The Anointing with Power—Christ Among the Children—His Love for the Childlike—The Ordeal of Self-sacrifice—Lessons of Suffering and Service—A Blessed Exchange—An Incident at Bethshan—How far Faith will go—Jerusalem's Lost Opportunity—The Insulation of the Praying Soul—The Formalists and Freethinkers of Christ's Day—Directions for Defence—How to be Ready.

IN the early part of the year we were considering from the first part of St. Mark's Gospel, the mighty works both of miracles and of healing which Jesus wrought. During the past quarter, with the exception of the healing of Bartimeus, the portion of the Gospel of Mark, from which our lessons have been drawn, chapters 10 to 13, have been full of our blessed Lord's teaching.

Our golden texts harmonize beautifully one with the other, and also with these Scriptures. The American Committee has chosen Isa. 11:2, "And the Spirit of the Lord shall rest upon Him, the spirit of wisdom and understanding, the spirit of counsel and might, the spirit of knowledge and of the fear of the Lord." The English Committee have chosen Luke 4:32, "And they were astonished at His doctrine for His Word was with power." Christ is the Head of His body the church "as He is, so are we in this world" (1 John 4:17). He as Man was anointed with the Holy Ghost and through His anointing, wisdom, Holy Ghost wisdom, understanding, counsel, might, knowledge, the fear of the Lord were upon Him, and flowed out from Him. All which He received He received for us His members. "The precious ointment upon the head . . . ran down upon the beard, even Aaron's beard; and went down to the skirts of his garments" and so the anointing of Jesus descends upon His members, and as we are really united to Him, His anointing becomes our anointing, we partake in it. He said, "I can of mine own self do nothing." He spoke as Man, and those of us who know ourselves can most fully enter into this declaration, and say for ourselves, "I can of mine own self do nothing." But anointed, and coming out of His time of temptation in the power of the Spirit into Galilee we hear that men "were astonished at His doctrine; for His Word was with power." In order that any words we speak may be with power, we need to give place to the Holy Ghost and fall into our place fully as members of Christ's anointed body. In our own selves, by our own selves, we can do nothing.

In our first lesson we saw

CHRIST AMONG THE CHILDREN.

O how the old unbelieving ideas that the conversion of children is not to be believed in, vanish when he hear Him say "Suffer the little children to come unto Me and forbid them not; for of such is the kingdom of God:" how we see in all His life His condescension to the understanding and to the condition of those with whom He had to do meeting them where they were. He did not put the children through some stern exercise, and frighten them, but won their hearts by taking them up in His arms and blessing them. And then by making the children an example and saying "Whoever shall not receive the kingdom of God as a little child, shall in nowise enter therein," He showed how we may learn from the smallest, weakest and most ignorant. The most advanced souls are always the most teachable, the most holy ones are those who most readily see and admit where they have been wrong. God loves childlikeness, simplicity and openness, and those who most resemble Him like that which He likes.

Our next lesson was from the rich young man who lacked one thing, and that one thing was an all-inclusive one, the renouncement of all which he possessed, that he should be no more a rich young man, but a poor young man, and thus lose all his distinction, all which marked him. O how many there are who will sacrifice everything, even health and strength, rather than position. How many, even of those whose sins are pardoned, fail to renounce all for God, and remain before the world much as they were before. "It would seem so strange," they say, "if I were not to dress as others do," "it would be thought so strange if I did not go to such and such a worldly place, if I did not know what is passing in the world, if I did not understand a reference to some new book. I should not like to be peculiar: I should sink so much in the eyes of those around me if I gave up one of my servants that I might spend more in the direct service of God, it is expected of me to do such and such things." To all such the Lord Jesus says, "One thing thou lackest, go and sell all that thou hast; be content with what I have, give up all for Me, and I share all with thee." Blessed exchange, ourself for Himself, our possessions for His! The lesson on immediately followed, when our blessed Lord sought to teach His disciples the lesson of the cross, of His cup and His baptism, and of that paradox which seems to our carnal nature so inexplicable, "Whosoever will be great among you, shall be your minister; and whosoever of you will be the chiefest, shall be servant of all." Human nature seeks its own, vaunteth itself, is puffed up, seeks its own glory, values itself, and seeks to force others to value it; divine nature is the exact contrary, it seeks neither its own, nor its own glory, "beareth all things, believeth all things, hopeth all things, endureth all things."

Just in the midst of our Lord's teaching, the cry of blind Bartimeus found a willing response in the ears of Him who was anointed to preach "recovering of sight to the blind," and the incident of his healing, so full of teaching, both to the spiritually and physically blind, formed our next lesson. One day a friend who was present at one of our meetings at Bethshan, (the house for faith healing), remarked upon the request of one present for prayer which had been responded to by two who were present, "You prayed as though you quite believed that the closed eye would be opened, does your faith go so far as that?" What a strange question to ask! What difference can it make to Him who created the whole world whether the eye on which the Creator of all sight is about to operate, is wholly or partially closed! how small such differences must be to Him! Let the eyes of our understanding be opened to know Him fully, and then minor differences in the diseases of spirit, soul, or body which we bring to His Almightyness, almost cease to be apparent;

WE HAVE TO DO WITH GOD.

After the healing of Bartimeus, our blessed Lord made His first and last triumphal entry into the city, over which He afterward wept, the city which knew not the time of her visitation. With what gladness would He have saved every soul in Jerusalem! how joyfully would He have swept away from her all disease and sickness, blindness, deafness, lameness, and that terrible possession by the devil or by evil spirits, of which we read so much in the New Testament! But although for a moment there was a cry of "Save now" [Hosanna] it died away, and in actual fact, few were healed, few saved, "the blind and the lame came to Him in the temple," it is true "and He healed them" (Matt. 21:14), but the great mass of Jerusalem citizens only asked the question, Who is this? and on finding it was neither warrior nor statesman, nor priest, nor Levite, only a prophet, and a prophet of Nazareth of Galilee, there was not in Him sufficient prestige to secure their further notice, and so the Deliverer and the deliverance passed away from them. Not however until, in the incident of the fig-tree, He had taught the nation a lesson, a lesson which the scattered Jews are practically learning even to this very day.

Our Lord's next lesson was on prayer and forgiveness. Prayer needs two conditions one is faith, the other a heart really right with God and man. Just as the telegraph wires except they are insulated from all conducting agencies, cannot convey the message, because the supply from the battery is dispersed so the Spirit of God cannot convey prayer through our hearts to God, nor yet His answer to us unless there is complete insulation from all foreign element. God means that prayer shall be prevailing. He has made provision that it shall be so. He wills that we should have power with Him and prevail, but in order that such a mighty power should be put into our hands, there must be nothing in us which does not work with God, no contrary current, nothing personal or for self, and therefore nothing contrary to love.

A great deal of our unbelief arises from the want of a really single eye. "Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God." Seeing Him, His side of every question, settles the matter, and we can understand, and build upon His words, "All things, whatsoever ye ask, when ye pray, believe that ye receive them, and ye shall have them." The doubt which takes the form of often arises from something really wrong, which needs setting really right, and when there is no allowed sin of temper, jealousy, evil-speaking, or other kind, then there is such an occupation with self as shuts out the sight of God. Really humble Christians are the boldest of all in prayer, while those who are afraid to go too far and to be presumptuous often think much more of their own attainments.

Our Lord's next teaching was about the wicked husbandman, the abused responsibility of the Jewish nation. This it was which roused the forces of the priests, scribes, elders, Pharisees, Herodians, and Sadducees to try and silence Him. The attacks began with the chief authorities; but His quotations from Scripture were unanswerable. They then sent some of the Pharisees, probably young students, "disciples of the Pharisees," and these were joined with the Herodians, a sect as unlike the Pharisees in doctrine as well could be. The Pharisees were the high churchmen of that day, the Herodians bordering on infidelity. But both were spiritually dead, and death combined against life. It was in vain: the Lord in words of wisdom put them to silence. He never entered into dispute with them, but He took high ground, above their limited horizon, and thus they could have nothing to say; and even when the Sadducees, the rationalists, the disputers and talkers of the day, came to the attack, they could not stand their ground.

Let us too never be dismayed. God has given us the promise that when we are brought "before rulers and kings," and most surely also before the cavillers and doubters in our own circle, "Whatsoever shall be given you in that hour, that speak ye: for it is not ye that speak, but the Holy Ghost;" and let us take care that we speak nothing which is not given us. The last of Christ's questioners brought forward with apparent honesty a question about the law, the "Thou shalt love" of our God; and having answered it Jesus took occasion to ask them a question, "What think ye of Christ?" Alas! this was a subject far from their thoughts. As the Son of David they knew Him by name, but the Christ was not the occupation of their thoughts, and thus He was among them and they knew Him not.

Our last two lessons concerned the coming of the Lord; the signs of His coming and our right attitude with regard to it. The state of the East at this very day seems an additional sign that the Lord is at hand. O to be found ready! (2 Pet. 3:14.) O to "be diligent that we may be found of Him in peace, without spot, and blameless!" O to be found with hearts just as He would have them when He comes, tongues and minds, hands and feet, occupied as He would have them! To have no money spent otherwise than will best prepare for His coming! How can this best be? Surely by being occupied with Him. He who is coming in glory is already here as our Wisdom, our Life, our Power, our all. Knowing Him as our indwelling Saviour and King, we shall be ready for Him as our Bridegroom; carrying out in a lost world His purposes, occupied with His interests, so we shall be found ready. "Even so, come Lord Jesus."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Reports from the Seat of War in Egypt indicate a check to the British advance in the direction of Cairo. The lengthy and detailed reports from the British camp are no longer sent to the newspapers, General Wolseley having subjected them to a censorship and limited each telegram to five hundred words. It is evident, however, that no progress has been made, and one report states that Arabi holds four positions from which he had been driven at an early stage of the campaign. An artillery duel is the name given to an action which took place on September 9th. Arabi's troops turned out for a reconnoissance of the British position, but were received by the Bengal troops, who sustained the shock of the Egyptian advance until reinforcements arrived from the rear, when the Egyptians were driven back to their intrenchments, from which a heavy and well-directed fire was kept up on the British position. These intrenchments are said to be enormously strong. The correspondent of the New York Tribune says: "They extend eight miles and are defended by black regiments—the flower of the Egyptian army—twelve or fifteen thousand regulars, the same number of irregulars, fifty guns and a few cavalry. If they are not overtaken by panic, the fight will be very severe and may last two days. Some mystery attaches to the movements of the Highland brigade, who were kept on ship-board at Ismailia, and a part of the Indian contingent, of whose precise whereabouts there is no information." The same correspondent also states that the delay in the advance, the unhealthy locality in which the British troops are stationed, and the attitude of the people all give rise to serious apprehension.

The Conference of Ministers at Constantinople convened to consider the Egyptian question has found no basis for united European action. The jealousy manifested by Russia at the action of England is unabated, and evidence is not wanting that France sympathizes with her. The Anglo-Turkish Convention is still unsigned, the difficulty in regard to the final signing of the draft being upon the question whether the Turkish troops, when they arrive at Port Said, will be allowed to disembark or be required to await instructions from General Wolseley. The Porte claims that it has proved its sincerity by proclaiming Arabi Pacha a rebel and that it is justified in expecting an immediate signing of the convention, but it is noteworthy that the Sultan does not explicitly denounce Arabi as a rebel in his proclamation, but merely states that the designs of Arabi Pacha justified his being described as a rebel. The embarkation of the Turkish contingent is consequently delayed pending the settlement of the difficulty.

The British Troops are in the Land of Goshen according to an article by an Egyptian scholar published in the London Daily News. He says: The field of Sir Garnet Wolseley's operations is the celebrated land of Goshen. The site of Ramesses is not a settled point; that was where the Israelites started from in the Exodus: the first march was to Succoth, the word means "tents," so it was probably only a camping ground. Etham was on the edge of the wilderness, or the desert; hence two marches brought them out of the black land of Khem, and into the sandy region. Pihahiroth, the next journey, was between Migdol and the sea, over against Baab Zephon. The maps given in Bibles generally place these names along the line from near Cairo to Suez, which will correspond with the Haj route of the present day, and the pilgrims when they start from Cairo to cross the desert, as they go in a body, bear many characteristics which suggest a resemblance to the account in Scripture of the Exodus.

A Party of Arabian Christians who Arrived last week at Castle Garden from Alexandria by way of Malta bore witness to the horrors which succeeded the bombardment. One of them said to a reporter who visited the party that they had seen natives departing from the city "loaded with booty, and the police only encouraged them and ridiculed them for not taking more. If a European showed himself out of doors he was pursued and beaten to death, and if the police rescued him they generally cut his throat themselves. We saw a man beaten to death in our street and a Greek flying with a score or two at his heels. After this had continued some time the soldiers were called out from the Ras-el-Tin, but instead of defending the Europeans they shot them down themselves. I do not believe the mob killed many in comparison with the soldiers. For five days we were kept in the city while all this was going on. Most of the Europeans sought refuge on their ships. But we had no resort. For a time the port was shut and we could not get away, but when it was opened we managed to get off without our property and fly to Malta."

A Serious Accident Occurred to an Excursion train on Sunday, September 3d, in Germany. The train which was running between Freiburg and Colmar left the rails near Hugstetten. There were twelve hundred persons on the train, fifty of whom are reported killed, and 300 injured. The accident was caused by a telegraph pole which had been struck by lightning and fell across the tracks, throwing nineteen of the cars off the rails. There were twenty-four cars on the train, and those thrown off the track shot down an embankment into a swamp, where their weight caused them to sink. The number of persons smothered in the deep mud cannot yet be ascertained.

The Difficulty with the Irish Police Issued in a renewal of the rioting in Dublin on Sunday, September 3d. Soon after midnight the Riot Act was read in Sackville Street and the street was cleared by continued charges of cavalry and infantry, in which three or four people, including a reporter, were wounded. There was an unfortunate affray in Capel Street. Thirty special constables were marching over Grattan Bridge on their way to the Green Street police station when they were hustled and assailed by a mob of roughs. One constable drew his revolver and fired three shots into the mob, severely wounding three men, and seventy-seven persons were injured with bayonet thrusts. The dismissed policemen memorialized Earl Spencer, who replied by reinstating about two hundred of them, excluding only the leaders. He granted the reinstated men a free pardon, but expressed regret and surprise that they should have been induced to take the step they did. Lord Spencer also promised that their grievances should be carefully considered.

The Nihilists are still Active in Russia in spite of the severe measures of the government. The Czar narrowly escaped death on Monday, September 4th, on his way to his palace at Gatchina after the conclusion of the army manoeuvres at Ishora. He and the empress were driven over a bridge constructed by the military across a ravine, and had only just reached the opposite side when the bridge fell into the ravine. It is stated that its demolition was effected by a torpedo placed under it for the purpose of injuring the Czar and the Grand Duke Michael. The Minister of War was swept from the bridge and severely injured.

A Desperate Attempt to Rescue an Imprisoned Nihilist was made recently at Saratoff in Russia. During the hour allowed the prisoner for exercise a cart containing two men drove up to the jail and made a signal to the prisoner, who was walking within the prison enclosure, guarded by a jailer. The prisoner at once threw sand in the eyes of the jailer and ran to the wall, while the men in the cart fired revolvers and mortally wounded the jailer. The liberated prisoner and his rescuers drove off, but were stopped by persons who witnessed the occurrence, and after a desperate struggle, in which one of the liberators was killed, the other two men were captured. The crowd tried to lynch them, but were prevented. The captured liberator states that he is the son of a landed proprietor.

Mr. Moody's Closing Service in Scotland is thus described in an English journal: "The very last evening in Scotland of this nine months' campaign came at length, and it cannot be said that Mr. Moody did not make the most of it. He spoke to a densely-crowded meeting of women only, who met in the George Street Free Church, Dumfries at six o'clock. His parting message to those who were not far from the kingdom was inexpressibly solemn and moving, and produced one result I had not seen equalled on any former occasion. When he asked those to rise who wished to be remembered in prayer, I should judge that about a third part of the great company of women stood on their feet. The circumstance that it was deep twilight, with the gas unlit, may have given unusual courage to some, but the fact remained, and testified to the great impression made by Mr. Moody's address. The after-meeting was large, and was continued for a considerable time. A large number of names and addresses of those spoken to were taken for future visitation. Having closed a day, memorable not only in itself, but in the fact that it terminated an evangelistic campaign that will not be forgotten while Scotland stands, Mr. Moody quietly retired to his hotel. In less than two hours he was on his way to London en route for the continent, where he will spend a brief period with his family before buckling on the harness at Swansea, South Wales."

During the Visit of Cetewayo the Captive King of the Zulus, to England, the Rev. A. C. MacLaglen, formerly a missionary in Zululand, presented him with a handsome Bible printed in the Zulu language, also seven copies of the Book of Common Prayer in Zulu, given for that purpose by the Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge. Cetewayo seemed much gratified at the gift, and remarked that this was the first Bible that had been presented to him since he had been in Great Britain. A Prayer-book was also given to each of the chiefs, and to every member of the suite, whereat one of the latter remarked, "It is high time we had something of this kind to read." A deputation from the National Temperance League waited on him to urge him to discontinue the use of ardent spirits in Zululand; but the queen had sent an artist that morning to take his portrait, and the king positively declined to see the deputation, stating that he could not disregard the wish "of his mother the queen," which was as urgent as a matter of life and death. Copies of the British Workman and other temperance publications were left for presentation to him.

The Health of Dr. Tait, Archbishop of Canterbury has improved during the past week. The apprehensions entertained have given place to a more hopeful feeling though his grace is not considered out of danger. Severe neuralgic headaches and nervous prostration are now the most serious symptoms of his condition.

An Accident Happened to the Rev. Joseph Cook during his journey to Australia from Japan. Mr. Cook was thrown down a hatchway during a storm with such violence that some of the muscles and cartilages of his ribs were torn asunder, and considerable surgical treatment was necessary. He soon recovered completely, and at last accounts was in excellent health.

Christian Work has been Commenced in Russia by a noble of the empire. Prince Galatzin, a young Russian nobleman who had a Bible given him at the Paris Exposition and was led to accept its truths, proposes to travel for some months through Russia for evangelistic work. He intends to build thirty Bible kiosks, and fit up seven carriages for religious books and tracts.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE year 1805 was a time of great disturbance in Germany; the French troops entered Stuttgart on July 16th, and there was a general panic. On that very day was born Christopher Blumhardt and in the very house in which he first saw the light a number of French soldiers were quartered, and the young mother and her newly-born son were disturbed by their inconsiderate revelry.

Christopher's father was a man of eminent piety. He was an overseer in the employ of a timber merchant, and his income was very small. He determined, however, that his boy should have a good education and he was therefore sent to school when he was only three years old and as the distance was too great for him to walk, he was carried to school on his father's shoulder, and was frequently brought back by the schoolmaster in the same way. (See frontispiece picture at the left-hand corner.) One day the latter said, as he set down his burden, "Here is your son, you must not bring him up as a mechanic; he must study; the boy has special gifts and may become something great." "How can I?" replied the father, "Where can I get the means?" "The means will soon be forthcoming," was the reply. "I am persuaded this boy will do great things. He must study, and God will provide for him. Only believe!" In due time Christopher was sent to the Gymnasium, or Public School, where he was placed on the free list.

SCHÖNTHAL SEMINARY.

From an early age Blumhardt took a great delight in his Bible, and had read it twice through from beginning to end before he was thirteen years old. The family being poor he soon learned to make himself useful in bringing home heavy logs of wood from the market, and splitting them into firewood for his mother's use, and in later life his small but muscular hand showed that it had grasped something heavier than a pen in early days. When fourteen years old he obtained a free nomination to the theological seminary at Schönthal. On his journey there he first met his lifelong friend Wilhelm Hoffmann, who subsequently became the court preacher at Berlin. It is told of him that Blumhardt and a friend arrived at a little village inn just before the Hoffmanns, father and son. The young men eagerly tried to secure for themselves the best accommodation, when the elder Hoffmann said mildly, "He who would be Christ-like will never take the best for himself, but give it up to others." This rebuke sank into Blumhardt's mind, and was the key-note of the whole of his after career.

UNIVERSITY LIFE AT TUBINGEN.

In the autumn of 1824 the two friends entered the University of Tübingen. At that time Hegel and Schelling were electrifying the students with their new rationalistic philosophy, and Hoffmann, for a time, fell under Schelling's influence, but Blumhardt's love for his Bible, constancy in prayer, and dislike of all that was purely conjectural, kept him from being carried away by the dangerous current. The trusting faith of his childhood remained unshaken amid the perils of the reckless criticism and infidelity which were then manifesting themselves. David F. Strauss, the æsthetic Vischer, and Gustavus Pfister, were among the circle of students gathered round the two friends. Blumhardt not only worked hard at his studies, but gave private lessons to support his now widowed mother. The intellectual many-sidedness of university life laid the foundation of that wide sympathy and extensive cultivation which afterward distinguished the "Pastor of Bad Boll."

FIRST CURACY.

In 1828, having successfully passed his examination, Blumhardt became curate to a former tutor, Professor Kern, in Dürrenz-Mühlacker. A friend, Dr. Gundert, relates how easily and quickly he won all hearts there, but he does not appear to have aimed so much at conversion among the people, as at preparing the way for future work. About this time his brother Carl, a mechanic in Basle, was converted, and wrote an earnest letter exhorting Christopher to repentance and faith in Jesus, not knowing that he had been anticipated by the Holy Spirit, and that his letter was needless. Blumhardt was overjoyed, and resolved to visit his brother.

TUTOR AT THE MISSIONARY COLLEGE.

At Basle he met his uncle, the Inspector of Missions, who offered him a tutorship in the missionary college there, which he accepted. A friend writes that he had much work laid upon him while at this post, but that he was always content and cheerful under the greatest pressure. Whatever he undertook he did with ease, and was beloved by all with whom he came in contact. Many persons, who had thought he owed his appointment to nepotism, acquired respect for his ability and worth when they became acquainted with him.

Sometimes he would go on a preaching tour in the country, driven by a young postboy. On one occasion this boy was so behind time as to put him to the greatest and most unjustifiable inconvenience. When at the last minute he appeared, Blumhardt gave vent to his displeasure, but suddenly stopped as he observed first an expression of surprise, then astonishment, and finally something like contempt, pass over the boy's face. Blumhardt saw that by his anger he had lost his place in the boy's esteem, owned to himself the lad had a right to his surprise, and felt ashamed, as he writes, "to his very skin."

MEETS HIS FUTURE WIFE.

In Basle he made the acquaintance of his future wife, Johanna Dorothea Köllner, a quiet thoughtful woman, whose idyllic dreams of a pastor's home were widely different from the real life of self-denial and unceasing toil which awaited her. Soon after their betrothal he accepted the curacy of Iptingen. The next year, 1838, he was called to the parish of Möttlingen, a village in the Black Forest of the Kingdom of Württemberg, and there, in the month of September, his uncle, Inspector Blumhardt, united him in marriage to the lady of his choice.

WORK AT MÖTTLINGEN.

Möttlingen had long enjoyed a succession of godly pastors, not the least of whom was Dr. Barth, his friend and predecessor. Yet an apathy had crept over the parish, and an unaccountable spirit of slumber had seized the whole congregation, and Blumhardt's simple preaching was unable to arouse those who were accustomed to sleep under Barth's eloquent energetic orations. But now we come to an episode which is a marked feature in this history.

A CASE OF DEMONIACAL POSSESSION.

In Möttlingen there lived a highly gifted and favorite scholar of Dr. Barth's, Gottlieb Dittus. She belonged to a family of poor orphans, had shattered health, and Barth, through his extensive acquaintance, often procured the best medical advice for her severe ailments. The family had just moved into a smaller house, when Gottlieb experienced all manner of strange sensations, and unaccountable noises were also heard in the house. These increased, as did also terrible fits and convulsions.

At first Blumhardt visited her but rarely, thinking her apparent dislike of him proceeded from self-righteousness and spiritual pride, but the remark of an earnest Moravian regarding her, "One would think there were no soul-seeker here" occupied him intensely, and he felt his responsibility before God. He was afterward led to recognize her case as a form of demoniactal possession; he became deeply interested in her, prayed earnestly for and with her; at last he bade her when apparently unconscious in the midst of a fit, clasp her hands and cry "Lord Jesus, help me," saying, "We have seen long enough what the devil can do, now we will see what Jesus can do!" In a few moments she roused herself, called on the name of Jesus, and the fit ceased at once. (This incident is illustrated in the left-hand corner of the upper portion of the front picture.) This was a turning point in Blumhardt's life. Having, as it were, in this remarkable manner, entered into

A HAND-TO-HAND FIGHT WITH SATAN, he felt he must carry it on at all hazards, and conquer or die.

A quiet interval was followed by fresh and more violent fits. Gottlieb's whole body was affected and she uttered words not her own, in varying voices unlike her own. Two of his parishioners stood by Blumhardt all through this trying time as his helpers by prayer and faith. The trio were often called to the sufferer's side at all hours of the day or night, and the one remedy invariably employed was the prayer of faith, in the name of Jesus, and it was always sufficient. Another respite of several weeks ensued, during which she so far recovered as to walk about, and Blumhardt rejoiced. But in August 1842, the malady returned with redoubled violence, many symptoms recalling the old Biblical accounts of possession by the devil. Almost in despair he was tempted to give up the struggle, but finally resolved to continue, trusting in Him who answers prayer saying, "The Lord will do as He has promised."

A FEARFUL NIGHT.

There was one fearful night, when Gottlieb attempted self-destruction in various ways, but by the following evening she was again restored, and one of the worst symptoms of her illness disappeared from that time. But the voices continued speaking through her as through an instrument, and sought to engage Blumhardt in conversations which recall the demoniac of Gadara. For the third time the power of Jesus' name brought some quiet weeks, followed by a renewal of the struggle so intense, that for many days Blumhardt could only cry to the Lord with all his might, that He who had formed all things out of nothing, would turn to nothing these things which were wrought by the craft of the devil.

Many severe diseases now supervened, and Gottlieb seemed near her death. She was said to be dying from self-inflicted wounds. Blumhardt was summoned in haste; he threw himself on his knees and cried mightily to the Lord, and then, strong in faith, sent word "Gottlieb must rise and come to me: she can do it by faith." She came. In December the long struggle was brought to a close. On Christmas-eve, with a superhuman voice, she exclaimed, "Jesus is conqueror; Jesus is conqueror." The words resounded through the still night: and caused profound awe wherever heard. Gottlieb now fully recovered her health of mind and body, and lived for many years at the parsonage, sharing in all the household work.

A REMARKABLE REVIVAL.

From the time that the evil spirits were cast out of Gottlieb, there arose a marked religious revival in Möttlingen. Many were deeply moved by the sermon on the following day from the Song of Mary (Luke 2), and there was a general disposition prevalent to make confession of sin and ask the pastor to give assurance to the penitent that God had forgiven him. One after another of the Confirmation class wrote letters to their pastor, confessing sins hitherto concealed. On New Year's Eve one of the parishioners paid him an unusual call; he came to humble himself on account of sin, and to ask, could there be forgiveness for such as he?—for eight nights he had been unable to sleep. Blumhardt was at first suspicious, then convinced of the man's sincerity he prayed with him. A second time he came to confess worse sins, whose very existence Blumhardt had not suspected in his parish, and to beg for the pastor's intercession. This was the second turning-point in Blumhardt's life.

A PHARISEE'S CONFESSION.

And now began a deep revival work. Day by day the parsonage sitting-room was filled with anxious souls, waiting their turn to go into the little study. During some months, the people were with him daily, with but little intermission, from six in the morning until half-past eleven at night; the children held little meetings of their own, where all rayed in turn; by Easter the whole parish, with a few exceptions, had come under the influence of the revival. Yet all was exceedingly quiet; there was no attempt to work upon the people's feelings. But though Blumhardt urged no one to confession, he was inexorable toward half-heartedness on the part of a penitent who professed a desire to confess. "Say that which you do not willingly say," was his advice. A friend accompanying Blumhardt to an out-lying hamlet writes: "When the school bell rang, the people came from the fields with their carts and implements, though it was ten o'clock in the morning. Out of two hundred and fifty inhabitants, one hundred and fifty were present at the Bible reading. And that joy was on their faces, what light in their eyes; it was the sunbeam of the 'new creation' in these sunburnt faces of men and boys." And this was on a week-day!

EXTRAORDINARY FAITH CURES.

Simultaneously with this revival began the faith cures so intimately associated with Blumhardt's name. Many had experienced unexpected bodily healing as well as spiritual peace through his instrumentality. The sick, lame, blind, consumptive and otherwise diseased, gathered from all parts. One Sunday a peasant lad came a distance of three miles, carrying on his back his lame, deformed brother; the two returned walking beside each other, and soon this hunchback was made upright and strong. (This scene is illustrated at the left lower panel of the frontispiece.)

A young man in consumption, given up by his physician, came seeking healing; his bright, cheerful face was in strong contrast to his hollow voice. After the sermon he was silent, an arrow from God's hand had pierced his soul: "I ought to be very different," he murmured, and seemed to have forgotten about his illness. Humbly and quietly he sought Blumhardt's study, that evening he was a new man, and the spiritual cure was effected; "He was like an angel among us," was the after testimony of his companions. He returned in good health to his former employment, able to sing to his heart's content.

The Presbytery hearing of these occurrences summoned Blumhardt to desist from receiving or even speaking and praying with the sick of other parishes. He obeyed for a time, but the cures continued to take place under his simple preaching. God's providence delivered him from the plots of other enemies. A written paper was found at his door one morning to say the writer had entered his house with murderous intent, and had remained some time concealed in the roof awaiting an opportunity to effect his purpose, but his conscience had been awakened and he could no longer remain to carry out his purpose.

The Sabbath services were preceded by a prayer-meeting and Bible-reading on Saturday night. When the number of visitors to the church grew too large, Blumhardt persuaded his people to give up their seats, under promise of a third service for themselves. This they did, filling the churchyard with their chairs, and often in the rain, with their umbrellas. The children's catechising was followed by this third service, when the parishioners and visitors changed places. Where did they all sleep? Every house in Müttingen was open to them. The women slept on shake-downs on the cottage floors, the men in the haylofts or often in the wood. The parsonage table was free to all who desired to partake of the simple meal of soup, potatoes, and meat. Beloved and trusted as a father throughout the "Forest," Blumhardt was unanimously chosen Deputy, and had some difficulty in declining the unwelcome honor.

REMOVAL TO BAD BOLL.

Finding his house far too small for the constantly growing number of sick who came to board with him, and feeling the weight of his parish work in addition too great a burden, Blumhardt resigned his living, and with the help of a friend purchased from the Government Bad Boll, a large building close by a sulphur spring. Here he and his family, accompanied by Gottlieb, her brothers and sister, removed in 1852.

This change of residence altered the character of his work. Being no longer a simple pastor, but head of an establishment, many sought him for bodily healing, as though he were a worker of miracles, without any concern for the needs of their souls. In such cases there was little or nothing to be done, and they would leave saying Blumhardt had lost his power. In one sense, too much was expected from his gift of healing; because those who sought it looked to him instead of to God for deliverance.

MORBID CASES.

With morbid, nervous cases, Blumhardt made short work. One such who came to detail all her troubles and symptoms was cut short with, "Dear child, just now I have no time. The Lord bless thee, and take away all these things." Hurt—almost angry—she left the room, but "these things" were taken away. Another, liable to fits of nervous irritability, sent for him to her room. He listened patiently to her description and saying simply, "Yes, the Lord will set all that right; I will pray earnestly for you," left the room. The invalid, who had consulted all the advisers, medical and spiritual in Würtemberg, despised this simple speech, but the paroxysm was gone, to return no more.

Blumhardt's family grew up and settled near him, the elder sons helping him in his work; Gottlieb married the bailiff, and became the mother of three children. Subsequently, after an illness of two years, she died. Her loss was severely felt by the little band of believing souls who had worked and wrestled together with her through so many conflicts. After thirty years of incessant labor, and when Blumhardt's head was whitened with the snows of age, his life was as laborious as ever.

A YOUTHFUL MANIAC.

Round his table all ranks were gathered, from members of princely and royal families to the country farmers and peasants. The tone of the conversation was free, natural and yet holy. Throughout the day his time was devoted to the invalids. From nine in the evening till two A. M., he worked at his large and increasing correspondence with those who could not personally visit him; and sometimes the telegraph was employed to ask his prayers in urgent cases. Often his patience and faith were taxed to the uttermost. A closed carriage drove up one day to Bad Boll, a couple stepped out, and there remained something behind under a rug. That something was a boy ten years old, stark naked, for he would bear no clothes. His language was furious and terrible beyond description. The mother remained to nurse him, and they were given a large ground-floor room.

Blumhardt visited him frequently until the boy, whose name was John, gave him a severe kick which caused him much suffering. Then his son, Christopher Blumhardt, took charge of him and visited him thrice daily, without any effect. At last John made friends through the window with a child of Gottlieb's, of his own age, and was bribed by him with fruit to put on clothing. As a reward, he was allowed to walk in the garden with his little friend; presently when John began to insult and abuse the gardener's son, the latter enraged, struck him senseless to the ground with a mallet. The doctor pronounced the skull fractured, and said, the case was hopeless, and that in a few hours the boy must die. The Blumhardts sat silently beside him for two hours, and then the elder withdrew. Immediately afterward John asked for water, in a perfectly natural voice. Christopher Blumhardt gave it him, and hurried to tell his father, "John is healed!" And so it was: in two days he was able to greet Blumhardt with the other children. (These episodes are illustrated at the right hand corner of the lower portion of the front picture.)

In addition to all these labors, Blumhardt was an author. Beside his published sermons, he wrote a "Handbook of the History and Geography of Missions," and several poems and hymns, setting these to tunes of his own composition. His style of preaching was original and forcible, and drew large audiences wherever he went.

CLOSING SCENE.

And now we come to the closing scene of his life. His strength had been failing for some time, and notwithstanding his marvellous self-control, it was apparent in the beginning of 1880 that pain and disease were gaining ground. On Sunday, the 15th of February, he preached his last sermon from the text in Psalm 27: 7, 8. He had arranged to hold a Communion that day, out of the usual course; it was a specially hallowed time. The next Saturday, though inflammation of the lungs had already set in, he persisted in holding the evening Bible-reading on Psalm 46: 1; but this exertion was too much for him; he was henceforth a dying man. His prayer on his death-bed was, that the Lord would have mercy upon all men. It had long been on his heart that the Lord would not suffer any to perish. His wife was in a distant room, so dangerously ill that she could not be carried to him to share his last moments, and they who had been so much to each other in life, might not be together in death. He fell asleep, February 25th, 1880, blessing his sons like an old patriarch.

THE SECRET OF HIS POWER.

In writing of him last year, his brother C. H. Blumhardt, says: "The secret of his power and success lay in his habitual converse with God in prayer and communion with Him, and in his child-like, but firm, belief in the stupendous doctrine of Christ's atoning sacrifice for the sins of a guilty world."

It is remarkable that in these last days Healing by Faith without medicine is being experienced increasingly in many places. In America Dr. Cullis has been enabled to do a great work as described last week, and reports of numerous incontestable cases of remarkable cures come continually from the principal House of Faith Healing in London, Bethshan, conducted by Dr. and Mrs. W. E. Boardman, Mrs. M. Baxter, and Miss Murray.

A Sane Millionaire Confined in an Asylum for the insane in France is endeavoring to regain his liberty. He is the son of a deceased merchant who resided at Marseilles, France, who dying left a fortune worth twelve and a half million dollars. The generally admitted facts seem to be these: M. Jean Mistral, when twenty-three years of age, fell in love with the daughter of a Polish exile, and married her against his father's will. The father was not to be moved by the entreaties of the young couple, and left them to beg their bread. As the marriage had been celebrated in Poland, he contrived to have it declared null and void, and then, after several violent scenes with his son, induced a doctor to sign a certificate of his son's insanity. The young man was shut up in the asylum, and though his father bequeathed him the whole of his fortune, there he has remained ever since. During that time his fortune has been administered by his family, who in order to secure the control of his estates have perpetuated the wrong committed by his father.

A Heathen African Woman was Converted

by means of a picture a short time ago. Archdeacon Johnson, writing from the Upper Niger, relates that a woman by the name of Ekubie gave up idol-worship, and brought her gods to the catechist. She was converted by means of a picture. Once, on entering the mission-house, she saw a picture on the wall. It was the picture a copy of which may be seen in any German print-seller's store in America, of Jesus sitting before a table in the attitude of blessing a loaf of bread, which He held in His hand, and a cup before Him. Mr. Fyne, a missionary, patiently explained who Jesus Christ was—"the Saviour of men, who came to this world, and died to take away sin." Gradually the woman became interested, and at length she asked, "Did He die for me too?" "Yes," was the immediate reply, "and if you believe in Him, He will save you." So the conversation went on, until at last the poor heathen woman resolved to give up heathenism and embrace Christ, and found great joy in His salvation. When I left Onitsha a few days ago, none was more earnest in proclaiming the love of Christ than Ekubie.

HOMESICKNESS.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon last Sunday Morning,
September 24, 1882.

"I will arise and go to my father."—LUKE 15: 18.
The Pangs of Hunger—A Contemptible Business—A Persecutor and the Mirror—The Prodigal's Resolution—I. Formed in Disgust—When Men Want a Physician—Napoleon's Conquest of the Alps—II. Formed in Sorrow—III. In a Feeling of Homesickness—A Sailor's Prayer in the Shrouds—A Liverpool Boy's Rescue from the Sea—IV. Immediately Put Into Execution—Twelve Graves at East Hampton—Almost Saved—Two Prodigals—A Desolated Virginia Home—An Englishman's Runaway Sons—A Sailor in Irons—The Full Pardon of the Gospel.

I TAKE another lesson from the inexhaustible parable of the Prodigal Son, and every time I preach on any part of this parable, I feel as though I were only dipping a chalice into an ocean.

It is nearly fourteen years since I began to preach the Gospel of Jesus Christ in this place, and some may have wondered why vast multitudes have come here, and why still they come Sabbath morning by Sabbath morning and Sabbath night by Sabbath night I believe it is because they want the Gospel 1800 years old, the Gospel 6000 years old, an intimation of it given at the Garden of Eden, and that there are so many people who want their sorrows comforted by this Gospel, and so many people who are down in sin who want to get rid of their iniquities, and so they come year after year to receive the message.

There is nothing like hunger to take the energy out of a man. A hungry man can toil neither with pen nor hand nor foot. There has been many an army defeated not so much for lack of ammunition as for lack of bread. It was that fact that took the fire out of this young man of the text. Storm and exposure will wear out any man's life in time, but hunger makes quick work. The most awful cry ever heard on earth is the cry for bread.

A traveller tells us that in Asia Minor there are trees which bear fruit looking very much like the long bean of our time. It is called the carab. Once in a while the people reduced to destitution would eat these carabs, but generally the carabs, the beans spoken of here in the text, were thrown only to the swine and they crunched them with great avidity. But this young man of my text could not even get them without stealing them. So one day amid the swine troughs he begins to soliloquize. He says: "These are no clothes for a rich man's son to wear; this is no kind of business for a Jew to be engaged in—feeding swine; I'll go home, I'll go home; I will arise and go to my father."

I know there are a great many people who try to throw a fascination, a romance, a halo about sin; but notwithstanding all that Lord Byron and George Sand have said in regard to it, it is a mean, low, and putting food and fodder into the troughs of a herd of iniquities that root and wallow in the soul of man is a very poor business for men and women intended to be sons and daughters of the Lord Almighty. And when this young man resolved to go home, it was a very wise thing for him to do, and the only question is whether we will follow him.

Satan promises large wages if we will serve him; but he clothes his victims with rags, and he pinches them with hunger, and when they start out to do better he sets after them all the bloodhounds of hell. Satan comes to us to-day and he promises all luxuries, all emoluments if we will only serve him. Liar, down with thee to the pit! "The wages of sin is death." O! the young man of the text was wise when he uttered the resolution: "I will arise and go to my father."

In the time of Mary, the persecutor, a persecutor came to a Christian woman who had hidden in her house for the Lord's sake one of Christ's servants, and the persecutor said: "Where is that heretic?" The Christian woman said: "You open that trunk and you will see the heretic." The persecutor opened the trunk, and on the top of the linen of the trunk he saw a glass. He said: "There is no heretic here." "Ah!" she said, "you look in the glass and you will see the heretic!" As I take up the mirror of God's word to-day, I would that instead of seeing the prodigal of the text, we might see ourselves—our want, our wandering, our sin, our lost condition, so that we might be as wise as this young man was and say: "I will arise and go to my father."

I. The resolution of this text was at his present circumstances. If this young man had been by his employer set to culturing flowers, or training vines over an arbor, or keeping account of the pork market, or overseeing other laborers, he would not have thought of going home. If he had had his pockets full of money, if he had been able to say, "I have a thousand dollars now of my own; what's the use of my going back to my father's house? do you think I am going back to apologize to the old man? why he would put me on the limits; he would not have going on around the old place such conduct as I have been engaged in; I won't go home; there is no reason why I should go home; I have plenty of money, plenty of pleasant surroundings, why should I go home." Ah! it was his pauperism, it was his beggary. He had to go home.

Some man comes and says to me: "why do you talk about the ruined state of the human soul? why don't you speak about the progress of the nineteenth century, and talk of something more exhilarating?" It is for this reason; a man never wants the Gospel until he realizes he is in a famine-struck state. Suppose I should come to you in your home and you are in good, sound, robust health, and I should begin to talk about medicines, and about how much better this medicine is than that, and some other medicine than some other medicine, and talk about this physician and that physician. After a while you would get tired, and you would say: "I don't want to hear about medicines. Why do you talk to me of physicians? I never have a doctor." Suppose I come into your house and I find you severely sick, and I know the medicines that will cure you, and I know the physician who is skillful enough to meet your case. You say: "bring on all that medicine, bring on that physician. I am terribly sick and I want help." If I came to you and you feel you are all right in body and all right in mind, and all right in soul, you have need of nothing; but suppose I have persuaded you that the leprosy of sin is upon you, the worst of all sickness, O! then you say: "bring me that balm of the Gospel, bring me that divine medicament, bring me Jesus Christ."

But says some one in the audience, "how do you prove that we are in a ruined condition by sin?" Well, I can prove it in two ways, and you may have your choice. I can prove it either by the statements of men, or by the statement of God. Which shall it be? You all say, "let us have the statement of God." Well, He says in one place: "the heart is deceitful above all things and desperately wicked." He says in another place: "what is man that he should be clean? and he which is born of a woman, that he should be righteous?" He says in another place: "there is none that doeth good, no, not one." He says in another place: "as by one man sin entered into the world, and death by sin; and so death passed upon all men, for that all have sinned."

"Well," you say, "I am willing to acknowledge that, but why should I take the particular rescue that you propose?" This is the reason: "Except a man be born again he cannot see the kingdom of God." This is the reason. "There is one name given under Heaven among men whereby they may be saved." Then there are a thousand voices here ready to say: "well, I am ready to accept this help of the Gospel; I would like to have this divine cure; how shall I go to work?" Let me say that a mere whim, an undefined longing amounts to nothing. You must have a stout, tremendous resolution like this young man of the text when he said: "I will arise and go to my father."

"O!" says some man, "how do I know my father wants me? how do I know, if I go back, I would be received?" "O!" says some man, "you don't know where I have been; you don't know how far I have wandered; you wouldn't talk that way to me if you knew all the iniquities I have committed." What is that flutter among the angels of God? It is news, it is news! Christ has found the lost.

"Nor angels can their joy contain,
But kindled with new fire;
The sinner lost, is found, they sing,
And strike the sounding lyre."

When Napoleon talked of going into Italy, the said: "You can't get there; if you knew what the Alps were you wouldn't talk about it or think of it; you can't get your ammunition wagons over the Alps." Then Napoleon rose in his stirrup and waving his hand toward the mountains he said: "There shall be no Alps." That wonderful pass was laid out which has been the wonderment of all the years since—the wonderment of all engineers. And you tell me there are such mountains of sin between your soul and God, there is no mercy. Then I see Christ waving His hand toward the mountains, I hear Him say, "I will come over the mountains of thy sin and the hills of thine iniquity." There shall be no Pyrenees, there shall be no Alps.

II. Again, I notice that this resolution of the young man of the text was at his misbehavior. It was not mere physical plight. It was grief that he had so maltreated his father. It is a sad thing after a father has done everything for a child to have that child be ungrateful.

"How sharper than a serpent's tooth, it is,
To have a thankless child."

That is Shakespeare. "A foolish son is the heaviness of his mother." That is the Bible. Well, my friends, have not some of us been cruel prodigals? Have we not maltreated our Father? And such a Father! So loving, so kind. I He had been a stranger, if He had forsaken us; if He had flagellated us, if He had pounded us and turned us out of doors on the commons, would not have been so wonderful—our treatment of Him; but He is a Father so loving, so kind and yet how many of us for our wanderings have never apologized. We apologize for wrongs done to our fellows, but some of us perhaps have committed ten thousand times ten thousand wrong against God and never apologized.

III. I remark still further, that this resolution of the text was founded in

A FEELING OF HOMESICKNESS.

I do not know how long this young man, how many months, how many years, he had been away from his father's house; but there is something about the reading of my text that makes me think he was homesick. Some of you know what that feeling is. Far away from home sometimes, surrounded by everything bright and pleasant—plenty of friends—you have said: "I would give the world to be home to-night." Well, this young man was homesick for his father's house. I have no doubt when he thought of his father's house he said "Now, perhaps, father may not be living."

We read nothing in this story—this parable founded on everyday life—we read

NOTHING ABOUT THE MOTHER.

It says nothing about going home to her. I think she was dead. I think she had died of a broken heart at his wanderings, or perhaps he had gone into dissipation from the fact he could not remember a loving and sympathetic mother. A man never gets over having lost his mother. Nothing said about her here. But he is homesick for his father's house. He thought he would just like to go and walk around the old place. He thought he would just like to go and see if things were as they used to be. Many a man after having been off long while, has gone home and knocked at the door, and a stranger has come. It is the old homestead, but a stranger comes to the door. He finds out father is gone, and mother is gone, and brothers and sisters all gone. I think this young man of the text said to himself: "Perhaps father may be dead." Still, he starts to find out. He is homesick. Are there any here to-day homesick for God, homesick for Heaven?

A sailor, after having been long on the sea, returned to his father's house, and his mother tried to persuade him not to go away again. She said: "now you had better stay at home; don't go away, we don't want you to go; you will have it a great deal better here." But it made him angry. The night before he went away again to sea, he heard his mother praying in the next room, and that made him more angry. He went far out on the sea and a storm came up, and he was ordered to very perilous duty, and he ran up the ratlines and amid the shrouds of the ship he heard the voice that he had heard in the next room. He tried to whistle it off, he tried to rally his courage; but he could not silence that voice he had heard in the next room, and there in the storm and the darkness he said: "O! Lord, what a wretch I have been, what a wretch I am. Help me just now, Lord God." And I thought in this assemblage to-day there may be some who may have the memory of a father's petition, or a mother's prayer pressing mightily upon the soul, and that this hour they may make the same resolution I find in my text, saying: "I will arise and go to my father."

A lad at Liverpool went out to bathe, went out into the sea, went out too far, got beyond his depth and he floated far away. A ship bound for Dublin came along and took him on board. Sailors are generally very generous fellows, and one gave him a cap and another gave him a jacket, and another gave him shoes. A gentleman passing along on the beach at Liverpool found the lad's clothes and took them home, and the father was heartbroken, the mother was heartbroken at the loss of their child. They had heard nothing from him day after day, and they ordered the usual mourning for the sad event. But the lad took ship from Dublin and arrived in Liverpool the very day the garments arrived. He knocked at the door and the father was overjoyed, and the mother was overjoyed at the return of their lost son. O! my friends, have you waded out too deep? Have you waded down into sin? Have you waded from the shore? Will you come back? When you come back will you come in the rags of your sin, or will you come robed in the Saviour's righteousness? I believe the latter. Go home to your God to-day. He is waiting for you. Go home!

IV. But I remark the characteristic of this resolution was, it was IMMEDIATELY PUT INTO EXECUTION.

The context says "he arose and came to his father." The trouble in nine hundred and ninety-nine times out of a thousand is that our resolutions amount to nothing because we make them for some distant time. If I resolve to become a Christian next year, that amounts to nothing at all. If I resolve to become a Christian to-morrow, that amounts to nothing at all. If I resolve at the service to-night to become a Christian, that amounts to nothing at all. If I resolve after I go home to-day to yield my heart to God, that amounts to nothing at all. The only kind of resolution that amounts to anything is the resolution that is immediately put into execution.

There is a man who had the typhoid fever. He said: "O! if I could get over this terrible distress: if this fever should depart, if I could be restored to health, I would all the rest of my life serve God." The fever departed. He got well enough to walk around the block. He got well enough to go over to New York and attend to business. He is well to-day—as well as he ever was. Where is the broken vow? There is a man who said long ago: "if I could live to the year 1882, by that time I will have my business matters all arranged, and I will have time to attend to religion, and I will be a good, thorough, consecrated Christian. The year 1882 has come. January, February, March, April, May, June, July, August, September—three-fourths of the year gone. Where is your broken vow?" "O!" says some man, "I'll attend to that when I can get my character fixed up, when I can get over my evil habits; I am now given to strong drink," or, says the man, "I am given to uncleanness," or says the man, "I am given to dishonesty. When I get over my present habits, then I'll be a thorough Christian." My brother, you will get worse and worse until Christ takes you in hand. "Not the righteous, sinners, Jesus came to call."

O! but you say: "I agree with you on all that, but I must put it off a little longer." Do you know there were many who came just as near as you are to the kingdom of God and never entered it? I was this summer at East Hampton and I went into the cemetery to look around, and in that cemetery there are side by side—the graves of sailors. This crew, some years ago, in a ship went into the breakers at Amaganset, about three miles away. My brother, then preaching at East Hampton, had been at the burial. These men of the crew came very near being saved. The people from Amaganset saw the vessel, and they shot rockets, and they sent ropes from the shore, and these poor fellows got into the boat, and they pulled mightily for the shore, but just before they got to the shore, the rope snapped and the boat capsized and they were lost, their bodies afterward washed up on the beach. O! what a solemn day it was—I have been told of it by my brother—when these twelve men lay at the foot of the pulpit and he read over them the funeral service. They came very near shore—within shouting distance of the shore, yet did not arrive on solid land. There are some men who come almost to the shore of God's mercy, but not quite, not quite. To be only almost saved is to be lost.

I will tell you of

the one that got back and the other that did not get back. In Richmond, Va., there is a very prosperous and beautiful home in many respects. A young man wandered off from that home. He wandered very far into sin. They heard of him often but he was always on the wrong track. He would not go home. At the door of that beautiful home one night there was a great outcry. The young man of the house ran down and opened the door to see what was the matter. It was midnight. The rest of the family were asleep. There were the wife and the children of this prodigal young man. The fact was he had come home and driven them out. He said: "Out of this house. Away with these children, I will dash their brains out. Out into the storm!" The mother gathered them up and fled.

The next morning, the brother, the young man who had stayed at home, went out to find this prodigal brother and son, and he came where he was, and saw the young man wandering up and down in front of the place where he had been staying, and the young man who had kept his integrity said to the older brother: "Here, what does all this mean? what is the matter with you? Why do you act in this way?" The prodigal looked at him and said: "Who am I? Who do you take me to be?" He said: "You are my brother." "No, I am not. I am a brute. Have you seen anything of my wife and children? are they dead? I drove them out last night in the storm. I am a brute. John, do you think there is any help for me? Do you think I will ever get over this life of dissipation?" He said: "John, there is just one thing that will stop this." The prodigal ran his finger across his throat and said: "That will stop it, and I'll stop it before night. O! my brain; I can stand it no longer." That prodigal never got home. But I will tell you of a prodigal that did get home.

In England two young men started from their father's house and went down to Portsmouth. The father could not pursue his children; for some reason he could not leave home, and so he wrote a letter down to Mr. Griffin, saying: "Mr. Griffin, I wish you would go and see my two sons. They have arrived in Portsmouth and they are going to take ship, and going away from home. I wish you would persuade them back." Mr. Griffin went and he tried to persuade them back. He persuaded one to go. He went with very easy persuasion because he was very homesick already. The other young man said, "I will not go. I have had enough of home. I'll never go home." "Well," said Mr. Griffin, "then if you won't go home, I'll get you a respectable position on a respectable ship." "No, you won't," said the prodigal: "no, you won't. I am going as a common sailor; that will plague my father most, and what will do most to tantalize and worry him will please me best."

Years passed on and Mr. Griffin was seated in his study one day when a message came to him saying there was on a ship at the dock—a young man condemned to death—who wished to see this clergyman. Mr. Griffin went down to the dock and went on ship-board. The young man said to him: "you don't know me, do you?" "No," he said, "I don't know you." "Why, don't you remember that young man you tried to persuade to go home and he wouldn't go?" "O! yes," said Mr. Griffin, "are you that man?" "Yes, I am that man," said the other. "I would like to have you pray for me. I have committed murder and I must die; but I don't want to go out of this world until some one prays for me. You are my father's friend and I would like to have you pray for me."

Mr. Griffin went from judicial authority to judicial authority to get that young man's pardon. He slept not night nor day. He went from influential person to influential person until in some way he got that young man's pardon. He came down on the dock and as he arrived on the dock with the pardon the father came. He had heard that his son under a disguised name had been committing crime and was going to be put to death. So Mr. Griffin and the father went on ship's deck, and at the very moment Mr. Griffin offered the pardon to the young man, the old father threw his arms around the son's neck and the son said: "Father, I have done very wrong and I am very sorry. I wish I had never broken your heart. I am very sorry." "O!" said the father, "don't mention it. It don't make any difference now. It is all over. I forgive you, my son," and he kissed him and kissed him and kissed him.

To-day I offer you the pardon of the Gospel—

FULL PARDON, FREE PARDON.

I do not care what your crime has been. Though you say you have committed a crime against God, against your own soul, against your fellow man, against your family, against the day of judgment, against the cross of Christ—whatever your crime has been, here is pardon, full pardon, and the very moment you take that pardon your heavenly Father throws His arms around about you and says: "My son, I forgive you. It is all right. You are as much in my favor now as if you had never sinned." O! there is joy on earth and joy in Heaven. Who will take the Father's embrace?

A Hunter in South Africa, named Farker

Gilmore, thus describes a missionary service at which he was present: "It is Sunday, the hour about three P.M. I have been resting in a wagon of Mr. Mackenzie's, when I become conscious that it is time for me to turn out, if I mean to attend worship. I leave the wagon, and in front of the house find four or five stalwart bronzed men assembled; some are seated on the terrace, others lounge upon the steps that lead up to it. I join the group. Few words are spoken; possibly nothing more than a bluff salute. Soon after, the minister comes forth and summons us to worship. With heavy tread and serious thoughts we enter the room where it is intended we should listen to Divine truths. Close to the table, on which is laid the Word of God, sits Mrs. Mackenzie; by her side are her children, bright, happy specimens of what we all were in the days of our childhood. A psalm is sung, the gruff voice of the wanderer mingles with the gentle cadence of the bonnie bairns. The pastor rises: no flowery language is in his mouth, but earnest truths that strike home to the heart; and see the bronzed and bronzed men, who fear nothing on earth, not the desert and its wild beasts, not the great thirst land nor its hardships, all intently listening, enjoying, and feeding on the precepts inculcated in the holy book. The service over, every one directs his steps to the traders' quarters, but for a while no one speaks, for each has been listening to solemn words of love and kindness faithfully expounded."

PROPHETIC NOTES ON PASSING EVENTS.

By Rev. M. Baxter.

THE SEPARATION OF SYRIA

from Turkey as one of Alexander's four-horn kingdoms (Daniel 8:9) is certain to occur within a year or two. It is stated that the new French Government will shortly devote their whole energies to Syria. For the last two years there has been a marked revival of French activity in that part of Turkey. Since M. de Torcy, the French Military Attaché at Constantinople, went there on a secret political mission in 1880, the consular agents of France have been engaged in a propagandist campaign with which no change of ministry has interfered. There can be little doubt that France has established her influence predominantly among the Syrian Christians. One thing is certain, that in case of a Syrian outbreak, the Turkish garrison is far too small to resist a general Mussulman rising. French intervention would then follow as a matter of course. Already France has commenced a diplomatic correspondence with Turkey in reference to apprehended disturbances in Syria.

A MUSSULMAN OUTBREAK

is seriously apprehended by politicians before the end of the year. It will chiefly affect three powers—England, France, and Holland, the latter in its colonial possessions. Holland has long ceased to reckon with the Sultan in her efforts to check the progress of Pan-Islamism. Ten years ago the Dutch Government took stringent measures for nipping Pan-Islamism in the bud. Had it been of local growth they might have been successful, but it was unfortunately an evil common to all countries where there are followers of Mahommed. The Sultan's waning influence among those who recognized him as Caliph is no longer a factor which any power need seriously take into account. His religious prestige has been steadily decreasing since the Ottoman reverses of 1877, and is not likely to survive the pending agitation in the Mussulman world and its probable consequences. Yet the bulk of the mischief has been wrought from Constantinople. The paid emissaries of the Porte have for several years past been scouring the East in every direction, and have penetrated to the most remote parts of British and Dutch India. They have roused Mussulman fanaticism, but they have not furthered the cause of the Sultan of Turkey. Abdul Hamid could not have committed himself to a more suicidal policy than that of stirring up Pan-Islamic fanaticism. The rallying-point of the different branches of Islamism is not the Caliph's authority, but hatred and contempt of other religious creeds. By exciting the religious zeal of the Mussulman world the Sultan has merely paved the way for the intervention of the interested Christian Powers in his own realms and has undermined his own position as Caliph.

THE SYRIAN MUSSULMANS

are in a state of excitement and strongly in favor of Arabi. The national party believes the moment for action to be near at hand. The extermination of all Christians is the leading feature of its programme. This may be ascertained every day in the Mussulman coffee-houses. The Christians are in constant fear, and are providing themselves with arms and ammunition. There is now hardly a Christian house in Syria which does not contain firearms of some sort. Excitement on both sides having reached a high pitch, it would only require an unimportant incident to bring about a massacre and ignite a conflagration. The Turkish Government's conduct is well calculated to push the Christians to extremities. The oppression and injustice which they exercise throughout the country are without precedent. The lower officials are fanatical partisans of Arabi Pacha and of the extermination of the Christians. Their attitude encourages the Mussulmans and exasperates the Christians. The situation in Syria is such that a trifling incident would suffice to set the whole province in a blaze. In the mosques at Damascus sermons are preached holding up Arabi as a champion of the Moslem faith. All these facts show that the predicted crisis in the Mohammedan world is close at hand, and its consequences will result in the rearrangement of the maps of Europe, Asia and Africa, and the establishment of the ten-kingdomed confederacy.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Reformed Inebriate's Mission.—At a recent meeting in Glasgow, Mr. J. F. Shorey, said: "Six years ago, in the city of New York, I was what is called a confirmed drunkard. I did not think it possible to become better, and expected to die drunk. In answer to my mother's prayers, I was led into one of Moody and Sankey's meetings and in that hall, even although I was under the influence of drink, I was converted, and, what is more, God has kept me ever since then, and taken away the desire for strong drink from me altogether. Mr. Moody told me to tell everywhere what the Lord has done for me, and I do it."

An Angel in the Marble.—The Rev. Mr. Duncan said: "A sculptor saw a piece of marble in a heap of rubbish. He was so absorbed gazing at it, that a friend asked, 'What do you see in that block of marble with which you seem so fascinated?' 'I see an angel in it.' Now, just as clearly as that artist saw in his mind the statue which was not yet in existence, can you also see the beauty of Christ's life, and if you endeavor to enter into the Spirit of Jesus you will be so strongly drawn out toward Him, that all men will know that you have been with Him."

Mother's Coffin.—Mr. Mabon related the following personal incident: "Seventeen years ago I do not think there was a worse sinner out of hell than myself, but all this long time, and in the face of gravest temptations, the Lord has kept me, and He has graciously blessed my efforts on behalf of others, making me the means of bringing many of my relations into the kingdom of Christ, among the rest, my own dear aged father. It was with my arms stretched across my dead mother's coffin that I found rest in Jesus. She was a good, indulgent mother to me, and my heart was broken by her death, but the gracious One healed it, and made it His own evermore."

A "Crusty" Christian.—Mr. Pentecost said: "I have a friend in Boston, who is as crusty a man as you will find anywhere. He is a Christian, and desirous of doing good, but his manner is so brusque, and to many offensive, that I think he does nearly as much harm as he does good. I have another friend, who is also a Christian, and quite as strong in the long run as my other friend, but so gentle and courteous that people are insensibly drawn to him, and he is instrumental in winning many men to Christ. Christians should get rid of all their offensive and objectionable manners, or they will have to answer for them at the judgment."

A Cabman's Friend.—Mr. Jack said: "A poor cabman came into the circus one night when Mr. Moody was speaking in it, and was very much affected by the words of truth which he heard. A Christian lady, of whom it is impossible to speak too highly, sat down alongside this cabman, who was in a very wretched state of mind and body. His mind was tortured with anxiety, and his body was dressed in rags. This noble lady took him to her own home, made him bathe himself, and gave him clean clothing. Then she guided him to the fountain where he might wash and be cleansed from his covering of sin. Speak to every man whether he is drunk or sober, and ask the Lord to bless your work; it will not fall to the ground."

A Walk in the Park.—At the same Meeting Mr. Bradlaugh said: "When Mr. Moody was in England about eight years ago, two gentlemen were walking about one of the parks in London. One of them had been converted at Mr. Moody's meetings, and was pressing upon his companion the necessity of being converted. Speaking in vivid language of the pleasure of being a pardoned man, and the happiness and peace which he now enjoyed through a communion with God, his friend interrupted him by saying, 'Ah, but that is not for me; I don't believe in this whosoever doctrine.' 'It is scriptural, however.' 'Yes, it certainly is there; but I think it is limited to certain peculiar persons.' Fortunately they were passing a plot of rare flowers; in the centre was a placard which read, 'Whosoever tramples on or destroys these flowers will be prosecuted.' The Christian seized his companion's arm and said, 'Jump on these flowers.' 'Oh, no; I cannot do that! Do you not see that warning?' 'Yes, but how do you know applies to you?' 'Why, it says, "Whosoever tramples on these flowers will be prosecuted." 'Just so. The Bible also says, "Whosoever will let him take of the water of life freely." The Christian was triumphant; his friend accepted Christ's offer of pardon, and has been taking of the water of life freely since that day."

A Short Cut to Church.—Mr. Jack said: "An old minister told me that one of his flock was in the habit of taking a short cut from his house by a private footpath, as he was a very old man, feeble in bodily health, though strong and robust in spiritual faith and hope, carrying into practical every-day life the teaching of his well-beloved Master. One day the proprietor of the land ordered him never to come that way again. This act prevented the aged Christian attending church so frequently as he had hitherto done. When the minister condoled with him about the harsh conduct of the laird, the old man's reply was, 'Never mind, sir, it will not be so long, I'll be at home soon. Through Christ I know the short cut to Heaven as well as to church.'"

A Puzzled Peasant.—"While an eminent painter was examining a celebrated picture, a countryman approached him saying, 'What do you see there to engross you so much?' 'If you could understand it you would not require to ask such a question,' was the answer. 'How can I learn to understand it then?' inquired the peasant. 'By studying the rules of painting and cultivating your eyes to see the beautiful which you apparently cannot see just now.' If any one says, 'I cannot see anything in the Lord Jesus Christ to cause me to follow Him,' it is simply because you do not want to see. Open your eyes to the beauty of a meek and lowly spirit, to the loveliness of a self-sacrificing man, and He the only begotten Son of the Creator of the whole universe; then you will bow down in humble adoration at His feet, and beg that you may be permitted to lie there forever."

Beating about the Bush.—Mr. Campbell said: "Four young men were very anxious about the salvation of one of their companions. They set to work in a roundabout way to interest him in religion, but could make nothing of him. No matter how carefully their plans were laid, they always miscarried. At last the youngest of the four spoke to him directly about his soul; and, without beating about the bush, asked their friend to become a Christian. This method was successful; the young man gave himself up to Christ. Addressing the three others, he said, 'Do you fellows think I did not see through all your plans and laugh at them? I would never have become a Christian if you had continued acting as you were; it was simply amusing me, but the courage of this young fellow, and his straightforward way, reached me at once.'"

A Monarch and His Enemies.—Mr. W. F. Bradlaugh said: Just before Louis XII. ascended the throne of France he heard that there was a conspiracy against him. After he was raised to the throne he prepared a list of names of those whom he had cause to remember either for good or evil. Opposite the name of his enemies he put a black cross. When this was reported to them, every one of the conspirators fled for safety to other countries. But Louis sent trusty messengers after each one to request them to meet in his palace on a certain day, with the assurance that no harm would be done to them. On the appointed day they all met in the king's presence. Louis asked in a gentle voice, 'Friends, why did you flee from my court so suddenly?' One of the lords said, 'Sire, before we answer your question, will you graciously tell us the reason you put a black cross opposite our names on the list which you prepared?' 'Yes, I will tell you. My lords, I prepared that list for the purpose of laying it before God when I kneeled down in prayer at morning and night. I put the cross before the names of those who hated me to remind me to plead with God in the words of our Saviour, "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do." Are you ready to plead at the throne of grace for your enemies in the same way as our Saviour and this French king did for theirs? Ask yourselves the important question, What kind of forgiveness will get if I pray 'Forgive me as I forgive others.'"

A Conspirator Pardoned.—Mr. W. R. Bradlaugh said: "On one occasion when the Emperor Napoleon was riding through the streets of Paris, a young girl rushed out of the midst of the crowd which lined the street, and falling upon her knees cried, 'Sire, pardon my father! oh, pardon my father!' The Emperor bent down and asked, 'What is your name?' 'Le Julien, Sire.' 'Le Julien! Your father has already conspired three times against the State, and justice demands that he die.' 'Sire, I do not ask justice, but mercy.' The Emperor was moved with compassion, and granted the boon so eagerly craved by the daughter for her father. Do you not think if a man had such pity in his heart, that he forgave one of his worst enemies, simply because a young girl prayed for it, that God will not forgive you whom He loves, if you turn to Him? Aye, He will grant you a pardon. It is yours, if you will accept it upon God's conditions of believing upon His dear Son."

ENGLAND IN PROPHECY.

By John M. Bright, M.D.

Magnitude of the Empire—The Sins of the Empire—Prophecies Relating to Britain—England the Modern Tarshish—The Burden of Tyre—The Prophet's Earliest Warning Fulfilled—The Instrument of the Judgment—Destruction of Tyre—The City of London and Rev. 18.

THE position of England, as foreshadowed in the prophecies of the last days, has hardly, I think, been sufficiently considered by many students of prophecy. Blessed in religious and civil liberty, and in domestic and social happiness, Englishmen have been accustomed, especially, in these latter days, to consider these blessings as of right belonging to them, and to think too little of the Giver of all Good, who can withhold His hand, as well as richly endow those who fear and honor Him.

The consideration of this question at the present time seems especially opportune, when England, by an extraordinary series of events, is placed in a position absolutely unique in her history. Confronted by rebellion scarcely veiled, in Ireland, to suppress which she is obliged to witness fifty thousand of her best troops helplessly locked up in barracks, she is engaged, at the same time, in a war in Egypt, to protect the Suez Canal and her vital interests in India. Coincidentally with these troubles, come mutterings of a storm at the Cape, and a fierce fanatical excitement in the Mahomedan world, which may lead at any moment to a terrible outburst in India.

MAGNITUDE OF THE EMPIRE.

A glance at the present position of the empire in face of these dangers may well fill the hearts of all patriotic Englishmen with anxiety for the future of their country. The British Empire, with its colonies and dependencies in Europe, Asia, Africa, America, and Australasia, has now an estimated total area of nearly nine millions of square miles; a population of more than three hundred millions; and an annual revenue estimated at more than one hundred and eighty-four millions sterling.

The population of London alone, with its suburbs, amounts to nearly five millions, and almost equals the aggregate population of the large continental cities of Paris, Berlin, Vienna, and St. Petersburg.

These figures present a result which is unparalleled in the history of the world. The British Empire is far grander than those of Assyria, Persia, Greece, or Rome, or any others that have ever existed, in the vast extent of its territory, in its enormous wealth, and above all in its beneficent rule, and in its great Protestant mission work of spreading the glad tidings of salvation throughout the world.

THE SINS OF THE EMPIRE.

Would that it could be said that, with all these marvelous blessings from Heaven, there was a corresponding zeal for the honor and glory of God! "O that there were such an heart in them, that they would fear me, and keep all my commandments always, that it might be well with them, and with their children for ever!" But, alas! sins of a terrible dye like crimson, stain the national character, and cry aloud to Heaven for judgment.

Drunkness is computed to be answerable for more than half the crime which exists, beside the misery and pauperism it entails upon thousands of innocent persons. Infidelity, scepticism, and a life without any pretence of religion are sapping the morals of vast numbers of people, so that doctrines which but a few years back would have been scouted as infamous are now openly advocated by thousands. The opium trade with China is annually counting its thousands of victims, while to the national disgrace it is boasted that it brings in a revenue of *eight and a quarter millions sterling!

Commercial fraud, dishonesty, and deceit, the false balance, and the unjust weight, the "falling away" from the truth and the religion of Christ, the selfishness, luxury, pride and extravagance of all classes, make up a terrible catalogue of sins against a nation professing Christianity. "Shall I not visit for these things, saith the Lord, shall not my soul be avenged on such a nation as this?"

Is it probable that a nation with such characteristics as these should pass unnoticed in the record of God's judgments upon the Gentile nations in the last days? We have a distinct account of His dealings with Judah and Israel, with Egypt, and Greece, with the great Fourth Empire of Daniel, and the Monster of Revelation, and lastly, with Gog and Magog; but is nothing said of England? Exalted to the highest pinnacle of glory among the nations, like a city set upon a hill which cannot be hid, will it retain its present proud position, or, like Capernaum to be thrust down to the lowest depths, and humbled in the dust?

We may then ask, Are there any prophecies which can be shown to refer to such a nation as England?

PROPHECIES RELATING TO BRITAIN.

If the visions of the nations in the last days, as recorded in Isaiah, Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Daniel, Zechariah and other prophets be yet future, then it is extremely improbable that ENGLAND, the greatest and proudest nation in the world, shall be omitted from all mention. Let us examine first, the prophecies of TYRE and TARSHISH, and I think it will be seen that a very remarkable accumulation of evidence points almost unmistakably to a nation in the last days holding a position exactly similar to that of England.

The main argument has been described by the Rev. W. Chamberlain, in his most able and exhaustive works, "On the Restoration of Israel," and "Isaiah's Call to England;" but the present object is to supplement this argument, and to show that the future of England seems not indistinctly foreshadowed in prophecy by evidence, which, although circumstantial, is clear and irresistible.

1. Tarshish, under its prophetic name is a nation of which some prophecies have been fulfilled, but of which some prophecies yet remain unfulfilled. For the prophecies concerning Tarshish and Tyre which have already been fulfilled see Isaiah 23 and Ezekiel 26. For the prophecies which are not yet fulfilled see Is. 2:16; 60:9; 66:19; Ezek. 27:38; 13; Ps. 48:7.

2. From an examination of these and other prophecies, it would seem that "Tarshish must be some maritime, commercial, manufacturing, colonizing, naval and warlike power, in such respects the greatest of its day; possessing a name

* To prevent any mistake on this point, the actual figures are as follows: "For the year ending March 31st, 1880, the net profit from the produce, from Bengal in British India, was £4,848,734; while that from Bombay, which is called Malwa opium, grown in the native states of Central India, was £3,141,347. In addition to this, opium to the value of £263,590 was issued to the excise department to meet the consumption in India itself. The total net revenue was therefore £8,253,671. Nearly the whole of this opium is exported to China, and is consumed by one million persons."

Well might Dr. Morley Punshon as a bitter reproach to the so-called Christianity of England, say, "All through China the brethren still deplore the blight of the opium traffic. A greater national calamity than famine—a calamity which enlightened heathens are urging a Christian nation, which first imposed it upon them, to remove."

and influence in the Mediterranean Sea, but placed among the 'Isles of the Gentiles,' the sons of Japhet, in the sea coasts or Islands of Europe, and beyond the 'Pillars of Hercules' or 'Straits of Gibraltar.' (Chamberlain.)

3. If the prophecies above referred to be yet future, and refer to any kingdom now existent in the world, there is but one great power acknowledged by all the world as the greatest maritime, commercial, colonizing, manufacturing, naval and warlike power of its day, in all respects a modern Tyre.

4. "This power is the only great maritime, commercial, and colonizing power, which is also naval and military, and as such pre-eminently distinguished in war, and which alone of all the European powers carries for her two Protestant divisions the Lion as her ensign."

5. Hence the expression "the merchants of Tarshish, with all the young lions thereof," of Ezek. 38, identifies Tarshish in prophecy unfulfilled with Great Britain.

6. Now it is expressly said of Tarshish, typically fulfilled by Tyre, that she was overthrown, and that her ships were destroyed. Compare Is. 23 with Ezek. 26, 27.

7. But it is also said of the modern Tarshish, of which the prophecies are not yet fulfilled, that her ships are broken and destroyed, Ps. 48:7; Is. 2:16.

8. Hence, if Great Britain be identified as the modern Tarshish, it is distinctly shown that her ships will be destroyed, and her fleet crippled in the last days; and that this destruction of her ships must take place upon the Mediterranean Sea, or the Great Sea, or the Middle Sea; since it is said "The east wind hath broken thee in the midst of the seas." "What city is like Tyre, like the destroyed in the midst of the seas?" (Ezek. 27:26-32.)

ENGLAND THE MODERN TARSHISH.

But further, even admitting the literal fulfilment of Is. 23 by the overthrow of Tyre, is this an exhaustive fulfilment? May there not be here, as in so many other prophecies relating to the last days, a double fulfilment of this prophecy of which Tyre was the type, and England the anti-type? If England be the modern Tarshish, then it is impossible not to see how closely and wonderfully the language of Is. 23 is applicable to her, and if so, the destruction of her ships is not the only calamity which is to befall her. The words of this prophecy point to a direct visitation upon the great merchant city itself. Let the words and phraseology be carefully noted, and it will be seen how strikingly they may apply to the great modern city of Tyre.

We adopt the revised translation and notes of Professor Birks' "Commentary on Isaiah" (Macmillan, 1878); with explanatory notes from some other commentators.

THE BURDEN OF TYRE.

Verse 1. The burden of Tyre: "Howl, ye ships of Tarshish; for it is laid waste, so that there is no house, no entering in: from the land of Chittim it is revealed unto them."

"The message begins with a call to the Tyrian merchants and sailors far away from their homes to mourn over the ruin of their city. Tarshish is probably one of the following localities, to each and all of which the name seems to refer in Scripture: (1), Tartessus, in Spain, not far from Gibraltar. (2), Cornwall, or the Cassiterides or British Isles, to which the Phœnicians sailed for tin; (3) Ceylon and the Coromandel coast of India.* All these are closely connected with England. 'Ships of Tarshish' thus became a title for all vessels used for long voyages. Chittim is Cyprus and the sea coasts of the East of Europe."

* Sir Emerson Tennant thus sums up the argument in favor of Ceylon being the modern Tarshish: "It seems more probable that the long-sought locality of Tarshish may be found to be identical with that of Point de Galle. By geographical position, by indigenous production, and by the fact of its having been from time immemorial the resort of merchant ships from Egypt, Arabia, Persia, on the one side, and India, Java, and China on the other; Galle seems to present a combination of every particular essential to determine the problem so long undecided in Biblical dialectics, and to establish its own identity with the Tarshish of the sacred historians, the mart so long frequented by the ships of Tyre and Judea." "History of Ceylon," vol. i. p. 109.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Proceedings of the New York State Conventions have been the principal topic of interest in political circles during the past week. They were anticipated with considerable anxiety, and their ultimate results are still matters by no means easy to predict. Three years ago, the Republicans of the State were able to elect a Republican Governor, and two years ago the vote of New York, elected a Republican President, but since achieving those victories, the Republican party has been torn by a bitter quarrel. The leaders of both wings of the party have become more inflamed against each other, and the men on the fence who care more for place than principle, have needed more adroitness than usual in trimming. The influence of the Federal Administration which during President Garfield's brief term was cast in favor of one section, has in President Arthur's hands been given to the other section. The convention was expected to indicate the effects of these changes. The Democratic Convention too was the subject of anxiety. The quarrel three years ago between Tammany and the regular Democracy was the cause of the Democratic defeat in the Gubernatorial contest, if it did not cause the defeat of General Hancock, but there was little evidence that adversity had tended to the success of peaceful counsels. The problems, therefore, to be solved by the conventions were, whether the Stalwarts or the Half Breeds would triumph at Saratoga, and whether harmony between all sections of Democrats could be secured at Syracuse. How momentous were the issues depending on the solution of these problems all politicians were aware; it was natural therefore that the Conventions of the State should be awaited throughout the country with concern.

The Nomination of Judge Folger for the Governorship by the Republican Convention was accomplished on the second ballot on Wednesday. The vote stood Folger 257; Cornell 222; Wadsworth 18. The nomination was then on the motion of Senator Miller made unanimous. The first ballot had been: Folger 223, Cornell 180, Wadsworth 69, Starin 19, Robinson 6. A considerable section of the Republican press including the New York Times, one of the most influential journals of the party does not conceal its regret at the result. It is accepted as a triumph of the Stalwarts, and therefore a nomination that will not command the cordial support of all the Republican voters of the State. It is, however, admitted by all, that Judge Folger is personally popular, and it is a fact that at his election he ran ahead of Garfield by 7277 votes. The lack of enthusiasm therefore, will be due, not to objections to Mr. Folger personally, but to the representative of Stalwartism and to a candidate forced on the party by the administration. It is remarkable that the renomination of Governor Cornell should have been urged by those who opposed his nomination three years ago, and should have encountered the bitterest resistance from those who then pressed it on the party. This reversal is said to be due to the fact that the Governor failed to support Mr. Conkling in the Senatorial contest at Albany, and also that in other ways his policy has been offensive to the Stalwarts. It is not yet known whether Mr. Folger will resign, before the election, the office he now holds as Secretary of the Treasury.

At the Democratic State Convention at Syracuse there were four distinct factions from New York City, and at the outset there seemed to be all the elements present for an acrimonious struggle. It was eventually arranged, that of the seventy-two city delegates, Tammany should have twenty-four, the County Democracy thirty-eight, and Irving Hall ten. The fourth ballot resulted in the nomination of Grover Cleveland, Mayor of Buffalo, for Governor. The numbers stood: Cleveland 211, Slocum 156, Flower 15. The first ballot gave Slocum 98, Flower 97, Cleveland 66 and the remainder were distributed among five candidates. Mr. Cleveland is forty-six years of age, his father was a clergyman and he is related to Bishop Arthur Cleveland Coxe, of the Protestant Episcopal Church. He was appointed Assistant District Attorney for Erie County in 1863, and in 1870 was elected sheriff of the same county. Mr. Cleveland was elected Mayor of Buffalo last year by an unexpectedly large majority after a very exciting contest.

The Political Situation was thus Summarized by Dr. Talmage at his last Friday evening prayer-meeting: "No great principles are involved in these autumnal elections. It is for the most part a question of offices; the people who are in want to stay in, and the people who are out want to get in. After all the talk in all the States during the last ten years against political bosses, every State, county, and township in the whole line has its boss. For every political machine broken there is a new political machine constructed. I defy any man with ordinary sense of the ludicrous to read without laughter the plank and the platform of civil service reform, this week adopted. How much does it mean? As much as it did in General Grant's time, in Mr. Hayes's time, in President Garfield's time. In other words, it means nothing. After all the platforms and fiery campaigns, the civil service was never in a more debased condition than to-day. The party which, instead of making civil service reform a dead plank, will make it revolutionary—a revolutionary principle—will put the country under everlasting obligation. No such state of things as we have now was ever intended by the founders of this government. The only encouragement to-day in the political direction is that for the most part a higher class of men are nominated for political positions. Men that will do their whole duty. I am told that Mr. Folger and Mr. Cleveland are both men of talent, men of purity, and men of good morals. It will not be as it has been in some of the States a choice between two thieves. It will be a choice between honorable men."

A Noteworthy Feature of the Prohibition vote in Iowa was explained in a recent number of the New York Tribune. It appears that the population of Iowa is nearly one third of foreign birth, and about five out of nine of its voters cast their vote for a prohibitory constitutional amendment. The counties in which the foreign vote was more than one third gave a majority against the amendment, and the great proportion of the foreign vote was in that direction. The figures show that the foreign vote is not, as is sometimes supposed, unanimously hostile to prohibitory action. The Tribune says: "If most stringent prohibitory action succeeds in Iowa, with over thirty per cent of the possible voters foreign born, it is not to be presumed that it will fail on account of opposition from that element in any one of twenty-six States of the Union, for in all these the proportion is smaller than in Iowa. The same movement of public opinion, among the native white population and a like readiness on the part of a fraction of the foreign-born voters to support prohibition would insure the success of the measure in over two thirds of the States. An amendment of the Constitution of the United States would then be come possible. These are only possibilities, it is true, but they are possibilities which may very quickly ripen into something else if a law-defying liquor interest does not cease its insolent dictation."

The Silver Wedding of the Fulton Street prayer-meeting was celebrated on Saturday last. Twenty-five years ago the meeting was inaugurated in a time of financial panic and sore distress. The first meeting was held September 23d, 1857 and a circular was issued which explained its object. It said: "This meeting is intended to give merchants, mechanics, clerks, strangers, and business men generally, an opportunity to stop and call upon God amid the daily perplexities incident to their respective avocations. It will continue for one hour; but it is also designed for those who may find it convenient to remain not more than five or ten minutes, as well as those who can spare the whole hour. The necessary interruption will be slight, because anticipated, and those who are in haste can often expedite their business engagements by halting to lift up their hearts and voices to the throne of grace in 'humble, grateful prayer.'" Rev. J. C. Lamphier who founded the meeting was present on Saturday last, and took part in the celebration, Dr. Talmage, Dr. Chambers, Dr. Reinke and other ministers addressed the meeting.

A Convention of Christian Workers, which bids fair to be very large, is announced by the Evangelistic Record to assemble in Chicago on October 11th. It is expected that over one thousand of the most prominent lay and clerical workers in the United States will be present, and papers on subjects connected with the advancement of the kingdom of Christ will be presented. Of those from abroad who have promised to be present, are Rev. Marcus Rainsford, of the Church of England; Rev. C. Spurgeon, son of C. H. Spurgeon, and Rev. W. P. Mackay, D.D., of Hull, the author of "Grace and Truth."

A Significant Gathering was that of the Employees of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad and their friends at Harper's Ferry, W. Va., recently. The excursion was projected as an expression of gratitude for "the facilities afforded Miss Jennie Smith, the Superintendent of Railroad Evangelistic Work for the Woman's National Christian Temperance Union, which enabled her to inaugurate and accomplish a work unprecedented in the history of the Baltimore & Ohio, or any other railroad; and at the same time to afford an opportunity to those who might desire to tell 'what great things the Lord hath done' for them through the instrumentality of the union." Over seven thousand persons attended, and Mr. G. A. Hilton who, with Miss M. Adelaide Sherman, have been Miss Smith's indefatigable coadjutors, says: "Nothing occurred to mar the enjoyment of the occasion, and when the hour for leaving arrived, and the heavily laden double trains moved away in different directions with their burdens of precious freight, the expression upon all sides was one of gladness."

An Invalids' Room has been Added to a church in Chicago, so that chronic sufferers may enjoy religious service who might otherwise stay away, fearing to annoy the congregation. It is placed on one side of the recess in which stands the pulpit, a room with a window (invisible to most of the audience) which looks directly down on the preacher's desk. This apartment is divided by a thick wall from the main audience-room, and entered by a private door. In it are tables, chairs, lounges, and other conveniences. The inmates may sit or stand or lie or walk, cough when disposed, and leave the house at their pleasure, without disturbing the congregation.

Doubts as to the Impartiality of a Judge were expressed recently by a prisoner about to be tried. A Texas paper relates that a young Austin lawyer was appointed to defend a negro who was too poor to hire counsel of his own. After the jury was in the box the young lawyer challenged several jurymen who his client said had a prejudice against him. "Are there any more jurymen who have a prejudice against you?" whispered the young lawyer. "No, boss; de jury am all right, but now I want you to challenge de judge. I has been convicted under him several times already, and maybe he is beginnin' to hab prejudice agin me." The apprehensions of the prisoner were probably well founded, for judges are naturally inclined to deal severely with prisoners they know to be habitual criminals. With what dread would the sinner stand at the bar of the omniscient judge of all the earth were it not that He who is mighty to save has become his surety (Eph. 2 : 13-17).

A Copious Draught of Whiskey Killed an eight-year-old boy in New York last week. At an inquest held on the child it was elicited that the attendants at a distillery in Spring Street had been in the habit of allowing children to help themselves to water from a cooler near which stood several barrels of liquor. Under the barrels pails were placed to catch the drippings from the faucets. On Sunday the boy entered the distillery with a companion for a drink of water and it is supposed he mistook one of the pails of whiskey for water. He took the glass from the stand in front of the cooler, and dipping it into a pail of whiskey drippings, half filled it, and swallowed the contents at a draught. He staggered out of the store and fell on the sidewalk unconscious. A neighbor who was passing recognized him and carried him home where he received medical attention; but in spite of all that was done for his relief, he died in horrible suffering. Thousands of people in this and other cities are by the same agent going to a premature death, though by slower stages. In their case, however, the calamity is greater, because unlike the child, they know what they are drinking (Prov. 23 : 31-35).

A Double Error in Identification has been made in Pennsylvania. A boy was killed by the cars at Johnstown and his remains were identified by a gentleman at Bristol, near Philadelphia, as those of his son who had been missing for several days. The body was decently interred and the family put on mourning, but a few days after the funeral the missing boy returned, to the delight of his parents. The account of his return was published and was read by a gentleman who resided at Sharon, who had also lost his son about the same time. He went to Bristol and had the body disinterred. On it he found marks which convinced him that it was the body of his son. The body was re-interred, the name on the gravestone changed, and a funeral service was preached for the boy in the Sharon church. On September 19th, the missing boy returned to his home after an absence of six weeks. The tombstone will now again be marked, "Unknown." Timorous Christians whom Satan has distressed, have sometimes doubted whether their safety after death was assured, but the doubt was unfounded. God makes no mistakes, and we are assured He knoweth them that trust in Him (Nahum 1 : 7).

A Fortune of $40,000 is Said to have been acquired in five years by an immigrant beggar who sailed for Europe recently. She is a little, deformed lady about forty years old, whose bright intelligent face and painful deformity attracted attention wherever she went. Before returning to Europe she made a frank statement of her history. She was born in the little village of Roubais, in Belgium, and went to Paris to beg on the boulevards some years ago, but she did not meet with the success that she desired, and sailed to New York. For a time she begged at Arnold & Constable's establishment, with occasional visits to the doors of A. T. Stewart & Co.'s store at Tenth Street and other leading New York houses. She was eminently successful, and often gathered $25 or more a day. She adroitly eluded all the philanthropists who devised plans to put her into charitable institutions, and was finally arrested as a vagrant. Shortly afterward she disappeared from New York and made her appearance at the door of Wanamaker's grand depot in Philadelphia, where, under cover of a license to sell lead-pencils, she carried on her begging trade despite all the efforts of Mr. Wanamaker and all the detectives and police officers. She usually found her way to Wilmington on Saturdays and upon other days when the streets were likely to be crowded, and plied a lucrative business. She lived in the dingy little court running off South Street above Fourth, in Philadelphia, with a parrot for a sole companion. She admitted that she was taking to Europe, as the proceeds of her mendicancy here, forty thousand dollars. This method of acquiring a fortune naturally excites indignation because it is an imposition on the kindly feelings of the public, who supposed her to be poor. But her fortune is not the first that has been founded on misrepresentation and deceit. Those methods have been extensively employed in the business world, and too often by people, who professing Christianity, have brought a reproach on the name of religion. Against all such schemes God warns us (Psa. 101 : 7).

The Rescue of a Lady from Drowning Cost her rescuer his life on September 19th. On the morning of that day four ladies and two gentlemen set out from Newport, R. I., for a sail. They had not been out more than an hour before a strong north-east wind came on, accompanied by a heavy sea. Through some mismanagement on the part of the men in charge of the boat two of the ladies were thrown into the sea. One of them was quickly caught and lifted into the boat, but the other, who was only sixteen years of age, was carried some distance from the boat. Her danger was imminent to all in the boat, and one of the gentlemen, whose name was Eugene Byron, seized a rope and sprang into the sea, caught the drowning girl just as she was sinking beneath the waves, fastened the rope about her waist, and she was drawn on board. A rope was thrown to Mr. Byron, but, whether from cramps or exhaustion, he sank and was seen no more. Mr. Byron was a Georgian by birth, and his death is deeply mourned by a large circle of friends. As long as the rescued lady lives, the memory of the man who died in saving her, will be a sacred one with her, for people are not forgetful nor ungrateful in such cases though even professing Christians are often unmindful of Him who died that He might save them from the second death (1 Peter 1 : 18, 19).

A Wedding was Celebrated Two Miles Under ground on September 12th. The scene was the Mammoth Cave of Kentucky, and the bride and bridegroom were from Senora, Ky. The bridal party was fourteen in number and included representatives from Scotland, Germany, England and America. The room in which the ceremony took place is fifty feet square and twelve feet high. The roof is supported by stalagmitic and stalactitic columns, the largest of which are called the pillars of Hercules, and, according to Dr. A. D. Binkerd, it has required 940,000 years for them to develop into their present dimensions. From the roof hang many stalactitic formations, on every one of which was hung a lamp. On the farther side of the chapel, near the middle of the exit avenue, stand the Herculean pillars, which form two gothic arches and served as a chancel. Beneath the large arch stood the clergyman. On each side of his head hung a lamp, and as the bride and groom approached within a few yards of his subterranean altar they stopped, being near the centre of the room. In the midst of this pleasant bewilderment the minister's voice was heard commencing the marriage service, which had a strangely solemn effect among the magnificent natural surroundings. It was a weird fancy that led to the young people choosing to commence their married life in the gloom of a subterranean cave rather than in the glorious sunlight of the outer world. We may hope that when in after life they involuntarily descend into the darkness and gloom of trouble, they may find their path, like that to their marriage scene, so illumined that they may see there, as they did in the cave, glorious evidences of God's wisdom and power (Isa. 26 : 9).

A GREAT MISTAKE, AND THE WAY TO RECTIFY IT.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing; and knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked: I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eyesalve, that thou mayest see."—Revelation 3 : 17, 18.

A Special Message to the Church—Causes of Lukewarmness—The Laodiceans Difficult to Move—I. Their Saying—Unanimous—Their Minister—They were Boastful—Of their Wealth—That they were Perfect—Mistaken through Ignorance—The Blessing of Uneasiness—II. Our Lord's Counsel—To Buy of Him—Their Dealings with Each Other—The Blessings Offered—All-Inclusive—The Market for Pure Gold—A Rebuke to Boasting.

THESE words were spoken, not to the outside world, but to the church of Laodicea. They relate to persons who were in a church state, who had been baptized on confession of their faith in Christ, and who were thought to be in a fine spiritual condition. They had a singularly high opinion of themselves, and probably considered that of all the seven churches in Asia they were the first in power and influence. The words before us are as sharp as they are true, and they demand the earnest attention of all professors of our holy faith, for to persons like ourselves they were addressed, and moreover we have the special note of attention—"He that hath an ear, let him hear what the Spirit saith unto the churches."

The solemn words which make up our text were also spoken by the Lord Jesus under a most special title: "These things saith the Amen, the faithful and true witness" (verse 14); as much as to say that, though the LAODICEAN PROFESSORS WERE FALSE, mistaken, and deluded, he who now addressed them by his servant John, was true and faithful. He is "the faithful and true witness," who does not flatter, nor keep back any of the terrible truth; but speaks out that which He perceives with His eyes of fire, and warns men of their condition with all sincerity. Oh for grace to hear this word at this time as from the Lord Jesus, and as from Him under the weighty character of a witness faithful and true, speaking as the Amen of God.

It seems to me that my text accounts for the lukewarmness of the Laodiceans. They were unhappily in such a state that you could not get at them. They were not so poor that they knew they were poor, and therefore when the poverty-stricken were addressed, they said, "These things are not for us: we are increased in goods." They were blind, but they thought they saw; they were naked, and yet they prided themselves in their princely apparel, and hence it was hard to reach them. Had they even been outwardly worse, had they openly sinned, had they defiled their garments with overt transgression, then the Spirit might have pointed out the blot and convicted them there and then; but what was to be done when the mischief was hidden and internal? How far this may be true of any one of us may God of His infinite mercy help us to judge each one for himself.

Two things in the text call for our notice. The first is their saying: "Thou sayest, I am rich;" and the second is Christ's counsel: "I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eyesalve, that thou mayest see."

I. First, let us think of the church in Laodicea and listen to it may prevent us from reaching such a height of pride as to speak as they did.

The spirit of self-congratulation expressed itself in a manner strikingly unanimous. If all the members did not say so in words, yet, as a whole, they were so self-contented, that the great Amen spoke of them as one person, "Because thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods, and have need of nothing." Doubtless a few wept and sighed before God, but they were so inconsiderable that they did not mar the apparent unanimity of the church in its conscious self-respect, nor divide the united utterance of its open boasting. "Thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods."

It would seem that

was of the same opinion. Good easy man, he felt that his church was in a splendid state, for the Spirit of God here speaks to the "angel of the church," who is, no doubt, the minister of the church, and He says to him, "Thou sayest, I am rich, and increased with goods." The self-complacent man had probably gathered together a wealthy congregation, wealthy as compared with the general run of the people of God, who, were usually the poorest of the poor. Among these were persons of considerable talent, and as a body they were intellectual and educated. They were so rich in all sorts of endowments that they had "need of nothing." Perhaps they hardly needed a minister at all, but were able to become every man his own teacher, and so the timid man was quiet and smooth-tongued for fear they should dispense with him. They might perhaps prefer an open meeting, and then what would become of him? The proverb saith, "Like priest, like people," and under the preacher's lukewarm addresses the church became lukewarm too.

They were so rich in gifts that they did not need to economize, and sent out their brethren to preach one by one. They could afford to let a dozen attempt to do what one could have done a great deal better. They had grown to be such a leading church that other churches looked up to them. They were noted and celebrated all over the country. A member of the Church of Laodicea was recognized at once as a remarkable person, so that wherever he went the people would ask him to get up and speak; for coming down from Laodicea, that famous church which had "need of nothing," surely he could not open his mouth without precious things dropping therefrom; for was he not one of those who were "rich, and increased with goods, and had need of nothing?" It was and their prudent and kind minister thought so, too, and he took occasion often to say as much.

This saying of theirs was exceedingly boastful for it divides itself into three parts. They were "rich," that was their present state; and "increased with goods," that is they could look back upon years of great prosperity and progress in their past history; and at that present time, if they were not absolutely perfect, they were getting close to the edge of it, for they had "need of nothing;" they did not know of anything which the church lacked; they had the best deacons, the best elders, the best members, always ready to do anything and everything that was proposed to them. They were rich, and increased with goods, and had need of nothing. The present was all right, the past was eminently satisfactory, and they had reached a point of all but absolute perfection, for they needed nothing, and when people have need of nothing they can go no further; they have ascended to the highest point; their sun has reached its zenith; their path has been like the path of the just which shineth more and more unto the perfect day.

Truly I do not know that they could have opened their mouths any wider. They gave forth about as fine a piece of brag as one is likely to meet with in any ancient record. Here is a church which is a city set on a hill that cannot be hid; is it not a candle that giveth light unto all that are in the house? and the candle wants no snuffing, it is burning at its very best. Think of a church which has need of nothing!

Now, notice once more that they were sincere in this glorying. When they said it they were for the text says, "And thou knowest not that thou art wretched, and miserable, and poor, and blind, and naked." They did not know the truth. They were not hypocrites; when they thus spoke with such self-conscious complacency they really thought it was so, and their minister thought so too. The angel of the church thought that it was an angelic church. There was no insincerity in what they said: in fact, I dare say they said to themselves, "We really speak below what we might say. We are a wonderful people! What we do could hardly be put in print or thoroughly described in words. Our existence is an extraordinary fact." They did not know the real truth of the matter, but they sincerely believed the flattering tale which their ignorance told them. How readily do we believe a lie when it fosters in us a high opinion of ourselves.

But now see what was their actual state: they were altogether mistaken. Their mistake was founded upon ignorance: "Thou knowest not." These intelligent persons, these wealthy persons, these instructed persons did not know themselves, and that is the grossest kind of ignorance. A man may know all about Africa, and the sources of the Nile and the Congo, and yet he may not know what is going on in certain regions of the home department. He is ignorant indeed who does not know his own condition in reference to the most weighty matters.

These Laodicean people were mistaken through ignorance; they had not searched, they had judged the surface of the matter, and never looked below the top-soil; but "the faithful and true witness" makes them see the naked truth. He says, "Thou knowest not that thou art wretched:" that is to say, they were in there was nothing about them that could please God, and nothing about them that would have pleased themselves if they had seen things in a true light. "Thou art wretched." Oh, what a change from the distorting glass of self-flattery to the clear mirror of truth! How these men that had need of nothing are shown up when Christ begins to describe them! They seem to need everything.

The next word, "miserable," conveys the same idea to us in the English, but the original had better, perhaps, have been translated "pitiable." There was nothing about them to admire, but everything to pity; for everything that seemed to be good was really false; everything that was apparently useful was a mere matter of display. As Jesus Christ looked at Laodicea He said of the church, "Pitiable! Pitiable!" He does not use fine expressions, does He, toward this respectable church, this church with so much wealth and so much strength? He does not flatter it, for He says of it, first, "Wretched!" and then "Pitiable!"

Then He goes on to say, "Poor!"—poor in the choice things in which they thought they were rich; so much grace they thought they had, but He says they have exceedingly little and calls them "poor." And then He goes on to say they are "blind." Blind? Why, they had among them men of the greatest possible discernment, who could see as far into a millstone as any people; they were able to split hairs over points of doctrine, and they had discernment of spirits, so they thought, and could tell who was and who was not sincere; but Jesus Christ says—they have no discernment, they are "blind." They are not merely short-sighted and weak about the eyes, but altogether blind. And mark you, this is no exaggeration: it is not a hard speech meant to sting them into repentance, but the "Amen, the faithful and true witness" says this calmly and deliberately, and says it about that admirable church of Laodicea concerning which we heard so much when we commenced our discourse; they were poor and blind.

And now He adds that they were "naked." No, surely, not that! Will the Saviour say as much as that? Yes, He says so. They are not dressed in the righteousness of Christ: they are dressed in their own cobwebs of conceit; and therefore they are naked. They are not resting upon Christ, but relying upon their own strength and wealth, and therefore He says they are "naked." Yes, these same people who "have need of nothing," yet have need of a rag with which to cover the shame of their nakedness. They are "naked" before God. Had a storm come upon them suddenly they would have found it out. Oh, this mistake!

May the Lord of truth prevent us from making it about ourselves individually, and prevent every church from making such a mistake about itself, and being unanimous in it.

These professors were

they were conceited, and therefore they were not likely to be converted. They thought they were making progress, but they were going backward and because they did not know their true condition it was hard work to help them. You remember the Tay Bridge disaster. There is no doubt whatever that the bridge was not fitted for its position, its ordinary strain was all it could bear; but nobody thought so. Undoubtedly the engineers reckoned it would stand any test to which it might be put, and therefore there was no attention given to it to make it any stronger and to provide against sudden disaster; and consequently when a specially fierce hurricane was out one night it swept it all away. That is just the picture of many a church and many a man, because he is thought to be so pious, and the church is thought to be so correct and vigorous, therefore no attempt is made for improvement, no special prayer, no cries to heaven, no repentance because of backsliding, and so when there comes an unusual pressure, a night of terrible temptation, the whole fabric falls in ruin.

How much better is the condition of the man who feels that he is weak, and therefore goes to the strong for strength! I know a railway-bridge at this moment which is showing signs of danger; there are cracks in the brickwork and other mischiefs: in all probability it would soon have come down if let alone: but it has been noticed by the railway people, and they are as busy as possible trying to repair it and prevent accident. Is not this much better than a delusive belief that all is safe? If there is a crack in the substantial part of your religious structure, what a mercy to see it! If the supporting pillars begin to give way, what a blessing to perceive the fact! "Oh," says one, "you make us feel uneasy." Yes, it is often and that blessing I pray the Holy Spirit to confer upon you. It is infinitely better to be uneasy and to get right than to be perfectly serene and all the while to be wrong. How many a house is built upon sand, and only waits till the floods shall come and the winds shall beat upon it, and then the whole fair fabric will vanish like a vision of the night: will it not be well to let the tenant know his peril? I think so.

II. Now we come to think of

OUR LORD'S COUNSEL.

"I counsel thee to buy of me gold tried in the fire, that thou mayest be rich; and white raiment, that thou mayest be clothed, and that the shame of thy nakedness do not appear; and anoint thine eyes with eyesalve, that thou mayest see." I call your attention first to the amazing grace which is here displayed. Ask a schoolmaster what kind of pupil is most objectionable, and I think he will reply that he cannot bear a youth who knows so much already that he will learn nothing correctly. It is very hard to deal with the conceited. But here our blessed Lord seems to single out this puffed-up church, though pride is always obnoxious to Him, and He draws near to it and begins to speak to it in love. He does not use a peremptory tone, but in words of great affection He tenders His advice. He does not say, "I command thee," but "I counsel thee." It is tantamount to that other blessed text, "Come now, and let us reason together."

Note how He begins—"I counsel thee to buy." Is not that singular advice indeed? Just now He said that they were "wretched" and "poor." How can they buy? Surely it suggests to us at once those blessed free grace terms which are only to be met with in the market of divine love: "Yea, come, buy wine and milk without money and without price." The chapmen of Vanity Fair have great difficulty to bring people up to their price, but the Lord Jesus Christ's difficulty is to bring people down to His, and so He begins by counselling the poor to come and buy on such terms as this: "Without money and without price."

But why is it called buying? If you have nothing to give, why does He not say, "Come and take it?" Nay, it is buying, because God would have us make business of it. If any of you have backslidden, and yet dream that you have not declined; if there creeps over you now the cold thought that perhaps it is so; then rouse yourselves and make a business of recovery. Come to Christ and buy; not merely act the beggar's part, but come and act the purchaser's part, with thoughtfulness, with desire, with judgment. Come now, and do as you would if you were buying a valued article. Estimate the value of Christ and see how richly He is worth having.

But next, what does He say? "I counsel thee to buy of Me." Ah, they had been dealing with one another: they had been chaffering and bartering among themselves. One brother had brought this talent, another another, and they had grown rich, as they thought, by a mutual commerce. "Now," says Christ, "compare yourselves with yourselves no longer: give up seeking of man, and buy of Me." It is the very foundation of grace—to be willing to buy of Christ. Have you a religion which you received of me? It is not worth a pin. Have you in possession a religion which you received of your mother, and father, and Sunday-school teacher, and neighbors, and friends? It is worth nothing. All true grace must be bought of Christ on free grace terms: "I counsel thee to buy of Me."

Do you wear a spiritual vesture which you bought elsewhere? Do you use an eye-salve which you purchased of another physician? Do you hoard up gold which you procured of some pretended goldsmith? Throw the imaginary boons away; for there is no genuine article in the market except that which comes of the Lord Jesus Christ, and of Him alone. "I counsel thee to buy of Me." Oh, that every Christian here would lay hold upon this advice, and say, "I will go and buy of Christ again." Have I been living on past experience? Have I been living on a profession which I have maintained these last twenty years? I will do so no longer: I will buy of Jesus anew: I will get my inanna fresh from heaven: I will seek all my provision day by day from the person of my blessed Lord and Master, for He counsels me to buy of Him.

Now see the goods which He describes. "I counsel thee to buy of Me"—what? Everything. It is true that of these people are here mentioned, but they are inclusive of all needs. First, the Lord says, "Buy gold." The man who can buy gold has bought everything, for money answereth all things. He who has gold has the medium with which he can procure whatsoever he needeth. In Christ there is a fulness of all good things, and in the gold of His grace there is an adaptation to every need. You cannot have a necessity, nor even think of a necessity which is a real one, but the grace of God, which is like fine gold, will be sure to meet it.

Then next He brings forth raiment rich and rare; perfect coverings, such as do really clothe a man so that the shame of his nakedness will never appear. I like that expression. It is very plain, but what suggestions there are in it! for our sin is our shame, and it is well that the Lord has found a complete covering for it. Next our Lord recommends them to buy an eye-salve of Him. That is a very curious recommendation, is it not? For they were blind; and can an eye-salve give blind men eyes? Many salves are useful for eyes when they are weak or inflamed, but what salve is of any good to a blind man? O ye that have no heavenly discernment, that have no eyeballs upon which the light might fall, Christ Jesus counsels you to come and buy of Him the true collyrium, that ancient salve of high renown, or something more marvelous still, which will open your eyes so that you shall see that which is invisible, and shall behold the face of God.

I have lately been looking through some of the sufferings of the Waldenses for Christ, and the sad spectacle has produced a most painful effect upon my mind, but I trust also a beneficial one. When I read of the horrible cruelties wrought upon them by the Papists, and of the firmness of feeble women and children, as well as men, I asked myself, Could I endure such torments? I did not dare believe that I could, for they suffered agonies which scarce even the devils of hell could have invented. Suppose that you and I should possess a sort of grace which would not endure such tests, will it be

THE RIGHT SORT OF GRACE?

If we are never dragged at the heels of horses, or set up as targets, or dismembered, or burned at a slow fire, yet we ought to have that same kind of grace which made these gracious ones more than conquerors through Jesus Christ. It is true we may never have to suffer martyrdom, but a man must be prepared to give up house, and lands, and wife, and children, yea, and his own life also, sooner than forsake Christ.

Look at the saints in the first days, the young, brave church of Christ, when the world sought to stamp out our holy faith. They defied the world, and Pliny writes to Trajan to know what to do, for the Christians come crowding to the judgment seat to avow their faith. Could we act in this fashion, think you? Yes, if we have bought the true "gold tried in the fire," but not else. Is our gold of this sort? Do not begin talking about how you could endure martyrdom: how do you endure the ordinary trials of life? In those lesser pains that come upon your body—are you patient? Those little disquietudes in the domestic circle—do you keep your temper over them? Those words that sometimes drop carelessly, not meant to be unkind, but which grate on your feelings—can you forgive them for Christ's sake, and think no more of them? If not, what kind of gold is this which cannot bear the touch of the acid?

Remember the raiment too, for that is of the best; our Lord calls it "white raiment." That is a pure color, a holy color, a royal color. We put on the Lord Jesus as our joy, our glory, our righteousness. To walk with him in white is real honor, and sure acceptance: it marks us out as victors through him that has loved us. This robe is the true wedding dress, a holiday robe, and yet a serviceable garment arraying a man from head to foot. Are you wearing it? Is your sin hidden? Does it not at times appear? Does it not come before your own conscience? And as to the eye-salve, it is the best possible one, for Jesus says, "Anoint thine eyes with eye-salve that thou mayest see." Eye-salve that can make a blind man see stands in the front rank of all the medicaments that ever can be sold. Oh, for grace to get it, so that we may see and know spiritual things.

So I must come to a close by noticing that all this is the counsel of Christ, and the counsel of Christ to a people that were proud and self-conceited. He gave those counsel who thought they needed none. Does not this reveal infinite grace, that he should come to such and sit down by them and say, "Come now, put your case into my hand; it is a very bad one, and I advise you to come to me for help?" Oh, how tenderly would I try to speak this morning in imitation of the soft tones of Jesus. O you who have thought of yourself other than the truth, I do not counsel you to despair. "No," Christ says, "be advised; take counsel; I counsel you to come to me now and get in very truth all that which you only had in fancy."

All things are ready for you. You have not to search for the gold and dig it up from the mine: here it is: come and buy it. "Lord, I have not a penny to buy it with." That does not matter; buy it without money and without price. These are the easy terms of the gracious Saviour.

BELIEVE AND BE RICH.

When Satan tells me, or conscience tells me, that I am not a Christian, that I am not saved, then I find it wise to say, "I will begin now. If I have made a mistake, if I have been presumptuous, if I have not truly believed, then I will believe at once, and lay hold upon Jesus at this good hour."

I recommend you who are not puffed up to take Christ's counsel, for when He counsels these proud ones to come I am sure His advice is good for you too. It is always wise to get gold when you can buy it for nothing. I warrant you if the Bank of England put up a notification that they would sell any quantity of pure bullion for nothing to-morrow morning, our Stock Exchange men, instead of turning into Capel Court, would take the other side of the street, and dispose at once of the Bank's surplus. There is a ready market for pure gold at this extraordinary minimum. Come, then, and accept the gold of free grace. It is sure to be useful; therefore come along, you that love Christ, and you that are afraid you do not love Him. Come along, all of you: come and buy this "gold tried in the fire." You have never made a better investment in all your lives. May the good Master sweetly lead you so to do.

But what a rebuke this is to all boasting. The Lord does not say to us, "You have been very foolish in talking about your riches," but He convicts us by saying, "I counsel thee to buy gold." He does not say, "You are stupid to glory in your dress," but He convicts us by saying, "Buy raiment." He does not condemn us for pretending to be able to see when we are blind, but He cries, "Anoint your eyes with eyesalve." Is not this a sweet way of making us feel our error? perhaps you would turn away from stern rebuke, but you cannot turn from love. Come now, members of this church and members of no church, come, buy these three precious things, "without money and without price." You cannot take better counsel than that of the Son of God; therefore, do as He bids you, and buy at once. Amen.

MRS. POWERS is the wife of Henry Powers, the General of the Christian Army. This army is an offshoot from the Salvation Army as has been already described in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. Mr. Powers resides at Peterborough, England. His wife, whose portrait appears on page 620, is the daughter of Mr. Sutcliffe Johnson, of Clayton-le-Moors, Lancashire, in which quiet village she was born on September 22d, 1852. From her earliest childhood she enjoyed the inestimable privilege of being trained by loving Christian parents in the fear of God, their constant prayer being that in youth she might be taught by the Holy Spirit to feel her need of Christ, and give herself to Him and to His service.

Their faith in God was honored, for when their daughter was fifteen years of age she was converted, and in the fulness of her first love to Christ, laid herself upon His altar, to be used by Him for the extension of His kingdom.

Her first sphere of work was that in which the latent gifts of so many of Christ's eminent servants have been developed, namely, the Sunday-school, and for seven years she continued in that position under the auspices of the Wesleyan Methodist denomination, industriously, prayerfully, and successfully, leading her young scholars to the Saviour. It was a splendid training for the work in which she has since engaged, and in which she has realized so large a measure of blessing from God.

In November 1873, she became the wife of Henry Powers, a Methodist minister, and in conjunction with him has ever since assiduously sought the spiritual and eternal welfare of the unconverted around her. At the present time she is actively co-operating with her husband in his evangelistic efforts in various parts of Great Britain. Her Gospel addresses are characterized by a winning effectiveness, and her manner of "singing the Gospel," with a voice of much sweetness and pathos, is highly appreciated, and has been the means, in God's hands, of bringing many sinners to Christ.

GYPSY SMITH.The Dismissed Captain of the Salvation Army.

REPORTS have recently appeared in the religious and secular press, of a schism in the Salvation Army, arising out of the arbitrary dismissal of one of "the captains." Considerable interest has been excited by the affair, owing to the apprehensions felt by friends of the army lest it should degenerate into an organization controlled and despotically conducted by General Booth and his family. It has been urged repeatedly that now the movement has grown to gigantic proportions, it should be managed by a board of elected officers and its immense income should be invested in the names of trustees and an audited account of receipts and expenditures published. These suggestions have been, however, unfavorably received by General Booth and his family, and as a consequence a latent feeling of discontent and dissatisfaction has spread. In the majority of cases the officers of the army have been too seriously absorbed in their work to give much attention to these matters, so that there were no signs of active insubordination until recently. Now, however, the dismissal of Gypsy Smith has set fire to the already smouldering elements of rebellion.

Gypsy Smith, whose portrait appears on this page, was born in 1859. His father and mother were gypsies and spent their time in travelling from place to place in gypsy fashion, picking up a precarious subsistence by selling small articles at country fairs and occasionally the father would obtain a little money by playing on a violin, while his wife or child carried round the hat. When the lad was born, the family were living in a tent pitched near Woodford, England. He was named "Rodney," and as he grew he became strong and agile, and was able to assist his father in many ways during their wandering life. While quite young, he and his sister fell ill with small-pox, from which they recovered; but their mother caught the infection from them and died. After this the widower led a wild, wicked life, and his children, left to themselves, became adepts in sinful ways.

In the year 1869, however, the widowed gypsy attended some mission meetings at Notting Hill, near London, and was converted. His life was completely changed so that his children remarked it and drew their own conclusions of the power of a religion that could work such a revolution. Rodney was destined to experience that power, for after leading a wild life for several years, he also was converted. That event happened in 1876, when he was seventeen years old.

One summer holiday in 1877 he was in the neighborhood of London and went to a large

"tea-festival" of the Salvation Army, and there received an invitation from "General" Booth to join the army. He accepted, and was enabled to do good work at various stations. He was removed from place to place, as his services were required. He had labored in ten places when early in the present year he was ordered to Hanley, in Staffordshire, a manufacturing town where a large proportion of the inhabitants are notorious for their godlessness. Rodney Smith's efforts were there signally blessed of God, for the meetings of the Salvation Army, which when he went to Hanley did not exceed one hundred attendants, increased in a few weeks to 1500 on week evenings and 3000 on Sundays. The financial results were equally remarkable, for, instead of sending to headquarters every week a few shillings as the proceeds of the week's collections, he was able to send a remittance every week worth a hundred dollars.

It was then decided by General Booth to remove Smith and his wife and sister, who were laboring with him, to another sphere of labor. As soon as his approaching departure became known at Hanley several influential people in the town who had witnessed his zeal and the success of his endeavors to reach a class of people previously hostile to religion, decided on making some tangible recognition of the value of his work. A subscription was started and a considerable sum collected. A large meeting was held and a valuable gold watch was presented to Rodney Smith, another to his sister, and a pocketbook containing money worth twenty-five dollars to Mrs. Smith.

Intelligence of these presentations was carried to General Booth and it displeased him. It is stated that a rule exists that all presents shall be sent to the general treasury of the army, though Rodney Smith avers that he did not know of the rule and had never been asked to promise obedience to such a rule. However that may be, "General" Booth regarded the acceptance and retention of the presents as an act of insubordination, and without calling on Smith for any defence or explanation dismissed him and his sister from the army. Smith has received many expressions of sympathy with him, and thus encouraged, proposes to continue an independent work in Hanley, relying on God for the support of himself and his wife and sister.

MISS TILLY SMITH.The Gypsy Lass of the Salvation Army.

TILLY SMITH, whose portrait appears on this page, is the sister of Rodney Smith, and his active and efficient co-laborer in his work at Hanley. An English journal says of her: "Miss Smith is tall and attractive in appearance, and looks about twenty-two years old. Although brought up as a gypsy, she is refined and lady like. At a recent meeting we attended, her speech was characterized by much pathetic earnestness. Under the influence of her singing and speaking it was most interesting to observe the effect upon most persons present. Women whose seamed faces indicated that theirs were the rough places in life, listened with wrapt attention and tears in their eyes, and hundreds who would have been unaffected in the very respectable and decorous chapel or church were evidently stirred to the depths of their being by the enthusiastic earnestness of the young female who was addressing them. She sang her way into their hearts."

MOHAMMED SENOUSSEI.The Long Armed and Invisible Prophet in Africa.

DURING the progress of the Egyptian struggle frequent references were made to the Long armed Prophet. The following narrative will explain those references.

Mohammedan wise men say that the year 1300 of the Hegira is to be marked by events of transcendent importance to the future of Islam. It will commence on the 12th of November next, only six weeks hence, but as events follow each other nowadays in rapid succession, we shall probably know much more than we do now of the issue of enterprises headed by the two Mahdis, each of whom presents himself as the expected deliverer of faithful Mohammedans.

THE FATHER OF MOHAMMED SENOUSSEI.

It is now half a century since Es Senoussi, the Elder, an influential Marabout, or religious devotee, retired to Fez, and after a short residence there went on a pilgrimage to Mecca, travelling by way of Algeria, Tunis, Tripoli, and Egypt. In Mecca he received, if not fanatical inspiration, a wonderful increase of devotion to the cause of Islam. He brought it with him to Egypt, and demonstrated it by establishing in Alexandria a Zaouia, or Convent-Sanctuary, where enthusiasts, like himself, might gather and be prepared for work. Consecrated to a religious revival, Senoussi called for a return to the old faith of Mahomet, and denounced the present friendship for and contact with Christians. In his vehement condemnation he included the Sultan himself as having long displayed dangerous European sympathies.

Such success attended his labors as to draw upon him the notice and subsequently the restraining action of the Egyptian Government. Alarmed at the extension of his influence, they resolved to arrest him, but he evaded them and escaped to the Libyan desert, whence he issued after a time and settled in Djagh-dub, a place distant from the coast of the Mediterranean about three weeks' journey. There he repeated the course pursued at Alexandria, establishing another and a large central Convent-Sanctuary, continuing to proclaim his mission and to make numbers of followers. As men accepted him and his views he made them into missionaries, and they went forth teaching, making converts, and planting Zaouias.

HIS LONG RIGHT ARM.

At his death in 1860, his son entered into his work and assumed his place. He has carried on the one and held the other to this day, claiming and using the title of El Mahdi. He has at least one physical peculiarity which Mohammedan prophecy declared should be possessed by the true deliverer. Mr. Blunt quotes the prediction that "on the first day of the month of Moharram, in the year 1300, and in the 40th year of his age, will appear the Messiah of Islam, whose father's name shall be Mohammed, one of whose arms shall be of extraordinary length." Mohammed Senoussi's right arm is so long that it will reach to his knee.

A Moslem prophecy affirms that the Messiah of Islam will be invisible for some time prior to his final showing of himself. Senoussi now refuses to see even his most trusted followers. When he goes abroad on horseback a canopy is carried over and around him, so as to prevent him from being seen. Of late years the Mahdi has become as influential in the political as he is in the religious world. His emissaries boast that he can command an Arab army of unprecedented numerical strength, and he has accumulated at his Zaouia vast stores of arms and ammunition. The plans and movements of the Mahdi are being anxiously observed by the Turkish Government. He has hitherto refused to recognize the Sultan as the Caliph, and it is reasonably concluded that he means to restore the Arab power in his own person.

JOHN BANNISTER'S REGRETS.

(See Illustration.)

ON board an Eastern bound Atlantic steamer John Bannister was sitting with eyes eagerly watching the shores of Ireland. It was ten years since he had last seen them and he was now after that long time on his way to visit his widowed mother. The result of his journey is best told in his own words as he related his experience for the benefit of another, who was tempted to do as he had done.

"There are two nights," said John Bannister, "that will ever be deeply stamped upon my memory—one is the night when I first left home, and the other is the night when I returned. I had got tired of mother's apron strings, I longed to see the world. My father had been dead some years, and it seemed wretchedly dull, cramped up at home.

"Undoubtedly the attractions of a country village and a country life, are not many to a youth filled with restless longings, like myself. I wanted to see life; I wanted to see something of the great world beyond our Irish hamlet.

"I was only seventeen when I determined to set out for America. For three years I had been acting as clerk in a lawyer's office, in the small country town near home. Here I had made the acquaintance of Richard Rafferay, a young man some years my senior, who had come to America and was doing well. My mother was filled with grief when I told her of my determination, but at last I wrung from her a reluctant consent that I might go.

"My preparations were quickly made and soon the day for setting out arrived. I was to leave at night for Queenstown where I should catch the steamer on which I had taken my passage. Eager as I was to be on my way to the New World I was saddened at the thought of parting from my good mother. As she clasped me in her arms at the moment of parting, she said, 'John, I have put your father's Bible in your box. I never thought to have parted with it but I never thought to part from you until you laid me in my grave. But I am losing you now and I would like you to have the Bible. Promise me you will read it.' I promised so as to please her, and giving her a last kiss I hurried away.

"When I arrived out I soon obtained employment, for Rafferay introduced me to his employers and they engaged me at once. Together we spent our evenings, and I am ashamed to say that they were badly spent. There are plenty of haunts open in all our great cities for the amusement of young men away from home, and we drifted lower and lower until we drank the cup of sin to the dregs. I never opened my father's Bible and I never wrote to my widowed mother. Oh! it was a sad time, my heart aches now as I think of it.

"One night about five years after I landed in New York, I was passing a mission house where there was a meeting. At the door a man was standing, speaking to passers-by. He spoke to me and invited me in. I should not have entered, but I was hungry, and he told me there would be a free tea that night. So I went in. I was ragged and moneyless, without employment and steeped in sin. Those people were good Samaritans, and they never left me until I was saved from myself and from Satan. They found me employment and watched over me.

"Despairing at first I gradually regained strength of body and mind, and the Saviour in whom I trusted kept me from evil. I prospered and began to save money. Then I wrote to my mother and waited eagerly for a reply. I supposed the letter had miscarried, for no answer came. Then I wrote again but still no reply. My employers were sending a man to Europe to buy goods, but he fell ill on the eve of departure and could not go. I went to them and asked to be sent in his place and I was accepted and in two weeks I was again on Irish soil making my way on foot to my native place.

"My way lay through the ancient churchyard, as it had done when I first set out to 'see life.' I think this, the night of my return, was the saddest I have ever passed on earth. Near my father's grave the mould had been newly disturbed. I knew what this meant; and I guessed how much my heartless conduct had had to do in bringing to an untimely end a loved and loving one for whose loss nothing on this earth could compensate me. As I stood leaning on an old gravestone looking at that grave which held my dear mother's form, I would have given worlds to recall the past, and tell her that her wandering son had repented. But it could not be.

She went to her grave sorrowing for me, and that thought is now the bitterest of my life."

ONLY A TRAMP.

An Adventure.

"POOR thing!" sighed soft-hearted Mrs. Williams. "And so you thought upon putting him up here, James?"

James looked a little stupid. He had scarcely courage to meet the wondering pleasure in his wife's eyes, as he replied with an affectation of the morning's gruffness:

"Oh, well, it's this way: Vicar seems to have taken a sort of fancy to the lamp-post of a fellow, been walking about with him better part of an hour this afternoon, got him to come in to afternoon service, said I was to let him go where he liked; and then I did speak a bit nasty to him, gave him a sneer to put up with, when he didn't look as if he wanted much more to drop him into the Pilgrim's Progress Slough of Despond. And, after all, I'm an Englishman, and although he bids for a Yankee, I think I don't hold with kicking a man when he's down, and so—and so—"

"And so, James, you have been thinking whether we couldn't make out to give him a shelter here of some sort for the night. Were you thinking, maybe, of the sofa yonder? would it be long enough?"

"Aye, might be," replied the clerk, half-critically eyeing the great old-fashioned horse-hair heirloom that pretty nearly took up one side of the little sitting-room. "Might be that would really be about long enough even for him, with a couple of chairs on to end of it. But there, Molly, ye needn't to open your eyes so wide, and to look so scared-like. I've no thought of bringing the long-legged chap in here under our very roof. It's very well said as we aren't to judge, and all that; but it don't say as we're bound to take every beg—I mean every—raps, every—every—"

"Every poor houseless thing," came the gentle suggestion.

"Aye; yes, yes, that's it—every houseless thing into our own homes to give them a chance of our teaspoons, or to smother us alive in our beds. No, no, that's another matter; there's sense and there's craziness in all things. But what I do think is, as you might let me have those two old blankets as you put by for patchings, and with the fresh straw I got in yesterday for the donkey's bed, spread under them in the wash-house, he might sleep as soundly as the Queen in her Windsor Palace, and you could see to giving him a mug of cocoa and a bite of bread before he went on his way in the morning."

As the one trouble of worthy Mrs. Williams's married life had been the constant repression of her kind and charitable instincts, it need scarcely be said that she gave a willing assent to all her husband's propositions, and in a very few minutes he started off to the vicarage to learn where to look for the wanderer, that he might tender him his invitation.

It was a pity that Florry, and her mamma and sister also, could not see the clergyman's face as he stood listening to his clerk's stammered explanation of the object of his visit. Its almost brilliant happiness would have consoled them for his broken rest more than any amount of his loving assurances could do. The apostle's words were sounding in his heart:

"He which converteth the sinner from the error of his way shall save a soul from death, and shall hide a multitude of sins."

The vicar had felt humiliated, as he said, at the proof his clerk had given of the uselessness of his ministry, at any rate as far as one of his flock was concerned, and he had forthwith carried his trouble to his heavenly Father. The answer was granted with a speed wholly unexpected and un hoped for. Mr. Copleston went out into the garden, to seek the tramp, with a buoyant look and step that might well have made a stranger imagine that the twelve past hours of that Sabbath-day had been spent in restful ease. There were no traces in either, of the hour at the cottage hospital, the hour in the Sunday-school, the two full services in the church, and the three long and earnest conversations with individuals, which are more of a strain sometimes upon the mind than more general teaching.

But a good deal of the cheerful content in his countenance faded away when he and his disappointed clerk found the summer-house empty, and although Florry was summoned to help in the search, no bigger biped was found anywhere in the gardens, or orchard, than a poor young blackbird with a broken leg, which Edith bandaged up with a slip off a match by way of splint, while Williams walked home to his wife with a downcast face.

"Eh, Molly wife!" he ejaculated as he dropped back into his arm-chair, "this just serves to show as we can't pick up with a bit o' goodness, here an' there, as we can pick up a pocket-handkerchief. I've been spiteful an' uppish all along, an' never seen no need to pray 'deal not with us after our sins,' and so it's come upon me to be dealt with as I deserve, and if that poor chap comes to harm all along o' my hard tongue, I shall never know a minute's peace."

"I hope that poor tramp will come for papa to give him some work to do to-day," was Florry Copleston's first exclamation when she awoke on Monday morning, and she was highly delighted when Edith called to her from the next room:

"The man is already here, you lazy little puss. He came at six o'clock, and papa sent him to gather the walnuts."

Twenty minutes later Florry was flying out into the kitchen garden to have a peep up into the branches of the splendid tree in which the stranger was seated, choosing out such fruit as was already ripe. When she was summoned into breakfast, however, even this interest was forgotten in one more absorbing. She had come indoors intent upon preferring a request to be allowed to take some coffee and bread and butter out to the new gardener; but she caught sight of the postman on her way, and running to him, she shortly after entered the room with her hands full of letters, and her face beaming with joy. Tossing her light burden pell-mell on the table before her father, she exclaimed:

"Oh, papa! please be quick and look over them. The postman says there is one for me, and I know it will be from Hal or Frank from Wales."

Miss Florry's guess was correct, and the very possibility of such individuals as stranger-tramps being in existence was forgotten. Letters in a life that has lasted only eight years are important affairs, especially when they come from unknown places in another land. She gazed at the envelope in a state of rapt delight, and tried hard to shape her red lips into pronouncing the long name on the postmark.

Three days ago a kind-hearted, hospitably-disposed uncle and aunt of Guy Patterson's had carried him, and his three favorite friends, off with them for a three weeks' holiday stay at a little Welsh seaside place, to which they were very partial themselves, and which they always found equally popular with the various boys and girls they from time to time took with them.

"Do, do, do write me a little letter, one of you, all to myself," begged Florry earnestly, as she bid her brothers good-by; and the answer to her petition was the first news received from the travellers:

"MY DEAR FLORRY AND MR. CÆSAR," began the letter,

"I hope you are both quite well, and that the one of you that has got a tail has not scorched the hair off the end of it again, as you did last winter."

"Frank and I have been reminded of that foolish little tail acting broom in the library fireplace, and then filling the whole room with the odor of burned fur, by the smell of our own boots and clothes since last Friday. You are always wishing for adventures, Madam Florry, and I can tell you that your two brothers and old Berts Richardson very nearly came in for an adventure, three hours after saying good-by to Silverdale, that would have put a stop pretty sharply to their every saying 'how do you do' to it again."

"Of course, my estimable sister, with the laudable curiosity of a woman, you will ask at this point how we three came to be in more danger of an adventure than the whole of our party of six. But the answer is simple. In leaving Silverdale we were lucky enough to be able all to get into one carriage, and to have it all to ourselves, which was also lucky, because an hour and a half after we had started Mr. and Mrs. Elmslie said they were quite sure that we were all ready for luncheon, and forthwith one of the empty seats was turned into a table, and we regaled on cold chicken, and strawberry puffs and cheese-cakes, and cherries. We had just finished this light and elegant repast when we arrived at some place where we had to change, and, lo and behold! there was a great crush of people on the platform, grand doings going on somewhere on the line, fête, or something, and all the world and his wife going to it."

"The carriages were pretty full, so we had to get in as we could, Patterson with his uncle and aunt, Berts with us. At the next station most of the people got out, but we thought there was no sort of good in changing again, so we stayed where we were, with a lady and her little girl, a mite of a thing about three years old, I should think, in the carriage with us. The train was express from that point, and we were not to stop anywhere again for two hours. All of a sudden, while Frank and I were making friends with the little girl by means of cherries and chocolate drops, Berts looked up from a book he was reading and said, in a tone of surprise,

"What a strong smell of fire has been coming into the carriage the past few minutes—what can it mean?"

"Berts was right enough; it was strong indeed.

We all noticed it plainly enough when once he had called our attention to it, although we had not observed it before. We all echoed his words—'What could it mean?'

"At last he stooped down and put his hand on the floor, and then started up again with a smothered cry. Of course upon that we all stooped down, the lady, and even the little girl, and all also put our hands on the floor, and then we all, too, started up with cries, a good deal louder and more horrified than Berts's had been; for the floor our hands had touched, Florry, was hot, very hot, and the smell of burning was stronger than ever. We knew what it meant then. The carriage we were in was on fire! and we were flying along, making a strong blast of wind as we rushed through the air, which every moment must blow our smouldering enemy into greater fierceness; and there was more than an hour yet to pass before, in the due course of things, the train would stop."

"We all turned and looked at Berts. He ought to be papa's son instead of us; he is more worthy of the honor, I can tell you. So white but so calm he stood there, thinking for a moment, while all we others had lost our heads, and must have been burned to death, or crushed to death when the inside of the carriage fell out, but for him. The first thing he did was to look for an alarm signal, but there was none. Then he went to the door. He said he would get out, and thus attract notice to us and help; but the door was locked, Florry; both were locked."

"I don't think that I shall ever again be able to set a trap for a bird or a rat as long as I live. The feeling of being thus caged in, waiting for death to catch us, was more horrible than anything I have ever imagined; and all the while that awful, warning smell was growing more overpowering. The lady clutched up her little girl in her arms and fainted. Berts looked at her one instant, and then ordering us, in a stern, determined voice, as if he were at least a hundred years old, to get her up somehow or other off the floor on to the seats, lest the boards should give way, he climbed out of the window before we knew what he was going to do. It's not an easy thing to do, I must tell you, to get out of a narrow railway carriage window, with the train going express, and the wind and the dust blinding and choking you all the time. But Berts did it somehow, then he waited one more moment to tell us to lift the lady's feet and our own off the floor, and to make a second effort to open the door, which he could not do, and then he started on his journey down to the engine-driver."

"I watched him. Once he was nearly jerked away while making a long step from one shaking carriage to the next; but, happily, he was saved. Such a lot of heads were out of windows by that time, and there was quite a shout of thankfulness when he was seen to have a firm clutch again. Then the railway people saw him, the engine was stopped, we were got out, and not a moment too soon, for two of the boards of the flooring fell as the train stopped, and the wheels burst into flames."

"There was a pretty to do after that, I believe, in getting the burning carriage off the line, and stopping the next train from running into it; but we saw little of all that, for we were packed into the compartment with Guy, and Mr. and Mrs. Elmslie; and Mrs. Elmslie made so much of the fainting lady, that by the time she reached her husband at our journey's end, she was almost quite jolly again, and able to tell the stranger that old Berts was a hero; and that he is, and a regular brick besides; and so I hope father will tell Captain and Mrs. Richardson, for I am quite sure he won't tell them a word himself."

"This is an awfully jolly little place, Mr. and Mrs. Elmslie are the jolliest people for knowing how to let boys enjoy themselves I ever came across, and we are all as jolly as sandboys, eels, or Cæsar when you've given him a lot more milk than it's good his Imperial Majesty should have."

"Frank says he'll write to you next, but not more than a sixth part as much as I have scribbled, so you know what to expect. Love to all,

'HAL COPLESTON.'

"My first letter, all to myself, has been a very important letter," murmured Florry gravely, at last breaking the silence that followed upon the ending of Hal's letter.

"It has indeed," assented her father, gravely as herself. "I could willingly have had it less so."

Her mother could do no more than press her lips to the little girl's forehead, and then, returning the letter to her, she dismissed her by signs, rather than words, to her place beside her father at the breakfast-table.

When breakfast was over, and the servants were summoned to prayers, it was no effort of memory, no mere form of words, that broke from the vicar's heart as he prayed for all men, but especially for those near and dear to them:

"That it may please Thee to preserve all that travel by land or by water, we beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord."

"We beseech Thee to hear us, good Lord," murmured the mother, as she sat beside the open window of her sitting-room an hour later with her work in her hands, and her tears dropping on it for mingled feelings of thankfulness for her boys' past preservation from an awful death, and the anxiety for their future safety naturally aroused by the morning's news.

Meantime, Florry was standing sedately watching the tramp gathering beans. At last, as he came to the end of a row beside her, she said solemnly:

"You have travelled a great deal, haven't you?"

"Yes," said the man; "a very great deal."

"Ah!" was the earnest reply, in a tone of considerable relief; "I thought so; and yet you have been preserved, so I don't think I'll be frightened for my brothers, after all. And for myself, I don't want a fire adventure; I think—I'd rather have the rainy one."

THE PASSOVER.

S.S. Lesson for Oct. 8. Mark 14: 12-21. Golden Texts, 1 Cor. 5: 7. Ex. 12: 27. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Leaven of Self—Its Fatal Work—The Faithful Soul Guided by the Lord—The Announcement of the Betrayal—A Pertinent Question for Disciples—What Self-Interest is—How Christians Fall into the Sin of Judas—The Commiseration of the Saviour.

OUR subject for to-day is our Lord's commemoration of the passover with His disciples, immediately before His institution of the Lord's Supper. "The first day of unleavened bread" was come. God had ordained the children of Israel by Moses, "Seven days shall ye eat unleavened bread; even the first day shall ye put away leaven out of your houses, for whosoever eateth leavened bread from the first day until the seventh day, that soul shall be cut off from Israel" (Ex. 12: 15).

The English golden text says, "Purge out therefore the old leaven, that ye may be a new lump, as ye are unleavened. For even Christ our Passover is sacrificed for us; therefore let us keep the feast, not with the old leaven, neither with the leaven of malice and wickedness; but with the unleavened bread of sincerity and truth." What is the "old leaven"? It is distinguished from "the leaven of malice and wickedness," what is it then? Leaven contains within itself the principle of corruption, it causes dough to ferment and therefore to rise, and fill more space, without being more in substance. This is a true image of that principle which the Bible calls "the flesh" and which we usually call "self." Wherever it comes, it brings corruption with it, it puffs up, ferments. Jesus calls us to feast with Him, but that we may do so, there must be no leaven, no self, for Jesus cannot unite with self, cannot receive self. The heart which is constantly occupied with its own wrongs, its own rights, its own virtues, its own failings, its own feelings, its own reputation, its own development, its own experience, its own predilections, its own powers its own convenience, its own presence, or its own anything—is one where Jesus can find no resting-place. When He comes He is enough to fill all the space, He can

ADMIT OF NO RIVAL.

"And the first day of unleavened bread, when they killed the passover, His disciples said unto Him, Where wilt Thou that we go and prepare that Thou mayest eat the Passover?" O how little knew the disciples that the one real Passover, the fulfilment of all the types, the Lamb of God, stood before them about to be sacrificed! He had sought to tell them, but Mary alone understood Him, and she perhaps but dimly.

"And He sendeth forth two of His disciples (Peter and John, Luke 22: 8), and saith unto them, Go ye into the city, and there shall meet you a man bearing a pitcher of water: follow him. And whosoever he shall go in, say ye to the good man of the house, The Master saith, Where is the guest-chamber, where I shall eat the passover with My disciples? And he will show you a large upper room furnished and prepared: there make ready for us." Our beloved Lord never brought His disciples into an embarrassing position; when He told them to loose and lead away the ass and colt belonging to an unknown man, He both gave them His authority, and prepared the man's heart beforehand; and now when He sent them to ask for hospitality, He made His host willing. And yet how often have we feared to go forward where we knew our us, because we feared He would fail us in a moment of difficulty! How little credit have we given Him either for ability or for faithfulness! and yet He condescends still to use those who have so wronged Him! May not all our failures, and how many they are! proceed from this miserable unbelief? Might we not have succored thousands and tens of thousands both in soul and body, had we only looked completely away from them and from ourselves to Jesus?

The "disciples went forth, and came into the city, and found as He had said unto them: and they made ready the passover." "And in the evening He cometh with the twelve." Many a great passover had been celebrated in Israel, especially those in the reigns of Hezekiah and Josiah, but a greater still was at hand, and those who partook of it knew it not. Jesus Himself, the very Paschal Lamb, eat of the flesh of the passover lamb. He whose blood was to be shed before twenty-four hours had elapsed, sat within the blood-sprinkled doorway, and He knew, as He sat there all things which should come upon Him. "And as they sat and did eat, Jesus said, 'Verily I say unto you, One of you which eateth with Me shall betray Me.' The bitter herbs with which the lamb's flesh was eaten were not so bitter to Him as this, that a trusted disciple, one to whom power and authority had been given over all devils and to cure diseases, as well as the great glorious commission to preach the Gospel—that this one of the twelve should work His ruin. Wounded in the house of His friends (Zec. 13: 6), betrayed by His "own familiar friend" (Ps. 41: 9), the heart of Jesus was indeed heavy. "And they began to be sorrowful, and to say unto Him one by one, and another said, Is it I?" Shall we take our place among them, and say Is it I? Would to God that every professing believer would do so. Would to God every preacher, every Sabbath-school teacher, every Bible-woman, every evangelist, would lay this to heart and say Is it I? "Am I guilty of betraying my Lord?"

It was no murderer or swearer, no adulterer who was the betrayer, it was a disciple who loved himself and his own interests more than the Lord Jesus and His interests; this was all, but this was enough. The Lord Jesus came to teach us by His holy example a life of self-denial, i.e., self-ignoring, a life lived in the life of Another, a will moving in the will of Another, a joy springing from the joy of Another, a sorrow emanating from the sorrow of Another. Self-interest in one who professes to be a disciple of Jesus, and especially one who is a worker in the Lord's vineyard, gives a denial to the very spirit of Christianity.

When we see a Christian worker greedy of gain, seeking for himself either money, or comfort, or honor, we see him betraying his Lord, and giving occasion to those who know not Christ, to believe that Christianity is only another method of securing personal advantage even in this world. When a Christian worker makes complaints of the accommodation, or of the food provided for him, instead of joyfully enduring hardness for Christ's sake, he is betraying his Master's cause; when a Christian worker dresses in the vain fashion of the day, because she has not love enough to Jesus to make her dare to be peculiar, she is betraying the Master's cause. When a Christian upper servant has not enough of the Spirit of Christ to be willing to help an overworked kitchen maid or under housemaid, because she stands so much upon the world's way of thinking, that she "will not do anything menial," she betrays the cause of the divine Carpenter of Nazareth: when a Christian man who is out of work, would rather live on charity than take a situation which, in his un-Christlike pride he considers beneath him, he is betraying his Lord. When a Christian man of business demeans himself by putting out untrue and exaggerated advertisements, he betrays his Lord: when a child of God instead of keeping within his income goes into debt, and thus brings the honesty of Christians into question, he betrays his Lord. O God how few of us are free from Judas' sin!

True there are many who will try to get away from the lesson which the Spirit of God would teach us, by arguing whether Judas ever was converted or not. Reader, it will neither benefit your soul, nor hurt it to settle this vexed question; in any case he was not converted from his self-love but then, are you? If not, make haste to yield yourself so fully to Jesus that you may have neither life nor interest, joy nor sorrow, out of Him. Make haste to let Him fill your being, for thus alone can you be saved from the sin of Judas. Christ's salvation includes salvation from ourselves but that we may be saved from self, we must be willing, not once only, but in every moment of temptation to let self go.

To the repeated question, Is it I? Jesus answered and said unto them, "It is one of the twelve which dippeth with me in the dish. The Son of man indeed goeth as it is written of Him; but woe to that man by whom the Son of man is betrayed! good were it for that man if he had never been born." Jesus' heart was sad for Judas, even now that salvation for him was forfeited. He knew what meant, these things were no empty words to Him who gave His life for the salvation of men. God teach us more and more their import, that we may be ready to Thy hand at every moment to go out and seek the lost that they may be saved.

Dr. Guthrie, as was Well Known, was a Total Abstainer, but few people knew how he became so. The following account of the change is from the pen of Dr. Guthrie himself: "In a journey in Ireland in 1840, in an open car, the weather was cold, with a lashing rain. By the time we reached a small inn we were soaking with water outside, and as those days were days not of tea and toast, but of toddy-drinking, we thought the best way was to soak ourselves with whiskey inside. Accordingly, we rushed into the inn, ordered warm water, and got our tumblers of toddy. Out of kindness to our car driver, we called him in; he was not very well clothed—indeed, he rather belonged in that respect to the order of my ragged school in Edinburgh. He was soaking with wet, and we offered him a good rummer of toddy. We thought that what was 'sauce for the goose was sauce for the gander,' but the car driver was not such a gander as we, like geese, took him for. He would not taste it. 'Why,' we asked; 'what objection have you?' Said he, 'Plase your riv'ence, I am a teetotaler, and won't taste a drop of it.' Well, that stuck in my throat, and went to my heart, and (in another sense than drink, though!) to my head. Here was a humble, uncultivated, uneducated Roman Catholic carman, and I said, if that man can deny himself that indulgence, why should not I, a Christian minister? I remember that; and I have ever remembered it to the honor of Ireland. That circumstance, along with the scenes in which I was called to labor daily for years, made me a teetotaler."

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Reports from the Interior of Egypt Indicate that no further resistance will be made to the British army. The entire population of the part of the country around Zagazig have returned to their homes and are working in the fields, and every house and hovel floats a white flag. The forbearance of the conquering army has produced a most wholesome effect, as Arabi had circulated reports of atrocities and plunder committed by the British. The natives are surprised to see that all the native property has been left untouched. There have been illuminations every night since the arrival of the English troops in honor of the Khédive and England. The fortresses at Kafr-el-Dwar and Damietta, both capable of making a strong resistance, have surrendered, and on September 19th, a deputation of Ulemas waited on Sir Garnet Wolseley and assured him that the religious tranquillity would not be disturbed. The Khédive has issued a manifesto declaring that England has great interests in Egypt, both in regard to finances and traffic through the Suez Canal; that for the protection of those interests she was compelled to interfere, but that she has no intention of annexing the country. The Khédive announces that he has authorized General Wolseley to represent him in restoring order and punishing the rebels. All loyal Egyptians are called upon to render General Wolseley every assistance. Any one refusing to do so will be treated as a rebel.

The Proposal that England Should Maintain a protectorate over the Suez Canal if not over all Egypt is received with favor in many quarters, though Russia, France, Italy and Spain are strongly opposed to it. General Loring, who probably knows more about Egypt than any other American, said recently on the subject: "Three-fourths of the commerce which passes through the Suez Canal belongs to England. With efficient neutrality laws governing this canal the commercial world would be benefited by having the assured protection of a great government like that of England in Egypt. The Mohammedan world, with its pilgrimages, barbarisms, slavery and degradation of womankind, would become permanently subdivided, the communications between Asia and Africa would be sifted through a country vigorous with free labor, education, religious liberty and a just administration of law. Africa would soon be penetrated through the valley of the Nile—Egypt's great natural channel of commerce—and the vast regions, with their benighted millions, about the sources of that mysterious river, even to the Equator, would be reached by the hand of modern progress."

The City of Cairo was Saved from Destruction and the European inhabitants from massacre by the promptitude with which the British cavalry proceeded there after the battle at Tel-el-Kebir. The city would probably have been burned by the mob had they not arrived. The news of the defeat at Tel-el-Kebir excited the greatest grief and consternation among the population, but before they had time to come to any conclusion as to what action should be taken, the arrival of General Drury Lowe and the cavalry at once put a stop to the plans of the violent portion of the mob. When they reached the city, Arabi and Toulba had a long conversation with some friends as to whether they should fly to the desert, but on the advice of Ninet, the Swiss gentleman who had remained with the Egyptian ambulance throughout the war, they determined to give themselves up to the English and not to Tewfik Pacha.

The Surrender of Arabi to General Lowe of the British army is thus described by a war correspondent: "The Governor of the city was sent for and told by General Lowe that he was aware that Arabi was in Cairo and demanded his surrender. He offered to send a body of troops to surround Arabi's house. The Governor, however, said that this was unnecessary, as he would deliver him up. Then the Governor returned into the city and brought out Arabi and Toulba Pachas. Arabi, on delivering himself up, said to General Lowe that he had at first no intention of fighting the English, for whom he had always had a great respect; but the war was forced upon him. For this he blamed Tewfik Pacha; but, being a soldier, when the fighting began he was bent upon fighting. Now that all was over the Egyptians and English were brothers again. He trusted himself to English honor as a soldier whose army had been defeated. Arabi's manner was very dignified and composed. General Lowe replied that he could not enter on the subject of the war. His only mission was to arrest him."

Uncertainty Prevails as to the Date of the coronation of the Czar of Russia. He and the Czarina are now on a visit to Moscow, where the ceremony will take place, but it is given out that their visit is not for the coronation but simply to visit the Moscow Exhibition. It is believed in official quarters that the statement is untrue, and has only been issued to deceive the Nihilists. At one of the recent trials of conspirators, Lieutenant Butzewitch, who was in the plot, said on being pressed to divulge the names of his co-conspirators with a promise to him of a light sentence in case he complied, "I pity you, and the weakness which the government shows proves that those who, like me, wish to change it, are alone in the right. The idea of you asking me, whom you are about to condemn to death, while you have every means of finding out at your disposal! Have you not money and soldiers? Does not the very fact of your asking me prove your utter helplessness against us? But how can it be otherwise, as we have numbers in our favor? For, do not deceive yourselves, but take my word, that out of every ten enlightened Russians nine are socialists." This same officer is supposed to be the inventor of a new manner of preparing dynamite in the form of narrow ribbons, for putting along the rails, where they are not noticeable, being of the same color. This invention renders the dangerous and slow system of making mines unnecessary.

Anti-Jewish Riots have Been Renewed in different parts of Hungary, chiefly at Janoshaza, where a report was spread that through the efforts of the Jews, the military would be quartered in the town for several months at the expense of the residents. In their fury the peasants determined to kill all the Jews and in the first place to raze the synagogue to the ground. Nine Jews were frightfully beaten, and one dangerously wounded. At Suwalk, in Russian Poland, frightful outrages have again been committed. An attack was made on the Jews, the aggressors consisting chiefly of retired soldiers. The rioters, beside destroying several houses belonging to Jews, leaving the inhabitants nothing but the clothing in which they were attired, ill-treated a number of Jews, about thirty of whom were seriously injured, some having their heads, others their arms, broken.

An Attempt to Reform the French Constitution will be made in the next session of the Legislature. M. Naquet has announced that with the hope of preventing the evil effects of frequent Ministerial crises, he will move to abolish the Ministers altogether, or, at least, Ministers having seats in the Legislature. His programme involves the absolute separation of legislative from executive power, the selection of the Ministry by the President of the Republic, regardless of the sentiment of the Chambers, and the exclusion from the Chambers of all members of the government. This, it will be observed, is in some important respects, an approach toward the American system, of which M. Naquet has long been a close student.

The Ignorance of Russian Officials has Been frequently described but no one supposed they were so ignorant as a recent incident implies. It is stated that the Rev. Henry Lansdell, an English clergyman, and author of "Through Siberia," who started several weeks ago from St. Petersburg on a missionary tour in Siberia, was arrested and brought back, the police having taken the Bibles he distributed for Nihilist literature. After some considerable difficulty, however, the reverend gentleman got himself free again, though whether he proceeded on his journey is not stated.

Canon Wilberforce is Still Pressing on the attention of the prelates of the Episcopal Church in England the responsibility they incur in renting real estate to liquor sellers. Mr. C. H. Spurgeon thus comments on the movement: "With much pleasure we note that Canon Wilberforce has made a gallant attempt to clear the Church of England from complicity with the liquor traffic. Personally he is doing all that can be expected of any man, namely, getting rid of licenses as they fall in. No one can expect the Ecclesiastical Commissioners to do more; but we hardly dare to hope that they will do as much. Evidently, the Archbishop and other Commissioners will be all the better for a little stirring of their consciences. It will be an unspeakable blessing to them if the subject is kept before the public mind, and thus gently brought under eyes which are none too eager to perceive troublesome facts. Corporations are slow in being reformed, and for them to reform themselves is a thing so rare that we might almost say that it never occurred, and never will. 'Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots?' We shall see what we shall see."

Mr. Moody Commenced a Series of Evangelistic meetings at Swansea, on September 3d, which were conducted with characteristic vigor, and realized the prayerful expectations of earnest-hearted Christians in South Wales. Among those who co-operated with Mr. Moody are Lady Hope, who has given several stirring addresses, Rev. T. E. Cleworth, Rev. J. Thomas, an old local celebrity, and Dr. Rawling, an eminent physician in the town. The meetings were held in the Albert Hall, and crowded audiences filled the structure to its utmost limits. Many souls were saved, and Christians received a fresh baptism of the Holy Spirit. Mr. Moody then commenced services at Cardiff, from September 9th to 16th; and at Newport, Monmouthshire, from September 17th to 24th; then at Plymouth, from September 25th to October 6th; and then for two weeks in Paris.

The Contents of a "Charm" were Exposed in Brazil recently, and caused some surprise to its possessor. Mr. Leeite, of Brazil, writing from Caldas, says: "I spent twenty-six days in my last journey, and preached nearly every day. I was successful beyond all my expectations. One person who made a profession of faith on this occasion was a man who had confessed to the Jesuit monks, who were at Cabo Verde in January last. He was neighbor to a real Christian, who, seeing some charms about his neck, asked leave to examine them. 'No, sir, by no means,' said the man. 'But why not?' said the other. 'I will sew them up again for you.' 'No,' said the man, 'I cannot consent; the holy missionaries (the Jesuits) gave them to me.' The neighbor, however, insisted so much that they finally opened one of the charms. And what did it contain? One of a pack of gambling cards. The man was so much disappointed that he immediately flung away all these things he had been carrying around his neck, and began to examine for himself, and he and his wife now profess the religion of our Lord Jesus Christ." There are all too many people who have been fascinated by cards, and in playing with them have lost time and money, but it is something new to learn that they are used as these Jesuits used them. No wonder the dupe lost confidence in his charm.

Vol. IV. of The Christian Herald and Signs of our Times, bound in cloth, containing all the numbers for 1881, with complete index. Price, $3 including postage: ten per cent. less to ministers and the trade.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE GRAND TEMPERANCE CELEBRATION

In Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD gives this week on its first page, with five vignette portraits, a picture of an immense meeting held on Friday, September 8th, in Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle in London. The occasion was the celebration of a successful ten days' mission conducted by Mr. Richard T. Booth, an American temperance lecturer, now engaged in conducting meetings in various parts of Great Britain. The vast edifice, which is capable of accommodating seven thousand persons, was filled to overflowing. Mr. Spurgeon presided.

In addressing the meeting he said drunkenness was one of the worst of sins. It was an awful sin in itself. He would say that the worship of Bacchus was one of the most degrading that could befall a fellow-being. It was a degradation beyond the worship of the wooden image or the stone idol. He had seen youth blasted and old age without hope on account of this besetting evil. Was it, he asked, not killing a man when the attributes that make man above the brute creation were taken from him, and when he was left by his fellow-men to reel to and fro; when his tongue became speechless; when his eyes could not see; when he blubbered and stammered, and when, in fact, he or any one else did not know what he was about? This evil of intemperance was the burglar that opened the door for the admission of other foul and fell intruders. It blighted hopes and blasted prospects; it ruined men day by day, from the young branch to the aged stem of the social circle, and its effects were sadly visible everywhere around them.

On Tuesday, September 12th, another meeting was held in the same building for the purpose of making a presentation to Mr. and Mrs. Booth as an acknowledgment of the good effected during the ten days' mission. Mr. Dunn, one of Mr. Spurgeon's elders, dwelt upon the marvellous work which had been accomplished in their midst. Up to that evening 21,695 persons had taken the blue ribbon, and no fewer than 11,325 had signed the pledge. They were also thankful for the spiritual blessing that had resulted from Mr. Booth's labors. After expressing regret at the unavoidable absence of Canon Wilberforce, he begged Mr. Booth's acceptance of a timepiece suitably inscribed as a farewell expression of esteem, and bearing the signature of Mr. Spurgeon and his brother. Mr. Smithers, secretary of the committee, presented Mrs. Booth with a flower-basket, while Mrs. Smithers, as representing the ladies' committee, handed Mr. Booth an inkstand. Mr. Spurgeon next presented Mr. Booth with a set of his sermons.

MR. RICHARD T. BOOTH.

THE portrait at the head of the frontispiece is that of Mr. Richard T. Booth, who crossed the Atlantic to engage in temperance work in Great Britain, and whose labors there during the past few months have been remarkably successful. He was born at Ithaca, N. Y., in 1844. His parents were poor, and at the early age of ten years he was sent to work in a cotton factory. At the outbreak of the war he entered the army and served in the 111th Regiment, New York Volunteers. He was engaged early in the war and was taken prisoner. After his exchange he rejoined the army and was in the battles of the Wilderness and Gettysburg. At the close of the war he settled in Moravia, N. Y.

On January 1st, 1867, Mr. Booth married Mary J. Durling, of Seneca Falls, N. Y. She was a Christian, and had been reared in a Christian home. Shortly after marriage the young couple commenced business in Seneca Falls, and there Mr. Booth first came under the alluring influence of the "social glass." Up to this time he had been, if not a pledged, at least a practical abstainer, and had no appetite for the drink. In two and a half years the habit acquired such a mastery over him, that it had to be satisfied at any cost, and his wife and children were brought to want. Of this period Mr. Booth himself says:

"At last I could no longer endure the scorpionlike stings of outraged conscience, and in my remorse I resolved to END MY MISERABLE EXISTENCE.

One day when hovering on the very brink of the fatal precipice, I met in the street a young gentleman of the town, who had many a time been my boon companion, and who was the possessor of great wealth. With a kind heart and an open hand he proffered me assistance, which enabled me to remove to Moravia. There, through the devoted care of my wife and mother, I regained health and strength. After my recovery I went to Ithaca, the home of my childhood, and started forth in life afresh with high hopes and good prospects. Prosperity and friends returned. But in an evil hour I partook of a glass of lager beer. The appetite returned and reasserted its power, and again I found myself on the downward way.

THE GREAT CRISIS OF HIS LIFE.

"At last there came the great crisis of my life. One morning about four o'clock, after a night's carousal, I found my way to my miserable home. As I approached, I observed that the lamp was burning low, and there was no face watching for me as usual at the window. I thought that for once my patient wife, quite worn out, had retired to rest, having given up all hope of my return. As I ascended the steps I looked through the little window at the door, and there I saw her kneeling in the centre of the room.

"I entered the house, and feeling was so dormant within me that I tried to pass her prostrate form on my way to the sleeping apartment. In an agony of despair she seized me and pulled me down on my knees by her side. She threw her arms about my neck, and this was her prayer, 'My God, have mercy on me and save him!' Smitten with anguish, out of the depths of my helplessness, I repeated her petition, 'My God, have mercy on my wife, and save me!' God mercifully heard and answered our united cry. From that moment to this not a single drop of the accursed, soul-destroying liquor has passed my lips. I rose from my knees a saved and sobered man. Soon afterward I signed the temperance pledge, and set up the family altar in my now happy home; a new and blessed era in my life's history was begun."

AN ADVOCATE OF THE BLUE RIBBON.

Within a few days of his conversion Mr. Booth appeared on the platform as an advocate of the Blue Ribbon Temperance movement. His first temperance address was delivered in Ithaca, and from that time to the present he has been assiduously and successfully engaged in fighting the foe that had so often conquered him in bygone days.

Early in the autumn of 1877 he was joined in his public work by Mr. J. Reed Smith, who, like himself, was a reformed man. They clasped hands, and engaged in the Blue Ribbon enterprise with enthusiasm, and with a deep-set determination born of experience.

The young men went to the New England States, and began a mission in the city of Holyoke, Mass. They held successful meetings, and a large number of persons formerly addicted to drunkenness signed the pledge and donned the blue ribbon. A week was devoted to East Hampton, and then a campaign was begun in Greenfield, Conn. Here they were also favored with wonderful success.

Among the places next visited, and in which similar beneficial results were experienced, were North Adams, Fitchburg, Clinton, West Brookfield, and Turner's Falls, closing their first year's New England campaign at the town of West Somerville.

The second year of the joint labors of the temperance evangelists was inaugurated by a camp-meeting at Sterling Junction, Mass. It commenced on September 3d, 1878, and lasted for eight days. There were present many of the leading workers and speakers on this theme in America. Colonel Luther Caldwell, Colonel Pearce, Miss Frances E. Willard, and other well-known friends of the cause, delivered addresses. The railroad companies provided extra trains for the throngs that daily visited the camping-ground. From this time onward to the month of October, 1879, Messrs. Booth and Reed visited about fifty different centres of population in the New England States, and, among others, the city of New Bedford, Mass., where much good was done.

After two years of service, Mr. Smith and Mr. Booth parted at the close of their work in the city of Keene, N. H., where they met with great success. Mr. Smith returned to the practice of his profession as a stenographer, while his companion in labor continues to devote himself to the work of Gospel temperance.

FINAL MEETINGS IN AMERICA.

About the middle of March, 1880, Mr. Booth was called to speak in the city of Lockport, N. Y., where he labored for four weeks. From Lockport Mr. Booth proceeded to Malden, and there conducted a fortnight's meetings, which were concluded by a grand "farewell" in view of his impending departure for Great Britain. Many friends wished him to cross the ocean that he might devote a brief holiday to rest and the recruiting influences of change of scene in Great Britain and France.

Mr. Booth sailed for England in the Anchoria of the Anchor Line, and was on board that vessel when she collided with the Queen on June 13th, 1880. The two ships returned to New York, and on July 21st Mr. Booth again embarked for England, this time on the Scythia, of the Cunard Line. The voyage was safely accomplished, and Mr. Booth on landing proceeded to London, where, on August 7th, he was formally welcomed by a number of earnest English workers at Hoxton Hall, and many kind and brotherly greetings were uttered. Here, in the absence of Mr. Noble, he continued to labor for five or six weeks. Invitations were then responded to from the provinces, and he gave addresses at Newmarket, Tunbridge Wells, and other places in and near London. He afterward proceeded to Scotland, speaking to large audiences in the cities of Edinburgh, Glasgow, Greenock, and Peebles.

A GROC-SELLER'S PLEDGE.

On January 9th, 1881, Mr. Booth entered upon a ten days' mission at Cardiff, South Wales, where the work was solid and deep. Over seven thousand signatures were taken during his stay, and the meetings have been continued with no small success since his departure. An incident occurred at Cardiff that deserves to be placed on record as the first of its kind, in the advocate's experience, in Great Britain. A saloon-keeper who had long kept a house of very low repute, and was about to commence the business in another, went to one of the meetings of the series and signed the pledge, amid a scene of indescribable enthusiasm. The people threw caps, handkerchiefs, and shawls into the air in token of their delight. His wife, two sons, a daughter, and two brothers followed his example. The liquor dealer went next day to the prayer-meeting and knelt down on the floor in the presence of all who were assembled. Mr. Booth asked him if he would there and then give his heart to God, to which the man replied, "I have done so; I am trusting in Jesus this moment."

Mr. Booth afterward held meetings at Darlington, Kidderminster, Ipswich, Leeds, Leicester, and other towns, where he was cordially received and where he was very successful. Last summer he paid a brief visit to America for rest and recuperation, but returned to England in August and recommenced his labors. The results of his ten days' mission in Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle have already been related.

THE REV. C. H. SPURGEON.

THE REV. CHARLES HADDON SPURGEON, in whose magnificent and capacious Tabernacle Mr. R. T. Booth has just concluded his ten-days' Gospel Temperance campaign, is so well known, that it seems a superfluous work again to give the facts of his busy and eventful life to the world, but the occasion furnished by the hour, and the circumstance that he has so fully and cordially identified himself with the temperance mission, seem to require and even justify the reproduction of some, at least, of the leading facts in his remarkable history. We hope, therefore, to give, in the course of two or three weeks, some details of his history, with portraits of his wife and of his father, REV. BASIL WILBERFORCE, M.A., Canon of Winchester.

THE REV. CANON WILBERFORCE, another distinguished temperance leader whose portrait is in the group on our front page, was born in the Cathedral Close at Winchester—of which cathedral his father was then Canon—on the 14th February, 1841, and is now forty-two years of age. His father sought by constant care to lead his sons, early bereft of a mother's love, in the right path, and till that sad day in July, 1873, when he was thrown from his horse and killed, they were the objects of his most assiduous paternal care. One of them, Ernest Roland, whose portrait appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of August 17th, this year, was appointed that month bishop of Newcastle.

Canon Wilberforce was educated at Eton, and Exeter College, Oxford, where he took his B.A. degree in 1865, and his M.A., in the succeeding year. He was ordained by his father in 1866, and held the several curacies that he held during the five following years, gained that experience of church work among the masses which has served him so well in later life. In 1871, he preached his first sermon on Trinity Sunday as rector of St. Mary's, Southampton, and early began that system of visitation among his parishioners by which he was enabled to see that the drinking habits of the lower classes formed the greatest hindrance to the spread of the Gospel.

THE CANON'S STORY OF TAKING THE PLEDGE, as related by him at Exeter Hall, is as follows:

"Should you become ill, instead of resorting to Dr. Brandy, try Drs. Rest, Quiet, and Do-nothing. Before I became an abstainer, I was much subject to fainting fits. I even fainted in the pulpit, and my life was a burden, and when I had made up my mind to abstain, my medical man came from London, and said, 'If you do, you will probably die.' You want the 'whip' for your constitution. I did not believe him, and I said: 'Very well, doctor, then I'll die, and there's an end of it.' But I have not died. And when I met that medical man more than a year after, I said, 'Now, doctor, what do you think of it?' He said: 'You beat me altogether. I was never more mistaken in any case in my life. And now let me tell you, that if there was no such thing as alcohol, I should have to put up my shutters. Nearly all the illnesses that come before me have, in one sense or another, come from that; not always from the personal indulgence of the patients, for sometimes it is hereditary.'"

In November, 1873, Canon Wilberforce took the pledge and founded a temperance society in his own parish. Since that day an improvement which can only be called remarkable has taken place in the district. More than 2000 persons have taken the pledge from the canon's own hand, and temperance meetings are held regularly in his parish.

Canon Wilberforce has always most strongly pleaded for Gospel temperance, and insisted that the church should be in the forefront of the movement, and that "Love to Christ" should be its inspiring motive.

In 1875 he read an able paper at the Church Congress at Stoke-upon-Trent, on "The Best Means to Counteract Drunkenness," the result of which was the bringing of several clergymen into the temperance ranks, among whom we may specially mention Canon Farrar and Canon Duckworth.

As Canon of Winchester (to which he was appointed in 1876), he preached his famous temperance sermon, "Sound an Alarm," in St. Paul's Cathedral, which was speedily published, and obtained a circulation of about 50,000 copies. That all classes are needed in this crusade against drink has constantly been pressed home by the canon in his platform and other utterances.

THE IMPORTANCE OF WOMAN'S INFLUENCE he has specially recognized, as is evidenced by the following closing lines from a speech he delivered at a recent temperance meeting: "I shall never forget the beautiful lines of the poet Longfellow, in speaking of the influence of women over men. In the poem of 'Hiawatha,' he says:

"As unto the bow the cord is
So unto the man is woman:
Though she bends him, she obeys him;
Though she draws him, yet she follows;
Useless each without the other."

Useless each without the other." That is the grand social movement for the regeneration of England. My last appeal to-night is to the women."

For nearly ten years Canon Wilberforce has given the temperance cause the force of his eloquence and the weight of his personal example; ever being ready to stand and speak on its platforms, asking not which section of the body needs his advocacy, but discerning that all are co-workers in the one great movement that has for its aim the freeing of the nation from its terrible bondage to alcohol.

REV. JAMES A. SPURGEON.

JAMES ARCHER SPURGEON, whose portrait appears on the upper right-hand of the frontispiece, is the younger brother of the pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle. He is now about forty-five years of age. He was prepared for the work of the ministry by a four years' course of study at Regent's Park College, of which institution the Rev. Dr. Angus was Principal. He entered this college from Colchester in 1855, and gained the reputation of being a good student and an acceptable preacher.

He first settled as pastor of the leading Baptist Church at Southampton in 1861, and, after a brief but successful pastorate, was earnestly solicited to transfer the scene of his ministry to London. A new chapel had been built at Bayswater, a London suburb, and here Mr. James Spurgeon was induced to exercise pastoral functions until he was chosen to be assistant pastor at the Tabernacle, "in consequence," to use the senior pastor's words, "of the vast work of the church and our own frequent infirmities." His union with his famous brother has been a very happy and successful one for both, and, to quote Mr. C. H. Spurgeon once more, "his invaluable aid has lightened our burdens, and conducted much to our peace of mind."

In the course of time, having as co-pastor only a portion of the work at the Tabernacle, although that really meant more than the whole work of many laborious pastors, he devoted himself to the establishment of a Baptist congregation at Croydon, where he has now a large and handsome chapel and a church numbering some hundreds of members, and where he preaches nearly every Sunday. At the same time he continues to act as co-pastor at the Tabernacle, occasionally preaching and giving instruction to the seventy or eighty students as college tutor.

In a paper which appeared some time ago in his brother's well-known magazine, The Sword and Trowel, it is stated that once a month, or oftener when required, the junior pastor appoints a day to see all persons anxious to join the church, who have been approved of by the elders. It falls to his lot, also, to assume a general oversight of the various numerous charitable and philanthropic societies, and to do his part in bearing the burden of work connected with a congregation numbering more than six thousand persons.

In the college his work has been most valuable, his educational qualifications having tended to raise the standard of scholarship in that institution. In August, 1879, Mr. James Spurgeon visited America, when the sermons and addresses he delivered were specially reported for, and published in this journal.

THE REV. NEWMAN HALL, LL.B.

MR. HALL, whose portrait is No. 5 on the frontispiece, is the son of the late Mr. John Vine Hall, of Maidstone, author of "The Sinner's Friend," a small publication which has secured a circulation of more than two million copies, and has been translated in nearly thirty of the languages of the globe. He was born at Maidstone, England, on May 22d, 1816. His early education was received at Totteridge School, but, having been early converted to Christ, he decided, with the approval of his parents, to devote himself to the ministry of the Congregational denomination, and therefore entered Highbury College for the appropriate training.

His college career was brilliant, and terminated in his taking the B.A. degree at the London University. Thirteen years later, and when he was one of the most busy and popular men in London, he took the higher degree of LL.B., and won a valuable law scholarship at the same time.

In the year 1842 he was called to the important pastorate of Albion Congregational Chapel, Hull, as his first ministerial appointment. Shortly afterward he married a daughter of Dr. Gordon, of Hull, but the lamentable conduct of his wife necessitated a dissolution on August 8th, 1879, Sir J. Hannen, the President of the Divorce Court, in his summing up, giving utterance to the following sentiments:

"Mrs. Hall was sinning against God as well as man. Mr. Hall treated her with the utmost tenderness, indulgence, and patience. In not a single instance, not in one single word, has Mr. Hall departed from the line of conduct which the most high minded and virtuous man could pursue. He has dealt with his wife at every stage of her career with the tenderest consideration for her feelings. He had been a considerate, indulgent, and temperate husband."

MINISTRY AT SURREY CHAPEL.

After twelve years of successful ministration at Hull, he removed to London in 1854, where he occupied the pulpit of Surrey Chapel, a building famous throughout the world as the centre of the evangelistic and pastoral labors of the Rev. Rowland Hill. For twenty-one years Mr. Hall labored so assiduously that Surrey Chapel became the focus of Gospel and philanthropic work, which extended its beneficent operations over the whole of the populous borough of Southwark, and a considerable portion of that of Lambeth.

He has made two extensive tours in the United States. So well was he received, that at Washington, he was invited to open the business of Congress with prayer. He also preached before the House of Representatives while in session, and the next day he delivered an address on "International Relations," when President Grant and many members of both Houses of Congress were present.

During this time Mr. Hall was arranging for the erection of the cathedral-like edifice in which he now ministers. Christ Church, the name by which Mr. Hall preferred to designate his new house of worship, was opened on July 4th, 1876. It is a magnificent structure and will hold 3000 persons. The total cost, including lecture-hall, schools, and site, was $310,000. The service is that of the Episcopal Church with some slight modifications.

Mr. Hall, who is a most eloquent evangelical preacher, has acquired some fame as a writer of devotional treatises, one of which, entitled "Come to Jesus," has reached a circulation of upward of three millions, and has been translated into more than twenty foreign languages. His other works are a volume of sermons entitled "Homeward Bound," "The Land of the Forum and the Vatican; or, Thoughts and Sketches during an Easter pilgrimage to Rome," in 1854; "Hints on Preaching;" "From Liverpool to St. Louis;" a small volume of poetry, entitled "Pilgrim Songs in Cloud and Sunshine;" and a tractate on "Prayer, its Reasonableness and Efficacy." Beside these Mr. Hall is an extensive writer in advocacy of temperance, with which movement he has for many years identified himself.

Mr. Hall has fastened to his coat the blue ribbon, and two thousand six hundred and fifty-two of the members of his congregation imitated his example, sixteen hundred and four of whom signed the total abstinence pledge for the first time.

The Proposal to Erect a Memorial to the poet Longfellow in Westminster Abbey is favorably received in England. Several men of eminence in the State and in literature are acting on the committee. Among them are Mr. Chamberlain, the President of the Board of Trade, Mr. Tennyson, the Poet Laureate; Sir Theodore Martin, K. C. B.; Messrs. Anthony Trollope, William Blanchard Jerrold, and John Bright.

SHALL GAMBLERS TRIUMPH?

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning,
October 1, 1882.

"But I know thy abode, and thy going out, and . . . I will turn thee back by the way which thou camest."—2 KINGS 19: 27, 28.

SENNACHERIB, the infamous, had taxed and outraged the people until it was time to have him stopped. The Lord proposed to stop him; not through any mild or complimentary way. God says He will not argue or persuade him, but as a butcher thrusts an iron hook into the nose of an ox and leads it to the slaughter, so He turned back this infamous Sennacherib. "I will put my hook in thy nose, and turn thee back by the way which thou camest."

The gambling evil in our time has taken on imperial airs, and it is a Sennacherib. It has taxed and outraged a multitude of people already to financial and spiritual death. The work is to be stopped. The evil was never so defiant or blatant as to-day. All who have read the newspapers in the past few weeks know that a great attempt has been made by city authorities to put down this evil, and that a great attempt has been made to overthrow the law. The question now, the absorbing question for all classes of people who are interested in the welfare of our cities is, whether the gamblers shall be triumphant in their new movement, or whether the officers of the government in all our cities shall be backed up by a healthy and

VEHEMENT PUBLIC OPINION.

Sir Garnet Wolseley prophesied that on the fifteenth of September he should have Arabi Pasha a prisoner and that the Egyptians would be overthrown. With marvellous accuracy the prophecy came true, and on the fifteenth of September the rebellion had practically been overthrown. With just as much precision the gamblers of this country have declared that on the twenty-fifth of September they would open their pool rooms and their gambling saloons, and they have kept their promise, they being open in the different parts of the different cities. Pool rooms open in Long Island City. The officers of the law say they can do nothing now with them. A coroner of this city most suggestively allows his own premises to be the entrance to one of these pandemoniums, no doubt having an eye to business, since the way of the gamblers is very often the way to sudden death.

Last Thursday sixty-four of the miscreants in New York were arraigned for trial. They have, of course, plead "not guilty." Powerful counsel are enlisted in their behalf. The District Attorney of New York is warned by an anonymous letter that he had better look out. The politicians in all our cities are told that if they aid in the suppression of the gambling establishments they will never be mayors, they will never be district attorneys, they will never be members of Congress, they will never be anything. What all churches, what all reformatory institutions, what all good people now need to do is to rally a vigorous public sentiment on this subject and let the authorities in all our cities know that they will be backed up by all Christian, all decent people in every effort to put down crime and to elevate virtue.

This last week, in Cincinnati, on my way to the depot, I heard the rattling of the dice of gambling saloons, and then I went out into the country to a large agricultural fair, and in front of the hotel there was a large group of men gambling all day while their honest neighbors were admiring the fruits of the earth and blessing God for our great prosperity. The evil has rolled over this whole land. This Sennacherib needs to have an iron hook in his nose until he shall be brought back, until he shall be brought down, until he shall be destroyed, and it shall be demonstrated that honest, Christian sentiment in all our cities is mightier than crime.

Fathers and brothers and sons may well be enlisted in such a discussion, but just as much, wives, mothers, sisters and daughters need to be enlisted in such a discussion lest their present home be sacrificed, or their intended home blasted. No person can say successfully: "That evil has no relation to me or mine." Before long it may be found out in your own experience that this discussion had for you practical bearing on three worlds—earth, Heaven and hell. People who have not looked into this matter have no idea of the extent of the evil. I have no doubt there are a score of families in this house this morning touched by it. There may be members of the family who do not know exactly what is the matter, but the secret after a while will come out. There are young men in this house to-day with gambling tickets in their pockets. There are those here who have taken their first step on the downward road, the second step, the third step, the fourth step, and are the ministers of religion to be silent? and are we to spend our time talking about the sins of the Hittites, Jebuzites and Girgashites, and the Ahabs and the Jezebels of the past, when we have these monarchs of iniquity destroying the land.

It is estimated that in this neighborhood of cities there are three thousand five hundred professed gamblers. As much as it is your business to sell goods, or doctor the sick, or plead the law, or import goods, or manufacture, or carry on your trade, just so much it is their business to despoil society. In all these cities during these years, how many of have ever professed to be honest? Nine. These nine professedly honest gambling establishments only the antechamber to those acknowledged to be fraudulent. There are the first-class gambling establishments taking down hundreds of our young men, hundreds of our older men. You go a little out of Broadway, and you go up marble stairs and ring the bell, and a liveried servant comes to the door and introduces you. The walls are lavender tinted. There is a piece of furniture very costly, most exquisite and wonderful, its value so great I cannot compute it. It is the roulette table. Here is the banqueting room. Free drinks, free cigars, free fruits, free everything—sumptuous beyond all parallel. Pictures on the wall of Jephtha's daughter and Dante's "frozen region of hell," a most appropriate picture.

Pass on, and you come to the second class gambling establishments of our cities. You are introduced by a card of some "roper in." Once fairly inside, you must either gamble or fight. Sanded cards, dice loaded with quicksilver, poor drinks mixed with more poor drinks soon help you to get rid of your money to a time in short meter with no staccato passages! You went in to see. You saw! Does not a panther squat in the grass know a calf when he sees it? Wrangle not in that place for your rights, or your wounded body will be thrown into the street, or your dead body pulled out of the East River.

You pass on and you come to what are ordinarily called pool rooms. There is betting on numbers. Betting on two numbers is called a "saddle," betting on three numbers is called a "gig," betting on four numbers is called a "horse," and thousands of men spring into that "saddle," and mount that "gig," and behind that "horse" ride to perdition! The sign says "Exchange." Wonderfully significant sign—"Exchange;" for that is where a man gives up his respectability, gives up his money, gives up his morals, gives up his soul, and gets in exchange loss of hope, loss of respectability, loss of decency, loss of family, loss of Heaven. "Exchange!" Infinite exchange. Awful exchange. Everlasting exchange.

A great many Christian people wonder why it is that men of wealth and men of refinement, and men of education, as fine-looking people as have in these cities, go down into this evil. Well, my friends, it is easily explained. A great many people are born with

A PASSION FOR HAZARD.

It is a joy to them to go near a precipice. They climb Yungfrau not for the purpose of seeing the vastness of the landscape, but for the feeling "what would happen if I should fall off?" They are persons whose blood is filled and accelerated by skating near an air-hole. There are people who find a joyful feeling in driving within twelve inches of the edge of a bridge. Do not blame such people. Only blame them for the way which they develop or put down, that passion. "Oh," says one of that temperament, "here a $500; I'll stake them; I may lose but I may gain $5000, and it's excitement anyway." Shuffle the cards. Lost! Heart thumps. Head dizzy. Never mind, it is excitement. So they go on with the play and they go on down. That is the history of thousands of people. That is the history of some persons in this house this morning.

Then others are led into this great and absorbing evil through

SHEER DESIRE OF GAIN.

It is especially so with professed gamblers. They always keep cool. They never drink until their brain is unbalanced, or their judgment overthrown. They see not so much the dice as the dollar beyond the dice. They are as the spider in the web, looking as if dead until the flies pass. There are hundreds of young men who say: "Now, I don't in this office, store or factory get enough salary; I ought to have a room in a better boarding house or better hotel; I ought to have better wines; I ought to have finer cigars. I ought, when people banquet me, be able to banquet them, and I am going to endure this no longer. I will with one bright stroke make my fortune. Here goes, right or wrong, principle or no principle, Heaven or hell. Who cares?"

When a young man or an older man resolves to live beyond his means, Satan has bought him out and out and it is only a question of time when the goods shall be delivered. The thing is done. You may plant in his way all the batteries of truth and righteousness, he will press right on. If a man have a thousand dollars of income and he spends twelve hundred, if he have fifteen hundred and spend two thousand, if he have three thousand and spend five thousand, all the powers of darkness say, "Aha! aha! we have him." And they have. The extra five hundred or the extra two thousand or the extra five thousand dollars must be obtained some way.

Here is a young man who says: "there's my friend who came to town with no money at all and see how he's got on! He went into one of those places and put a certain amount of money on the ace; he has now his hundreds, his thousands, and his tens of thousands and here I am nothing but a poor clerk." What a dull business this is, adding up this long line of figures in a counting house. What a dull business, taking down fifty yards of cloth to sell one remnant. What a dull business this is, my waiting on other people when I might put a hundred on the ace and take up a thousand. What is the use? I am so insidious, this temptation. Other sins beat the drum, or flaunt the flag, or gather their recruits with huzzas; but this one marches its pale processions on down, and when they drop into the grave there is not so much as the sound of the click of a dice.

Oh, how many noble natures have perished under the power. That grand forehead is licked by a tongue of flame that shall never be extinguished. Into that heart there are vulturous beaks plunged which shall never be lifted. Open the door of that man's soul and see the coil of adders writhing their indescribable horrors until you turn away and hide your face and beg God to help you forget it.

The bad thing about all this is that the most of the evil, the most of the calamity goes unadvertised. The men who lose money in gambling generally say nothing about it. They do not want their families to know, they do not want the arch of God to know, they do not want the world to know, and so I suppose in ninety cases of a hundred when a man loses money in gambling he hushes it up. Once in a while there is an exception as where the police of Boston some years broke in upon a gaming establishment and found there some of the first merchants of State Street, clear down to the Ann Street gambler; as when Bullock, the cashier of the Georgia Central Railroad, was found to have purloined $103,000 for gambling purposes; as when many years ago, one of the savings banks of Brooklyn a young man was found to have stolen $40,000 to carry on gaming practices; as when in Wall Street, a man in an insurance company was found years ago to have stolen $180,000 to carry on gaming practices. But these are exceptions. The general rule is that in silence the money leaks out of the merchant's till, or out of the fireproof safe of the clerk into the wallet of the gambler. One of the main pipes to this sewer of iniquity is

BUSINESS EXCITEMENT.

It is a most significant fact that nearly all the day-long gaming establishments in New York were found in proximity to Wall Street. Men went into the excitement of stock gambling. Getting through at the close of business they went into other places of gambling that they might keep up the excitement. The howling, stamping, Bedlamish wailing of the old-fashioned Gold Room used to drop on the gambling saloons around about. The station in the Stock Exchange that you sometimes saw at the announcement of the word "North-western" or "Rock Island" or "Erie" or "New York Central;" the rat-tat-tat of the auctioneer's mallet, the excitement of making "corns," and establishing "pools," and "carrying" stock, and a "break" from eighty to seventy, and the excited cry of "buyer three!" "buyer ten!" "taken!" "how many?" and the loss or the gain of hundreds and thousands of dollars in the flash of a moment disqualifies a man to go home, and he goes into these establishments near by. That has been the past history of a great many men. They went up the stairs amid the closed business offices until they came to the room darkly curtained and the door shuttered, but richly furnished inside, and took their places at the roulette or the faro table. That is the way some of the best men of our great cities have been destroyed.

A merchant came from the far west. He was very influential in his own city. Coming to New York he went into an institution of that kind on Park Place, and before morning he had lost all his estate save one dollar, and with that dollar he walked around the room, and then seized upon by his infernal sorcery he again approached the table and was overheard to say as he put his dollar down: "One thousand miles from home and my last dollar on a gaming table!" Oh, it is merciful. I remember when I was living in Philadelphia hearing of a case down on Chestnut Street where a man sat at a gaming table playing for large stakes and he lost everything, and before he left the table he blew his brains out, and while the servants were washing up the blood from the floor they started the next game.

In the presence of God, I this day arraign

having a tendency to make this a nation of gamblers. Men failing in other enterprises go into gift concerts where the attraction is not the music but the packages distributed among the audience, into a sale of books where the attraction is not a book but the package that goes with the book. So in our time we have known tobacco dealers to advertise that on a certain day in every one of their papers there would be a prize, and whether a man bought the tobacco in Chicago, or Boston, or Charleston, or New Orleans, or New York, he would get a magnificent gratuity. Boys working prize packages through the cars—packages containing no one knows what until they are opened and found to contain nothing.

Aye, the cause of charity is insulted, and under the name of gift enterprises the gambling spirit goes on. You remember at the close of the war how we had gift enterprises all over the country, the proceeds for the benefit of the widows and orphans of soldiers." What did the men engaged in those enterprises care for the orphans? They would have been willing to allow them to freeze on their doorstep. I have no faith in a charity which for the purpose of relieving present distress will open the jaw of a monster which has taken down so many of the bodies and souls of men. I believe through these gift enterprises there are thousands of people being turned into gambling habits. Oh, my friends, do one of two things; be honest, or die!

It is not an abstract subject. I have seen so many go down! There are places where if you go to a cliff and cast a stone, you can hear it far down echo on the rocks. There are other places where the plunge is so great that if you take something and throw it down you may listen and listen and listen, but there comes back no echo of the fall. And this last has been the case in many a moral calamity. Oh, my friend,

WHAT IS YOUR GREAT WANT?

One man says it is higher social position; another man says it is larger salary; another man says it is easier work. I do not know what your other wants are, but I will tell you, my brother, what your greatest want is—if you do not already possess it—and that is the grace of God.

There may be in this house those who have fallen under this evil. You are in a prison. You feel it. You have tried to get out. You cannot get out. If I should have your personal confidence and talk this matter over you would say, "I can't get out of that prison." From other habits men seem to get away by the force of natural resolution sometimes; but from this habit I do not think any man gets away by the force of natural resolution. You want to get out of the prison and you rush against the iron bars on one side and you do not escape. And then you soliloquize, and think and think, and then you rush against the other side the cage and against the iron bars, and there is blood on the bars and blood on your soul, and you do not escape. But there is a key that will unlock that door. It is a key of the house of David; it is a key that Christ wears at His girdle.

Oh, prodigals, it is a poor business for you to be feeding swine when your father stands in the front door straining his eyesight to see the return of the prodigal, and the calf in the paddock is as fat as it ever can be for the celebration, and all the harps of Heaven are strung, and the feet free. There are converted gamblers in Heaven. Light from the throne of God flashed upon the green baize of their billiard saloon. They stopped trying for earthly stakes, and they tried for Heaven and won it.

There is a hand to-day, stretched out from Heaven toward the worst man in this audience. It is not a hand clenched as if to strike; it is a hand outspread as though to drop a benediction. Other seas have a shore and may be fathomed, but the sea of God's love, the eternity has no plummet to strike the bottom, and immensity has no iron-bound shore to confine it. Its tides are lifted by the great heart of God's compassion. But, alas! for the man who sits down to the last game of life and puts and when the kings and queens and knaves and spades have been shuffled and cut and the game is ended, hovering and impending worlds discover that he has lost the game, and the faro of eternal darkness clutches down into its wallet all the blood-stained wagers. Oh, come home to thy God to-day.

I do not feel so sorry for young men who were born in the city and who have had all these temptations described before them until they know what they are. I am not so sorry for them as I am for those who come from country homes and are easily betrayed and easily overthrown. Oh, young man from the farmhouse among the hills, what did your parents do to you that you should do this to them? Why will you by going into a life of dissipation break the heart of her who gave you birth? Look at her hand, so distorted are the knuckles. Why? Working for you. Look at the back so bent. Why? Carrying your burdens. Oh, dissipated young man, write home by the first mail to-morrow, cursing your mother's gray hair, cursing the chair in which she sits, cursing the cradle in which she rocked you. "Oh," you say, "I cannot, I cannot." You are doing worse than that. There is something on your forehead now. What is it? Run your finger over your forehead. What is it? It is red. It is the blood of a broken heart.

I am more in sympathy with such persons who have come from the country life to the city life because I was a country lad myself, and saw not until fifteen years of age, a great city. O! how stupendous New York seemed to me that morning I arrived at Courtland Street Ferry. I came to the city my soul all awake for the amusements and the hilarities of the world. No soul ever more awake, or more sympathetic with all the sports and amusements of life than my soul was, and I have sometimes thought it was quite strange I was not captured of evil and dragged down. I was talking with a man of the world about it some time ago, and though he pretended to be only a man of the world, he said: "I guess, sir, there must have been some prayers hovering over your head—prayers that have been answered!"

I was on the St. Lawrence River and the current was very swift, and I said: "Captain, why

HOW SWIFT THE RIVER IS."

"Oh," he replied, "not much here, but seventy-five miles on further it is ten times swifter, and we employ an Indian pilot, and we give him a thousand dollars a summer to take us through between the Thousand Islands and between the rocks." Every man who comes from the country to the city life comes from smooth water into the rapids. There are thousands of islands of enchantment and many rocks of peril. Oh, I wonder if you are going to have good pilotage.

Do you know, my brother, that the report of your dissipation has already got back to the old homestead? "Oh, no," you say, that isn't possible." It is possible. There are always people ready to carry bad news, and of these people that desire to carry bad news there is an accursed old gossip wending her infernal step toward the old homestead. She has been there. She sat down in a chair and she wriggled about for a while and said she could not stay a great while. But she said to your parents: "Do you know your son gambles? do you know your son drinks?" And the old people got very white about the lips, and your mother said: "just open the door a little, so we may have fresh air." And after this bad messenger went away your mother came out and sat down on the steps where you used to play, and she cried and cried and cried, and took off her spectacles and with her apron wiped off the mist of tears.

After a while she will be very sick and the old gig of the country doctor will come up the country lane, and the horse will be tied at the swinging gate, and the prescriptions will fail, and she will get worse and worse, and in her last delirium she will talk about nothing but you. And then the farmers will come to the funeral. They will tie their horses to the rail of the fence, and they will talk over what ailed the departed, and one will say it was intermittent, and another will say it was congestion, and another will say it was premature old age. Oh, no. It will be neither intermittent, nor congestion, nor premature old age; but it will be recorded in the book of God Almighty that you killed her!

Our language is very fertile in describing crime. Slaying a man, that is homicide; slaying a brother, that is fratricide; slaying a father, that is patricide; slaying a mother, that is matricide. But you go on in that way, oh, wandering and dissipated soul, and it will take two words to describe your crime—patricide and matricide. Oh, come home to thy God, come home to thy father's God, thy mother's God. Just fold your hands to-day and say with another:

"For sinners, Lord, Thou camest to bleed,
And I'm a sinner vile indeed;
Lord, I believe Thy grace is free,
O! magnify that grace in me."

Do not let the world destroy you. Do not get swindled out of Heaven!

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

THE following incident is related by the Rev. S. L. Gracey, of Chelsea, Mass., who, having read the criticisms on Dr. Cullis and his work, felt constrained to publish his testimony of what, by the blessing of God, he had experienced in his own home as the result of faith and prayer. He accordingly wrote a letter to The Christian at Work, in the course of which he thus described the cure of his wife through the instrumentality of Dr. Cullis:

Mrs. Gracey had been suffering for four years with that had rendered her almost helpless most of that time. For nearly a year she had been under the very best medical treatment at one of our best sanitariums in New York State. On our removal to Boston it seemed to be impossible for her to leave home and our church work for further necessary treatment, and she sought aid of the ablest physicians in Boston. She became worse and worse, and was almost in despair of ever being able to do any more work, either in the church or for her family, when a friend persuaded her to go and see Dr. Cullis.

She was full of prejudice against his work, and thought it almost presumptuous and fanatical to think of being cured simply by faith in God and in answer to prayer, without the use of any secondary means. The friend of my wife, Mrs. Roach, of Washington, D. C., in a private interview with the doctor, referred to Mrs. Gracey's case, and said she would like to have him pray for her. On their return to the public parlors, he asked Mrs. Gracey if she desired to see him in regard to her case. She said, "Well, I hardly know, Doctor, that I do. I came here with my friend, who wanted to see you, and had not expressed any desire in regard to myself; however, as I am here, I should like to talk to you about this matter."

On passing to the private office the doctor said: "Do you desire me to prescribe for you, Mrs. Gracey?" She answered: "No, Doctor, I don't want any more medicine. I've taken enough medicine to kill or cure most any woman."

"Then do you want me to pray with you for healing?" "Well, I don't know, Doctor, whether I do or not. I don't know that I am willing to be cured in that way. I have always prided myself on being a woman of very plain, practical common-sense, a very matter-of-fact sort of a body, and have never been given to what seems to me rather fanatical notions, such as Faith Cure, and I think I don't believe in this way of healing." "Well, but you believe in the Bible, Mrs. Gracey?" "Why, yes I trust I'm not a heathen, and I believe in the days of His flesh, when Jesus was upon the earth, He performed many miracles of healing, but I have always been taught that the age of miracles was past; that those were special gifts intended for Jesus and His Apostles, to confirm their teachings, etc., that they ceased with the Apostles, and were never intended as a permanent gift in the church."

"But," said the doctor, "have you any Scripture for that? Does it anywhere say that these powers shall be recalled from the church? Do you believe that Jesus is able to do this thing for you?" She answered: "I do believe that all power belongeth unto Him, and if He was on earth and I could get to Him, I would journey any distance to find Him, and I believe that if I could only touch the hem of His garment I might be instantly healed." "Do you believe He is any less powerful now than when on earth?"

So they talked over all the difficulties that she presented; such as it probably being the will of the Lord that she should glorify Him in suffering, by patient submission to His will, and that this might be the only way in which the Heavenly Father could perfect her character and get her home to heaven. He continued to hold her to the direct promise of God, made through James to the Church (Jas. 5: 14, 15) until every objection was answered, and every prejudice overborne. He said at length: "Are you willing to be healed in this way if it is the Lord's will?" She answered at once: "Why, Doctor, health is everything to me, my family need me; I long to be again in active service in the church, and am willing to have health anyway, if I can only have it."

Then they knelt in prayer. The doctor leading in a very simple, childlike talk with God, laid each difficulty of her malady before God, and asked in each particular, of her need for the healing and strengthening power which were necessary to her perfect cure. He then said: "And now, O Lord, according to thy literal command by thy servant James, in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." And placing the tips of his fingers in a small salver of oil, he touched her on the forehead.

Waiting a moment he continued the prayer: "And just now we claim the fulfilment of Thy promise. Give this Thy servant perfect and complete healing for Jesus' sake." Immediately a strange sensation thrilled through her entire being like an electric shock, felt in every muscle, nerve, and fibre of her being, and she at once arose, saying:

"DOCTOR, I'M HEALED."

He responded: "Praise God from whom all blessings flow. Now remember, Mrs. Gracey, no more medicines. Take off and throw away all mechanical supports. Use no more medicines; trust all the time in God and confess what He has done for you." She walked to Tremont Street and took the cars for home. She went there in a private carriage from a bed of sickness and severe suffering, almost unable to sit up for an hour, and never free from great pain; unable to walk a block in the street, or go up or down stairs without lying down for a long while afterward to regain her strength and be restored to even moderate suffering. She came home in the street cars without any suffering; and from that day to this, now nearly two years, has been as entirely free from that trouble and as active and smart as a girl of eighteen. It was the Lord's doing, and is marvelous in our eyes. I could duplicate this case by scores of instances of equally wonderful cures.

CHRONIC RHEUMATISM.

A middle-aged man said lately at a meeting at Bethshan, the House of Faith Healing in London: "I feel I would be doing wrong if I did not stand up and speak a word for the Lord, and praise Him for what He has done for me. This night seven weeks ago, I came here for the first time; I was a very great sufferer, as many here know. I had been suffering for about fourteen years from chronic rheumatism, and taking medicine of all kinds, until my strength was nearly all destroyed, and life was ebbing away.

"I was almost afraid to go out alone, for fear I should drop down from heart disease, as a dear sister of mine did four years ago, in coming home from a place of worship one Sunday. When I read of this Home my faith was stimulated. I came. Dr. Boardman said, in reference to my age, that if I were twenty years older it would not make any difference to the Lord, for He could still heal me. I left off medicine of all kinds, and put myself entirely in the hands of the Lord.

"I was only here about a week—not quite a week—and when I was going home from Dr. Boardman's house, from a meeting held there, I felt a sensible impression upon me, as if the Lord had touched me, and instantly I felt that the healing was begun. Before I got to this Home again, I put my walking-stick under one arm and my umbrella under the other; I could not walk before without resting on them. Before this it was a great trouble to get upstairs to the top room—fifty-one stairs from the ground floor—and still more was it a trouble and danger to come down, for one leg was so weak that it was liable to give way under my weight. Before I lived through a week, I could go up and down stairs without taking hold of the banisters. My strength has since come back to me, and I can walk nearly as well as I did twenty years ago.

"Well, I have been trying to work for the Lord since then, and in visiting one case in which I was deeply interested, the person who was ill said to me: 'If you should remain well next winter, and go through the winter without a return of your rheumatism, then I will believe in your cure.' said I might die before winter; but I know I healed perfectly; I am satisfied of that; I have a doubt about it. I have gone without medicine for seven weeks, and I am far better without it than I was with it. I thank God, too, that Jesus is never so dear to me as now."

A Comic Singer Saved.—Mr. Campbell White said at a recent meeting: "One of our converts in the Vale of Leven was one of the most no comic singers in the place. He was known to men, and was a most earnest worker for the cause. A word spoken to him in the street arrested his attention, and induced him to go into one of our meetings, where he heard the Gospel preached and was converted to Christ. Another was blacksmith who was the leader of all the public revelling of the place. Both these men declared that they will now work for the Lord as vigorously as they previously did for the devil."

A Half-Witted Man's Consecration.—The Rev. James Scott said: "A brother told me some years since of three men who determined to follow the good old Scotch fashion of going from parish to parish to celebrate the Lord's death. When they were travelling together one of them said, 'What shall we offer the Lord when we sit down at his table to-day. I will offer praise for I goodness to me.' 'I shall take a broken and contrite spirit,' another said. The third man could not speak; but although he was considered a half-witted man, the other two pressed him so much that he said, 'When I sit at His table I'll tell Him that I am a poor sinner, and have nothing to bring to Him but what He gave me—the Lord Jesus Christ, I will hold Him up.'"

Medical Aid too Late.—The Rev. James Scott said: "On Friday last I was in the count at a place where a man whom I knew very well was lying dead. I was told that when the sickness first came upon him he refused to send for doctor; then he put off doing so until it was too late. When the illness became so bad that he could no longer refuse to see a medical man I friends brought one to see him. After the doctor examined him, the momentous words passed his lips, 'If I had been sent for sooner I might have been of use, but now it is too late; I can do nothing for him.' The Holy Spirit of God is searching your heart; now take care that you do not put off any longer. The Great Physician is ready to heal you if you will let Him."

A Drunkard Rescued.—Mr. W. R. Bradlaugh said: "We are asked, 'What is the use of speaking to a drunken man?' I answer, 'Very much, indeed,' and to prove it I will relate an incident in the life of a man who used to be a drunkard. In the month of November last I addressed a crowded meeting in Edinburgh; although there were fully 1000 people in the hall, yet one man who had drunk a few glasses of whisky, disturbed the all. Mr. Darling, the hotel proprietor, spoke to him, and in the inquiry meeting asked me to speak to him. I did so, and prayed with him. Then I desired to pray himself, and we again knelt down; but his language was so offensive, nay, even blasphemous, that I put my hand on his shoulder and said, 'Brother, I will see you home and into bed where you will get a good night's sleep, and then you will come and see me to-morrow.' Next day the man came to me. Holding out his hand I said, 'The grace of God is sufficient for me.' He was a changed man, and since then his life has been one of active service. He is now a useful member of the Baptist Church."

A Soldier's Letter.—The following is a letter sent by a soldier who used to attend the Cowcaddens meetings, to Mrs. Sutherland, who, along with Mr. Sutherland showed him and a comrade great kindness. They are now on the way to Egypt: "Troop-ship Nepal, off Malta, 16th August, 1882. 'Dear Mrs. Sutherland—You will be glad to learn that we have got thus far on our road to Egypt, and truly the Lord has been good to us. We have had grand weather, not man sick all the time; and oh, what grand meetings we have had, too, every night ! Our old friend Mr. Mathers, from Maryhill, and Mr. Millar, from Edinburgh, are with us, so that we are well looked after by these men of God. We have had souls converted at our meetings. We sing a number of hymns, and they each of them speak for a short time. We have a good company of God's children with us, so we show a good front. On Sabbath we had three meetings ; it was so pleasant. Bullock, Wood, Simpson, Greenland, and Stewart are all well, and all with us. They send their kind regards to all the Lord's dear children : and do pray for us that we may be kept by the power of God, and that many souls may be converted."

A Disagreeable Sermon.—The Rev. James Scott said : "I remember, when preaching the Gospel some years ago in the country, that in closing I made the remark that Jesus would save any one just where they were sitting in the pews. After the service, the minister of the church said to me, 'Some members of the congregation are very indignant at the assertion you made at the close of your sermon.' 'Why ; is it not true?' 'Yes ; but it seems to them something against reason. The idea that a man could come into the church an unpardoned sinner but leave it a Christian, strikes them as being outrageous.' 'On the contrary, it is quite in consonance with reason. If a guilty man is offered a pardon, and accepts it at once, is not the transaction completed instantaneously?' 'Certainly it is.' 'Well then your friends have no reason to find fault.'"

The Doctor Settled With.—Captain Hatfield said : "Some time ago, I was asked to visit a dying woman. When I entered her house I was surprised at the cheerful aspect which it had ; all was bright and pleasant. Two little children were playing with the fire irons as though such things as sickness and death were unknown in that house. I found the woman in bed. At once she began to speak about some friends in Liverpool, and taking everything quite lightly. I concluded that she was not a Christian, and felt bound to speak to her so that she might know her condition both of mind and body. I said, 'Mrs. Campbell, how is your soul? You are surely not aware that the doctor has given you up.' 'The doctor given me up, no sir, I have given the doctor up. He came in one day when I was reading the Bible and said, 'Mrs. Campbell, you must not read such a gloomy book as that, put it aside at once and I will bring you a nice lively novel.' When I heard him speaking of my precious Bible like that, although I had very little money I scraped enough to pay him his fees at once, and then put him aside instead of the Bible.' I read the twenty-third Psalm to her. When I had finished she said 'Ah, that's an easy seat.' 'What do you mean by an easy seat, Mrs. Campbell?' 'I mean that though I am dying poor and helpless, and my two children will be left without either father or mother in a very short time yet I know that the Lord will provide for them and that lets me sit easy.'"

ENGLAND IN PROPHECY.

By John M. Bright, M.D.

"TYRE was one of the most famous marts in the world in the time of Isaiah, and the destruction of it must have been ruin to merchants and adventurers. Every house or warehouse in Tyre was shut up, so close was the siege. The Tyrians, when they saw no other means of escaping, fled in their ships and took refuge in Carthage, and in the islands of the Ægean and Ionian Seas ; whence the news would soon spread and reach Tarshish. Thus the ruin of Tyre was revealed to them (the inhabitants of Tarshish), from the land of Chittim or Cyprus, and the Mediterranean coast."

Verses 2, 3.—"Be dumb, ye inhabitants of the isle, which the inhabitants of Zidon, that cross the sea, have replenished ; and her revenue in great waters is as the sowing of the Nile, as the harvest of the river ; and she hath been the mart of nations." The word, "isle," as in 20 : 6, denotes a maritime district, there Palestine, here Phœnicia. Silence is a mark of grief or consternation, as at 47 : 5, Lam. 2 : 10. The people would be dumb with fear and sorrow at the entire failure of commerce which a close siege would effect ; and the noise of the busy multitudes which before was heard in the merchant city would be utterly silenced.

"Merchants of Zidon" is a generic term for those of Phœnicia, since either Tyre or Zidon fitly represents the whole nation. The Zidonians built Tyre, which is therefore called "the daughter of Zidon." The rich revenues from their commerce are compared to the plentiful harvests of the Nile. "The seed of the Nile," here called Sihor (or Shichor), as at Jer. 2 : 18, and 1 Chron. 13 : 5, so called from the blackness of its waters, charged with the mud which it brings down from Ethiopia when it overflows. What its river was to Egypt, the same to Tyre was the Great Sea itself—a source of most abundant riches. "Ezekiel (chap. 27), as it were, commenting on the words, 'the mart of nations,' recounts the various nations whose commodities were brought to Tyre, and were bought and sold by the Tyrians. It was then the most celebrated place in the world for its trade and navigation : the seat of commerce and the centre of riches."

Verses 4, 5.—"Be thou ashamed, O Zidon ; for the sea hath spoken, the strength of the sea, saying, I travail not, nor bring forth children, neither do I nourish up young men, nor bring up virgins. As at the report concerning Egypt, so shall they be sorely pained at the report concerning Tyre."

"The strength of the sea is usually referred to Tyre or Zidon, as if the cities were lamenting the loss of their former children. But the true emphasis is different. The sea itself, on which they relied, disclaims, as beyond its power, the task of supplying them with children, to repair the loss of men, and the desolation they had suffered. It could enrich and beautify Tyre in her prosperity, but could not breed or rear up children, young men or virgins, for the desolated homes. The sea, her fortress, and her refuge in danger, mourns over a calamity quite beyond its power to repair."

"As the nations were appalled at the plagues of Egypt by the power of God, in the days of Moses, so the report of the ruin of Tyre would fill them with consternation. The same comparison is made in predicting the Assyrian overthrow (10 : 27). It is no less suitable to express the general dismay which the fall of Tyre would cause throughout the whole Gentile world."

Verses 6, 7.—"Pass over to Tarshish ; howl ye inhabitants of the isle. Is this your joyous city, whose antiquity is of ancient days ? her own feet shall carry her far away to sojourn." The Tyrians, in this hour of trouble, would flee to their distant colonies for refuge, and St. Jerome asserts that when they were besieged by Nebuchadnezzar, they fled to Carthage, or some islands of the Ionian or Ægean Seas. Here the prophet bids them pass to Tarshish (India ?) ; and, in verse 12, to Chittim, or Cyprus. A parallel is seen in the resolution of the Dutch merchants, in 1672, to remove to Batavia, if their country were subdued by the French armies. The actual flight of the Portuguese Court and regent to Brazil, in 1806, to escape from Napoleon, is a still more complete parallel."

"The Tyrians boasted of the great antiquity of their city, which is mentioned as a fortified place in the time of Joshua (Josh. 19 : 29). Through its extraordinary wealth, it was replete with everything conducive to festive indulgence ; and the citizens were very jovial and luxurious." (Scott.) These proud boastings would give double force to the prophet's warning. Where all had been pride and vain security, there would soon be trembling, flight, silence and desolation.

So, too, of the calamities of Jerusalem (Is. 22) : "Her own feet" is an expressive figure for the Tyrian navy, by which this merchant city was accustomed to travel swiftly to distant lands." (Birks.) Or the prophet speaks of Tyre as "A delicate woman, and not used to hardships, who yet should be forced to travel on foot tedious journeys into foreign lands."

Verses 8, 9 : "Who hath taken this counsel against Tyre, the crowning city, whose merchants are princes whose traffickers are the honorable of the earth ? The Lord of Hosts hath purposed it, to stain the pride of all glory, and to bring into contempt all the honorable of the earth." Tyre might well be called "the crowning city," or "giver of crowns," because of the many kings she set up in the various Phœnician colonies of which she boasted. And there may be a further reason for the epithet. By her commerce and wealth she might be said to supply garlands of grace and beauty to all the other nations. The fall of a city so ancient and noble must have some very weighty cause. "The Lord of Hosts" purposed it in order to accomplish a great end in the moral government of the world. That purpose here announced is an echo of the opening message : "The loftiness of man shall be humbled, and the haughtiness of men shall be bowed down, and the Lord alone shall be exalted in that day" (2 : 11-17).

That day was to light in judgment on all the ships of Tarshish, and on all pleasant pictures, and on all merchandise of beauty. In this burden on Tyre and the ships of Tarshish, we see the last sentence of the prophet's earliest

WARNING FULFILLED.

Verses 10, 12 : "Pass through thy land like the river, O daughter of Tarshish ! there is no defence any more. He hath stretched out His hand over the sea ; He hath shaken the kingdoms : the Lord hath given commandment against the merchant city to destroy the strongholds thereof. And he said, Thou shalt no more rejoice, O oppressed virgin, daughter of Zidon ; arise, pass over to Chittim ; there also shalt thou have no rest."

These verses have been explained by many as announcing the release of Tarshish, and other colonies from the irksome control of the mother city. But this view, that the "daughter of Tarshish," means natives of Spain, in contrast to the Tyrians, has no solid ground. The "ships of Tarshish" are plainly those of Tyre and Sidon trading with that colony. The same people, called "the daughter of Tyre" from their capital, and "daughter of Zidon" from their chief early site, may also be called "the daughter of Tarshish" because they were dependent on those long sea voyages for their greatness and renown. "The ships of Tarshish," the "isle," the "Merchants of Sidon," the daughter of Tarshish, "the daughter of Zidon," are all names of the same Tyrian or Phœnician power, though each presents it in a different aspect. This name pictures them as driven out from their homes, and forced to seek for shelter in their distant colonies."

"Like the river," i.e., the Nile, in its steady onward progress, the mezach, "defence," elsewhere "a girdle," seems here to mean restraint, or barrier to this current of the figurative river. "A city taken by siege and destroyed ; whose walls are demolished ; whose policy is dissolved ; whose wealth is dissipated ; whose people is scattered over the wide country ; is compared to a river whose banks are broken down and its waters let loose, and overflowing all the neighboring plains are wasted and lost."

Verses 13, 14 : "Behold the land of the Chaldeans ; a people that were no people, which the Assyrian founded for dwellers in the wilderness ; they have reared their war-towers, they have wasted her palaces, they have made her a ruin ! Howl, ye ships of Tarshish, for your stronghold is laid waste."

THE INSTRUMENT OF THE JUDGMENT.

The received version is ambiguous and obscure. The true sense is given above and may be thus paraphrased : "Fix your eyes on Lower Mesopotamia, the land of the Chaldeans." This people had no place among the powers of the earth, till the Assyrians transplanted thither some of the dwellers in the wilderness, who had before led a wandering life in the mountains or deserts. This people, once not a people, and still obscure, are the destined leaders in this work of judgment, and by them luxurious, haughty Tyre will be overthrown. They will set up their war-towers against her, demolish her stately palaces, and make her a ruin. The successful siege of Nebuchadnezzar, and not the fruitless attempt of Shalmaneser or of Sargon, is thus the main object of the prophecy. The emphasis lies in the contrast between the past and present obscurity of the Chaldeans when the message was given.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Campaign in New York State Continues to occupy the principal place among political topics. A rumor was in circulation last week that Judge Folger would decline the nomination for the governorship in order that the party might nominate some man who could unite both sections. The rumor was, however, denied on the authority of persons supposed to be in the confidence of the Secretary of the Treasury. The objections to Judge Folger's candidacy have undergone no important alteration since his nomination. Contrary to the prevailing rule the candidate has not been assailed with personal abuse, but it is evident that the irritation produced by the interference of the administration in state politics is deep and widespread. Much indignation has also been produced by the discovery of the fact that Mr. Folger's nomination was aided in its earlier stages by disgraceful forgeries, one of which enabled Mr. French to sit and vote as proxy for Collector Robertson. It is not known by whom the forgeries were committed, and no one supposes that Mr. Folger connived at them, but that some unprincipled man did not scruple to advance the Stalwart nomination by a crime, is evident, and the fact is exercising a prejudicial influence on the campaign. The Republican State Committee assembled on September 26th, and Mr. John F. Smyth was elected chairman. The selection is not one conducive to the restoration of harmony in the party, nor is it one likely to impress the public favorably as to the purity of the campaign. It is said to have been made in view of the urgent need of discipline and organization in which arts Mr. Smyth is considered a master.

The Mormons are Engaged in an Energetic attempt to resist the operation of the Edmunds bill. Judge Jeremiah Black has been retained as their champion. The judge is stated to have prepared an argument for submission to the Secretary of the Interior, attacking the legality of the acts of the Utah Commission and of Governor Morgan, and testing the legality of the law. General Nathan Kimball, of Ogden, Utah, a member of the Utah Commission, who is now in Washington said, last week, that the work of the Commission was a fair beginning of the fight against Mormonism, though he believed the coming elections would result in returning a Mormon Delegate. He said the effect of the Commission's work was already apparent in various actions of the Mormons. Many of them were beginning to separate their families, with a view of avoiding the cohabitation clause of the law, and large numbers of them are taking out naturalization papers. The effect of registration and elections held under the strict surveillance of officers acting under the law will be a largely increased Gentile vote. Heretofore the election machinery was so entirely in the hands of the Mormons that the Gentiles had fallen into a practice of staying away from the polls.

The Secretary of the Treasury during a visit to New York last week explained the principle on which he issues his calls for bonds. He said: "I base my operations on the requirements of business. If I see commercial interests suffering for want of money, and if at the same time the treasury has a large surplus on hand, I believe that I am justified in releasing the accumulated money. As to the call for outstanding sixes, it matures too soon for me to offer pre-payment now. I do not understand, why bonds embraced in calls already matured should not be presented. I think there are some sixteen millions outstanding on which the interest has ceased." The gold certificates, he said, will soon be ready and he anticipated for them a more favorable reception than had been accorded to the silver certificates.

The Tariff Commissioners Intend to Embody in their report a draft of a law which, in their opinion, will remove all defects in the existing tariff, and remove all reasonable complaint against it. One of the commissioners, speaking of the report last week, said: "In the first place there will be a clearing away of the cobwebs that affect the working of the tariff and interfere with its smooth working. The tendency will be in the direction of a wholesome reduction in the industries that have grown up and are able to stand on their own feet without assistance." They expect to finish their work in time for the ensuing session of Congress to act upon the report if it is so disposed.

A Prohibition Convention was Held in Boston on September 28th, for the purpose of securing the united action of the temperance societies of Massachusetts in the prohibition movement. The following resolution among others was unanimously passed: That we recommend to the friends of temperance throughout the State to carefully ascertain how candidates for the Legislature of the various parties stand upon the question of the submission of a constitutional amendment forever prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor as a beverage to a vote of the people, and to vote only for such candidates as will favor such submission. It was also decided to call a ministerial convention in aid of the movement. Rev. Julius H. Seelye was elected president of the association, and among the vice-presidents is the name of Governor Long.

A Sad Steamboat Disaster Occurred on Saturday last on the Mississippi River. A dispatch from Vicksburg says that the Steamer R. E. Lee, one of the best known boats on the river, started on Friday on her first trip after being thoroughly overhauled and repainted. She left Vicksburg for New Orleans, having on board the United States mails, a cargo of cotton, and a large number of passengers, the list of whom has been lost. While opposite Point Pleasant, at 3:30 A.M., she was discovered to be on fire, and was immediately headed for the Louisiana shore, landing at Yucatan Plantation, thirty-five miles below Vicksburg. In a few minutes she was completely enveloped in flames. Twenty-one persons are believed to have been lost, including many of the crew. That the loss of life was not much larger is stated to be due to the noble conduct of Mr. Stout, the pilot, who though surrounded by the flames that threatened every moment to consume him, kept his place at the wheel and gave courage to all by his firmness. He remained at his post despite the fire around him, with almost a last hope of escape, until he gave word to the engineer that the boat had made the shore. Not until this was done did he for one minute take his hand from the wheel. Then he made his escape by the hurricane roof to the lower deck, and from there went ashore. The passengers who were not cut off from the bow escaped to the shore. The casualties occurred among those having berths aft. Some of them, however, were rescued after jumping overboard. Many of those who succeeded in getting ashore were half clad—some hatless, others shoeless, and others still with scarcely enough clothing to cover their nakedness. Much credit is given to William S. Perkins, who was in charge of the engines at the time of the disaster. He stood nobly at his post until the boat was grounded, and the pilot told him he might go.

The Reports of the Yellow Fever Epidemic from Pensacola, Fla., to Saturday last show a total for the month of 783 cases, and 78 deaths. The disease has been spreading rapidly for a week past, and it has unfortunately been chiefly confined to very poor people, the colored people, for a wonder, being peculiarly susceptible to its ravages. The Southern people, especially those of Mobile and Memphis, have sent most liberal contributions, and the local board has been enabled promptly to relieve all distress up to this time. Business is entirely suspended in the once thriving town. The Executive Committee of the Board of Health has 120 paid nurses on duty in addition to about a dozen Sisters of Mercy. Paid nurses cost frequently $3 per day. The board has furnished numberless needed articles to the destitute for four weeks, and also a great deal of medicine and medical attendance. How long its resources will hold out to meet the strain it is impossible to say. At Brownsville, Texas, the fever is said to be dying out. Deaths are reported every day, but no new cases appear; the authorities are still vigilant and firm in enforcing quarantine, keeping up cordons, etc., etc. Nurses and physicians, also, in New Orleans and Memphis, are prompt in offering to go to the relief of the plague-stricken towns.

Dr. Deems has had the Satisfaction of Addressing the anniversary meeting of the Institute of Christian Philosophy he was instrumental in founding a year ago. During the year that has passed the institute has made rapid progress in numbers and influence. It has attracted the support of those who believe that religion and science are not antagonistic, and who are convinced that the cultivation of science will rather tend to the advancement of religion. Dr. Deems in stating the aim of the institute said: "We seek to organize a company of some hundreds of workers who shall diligently set themselves to the task of exhibiting the existent harmony between the Old Testament and the revelations of nature, so that whoso takes the Bible for the text will find nature a most instructive commentator, and whoso takes nature for the text shall find the most luminous help in the Holy Scripture."

The Crew and Passengers of the Steamer Edam of the Netherlands-American Steam Navigation Company, arrived in New York on Monday on board the Lepanto, of the Wilson line. The Edam sailed from New York on September 20th, and the following day, the weather being foggy, her engines were slowed and the whistles blown every two minutes. About ten o'clock that night the whistle of another steamer being heard, the Edam gave two short whistles as a signal to the other steamer to starboard her helm. The captain of the Edam says: "Nearly at the same instant we saw the steamship coming out of the fog on our starboard side, headed directly toward us. She was too near to make any change in the course, so we went ahead fast, in hopes of clearing her. She struck us amidships, cutting through the boats, deck-house, and bridge, up to the bulkhead, around the engines and boilers. She rebounded and struck us again near the cabin, cutting in the plates and carrying away another boat and davits. She again rebounded, striking us farther aft and cutting into the hull. The water poured into the engine compartments. The vessel was rapidly sinking and we lowered our three boats. We got the passengers and crew into them." It appears that the colliding steamer was the Lepanto, and her captain mistook the signal or the position of the Edam. The Lepanto after the collision remained near the scene of the disaster, and rescued the crew and passengers of the Edam, but the engineer of the wrecked vessel and his assistant were both drowned.

Earthquake Shocks were Felt at Several western cities on September 27th. At St. Louis, Mo., the shock was felt at 4:18 A.M. It was first noticed as a rolling, even noise, followed by twelve distinct vibrations at intervals of a second. The first vibration was the most violent. The shock lasted about fifteen seconds. A dispatch from Springfield, Ill., says the shock was distinctly felt about 4 o'clock. It was noticed at Centralia, Ill., about the same time and a dispatch says it seemed to come from the west, accompanied by rumbling sounds, and shook houses very perceptibly, awakening nearly all sleepers. It was also felt at Vincennes, Ind.

The Departure of Twenty-one Missionaries was witnessed in New York last Saturday, by a large assemblage of Christian people. They sailed in the Anchor Line steamer Furnessia. The missionary party included Dr. R. R. Williams, the Rev. Mr. Fisher, the Rev. Mr. Hale, and the Rev. Messrs. Newhall and Eaton. The Furnessia takes them to Glasgow, whence they will proceed for missionary labors in India, Burmah, and Siam, under the auspices of the American Baptist Missionary Union. Of the twenty-one missionaries nine are new to the work, the remainder being missionaries who have been in this country for rest and the recovery of their health. On the preceding Thursday evening a farewell service was held at the First Baptist Church, Brooklyn, at which the departing missionaries were formally commended to the care of God in prayer.

A Wanderer was Deeply Moved by a Song at a New York mission recently. The evangelist who preaches there says that on Saturday, September 2d, as some friends were singing the piece entitled, "Where is My Wandering Boy To-night," a young man was attracted by the sound. He soon made his way into the church and listened to the singing, as the tears poured down cheeks long unaccustomed to such dew. He bade them sing the song over again, and at his close he was spoken with, when it was related that he had been brought up very respectably, but had left the ways of good and wandered far and wide. An inmate of the State Prison and a hardened sinner, he had still a vulnerable point, and there he was touched. He was most earnestly prayed for by the friends to whom he told his sad story, and it is hoped that the impression so made will lead to reformation and conversion.

Disappointed Ambition has led to the Suicide of a citizen of Philadelphia. A journal of that city, of September 22d, reports an inquest over the body of a man who killed himself in despair of ever realizing his ardent aspirations for fame. The deceased, a German by birth, was a weaver and designer of weavers' patterns. He had an intense desire to lift himself above his surroundings, and had instructed himself in many branches of knowledge, and occasionally wrote poems of more than ordinary merit for the German papers of Philadelphia. He did not succeed in his efforts, however, and his disappointment unnerved him so that when a short time ago he lost a beloved son his mind could not bear the shock. He became morose, separated from his wife and lived alone in seclusion, and finally blew his brains out. Even if he had succeeded in realizing his aspirations he would probably have found, as thousands have done, that he was still unsatisfied. There is only one fountain from which contentment and happiness flow (John 4 : 14).

A Plot against a Teetotal Railroad Engineer has had an issue which may be commended to the attention of those who are similarly active in the service of Satan. Mr. George A. Hilton, who has devoted much of his leisure time to evangelical work among the employes of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, thus describes an incident connected with an engineer who at the recent Lake Park meeting gave testimony of his conversion: "There are dangers besetting the pathways of railway employes that are not always the outgrowth of accident upon the rail. A period of great peril in the life of an engineer, recently converted at Keyser, W. Va., painfully illustrates this fact, and also how swiftly Divine justice overtakes those who set God at defiance. In an honest effort to escape a life of intemperance and sin the engineer joined a temperance lodge; upon this some of his old associates in sin, possessed by Satan, determined to compass his ruin; a purse of money was raised and two of the number devoted their time and energies to get the reformed man drunk, they were only too successful, and in a short time their victim was in the toils of the old enemy—a drunkard—but 'God is not mocked; for whatsoever a man soweth that shall he also reap.' Within four weeks of the perpetration of this fiendish act, one of the men became suddenly dumb, both were stricken with paralysis and are now paupers, dragging out useless and sin-blighted lives, and subsisting upon the charity of the State" (Hab. 2 : 15).

A Man's Impartial Estimate of Himself is not often given with so much frankness as it is in the following report of an adventure published in the New York Sun: "A traveller was leaning at night against a railing at the Harper's Ferry railroad station. A locomotive came along, and he sprang lightly over the rail to escape possible danger. He thought it was a meadow on the other side, but knew his mistake when he struck in a muddy stream forty feet below. On being rescued he was asked his name. 'I wouldn't tell you for a thousand dollars,' he replied; 'describe me simply as a fool.' There are many people who might be very truthfully so described, and there are many who are conscious of the fact, but there are very few who would make so frank an admission. The sad aspect of the case is that it will only be at the last great day, when it is too late to remedy the mistake, that so many who now are counted wise will fully realize their folly (Jer. 17:11).

The Chinese Mission Services in New York continue to attract large numbers of Chinamen from all parts of the city. They are conducted by Rev. J. Jackson, formerly missionary in Canton, who preaches in the Chinese language every Sunday evening. A report of the Chinese Sunday-school work recently published states that there are 610 names of Chinamen on the rolls of Sabbath-schools in New York and Brooklyn, and the average attendance is 331, of whom 40 are professors of religion, and 20 more believed to be Christians. Two young men, who have gone to Newark, N. J., to work, return to New York every week for the Sabbath for the sake of being taught by their old teachers. Those who are converted to the Christian faith shrink not from self-denial and labor. One of them recently refused to work on the Lord's day, at the peril of losing a lucrative position. He told his employer that he intended henceforth to love and obey the true God, who requires the observance of the Sabbath as a day of rest and holy meditation.

The Work of Marking the Boundaries of the two States of New York and Pennsylvania is described in an Elnira journal. The dispute between the two States over the boundary line was finally settled by both States accepting the old boundaries, for the principal reason that many farm line fences formed the boundaries and much labor was required to change tax assessments, etc. But the old boundary was ill understood, it being just a century since the boundary monuments were erected, and many of them were broken, covered up, or lost sight of. For the purpose of renewing the monuments a corps of laborers has been employed in marking the line on the most easterly point where the two States come together on the Delaware River. The monuments are made of Quincy granite, and are about four feet long and six inches square at the top. Heavy creases are cut at right angles across each. The letters Pa. and N. Y., which are about two inches long, face Pennsylvania and New York respectively. The freedom with which Christian people go to worldly places of amusement and indulge in questionable practices suggests the thought that a similar work needs doing as to the church and the world to that being done for these two States. The practice of wandering as near the boundary line as possible seems of late years to have become increasingly prevalent and has led to many sad falls which have brought reproach on the name of Christ (Jer. 2 : 19).

THE SAMARITAN WOMAN AND HER MISSION.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And upon this came his disciples, and marvelled that he talked with the woman; yet no man said, What seekest thou? or, Why talkest thou with her? The woman then left her waterpot, and went her way into the city, and saith to the men, Come, see a man, which told me all things that ever I did: is not this the Christ? Then they went out of the city, and came unto him."—John 4 : 27-30.

Christ Seeking a Single Soul—The Surprise of the Disciples—What Woman Owes to the Gospel—The Conference Broken up—The Woman Becomes a Messenger—Why She Left Her Waterpot—The Female Preacher—Her Message—I. The Invitation—Not the "Go System"—A Sister's Heart in it—II. The Argument—Concealed—Self-Revelation—The Non-Repentance Prophets—Jumping into Assurance—Revelation of Christ—A Robe that Fits—The Same Message in Judgment.

Behold our Lord and Master with divinely skillful art seeking after a single soul! We must have large congregations or we are disinclined for soul-winning. The habit of the age is to do nothing but what is ostentatious; every work must be with beat of drum or sound of tambourine. I pray that the Lord may work in us the steadfast desire to do good on the quiet, by stealth, when no one looks on, when not a single disciple is near. Oh! that we may have such an estimate of the value of a single soul that we count whole days well spent to bring one fallen woman or one drunkard to the Saviour's feet. Blessed is he who works on though he is never heard of, and looks for his reward from his Master.

Read this chapter through carefully, and see the skill which that compassion taught Him. How sweetly ready He was to converse with her and take up her questions. Never imagine that the thirty years of retirement at Nazareth were wasted.

I would fain go, if I were young, for thirty years to learn how to talk as He did, if His own Spirit would teach me the lesson. Souls have to be brought to salvation by a gentleness and wisdom such as the Saviour used when He fascinated the Samaritan woman into eternal life, and enticed her to the truth: so only can I describe that wondrous power which He exercised over her in the few short but blessed sentences with which He addressed her.

WOMAN'S GOSPEL PLACE.

Now turn a moment from that glorious One, that perfect man and yet infinite God, whom we would lovingly adore before we look away from Him. Here come His disciples! They have been into the city to buy food—an errand most needful—that they and their Teacher might live. But see! When they perceive Him talking with a woman they marvel, each in his own way. For these disciples of Jesus were steeped in the customary antipathies of the age. First, it was sufficiently offensive that the person with whom Jesus was conversing was a woman. My beloved sisters, you owe much to the Gospel, for it is only by its agency that you are raised to your proper place. For what said the Rabbis? "Rather burn the sayings of the law than teach them to women;" and, again, "Let no man prolong conversation with a woman; let no one converse with a woman in the streets, not even with his own wife." Women were thought to be unfit for profound religious instruction, and altogether inferior beings.

My sisters, we do not think that you are superior to us, though some of you perhaps fancy so; but we are right glad to own your equality, and to know that in Christ Jesus there is neither male nor female. Jesus has lifted you up to your true place, side by side with man. Even the apostles were tainted at first with that horrible superstition which made them marvel that Jesus openly talked with a woman. Moreover, they wondered that He could talk with such a woman! I do not suppose they knew all about her character, but there is a look about the fallen which betrays them; they cannot conceal the boldness which a course of vice usually produces. They may have thought "If He had talked with an aged matron, a saintly mother in Israel, it might not have been surprising; but how can He converse with such a woman?" They did not as yet understand His mission to rescue the perishing and save the lost.

This poor woman also had the misfortune to be a Samaritan, and above all things Jews hated Samaritans, as aliens and heretics, who dared to call Jacob their father and to believe themselves orthodox. Jews and Samaritans were much alike, and you know the sects that approach nearest to each other usually reserve their bitterest

HATRED FOR THEIR NEXT OF KIN.

They will tolerate those who are far removed from them, because they are altogether in the darkness of error, and so are somewhat excusable; but those who have so much light they detest for not seeing eye to eye with themselves. We pity a dumb man, for he cannot speak at all, but we are indignant that one who can say "Sibboleth" will not take a little more trouble and pronounce it "Shibboleth," as we do. Surely he might go that other inch and be quite right. This woman was one of those Samaritan heretics who had dared to set up an opposition temple to the one at Jerusalem, and say that they also were the people of God; so the disciples shrank from her, and marvelled that Jesus did not do the same. How could so good a man mix Himself up with such people?

I have, myself, heard a great deal of foolishness spoken about mixing up with certain people, because we dare to meet with them upon some common ground to accomplish a right purpose. I have sometimes wondered whether people ever read of Abraham when he fought for the cause of the king of Sodom. A horrible man, I have no doubt, that monarch was, yet when his country had been plundered by the invading kings, Abraham marched out on behalf of the King of Sodom; not that he cared for him, but that he desired to deliver his nephew Lot. For that reason he is found in some measure of association with Sodom's king; but when the object upon which they were united was achieved, then see how the princely Abraham washes his hands of the man. He says, "I will not take of thee from a thread even to a shoe-latchet, lest thou shouldest say, 'I have made Abraham rich.'" Thus there may be a temporary union among men, between whom there is the widest difference, and this apparent unity may be lawful and expedient because the end to be gained is altogether good.

See, as the result of this conduct of the disciples, one of the sweetest conferences that was ever held was broken up, and brought to a close at its very climax. Just when Jesus had said, "I that speak unto thee am He," then it must end, for here they come, these cold, unsympathetic ones. Yet they were disciples, were they not? Oh, yes, and true disciples, too; but, alas, no breakers of communion are more blamable or more frequent in the offence than Christ's own disciples when they are out of sympathy with their Master. You see, they are and about the Saviour's need of it: and these thoughts were most proper, but not very elevated or spiritual; and they come wondering that Jesus speaks with a woman, and so the holy conference ends, and the woman must go. Oh, when any of you draw near to Christ, and He is just lifting the silver veil from His dear face, and your eyes are beginning to behold Him, mind that you keep your door shut. "Oh, but it is a good man at the door." Yes, but he will be just as likely to mar your fellowship as anybody else.

Observe that the woman now becomes a messenger for Christ. She has to quit conferring with Him to go and testify about Him. She did not go unbidden though, for she recollected that the Lord had said at an early period of the conversation, "Go, call thy husband, and come hither." So she goes to call her husband. It is for what we do. Observe, she interprets her orders very liberally. She thought as the Christ had said, "Thou hast had five husbands, and he whom thou now hast is not thy husband," He could not have limited her errand to one who was not her husband except in name, and so she might as well call any men who were loitering about the public square, and tell them what she had seen.

Remember how our Saviour gave a large interpretation of His own prophetic mission. He was not sent as a teacher except to the lost sheep of the house of Israel, but He went to the very edge of His diocese, if He did not go over it. He went to the borders of Tyre and Sidon, and when a woman came out of those parts He had healing for her daughter; though He did sow most of His seed upon the acres of the Holy Land, yet He made it fly over the boundary; in fact, He sowed all the ages, and on this once barbarous island there have fallen blessed handfuls which are bringing forth fruit to His glory. Always go to the verge of your commission, never stop short of it. Try to do more good than you can, and it is very possible that you will be successful. Notice that

THE WOMAN LEAVES HER WATERPOT.

The Spirit of God thought well to record this circumstance, and therefore I think there must be a measure of teaching in it. She left her waterpot, first, for speed. Perhaps you have got it into your head that it was an ordinary English waterpot, such as you water the garden with: possibly you so picture it, rose and all. Nothing of the sort: it was a big jar, or large pitcher of earthenware, she had to carry on her head or her shoulder, quite a load for her, and so she left it that she might run the more quickly. She was a wise woman to leave her waterpot when she wanted to move rapidly.

Others think she did so because she was so taken up with her errand that she forgot her pitcher. It is blessed forgetfulness which comes of absorption in a holy design. When the King's business requireth haste it is wise to leave behind everything that would hinder. A man has hardly felt the power of eternal things unless at times he forgets some earthly matters. You cannot think of everything at once; your mind is limited, and it is not advisable that you should divide the strength of your thoughts by having two or more aims. So she left her waterpot. Sometimes you will have to leave your shop to win a soul. You will cast up a row of figures wrongly, and wonder why; and the reason will be that before your mind there fluttered the soul of a sweeper or the figure of a drunkard, or the image of a fallen woman, and your heart was filled with the longing to find the lost sheep. Never mind. I dare say the woman had her waterpot again, and you will get back to business again, and rectify your blunder, and attend to the shop, and set all matters right; and if a soul is saved you will have made a profit by any loss you have sustained.

We have started the woman on her mission; now I want you to observe particularly for there is teaching here. She said to the men, "Come, see a man, that told me all things that ever I did: is not this the Christ?" Observe first, when she did go back to the men she had but one aim, and that was to bring them to Jesus. She cries, "Come, see." She did not tell them anything about their sin at the time, nor try to reform their habits; she called them at once to Him who could set them right. She knew that if she could bring them to Christ all things would come right inevitably. It is good for you to shoot only at one target. Choose your design and aim at it, and not at two objects. Drive away at the souls of men in the name of God to get them to Christ, and nothing short of Him. Labor for this; be willing to live for this, and to die for this, that men may be saved by Immanuel's love, and blood, and Spirit.

She spoke self-forgetfully: she seemed entirely to have forgotten herself, and yet she remembered herself—a paradox, but not a contradiction. She said, "Come, see a man, which told me all things that ever I did." She quoted herself, and yet if she had thought of herself she would not have said a word on the subject of her own life. She might have feared that the men would have replied—"A pretty story that must be!"

and might have turned round and said, "You are a beauty, to come here and talk to us in this style!" No; she let them talk of her as they pleased. "Come, see a man, which told me all things that ever I did." That putting aside of all affection, that genuine simplicity, was part of her power. Never try to be otherwise than you are. If you have been a great sinner, be ashamed of it, but do not be ashamed of that love which saved you from it, so as to refuse to bear witness to its power. Put away the thought of what people will think of you, and only look to what they will think of Jesus for having forgiven and renewed you.

Note how short she was. Ralph Erskine calls her

THE FEMALE PREACHER.

I am not so sure of the correctness of the title. If women preached just as long as she did, and no longer, no one could find fault with them; her testimony is all in one verse, and is just an invitation and a question. There needed no more words; no, not another half a word. She said exactly enough; for she was successful in leading the men to Jesus, who could do the preaching far better than she could. I cannot call her words a sermon; at any rate, you would not care for me to preach so briefly. However, brevity is a great virtue. Do not crave to be fluent, only ask to be earnest.

Then, it was so sensible. There is a dispute about the exact force of what the woman said, but most of those who give us precise translations differ from our common version. It is what she meant and believed, but not exactly what she said. She probably said, "Come, see a man which told me all things that ever I did: Can this be the Christ?"—or, "This is not the Christ, is He?" She did not say He was, but she suggested it with great modesty for the men to examine. This led them to come, if it was only to set the woman right.

Possibly they thought her a poor, mistaken body; but in their superior wisdom they would look into the matter, and so the thing she desired was granted her. Oh, to have our wits about us for Jesus! Observe the force of her reasoning. His power to read her heart, and manifest her to herself, was conclusive evidence to her that a special anointing was upon Him.

But before I get at that I must have you examine more fully the whole of the woman's little message, of which it was a part. It divides itself into two parts. You have been looking for firstly and secondly all this while, and now you shall have them. There are two parts in her sermon. The first is the invitation: "Come, see a man, which told me all things that ever I did;" the second is the argument: "Is not this the Christ?"

I. Consider at once

THE INVITATION.

It is a clever as well as a genuine and hearty invitation. She says, "Come, see." This was putting it most fairly, and men like a fair proposal, and the Holy Spirit works by means which suit the mind. She does not say, "You must and shall believe what I say." No, no; she is too sensible: she says, "Come and see for yourselves;" and that is exactly what I want to say to every unconverted person here this morning. In fact, this is Christ's own word to the first disciples, "Come and see;" and they used it when pleading with others, saying to them, "Come and see."

Moreover, this woman's invitation throws the responsibility upon them. She says, "Come and see." Thus would I say to you—If you do not come and see, I cannot help it, and I cannot help you either. I cannot stand sponsor for you: use your own judgments and clear your own consciences. Come and see on your own account. If you do not, then the blame must rest with you. If you do, then your personal investigation will be sure to end in a blessing. O dear hearers, I may preach the Gospel to you, but I cannot go to Christ in your stead. You must come, you must repent, you must believe: you must lay hold on eternal life for yourselves. Nothing but personal religion can possibly save you. The woman's call was a good exhortation in that respect.

Then, is it not pleasantly put, so as to prove the sympathy of the speaker? She does not say, as she might have said, "Go, see a man." No; "Come, see a man," as much as to say, "Come along; I will go with you and lead the way. Dear friends, when you try to win a soul do not try but use the "come" system. When man cries, "I cannot go to Christ," or "I will not go to Christ," look at him through your tears and cry out, "Friend, I am a sinner like yourself, and have no hope but in the precious blood of Jesus. Come, let me pray with you: let us go to Jesus together." A sister's heart spoke out in that word, "Come."

THE "GO" SYSTEM,

Again, what a blessed vanishing of the speaker there is. I have heard of brethren whose preaching is spoilt because they are so self-conscious. The man wishes you to feel that he is speaking in first-rate style, and is an eminent divine. When he has finished, the common exclamation is, "I never heard such a clever man." But he was not so wise as he might have been or should have been, for he who preaches rightly makes you forget himself; in fact, the observation about him, if it comes out at all, is in this fashion—"I did not detect any eloquence; anybody might have talked like that, but somehow I have felt as I never felt before." The fish knows little about the angler, but he knows when he has swallowed the hook. When the truth has gone right home to the hearer's heart the form of speech is of little consequence. This sensible woman's invitation deserves to be copied by every worker.

II. Now for

THE ARGUMENT.

An argument lies concealed here, and if you look at the text a minute or two you will discover it. She conceals it because she is persuaded that they have already agreed to it. It is this: "If Jesus be the Christ, the Anointed, then it is fit that you should come with me and see Him." She does not argue that point, because every Samaritan agreed to it. If Jesus be the Christ then we ought to go and listen to Him, look at Him, and become His followers. Alas, my dear hearers, I am obliged to urge that argument with many of you, because you are not so practical as these Samaritans. You believe that Jesus is the Christ; I suppose every man and woman of you does that: why, then, do you not believe in Him as your Saviour? You never had a doubt about His Godhead: why is He not your God? "If I tell you the truth," says Christ, "why do you not believe me?" If this be the Anointed One whom God hath sent to take away the sins of men, why have you not sought Him that He may rid you of your sins? There is no reason in your course of action; it is illogical and irrational. This woman did not argue the point, because it did not need arguing.

But what she did argue was this: "This man who was just now sitting on the well, is He not the Christ?" How did she prove it? First, she did as good as say, "He must be Christ, because He has revealed me to myself;" He has told me all things that ever I did." The words are wide. Stop, dear woman; surely He has not revealed all your life, certainly not in words. He has revealed your unchastity, but nothing else. But she was right. Were you ever out in a black and murky night when a single lightning-flash has come. It has only smitten one oak in the field, but in so doing it has revealed all the landscape. It struck one object, but all around you was light as day for the moment. So, when the Lord Jesus Christ revealed this woman's lustfulness, she saw clearly the whole of her life at a single view, and the Lord had indeed told her all things that ever she did. Do you wonder that she said, "Is not this the Christ?"

Beloved, no one proves himself to be truly anointed unless he begins by showing you your sins. If any teacher leads you to hope that, without repentance, or any sense of sin, you may be saved, he is not of Christ. I charge you fling away any hope which is not consistent with your own entire hopelessness apart from Jesus. If you have not known yourself a sinner you cannot know Christ as a Saviour. Some are preaching up now-a-days a dry-eyed faith, and men seem to as if there were no new birth, no conviction of sin, and no repentance. But it is not so: "Ye must be born again." That birth is not without pangs.

Trust in Christ brings a hatred of sin and a mourning because of it. A man cannot hate what he does not know; but this woman was made to see her sin, and that sight proved that the Messiah was dealing with her.

The non-repentance prophets cry, "Peace, peace," where there is no peace: they film the sear, but Jesus puts the lancet into it, lays it wide open, and makes the patient see the gangrene of the wound, and then He closes it up, and with His heavenly ointment makes a sure cure of it. There is no binding up the heart that was never broken; there is no comforting a man who has always been comfortable; there is no making a man righteous who always was righteous; there is no washing a man who has no filthiness. No, and this is what the Messiah does; He lays bare the disease, and this is a proof that He is sent of God, because He does not adopt the flimsy, flattering mode of deceivers, but goes straight to the truth. Her argument is—He must be the Messiah, for He revealed me to myself.

Secondly, He must be the Messiah, for He has revealed Himself to me. Jesus has revealed Himself, and now she says, "I see that He knows me, and knows all about me." Wonderful it is how the Gospel robe exactly fits a man: when he gets it and puts it on he feels that He who made this garment knew his form. Perhaps you have some special weakness or singular deformity; but you soon perceive that Jesus knew all about it, for His salvation exactly meets the lack. There is a bath; ah, He knew I was filthy. There is a robe; ah, He knew I was naked. There is eyesalve; He knew that I was blind. Here is a ring for my finger; He knew I wanted a forget-me-not to keep me in memory of mercy received. Every want is forestalled, and this proves the omniscience of my Saviour. "Therefore," said she, "He knows all about me; He must be infinitely wise; He must be the Christ." This is good arguing, is it not?

Then she seemed to say to them too, "This is more to me a great deal than it can be to you; for He has dealt personally with me; therefore I abide in my assurance that He is the Christ; but go and learn the same arguments for yourselves." When conviction comes personally home, and the discovery is all about your own state and character, it has a special power over your heart and mind to make you say, "This is the Christ." I can feel His strength as He upholds me and I can feel His tenderness as He embraces me. Surely He is the Anointed, and sent of the Lord to bind up the broken-hearted, for He has bound up my broken heart. The case is proved to me; come and experience the like conviction within yourselves."

Moreover, and perhaps there is force in this which has not been noticed, she says, "Come, see," as much as to say, for when I came to the well He did not look daggers at me; and when I did not give Him water He did not grow hot with me and say, 'Disrespectful woman, I will not speak to you.' No, but I was at home with Him in a moment. Come, see a man who made Himself so at home with me that He told me all that ever I did. I am sure He must be the Messiah. The Messiah is to come to open the blind eyes, and He must needs be among the blind to perform the miracle. He is to fetch prisoners out of prison, and they are the lowest class that are in prison, and yet He goes to them. So, come along. I will introduce you to Him."

"YOU MAY COME, I KNOW,

That is the woman's little speech, and how good it is! I am going to add a bit to it which she did not know, but which we know. I wish I knew how to say something that would make you unconverted ones hurry to Christ, but if anything ought to do so it is this. Suppose you never do come to Christ in this life, and die without Him. God grant you may not die without having listened to Him and received Him; but if you do you will be awakened up at the last day from your grave with the blast of a terrible trumpet, and with the cry of "Come to judgment! Come to judgment! Come away!" Whether you will or not, you will have to come, and see a man sitting upon the great white throne, judging the nations; and do you know

WHAT HE WILL DO WITH YOU THEN?

He will tell you all things that ever you did, and as the scenes pass before your mind's eye, and as your own words go ringing again through your ear, you will be sore distressed.

Perhaps this morning's scene will be revived before you, and conscience will tell you, "You were at the Tabernacle that morning; the Gospel was put plainly to you, by one who in his heart longed for you to be saved; but you did despite to all those entreaties, and turned away." I tell you it will be your hell for Jesus to tell you all things that ever you did, and you then will see the argument: "Is not this the Christ?" But, alas, He will be no Saviour to you, for you refused Him. He will then tell you, "I called, but you refused; I stretched out my hands, but no man regarded." Still shall proceed that awful tale of all things that ever you did, concluding with this—you refused mercy, you rejected Jesus, you turned away from salvation, you would not have this man to save you, and therefore have you come to have your past made the fuel for your everlasting burning. God grant that no one here may ever come to that.

No, if I had the task to select one man out of this congregation that would have to spend an eternity in having his life rehearsed to him, where should I find him? No, I cannot see one that I dare to pitch upon, not one—not one—not even the worst man or woman here. I would not if I could. O God, of thy mercy suffer no one here to know the terror of being driven away for ever from Thy presence and the glory of Thy power, for Jesus' sake. Amen.

A Testimony to the Progress of Christianity appears in an unexpected quarter. The North American Review says: "During the century just passed the population of the United States has increased eleven-fold, and churches have increased thirty-seven fold, and while a hundred years ago there was one church to every 1700 inhabitants, there is now one for every 529."

How Caste Hinders the Spread of the Gospel in India and antagonizes the spirit of Christianity which would induce love to all men, has been often explained by missionaries. It is, however, realized more fully by illustration. The following incident, which is by no means exceptional, occurred very recently. It was communicated in a private letter from India. The writer says: "I was on my way home, and as I passed through the little native village which lies between Cutcherry and my house, I was attracted by some one groaning as in great pain. The groans came from some object under a tree, and I found they proceeded from a woman. I asked her what was the matter, and she gasped out that she had been lying there ill for five days, with no one to look after her, and nothing to eat. She was a low-caste woman, and I had great trouble in getting bearers to convey her to the dispensary. No one in the village would do it for money, as there was no one of so low a caste. I did not like to force them, so I had to find people of her village and her caste—two men and two women—and got her taken off to the dispensary. Poor woman, her frame, as she was lifted on the cot, was little better, if at all, than some of the worst I ever met in the famine days. It was very providential my going that way at all. She reached the dispensary alive, but I fear she will never leave it alive. It was a sad sight of how selfish and cruelly indifferent man can be. The poor creature had lain there, as a man admitted, for four days and four nights. Because she was a low-caste woman, no one stirred to help her, but went on with their avocations, possibly with just one atom of curiosity as to when she would die."

Scene in a Street in Alexandria.

A STREET IN ALEXANDRIA.

THE above picture is of a scene in a street in Alexandria, the second city of importance in Egypt, Cairo, the capital, being the first. In the foreground is depicted a water-carrier with his skin, or, as it is called in the New Testament (Matt. 9: 17), bottle. A little in the rear is a lady on an ass, accompanied by her servant, taking an airing. As is usual with ladies in the East, her face is partially hidden from view, to prevent the gratification of a too impertinent curiosity on the part of strangers and the sterner sex. On the left, and occupying an elevated position, are two of the tradespeople of the city, waiting under a little matting spread on poles to form a rude sort of shelter from the rays of the sun. They thus wait for customers, the one meanwhile smoking his strange-looking pipe, and his neighbor apparently absorbed in contemplation.

The Alexandria of to-day shows few traces of its ancient grandeur. Near the neighboring Mustapha Pasha Railway Station, died Sir Ralph Abercromby after his victory over the French. Concerning Alexandria, we may quote the words of Warburton: "Here the Hebrew Scripture expanded into Greek under the hands of the Septuagint; here Cleopatra revelled with her Roman conquerors; here St. Mark preached the truth upon which Origen attempted to refine; here Athanasius held warlike controversy; here Amru conquered; here Abercromby fell."

JAPANESE LADIES OUT FOR A WALK.

OUR picture on this page, represents two Japanese ladies of high social position, walking in the streets of Tokio, with an armed attendant. Japan is an extensive empire in the most eastern part of Asia. Its population is deemed, in proportion to the extent of territory, equal to that of China, being reckoned at about forty-five millions. The Japanese are of a yellowish complexion, and in their personal appearance, dress, manners and customs, as well as in their Pagan superstitious rites and ceremonies, resemble in some measure the Chinese.

To make a confession of Christianity in Japan, was at one time, owing to the mischief wrought by Jesuit emissaries, equivalent to the perpetration of a capital crime, and punishable with death. But in face of numerous persecuting edicts, and the frequent massacre of native converts, both English and American missionaries ventured to carry the Gospel into the country, and succeeded, amid many difficulties, in gaining and retaining a footing there.

The following incidents are from the journal of the Rev. Mr. Fyson, one of the devoted agents of the Church Missionary Society at Niigata, in Japan.

Open-Air Preaching in Japan.

"At Kumoro, our next halting place, we sallied out to find a suitable place for preaching. Seeing no better place, I decided on the entrance to the temple, and I enlisted the services of a policeman, who gave notice down one street that I was going to preach, while I did the same down the other street. By this means a crowd was collected and I stood and preached to them just outside the temple-gate. An amusing remark was made by one of the crowd. He looked at me and my long beard, and then he looked at Mrs. Fyson, who was sitting by me, and remarked, 'That gentleman has shaved off his beard.' I found afterward that a foreign lady is almost sure to be mistaken for a gentleman in country districts where our style of dress is not known. A foreign lady is generally taller than a Japanese, and she has three characteristics which in Japan are seen only with men. She wears a hat or bonnet, she has eyebrows and white teeth; whereas a Japanese woman shaves off her eyebrows, stains her teeth black, and leaves her head nearly uncovered.

A Christian's Answer.

"At Niigata there have been two baptisms during the year, one an old man nearly seventy years old, the other a young man whom the other first brought to us. I felt specially confident in admitting the old man into the visible Church. He had come always to the Sunday and week-day services for more than ten months before he was baptized, and he gave decided proof that he had learnt to know his own sinfulness. Once, at a small inquirers' class, I was telling them how the Bible speaks of all men having wicked hearts, and I asked whether they believed that this was true. 'I don't know about other people's hearts; I know mine is bad,' was the old man's reply.

"He has shown much thankfulness for having come to know about the one true God and the Saviour Jesus Christ; and sometimes he says he thinks that it was in order that he might learn to know about Himself that God allowed him to live so long."

THE FORGED CHEQUE.

TOWARD the close of a winter day, a middle-aged gentleman of sober garb and serious countenance might have been observed wending his way in the direction of a fashionable young ladies' boarding school on the outskirts of a great city. The air was chill and a drizzly rain was falling; yet the traveller did not quicken his footsteps, but walked on slowly and in deep abstraction. Slowly he ascended the hill, and, turning up the avenue, at last stood before the seminary.

"Poor girl!" he murmured, looking up at the windows; "I wish I had a more pleasant message for you. It is a miserable business!"

He walked up to the great door and rang the bell. Presently a servant appeared.

"Is Mrs. Simpson at home?" demanded the visitor.

"Yes, sir!" answered the maid, "Will you please step inside? Who shall I say wishes to see her?"

"Say Mr. Armstrong," replied the gentleman, "and if Miss Wilson is with Mrs. Simpson, tell her that her uncle has come to see her."

The servant girl hurried away to inform the principal of Mr. Armstrong's visit, and, quickly returning, asked that gentleman to step upstairs to the drawing-room.

"Miss Wilson is out for her afternoon walk," said the lady, "but she will be back soon. In fact, there is her knock at the door now. I hope, Mr. Armstrong," she added, "that you are satisfied with Miss Wilson's progress and general standing?"

"Oh, yes," answered Mr. Armstrong, "that is all right. It is not about that I have come; it is about something relating to Miss Wilson's family affairs. But if my niece has come in I should like to see her at once, as I have to catch a return train to the city."

Her mind thus re-assured, Mrs. Simpson left the room to inform her pupil of Mr. Armstrong's arrival. In a few moments she was running lightly upstairs to greet him, the color mounting to her cheeks from exercise and pleasure.

"My dear uncle!" cried the girl, springing forward and embracing Mr. Armstrong, "I am so glad to see you! How are you? and how is Edward?"

"I am quite well, my child," answered he, "quite well."

"But there is something the matter," said Miss Wilson, "I can see it, uncle, in your face. Tell me, what is it?"

"Yes, Lucy," her uncle replied. "There is something the matter, but it is not much. It might be worse, and, besides, it may be rectified."

"Oh, uncle! tell me what it is!" she repeated. "It is about Edward. I know it is. Oh, tell me the worst, do not keep me in suspense!"

"Lucy," said her uncle gravely, "your brother is quite well: at least, I believe so. But something has happened which has an ugly look and which needs clearing up. We are not overheard here? Well, yesterday I was sent for in haste by my bankers, and on arriving there was shown a cheque for $250, purporting to be signed by me, which had just been cashed by a young man, a stranger. Immediately after paying it the clerk's suspicion was aroused as to the genuineness of the signature and he sent for me. When the messenger arrived, Edward happened to be in my room, looking over some papers with me, and I was struck by his sudden and extreme agitation.

"Unhappy youth! Of late he has fallen among companions that have led him astray. I did not know much of this for I do not believe a young man of Edward's age should be treated as a child. But I cautioned him as delicately as I could. Latterly, however, I have had reason to fear he was becoming a slave to habits of intemperance; I have noticed that for quite an hour each morning now his hand trembles like an aspen leaf. But when the messenger announced that I was wanted immediately at the bank, Edward's tremor and agitation were altogether extraordinary. I started at once and on my way I was filled with dread, and trembled like a child. Arriving there, I was shown into the manager's parlor and confronted with the cheque. 'Mr. Armstrong,' said the manager, gravely, 'this cheque was cashed this morning. Is the signature yours?' I took the cheque and looked eagerly at the signature. My eyes danced in my head, my hand shook as if with palsy, and my tongue clove to the roof of my mouth. The signature was a forgery.

"Heaven forgive me, if I did wrong—I acknowledged the signature as mine! 'Mr. Gibson,' I stammered, when I could find utterance, Mr. Armstrong's Account of the Cheque.

'this is all right. I am not quite well this morning, and—and—it's all right.' Lucy, my child, I don't know how I got out of that bank parlor, or back to my own office, and I have Mr. Gibson's cold, incredulous gaze still on me. But Edward is my dear dead sister's boy and I could not say the word that would consign him to a felon's cell."

"Edward was not in the office when I got back," Mr. Armstrong continued, "nor has he since returned. I have come down here to-day to tell you these things, to ask you if you have heard anything of him, and to aid me in saving him."

Lucy threw her arms around her uncle's neck and kissing him with a heart full of gratitude and affection, burst into an uncontrollable flood of tears. "My dear, dear uncle," she said, "how good you are. We do not deserve all you have done for us, Edward and I, my poor wronged uncle, it is a cruel return you have received for all your kindness. Edward does not merit your forgiveness, but he is not himself; he must be mad to have done this wicked thing. Let me help you to find him and bring him to repentance. He has not been near me nor written to me, so he cannot have left the country. He would not, fallen as he is, go away without seeing me. Let us go at once and search for him."

"I think you are right, Lucy," said Mr. Armstrong, "Edward would be certain to come to you if he meditated running away to Europe or going far away. Let me think it over." So saying the good merchant buried his face in his hands, and for a few moments was lost in thought.

"Lucy," he said at last, "hard as it seems, I think our safest course is to do nothing. You remain here quietly where your brother knows he can find you, and depend upon it he will come."

Lucy consented and that night she took care to sit near the window of her room with the shutters flung open. From her window she could see the road in front of the school, and many an anxious glance did she cast along it. But there was no one to be seen there but a poor pedler in shabby garments, and a worn-out basket in his hand. Half an hour passed and still no signs of her brother. The pedler was still loafing about the gate, but no one else was in sight. Lucy could bear the suspense no longer, and hastily putting on her hat and saccque she went down to walk around the house. As she passed the gate the pedler accosted her and asked if she were Miss Lucy Wilson. Being answered in the affirmative he gave her a note addressed in her brother's hand. It told her that the pedler would guide her to his hiding-place, and begged her to come to him without delay.

At another time Lucy would have shrunk from such a companion, but now she accompanied him without fear to the poor lodging where Edward had hidden himself. On arriving there she flung herself on her brother's neck and kissed him with true sisterly affection. She listened to his confession, to his self-upbraidings, and to his fear of his uncle's anger. It was a sad story, but it had a joyful ending when Lucy told him of Mr. Armstrong's promised forgiveness. Edward was in credulous at first, for he was firmly convinced that a man so honest and upright himself, and one so proud of his good name, would never forgive.

"But Edward," said Lucy, "you forget our mother. Mr. Armstrong is willing to forgive you for her sake. You know how he loved her, and for the sake of that love he will pardon her son whom she loved." With many such persuasions Edward was at last convinced and accompanied Lucy to Mr. Armstrong's house. He went in with much trepidation, but it passed away before his uncle's greeting. A serious talk followed and then together they all knelt down and prayed that God would pardon the erring youth for Jesus' sake. A more humble, thankful youth there was not in the city that night than Edward Wilson. His uncle had heaped coals of fire on his head, and he resolved in the strength of Christ that his future life should prove his gratitude.

ONLY A TRAMP.

A Ragged Knight's Rescue.

"STEADY then, Nelly, steady!" exhorted a very unsteady pair of crimson lips. "Steady then, there's a good Nell!"

But whether it was a good Nell or a bad Nell, its pony nerves were in much too terrified a condition to pay heed to its mistress's quivering words of exhortation. Now it would jerk itself and the pony chaise from one side of the road to the other, then as suddenly jerk back to the middle of the path again, and stand there trembling from head to tail. On being urged with a touch of the whip to proceed, it would back instead for a dozen yards or so, but nothing would induce it to go forward.

"Oh, dear! what shall I do?" sobbed the solitary occupant of the chaise. But the exclamation was truly useless enough, for it must have been evident, almost to the capacity of the very youngest rabbit that sat alternately washing its face and peeping at her through the hedge, that she could do nothing, excepting indeed that which she was doing without any speculating in the matter; namely, sitting in the carriage to be jerked hither and thither at her pony's will or impulse.

A lonely road, with not a house before or behind her of any description within two miles; absolutely alone with a strong pony of the most docile disposition under general circumstances, but now terrified out of good behavior, the rain coming down as though for the commencement of a second deluge, and the thunder and lightning roaring and flashing as the drenched girl in her little carriage had never yet seen or heard them do in her life before.

It had been bright and beautiful and very warm, too warm to think of putting on an out-of-door jacket, when she left home; now, in her little thin, soaked pink cambric dress, she was shivering with cold. No wonder her lips quivered like a child's in spite of her seventeen years, which she considered almost venerable, and that a sob would break into the middle of her speech as she piteously besought her pony to be steady, and to make the best of its way to shelter.

"Steady, Nelly, steady, there's a good little pony. Do go on."

And at last, just for a moment, it almost seemed as if Nelly was gathering back senses, courage, and good conduct, and meant to be obedient. It gave itself a shake with a sort of air of its being a final one, let its ears rise up into their proper ordinary position, and took half-a-dozen steps forward. Nelly's young mistress heaved a great sigh of relief, gathered up herself and the reins, choked back the rising tears, and looked forward with comforting hope to the speedy end of her journey.

Alas! the good intentions of Nelly, and the hopes of her mistress, were destined to a speedy termination. The rain had been gentler for a couple of minutes; for that space of time the more fearful elements of the storm had lulled. Perhaps to these circumstances, rather than to the accession of any sudden wisdom, the pony's improved behavior might be imputed. At any rate, when suddenly a fierce gust of wind rushed down the road, Nelly once more took to backing, then stood still trembling more terribly than ever, and then the girl in the chaise uttered a startled shriek and dropped the reins, as a fearful flash of lightning temporarily blinded her, and was followed instantly by a terrific crash. For one awful moment, silence, stillness, blindness, and then the chaise dashing along the road as fast as the pony's terrified, flying feet could take it, the dragging reins adding to its fear.

Unable to help herself, and still unable to see where she was going, the girl sat dumb with terror, clinging with both hands to the sides of the carriage to keep herself from being jolted out. As it was, this final catastrophe was very nearly falling to her share, when the pony stopped with a suddenness as great as the commencement of its wild career. She swerved to one side, and must have slipped if a firm hand had not caught her and held her fast, while a very sympathetic voice muttered:

"Poor little thing! whatever can I do for her?"

The tone in which the words were uttered was so kind and gentle that the "poor little thing" turned her slowly-recovering eyes to the speaker, and said gratefully:

"You have done a great deal for me already. You must have risked hurting yourself very much in stopping the pony going at full gallop like that."

"I have stopped more than that, and for less reason or good, before now," was the quiet answer; "that's little enough to do for any one."

"Well, you do look strong," said the girl, with an unconscious note of admiration in her voice that sounded pleasantly in her companions ears, although he replied half gruffly:

"I guess being strong is of little account just now. If I were an umbrella or a good thick shawl I should be more use to you."

The speaker was not easily startled. His nerves were not at all like Nelly's, but matched his muscles, which those who knew him had been in the habit of declaring were made of iron. But nevertheless he did start, and the supporting arm he had thrown around the half-fainting girl trembled, as a low ripple of laughter, the sweetest music he had ever heard in his life, followed the ending of his declared sentiments as to usefulness. At any rate, that very declaration itself had been useful; for it had brought back a faint tinge of color to the white cheeks and pale lips, and stronger life into the dimmed eyes. Moreover, it had awakened that sweet, merry ripple of laughter.

However, the laugh was almost instantly checked, and gave way to the grave little speech: "I am very glad that you are not. As it is you have saved me from being dashed to pieces in a chalk pit a few yards from here, I believe. But even without that, neither a shawl nor an umbrella would be the least bit of good to hold Nelly, nor," with an additional little tinge of color, "would have prevented my tumbling out of the chaise just now."

"No," said the stranger, with a glance of compassion at the young face beside him, "they would not be much good at either of those things certainly, but I guess you would find them of pretty considerable use in keeping you comfortable in the chaise. You are drenched through with the rain, and must be just chilled to the bone. There—there—" quickly to the pony, who had been standing quiet enough since his sharp pull up, but now, without any notice, nearly wrenched itself free of its unprepared captor by a sudden plunge.

The next instant the man had tightened his grasp on the rein, tightened his clasp around the girl, and not a moment too soon. Another fearful flash crimsoned the surrounding gloom, another crash seemed as though the very world must be cracking and bursting to pieces, and a cry of agonized terror from the young lady was followed by a series of mad plunges on the part of the pony that taxed even the strong hand now holding it to retain possession. In another moment, and scarcely conscious how it could have been done, the frightened driver found herself lifted out of the carriage, and standing trembling beside the stranger. She was safe.

"I beg your pardon," he said humbly, and now using both hands vigorously, both to quiet and calm the pony. "I beg your pardon, missie, but there seemed no other way to rescue you from possible injury. Any moment the pony might have wrenched itself free, and then it would have bolted."

"Yes," quickly, with a shudder, and one little hand put up instinctively to shade the blue eyes; "yes, and then almost certainly I should have been killed in that pit. How strong you are, and how kind!"

The stranger's attention was absorbed with the pony, and he made no rejoinder of any sort to that last remark. There was a short silence.

But then came another of those fearful peals of thunder, if anything more stupendous than the last, in its dreadful majesty; another flash, and a tree was struck close by. Trembling with fear and cold, so that she could scarcely stand, the young girl clutched at her companion's arm with both little shaking hands, and sobbed:

"Oh, if only I were at home!"

"Poor child!" he muttered huskily—she looked no more in her drenched summer clothes and her terror—then, looking steadily away from her at the pony, "Would you let me drive you home?" he blurted out at last, more like a sheepish schoolboy than a man nearly thirty years of age, who had never before known what shyness meant.

But he had small need for shyness now; the small hands were clasped tightly together for one moment with an impulse of the heartiest gratitude, and a glad cry broke from her lips:

"Ah! that would indeed be the finishing touch to your great goodness to me."

"But," said the poverty-stricken stranger, with a second hesitating glance at his clothes now that his offer was accepted, "But I must tell you first that I am nothing but a tramp."

"Oh!" was the simple, calm reply, "then it's a good thing that my father's the mayor of Southford; I daresay he will be able to find you something to do."

"Possibly in the workhouse, or the county jail," was the response, with a grim smile.

A slight answering smile came on the pale young face as the girl said:

"I do not think my father finds me quite troublesome enough to give you such a reward for saving my life. But—" after a moment's pause—"you were not always a tramp I'm certain."

The tramp colored deeply, and there was a still deeper tone of shame in his voice as he said gravely:

"No; you are right. I had the birth and education of a gentleman. My father was a clergyman."

"Ah! and my father was a travelling tinker! so you see we cry quits."

"Or rather," muttered the other, "the distance between us is greater than ever. He has gone up; I have gone down."

"All the more reason to try hard now to go up again," said the young mistress gravely.

And then she got back into her carriage, and was driven by a resolute charioteer, with whom the pony, Nelly, found that it was not the slightest use to dispute for mastery, back to her own home in almost perfect silence. In fact Enid Barnes could already see her home before she had received more than two monosyllables from her companion—a negative to her declaration that he would have to wait to be thanked by her father when they arrived—a simple "yes," to the question, whether he really meant that he should fly off as soon as he had seen her safe. Miss Enid, with her inherited ideas on the score of gratitude, felt desperate. She faced round to her rescuer with an imperative:

"Tell me where you are living then?"

"In the fields."

"In the fields!" was the aghast exclamation.

"Yes; in the fields. At work in them since Sunday, during the day, thanks to good Mr. Copleston's kindness; asleep in them at night, thanks to some remnant still left of self-respect."

Enid looked puzzled. She was impressed, and pleasantly, by the tone of the speaker; but his words she could not understand. "Is sleeping in the fields, without any shelter, a proof of self-respect?" she asked at last with a curious little accent of innocent doubt.

A smile shone in the man's eyes, but he answered with very grave lips, "I hope so; I think so: when one has no right to a shelter, has not earned the money to pay for one."

"Umph!" said Miss Enid, and she turned away again, and fixed her gaze on Nelly's ears. Her thoughts were not all given to reflections on the stranger's confession of one article of his faith, although it was founded on the high authority of St. Paul's verdict—"If a man will not work, neither let him eat." But some of the ruminations in the young lady's dainty small head were given to the private congratulation that she had after all gained her main point, and trapped her benefactor into giving her a clue by which he might be found, and repaid for the services he had rendered her.

"At least," she corrected herself that evening, as she sat with her head leaning against her father's shoulder, and talking over her morning's adventure again with her parents—"At least, of course nothing can repay a man for saving one's life."

The mayor strained his daughter closer to him as he murmured hoarsely, "Nought that I can do can ever release me from the debt of gratitude I owe to the man who has saved my child for me, and," he murmured in a lower tone, and reverently, "nought can ever release us, and we do not wish it should, from the debt of gratitude we owe to Him who is above all, through whose loving mercy my bonny bird was delivered from the lightning and the tempest, in spite of her 'little faith.'"

When Enid Barnes was arrested by the thunder storm in the lanes between Southford and Silverdale, she had been on her way to call on Edith Copleston; the next morning her father drove her over himself, and while she ran off to the school-room, where Florry was about coming to the end of her lessons for the day under her sister's tuition, the mayor walked across the garden to meet the vicar, who was just returning home through his orchard from visiting some sick parishioners.

"Ah, Vicar!" was the hearty stentorian greeting; "you're a sight that's good for sore eyes."

"Then, in that case," was the laughing answer, "I'm glad to see that you are certainly not one of those that need me. How is Mrs. Barnes? and how is that little sumbeam, Enid?"

"You would not have called our bonny bird much of a sunbeam," said the father, smiling with pleasure at the kind words, "if you had seen her come home yesterday through that storm."

"Enid out in that storm!" exclaimed Mr. Copleston, in a tone of really fervent sympathy. "Why, we have not had such a one for thirty years it is said. She was not alone, I hope, poor child!"

"Better if she had been," answered the mayor, laughing; "for she had a very troublesome and unmanageable companion. She was driving; had set out without the man, meaning to try to persuade your Edith to return with her. And when the storm reached its height, which it did, you may remember, without much warning, Nelly turned restive, and after dancing about, apparently for nearly twenty minutes, pretty much on its hind legs, finally made a wholesale present to the storm of its wits and good character, and bolted toward the chalk-pit."

"And poor little Enid was all alone?"

"At that minute she was; but not for long, thank God for His mercy. She picked up a queer knight to come home with, I can tell you, and it's about him that I've come to you now."

THE LORD'S SUPPER.

S.S. Lesson for Oct. 15. Mark 14 : 22-31. Golden Text 1 Cor. 11. 26. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Satan's Perversion of the Institution—The Symbol of the Broken Loaf—Its Homely Inauguration—The Consecrated Elements Intrinsically Powerless—How to Know the Doctrine—Two Erroneous Extremes—Christ's Warning Uncomprehended—Peter's Self-Reliance—A Mighty Change—The Transformed Apostle—The Death of Self.

It is like the work of the arch enemy to have made that institution of our Lord which is in special and united remembrance of His death, to be the ground on which division, strife and faction are justified by the professing followers of our Lord. Sacerdotalism and materialism on the side of popery, ritualism, pharisaical exclusiveness on the part of others make the commemoration of the Lord's Supper the foundation for their opinions, and the strength of their position.

Meanwhile let us take our stand on the simple Word of the living God. "The cup of blessing which we bless, is it not a communion (or participation) in the blood of Christ? The bread (or loaf) which we break, is it not a communion of the body of Christ? seeing that we, who are many, are one bread (or loaf), one body: for we all partake of the one bread" (or loaf) (1 Cor. 10 : 16, 17, R. V.). Here we see that the design of our Lord was to make the Lord's Supper both a manifestation to the world of the unity of His people, and also a binding link among themselves, as they who belong as much together as the broken parts of a loaf, fitting in only where they have been broken.

Our golden text says, "As often as ye eat this bread, and drink the cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death till He come" (R. V.). In the early days of the church when bloodthirsty persecutors were seeking the disciples of the Lord to put them to death, the little bands of faithful ones who dared thus to meet together, knew that each time might be the last, and they proclaimed the Lord's death by their fearless following of Him whithersoever it might lead, to prison, to torture or to death.

In the circumstances of the institution of the Lord's Supper, we see none of that superstitious inapproachable awe with which some earnest but unspiritual men have invested it. It was during the feast of the passover, when with closed but blood-sprinkled doors, in token of a great deliverance from the destroying angel in Egypt, foreshadowing a greater deliverance from the deserved wrath of God against sin, that this feast was instituted.

"AS THEY DID EAT, Jesus took bread, and blessed, and brake it, and gave to them, and said, Take, eat; this is my body." Everything was homely, familiar and natural, no preparation by long fasting, no break even in the memorial feast in which they were engaged. But Jesus was with them, Jesus spoke with them. No amount of preparation by prayer or fasting can prepare us for partaking of the Lord's Supper if Jesus be not with us; if He is with us, what more do we want? He who made the world was with them, He had been partaking with them, and now would make them partake with Him, for His word is, "Behold I stand at the door and knock: if any man hear my voice, and open the door, I will come in to him, and will sup with him, and he with me" (Rev. 3 : 20). He fares with us, that He may lead us to fare with Him; He took our body that He might make us partakers of His body.

There is nothing, either in His words or in hard fact, to prove that the "consecrated elements" in themselves effect a change in the heart and life of those who partake of them. Peter went out from that table and denied his Lord, Judas went out and betrayed Him, becoming "the son of perdition," and all the remainder "forsook Him and fled in the hour of His betrayal. Had the bread and wine possessed in themselves the virtue which some are wont to ascribe to them, how is it that the natural hearts of the disciples remained capable of such treachery to their Lord? What then, is the Lord's Supper nothing?

IS IT A MERE FORM?

Far, far from it! But unless there be real contact with God, unless he who partakes stands in real, spiritual relation with Him, the mere elements, are nothing.

And He took the cup; and when He had given thanks (He whose blood signified by it was so soon to be poured out), He gave it to them; and they all drank of it. And He said unto them, "This is my blood of the New Testament, which is shed for many. Verily I say unto you, I will drink no more of the fruit of the vine, until that day that I drink it new in the kingdom of God." The blood of the passover lamb was to be poured out upon the ground, the children of Israel and the Gentiles later on, were forbidden to eat blood. "For the life of the flesh is in the blood: and I have given it to you upon the altar, to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood which maketh an atonement for the soul. Therefore I said unto the children of Israel No soul of you shall eat blood, neither shall any stranger that sojourneth among you eat blood. . . . For it is the life of all flesh, the blood of it is for the life thereof: therefore I said unto the children of Israel, Ye shall eat the blood of no manner of flesh: for the life of all flesh is the blood thereof: whosoever eateth it shall be cut off" (Lev. 17 : 11-14; see also Acts 15 : 29).

The life of all flesh is condemned because of sin, it is forfeited, but the life of Christ which is in His blood is not forfeited, therefore He says, "Except ye eat the flesh of the Son of man, and drink His blood, ye have no life in you" (John 6 : 53).

How then are we to avoid materialism on the one hand, and rationalism on the other? Between all human extremes there is a divine line which lies open, not to him who reasons, but to him who believes and obeys:

"HE THAT WILL DO HIS WILL shall know of the doctrine" (John 7 : 17). Sure it is that the blessed purpose of our beloved Lord in this dispensation is to prepare a people for eternal union with Himself, imparting to them His very life and nature, His very being; all types all ordinances, all words fail to convey the reality, for it "passeth knowledge." Jesus had sought to teach His disciples the lesson of the cross, and they had utterly failed to understand, now it was the divine and resurrection life which He would impart, but they were dull and without comprehension. Oh, are we not like them, were it not for our stupid unbelief and slowness of heart, surely the times of Pentecost would be lived again.

"And when they had sung an hymn, (for Jesus could sing even in such an hour), they went out into the Mount of Olives. And Jesus saith unto them, All ye shall be offended because of me this night." What they to whom He had given His body and His blood in symbol to be received by faith? Yes, even they! He knew beforehand what hearts they were who surrounded the table, but He had the power to make those hearts clean, free from sin and self. He added, "But after that I am risen, I will go before you into Galilee." The words were meaningless to them, they were "slow of heart to believe" (Luke 24 : 25). But Peter, always full of himself, ready to justify himself from every charge, and value himself upon his superior faithfulness said, "Although all shall be offended, yet will not I." Peter, although he understood that Jesus was the Messiah, and doubtless esteemed himself as very superior to the other disciples on that account, had nevertheless been as dull as any of them in understanding the coming death and resurrection of our Lord: he was foremost in combating the very idea; and consequently he could not enter into the self-denial or self-ignoring, the putting of himself out of the question which would make it possible for him to be of the disciples in the hour of trial. The very protest, "Though all shall be offended yet will not I," showed how the I remained in Peter, open to the attack of the enemy. He had not learned with Paul that in him, in his flesh or his self dwelt no good thing, there was more Peter about him than Christ. "Pride goeth before destruction and an haughty spirit before a fall" (Prov. 16 : 18).

The Master told him the truth, and said, "Verily I say unto thee, That this day, even in this night, before the cock crow twice, thou shalt deny me thrice." Peter thought he knew himself better than Jesus did, he felt deeply wounded that his Lord should seem so to doubt his love, he could not conceive it possible that he should be guilty of such treachery; therefore "he spake the more vehemently, If I should die with Thee, I will not deny Thee in any wise. Likewise also said they all."

Oh, how little Peter knew, oh, how little do we know, the depth of self and of evil which exists in our hearts! We learn, acknowledge, affirm, that our own nature is a complete wreck, and yet we catch ourselves still expecting something from ourselves. It has been the experience of many that in every point in which we have counted upon ourselves, we have failed. God in His loving mercy has brought all that is of self to ruin and nothingness, that we may learn to give it up entirely, and disowning self, become simple but willing instruments in the hands of God.

This same Peter, deprived of his self-dependence, ashamed and crushed, conquered and subdued, was filled with the Holy Ghost. Then came and the man who could not keep himself from denying his Lord, was His boldest and foremost witness, speaking words which pricked his hearers to the heart, and brought three thousand in a day to the feet of Jesus; words which later on put the very Sanhedrim to silence. God gave him a discernment of spirit which detected the lie of Ananias and Sapphira, without a word of intelligence from any man, and a power to bring instant judgment from God upon the offenders. In his time the tone of Christianity stood so high that the half-hearted durst not join themselves to such believers as these first apostles, and yet multitudes who were ready to go all lengths "joined themselves unto them." And God could so far trust Peter, when self was brought down, that prison doors could not keep him in, and his very shadow passing by was made the means of healing the sick who were brought to him.

Self; self-reliance or self something lies at the root of all our failure. In order that God may have His way with us, self has to disappear, and we have not simply to understand the doctrine of the death of self, but also to pass through the mortification of repeated failure, until it has been burned into us that we can of our own selves do nothing, and we learn at last not to talk about being crucified with Christ and living only the life of the Son of God, but to experience the blessedness of being nothing and yet being able to do all things through Christ which strengtheneth us. Lord go on, teach us always more, until we really serve Thy purpose and Thou art glorified in us.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Withdrawal of British Troops from Egypt has already commenced, the authorities considering that Egypt generally is so rapidly returning to its normal condition that a further display of force in the provinces is unnecessary. The London Times says it has been decided to retain for the present 12,000 men in Egypt to carry on and consolidate the work for which the suppression of Arabi Pacha does little more than clear the way. The principal part of the duty of restoring order is confided to Baker Pacha, an officer in the service of the Sultan of Turkey, who has been invited by the Khédive to organize an armed police force. He was formerly a colonel in the British cavalry, but was dismissed by the Queen seven years ago for an act of immorality perpetrated under peculiarly disgraceful circumstances.

An Explosion Occurred in Cairo, Egypt, on September 28th, which caused the death of about thirty persons and injured many others. During the afternoon an ammunition train arrived at the depot. Soon after it entered, fire was observed on one of the cars and almost instantly a loud explosion was heard and fragments of shells were scattered in all directions. The train was ignited and the fire spread to the railroad depot, which was quickly burned. The flames next reached the commissariat depot adjoining, and thence extended to some of the British magazines, which exploded. It was found impossible to prevent the reserve ammunition from being destroyed. The whole of the commissariat stores, the main ordnance stores, the greater part of the forage, all the hospital necessities and a large quantity of clothing were destroyed. The loss is estimated at half a million dollars. The railway officials express the belief that the fire was of incendiary origin. They noticed that trucks on two separate lines of track blazed up simultaneously. Subsequent to the first explosion two men with torches were seized while endeavoring to fire an adjacent quarter of the town. The British Government has telegraphed to Cairo ordering that an investigation be made into the cause of the explosion, and that the result of the inquiry be promptly reported.

The Commissary and Hospital Service of the British army in Egypt is stated to have been grossly mismanaged. The London Times asserts that the most deplorable neglect and inefficiency were shown. The surgeons had to perform their amputations and other operations at Tel-el-Kebir without using chloroform and bandages. Appliances and medicines were not to be had. The only stimulants available were such as the officers contributed from their flasks. One staff officer is reported as saying that had there been a real general engagement they were as badly prepared to handle the wounded as at Waterloo, where they were not all relieved on the field of battle for a week. The transportation of the injured was most brutal, and was effected with the temperature at over 100 degrees in the shade, and nothing to drink but tepid and filthy water.

Arabi Pacha has Expressed his Admiration for the British humane treatment of the prisoners and the wounded. He considers them a great people and says he is heartily sorry he fought them. He asserts that he never thought the English would send a large army to assist the Khédive, and so was led into the war. He denies that he had any communication with the Sultan during the war. Arabi says that the best thing the English could do for Egypt would be to send all the leading men connected with the rebellion out of the country. If they do not do so vengeance will surely be wreaked upon them after their departure. Among Arabi Pacha's papers were found written offers of service from French, German, and Russian officers.

A Report that the Czar of Russia has been secretly crowned is published by an Austrian journal which states in explanation that if the emperor survives till the public coronation the secret ceremony will be considered void. In the event of his death it will be made public, so as to avoid any difficulty in proclaiming the Czarevitch Alexander as the lawful successor of the crowned monarch.

The report is however discredited on the ground that there is no precedent in the Russian history of a clandestine coronation of the sovereign, a ceremony which absolutely requires the presence of a certain number of representatives of the nation. The fact of it having taken place is rendered the more unlikely in consideration of the personal disposition of Alexander III., who is very proud and is most earnestly resolved to sustain the prestige of an absolute monarchy, based on the devoted, unconditional support of the nobility and the lower classes of the Russian people.

The Retirement of Mr. Dillon from Parliament has caused some anxiety on the part of the National party in Ireland by whom he was highly respected. Mr. Dillon, in a letter announcing his retirement, attributes the step to ill health and says it will not be possible for him to take any part in Irish politics for the next few years. It was at first believed that Mr. Dillon's resignation was caused by disagreement with Mr. Parnell whose policy he recently stigmatized as "milk and water." Statements have, however, since been made by Mr. Davitt and Mr. Dillon in conversation explicitly denying that any difference exists between the latter and Mr. Parnell. Mr. Dillon resigns solely because of ill health. There are hopes in the party that he may be able to resume his duties after an absence of a year.

Mr. E. Dwyer Gray, the High Sheriff of Dublin, whose imprisonment aroused so much indignation in Ireland recently, was on Saturday last released from prison. Judge Lawson, who sentenced him, ordered his release on the payment of his fine of $2500. Judge Lawson, while defending his act in imprisoning Mr. Gray on legal grounds, said he felt that justice had now been vindicated, a better state of things being observable. He also pointed out that since his imprisonment a considerable change for the better had taken place in the tone of his paper, the Freeman's Journal. The judge said the action taken by himself and the law officers had been effectual in preventing the course of justice from being impeded.

The Outbreak of Cholera at Manila the Capital of Luzon Island has resulted in a large number of deaths. The island is one of the Philippine group which lie east of Siam and south of China. The population numbers about six millions, of whom only 350 are Europeans and Americans. The deaths at the last report numbered three hundred a day, and the descriptions of the scenes in the city of Manila are of the ghastliest description. "Whole families are grouped together dead in houses or by the roadside, and bodies are taken away in cart-loads. Contrary to the rule in most tropical cities, where cholera finds in defective drainage and the personal uncleanness of the people a stimulus in its work, in the present instance no predisposing cause appears. The natives are represented as a very cleanly, cheerful race. Owing to the fertility and fruitfulness of the soil, little labor is necessary to gain a livelihood, and poverty and pauperism are comparatively unknown."

An Interchange of Civilities Between the English and Turkish Governments has taken place as to the war in Egypt. The Sultan has sent a note to Lord Dufferin, the British Ambassador at his court, for transmission to Lord Granville, the British Foreign Secretary, in which the Porte thanks Great Britain for re-establishing order in Egypt, and expressing the hope that the bonds of friendship at present subsisting between Turkey and England will be drawn still closer. Lord Granville has replied, expressing satisfaction at the sentiments of the Ottoman Government.

The Death of Rev. George T. Dodds is Announced from Paris where he was doing active and efficient work as assistant to Mr. McAll. In a letter narrating the painful circumstances of his death, Mr. E. W. Hitchcock says that Mr. Dodds had gone with his family into the country in the Department of the Loir et Cher for a few days' rest, occupying a cottage which a friend had put at his disposal. The day after his arrival he was walking in the woods with his wife and children, and found what he thought to be mushrooms. They gathered an armful and took them to the cook, who made from them a dish for the breakfast table. Mr. and Mrs. Dodds ate freely of them, the children, fortunately, abstaining. In a few hours the three who had eaten were deadly sick. They had breakfasted upon poisonous "toad-stools." The children were too young to give help or seek it; and the nearest village was eight miles away. Paris was five hours' distant by rapid train. Toward evening, a neighbor called at the house, and he immediately summoned physicians and nurses from Paris. Mrs. Dodds and the servant recovered, but Mr. Dodds was seized with peritonitis and died the following day. His death will be a serious blow to the McAll mission, in which he was an indefatigable worker. It may be remembered that Mr. Dodds was the companion and interpreter of M. Réveillaud in his mission to the churches of America two years ago. He was the son-in-law of Dr. Horatius Bonar.

An Anti-Jewish Movement has Broken out in Austria. A cable dispatch says: "Advices from Pressburg report the occurrence of anti-Jewish riots at that place. The mob broke the windows of many houses occupied by Jews. The military finally restored order after making forty arrests. The military are confined to their barracks. The Hungarian Ministry have placed the Pressburg district under martial law. The rioters in Pressburg declared that what they had done was merely a prelude to what was coming. The shops and warehouses of the Jews were forced open and plundered. The rioters offered the military an obstinate resistance, some of them seizing the soldiers' bayonets with their hands. Similar excesses were committed in the neighboring town of Blumenthal, where thirty persons were arrested. Several hundred Jews have fled to Vienna."

The Courage of an English Preacher was recently displayed in the midst of an open-air service. Mr. Vivian Dodgson, a candidate for orders in the Episcopal Church, was preaching to a crowd of men and children upon the beach at an English watering-place, when loud cries for help were heard from the sea, where a boat containing five persons had overturned, and all were struggling for their lives. Without a moment's hesitation, with an unfinished sentence of his sermon on his lips, the preacher rushed into the water and swam out to the drowning creatures. One woman he brought safely to land; one of the men could swim, and saved a child as well, and the other two were rescued by others. Mr. Dodgson is the son of General Dodgson, who distinguished himself at the siege of Lucknow in saving the life of General Havelock when that illustrious soldier had sunk from exhaustion in the death-race across the open space between the rebels and the city. The history of that terrible time states that amid a hail-storm of bullets General Dodgson led the General at a slow and measured pace—for Havelock could go no faster—safely into Lucknow.

Mr. Von Schluembach's Evangelization Tour in Germany is being blessed to the revival of religion in many places where he has preached. His success among the Germans in New York and other American cities is well known, and he is now responding to calls in Berlin, Hamburg, and other large cities of Germany, to inaugurate a movement for the evangelization of the lower classes, who are estranged from the Church of God, and are ignorant of the salvation in Christ Jesus. Mr. Schluembach is supported by friends in Germany, England, and America, who desire no other report but that sinners are brought to repentance and conversion. In a letter recently received Mr. Von Schluembach says: "I may state to your readers right here, that as soon as the pastors find out that I come among them as an evangelist, pure and simple, sent by the Master, not by any distinct denomination, supported by friends in England and America, who have only the conversion of the sinner in view, and no desire to meddle with any church organization in Germany, a warm welcome is assured. At the same time, many do not believe that the movement will be successful others, however, encourage me greatly. But I see already, that if we can keep this movement entirely within the lines of what we call in America an 'Evangelization Society,' sure results will follow in the near future to the glory of Christ."

MR. McLAGLEN, whose portrait appears this week on the front page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, together with some scenes in his history, is a native of Africa. One of his parents was Dutch and the other Scotch. He was born in Cape Town on April 4th, 1852. He had the privilege of living in a Christian home, and from his earliest days his mother and father earnestly prayed for his conversion, and both by precept and example endeavored to lead him to Christ as his Saviour.

In the family there lived a native African nurse, who had once been in slavery but who obtained her freedom, and was also a most earnest Christian woman and intensely anxious to lead "young massa" to Jesus. She therefore availed herself of every opportunity to sing those hymns which were expressive of her own faith, and hope, and love, for the special benefit of her charge, and tried to familiarize his mind with the leading truths of the Book of God, especially such as set forth with the greatest clearness the ruin of all men through sin, and the great salvation which the precious blood of Christ has secured.

MR. W. TAYLOR'S PREACHING.

The prayers and teachings of his parents and the hymns of the colored nurse prepared the boy's mind for the reception of the truth, but the final means of his conversion was the blessing of God on the preaching of Mr. William Taylor, well known as "California" Taylor. When Mr. McLaglen was about twelve years old, he went with his parents to Sidney Road Chapel, Cape Town, where a series of services were being conducted by Mr. Taylor. There he heard the Gospel preached with simplicity and vigor and was deeply impressed. After the sermon the hymn was sung:

"Ah, whither should I go, Burdened, and sick, and faint?"

and it was sung with deep feeling by the impressed congregation. The boy was deeply moved and there and then in the strength of God he consecrated his future life to work for Christ.

He returned home full of zeal and love for the Saviour, which the passing weeks and months deepened rather than obliterated. After a time he began to make it the subject of constant prayer that some way of active service might be opened to him. Like most boys of humane sympathies and natural kindness of disposition, he was very fond of dumb animals, and used to keep and tend a considerable number of rabbits and pigeons. But now the objects of a higher ambition and of a loftier pleasure and employment, constrained him to clear out his pigeon-house, and consecrate it as a sanctuary for God, and into it he collected from the streets all the ragged children he could induce to attend, and in boyish language he told them of his object and of the Saviour who loved them. He then read to them some stories of the Bible which he had selected as adapted to enlist the wondering attention of the young.

AMONG KAFFIRS, ZULUS, AND BOERS.

After a little time the conviction was born which "grew with his growth, and strengthened with his strength," that he must devote himself to the ministry of the Gospel of Christ. In answer to his earnest prayers for guidance, and as a result of repeated deliberations with those who knew and loved him best, he resolved to avail himself of the curriculum of study provided by the Sunnybloom South African College, where he entered himself as a student, and remained there for four years. Having gained considerable distinction for the thoroughness of his academical career and the successful results with which it was crowned, he at once entered upon missionary labor among the Kaffirs, Zulus, and Boers, in which field of enterprise he found for a time a most congenial sphere of labor, and enjoyed a rich and abundant measure of the Divine blessing.

AMONG SAILORS IN MAURITIUS.

In the year 1877, he resolved on visiting England, and as a means for the more perfect acquisition of the English language, he worked for nearly three years as a missionary among sailors in the Mauritius. Here his unflagging zeal and tireless assiduity in his loving attempts to lead men into the way of salvation, met with the most cordial approval of the Bishop of the Mauritius, and resulted in numerous conversions. Many of the most abandoned men among the crews that he visited were led through his genial instrumentality to seek salvation and abandon the vicious ways for which they were notorious.

AN IMPORTANT VISIT TO ST. HELENA.

On his way to England he was compelled, through ill-health, to leave the ship upon its arrival at the historic island of St. Helena, where he remained for a few weeks. During this time he was introduced by the American Consul, whose acquaintance he had made through the captain of a Norwegian vessel, to some of the ministers of the Gospel there, as well as to the Governor of the island. There are now, happily, but few spots in the habitable globe to which Mr. Spurgeon's Pastors' College has not sent out one of its students as a herald of the Cross, and while in St. Helena, Mr. McLaglen was cordially received by one of them, the Rev. Mr. Cottrell, who is settled in charge of the Baptist Church on the island. Mr. Cottrell invited Mr. McLaglen to preach in his chapel to the native laborers one Sunday afternoon, and to his regular congregation in the evening.

Happening, in the course of his second address, to say how anxious he was to complete his interrupted journey and go to England, a captain, who was present in the audience, offered him a free passage to the land of his desire. The proposal was gratefully accepted, and in order to inspect the ship in which he was to sail, Mr. McLaglen, in company with Mr. Cottrell, at once went down to the wharf and stepped on board. Before they left, these two men of God entered into conversation with the crew about religion, and commenced to distribute tracts among them, which were most thankfully received. "You had better speak to our captain about these matters," said one or two of the sailors, "he is a bad man, a confirmed drunkard, and leads us a terrible life both at sea and ashore."

A MEMORABLE SERMON ON BOARD SHIP.

As Mr. McLaglen and his companion were proceeding homeward, they met the captain of the ship coming toward the quay with unsteady gait, and most unmistakably inebriated. In a few hours the intending voyager set sail, with his heart constantly ascending in prayer to God, that ere the ship should arrive at its destination the captain might become "a new creature in Christ Jesus."

The eldest daughter of the Governor of St. Helena, had presented him with a book of Mr. Sankey's solos, and Mr. McLaglen now and again sang from it to the assembled crew, an entertainment which was not only novel in their experience, but one moreover, which was highly appreciated. Having gained a reluctant permission from the captain to hold a Sunday service on board, the young missionary addressed his audience from the words, "Woe unto him that giveth his neighbor drink, that putteth the bottle to him and maketh him drunken also" (Habakkuk 2:15). Dilating, as he naturally would do, on the unmitigated curse of drunkenness, a vice to which most mariners are peculiarly liable, the preacher dwelt in an emphatic manner, upon the poverty, sadness, and sin which so often accompany indulgence in the intoxicating cup.

While the service was proceeding, the captain was lying in his bunk, but an arrow from the bow of Divine truth was directed by an unfailing aim to his heart, and he was compelled to listen to exceedingly unpalatable truths, which made him supreme-ly miserable, and filled him with a strange anxiety and unrest such as he had never known before. He invited Mr. McLaglen to join him at dinner in the evening, and he accepted the invitation. As they sat at table, in comparative quietness for a time, the captain, with manifest emotion, suddenly exclaimed, "While you were speaking about families suffering through drink, you touched my heart. I've a wife and six children in Glasgow, who have often wanted the very necessities of life, through my insatiable love of drink; and I have frequently squandered away all my hard-earned money in dissipation. Yes, sir, I'm a big drunkard, but your sermon this morning made it clear to me that I shall be lost for ever if I don't give up the drink. I must leave it off, at once too, and I will."

GIN THROWN OVERBOARD.

He then led Mr. McLaglen aside, and showed him, safely stowed away in a dark recess of the cabin, two barrels of stout, and also sixteen bottles of gin, which he had hidden in his chest of drawers. He said, "I intended to have had a jollification on board, but you have quite stopped that. What must I do?" And pointing to the bottles he said, "Shall I throw them overboard?" "Yes, captain," said the surprised missionary, his heart bounding with gratitude to God, "that is just the very thing to do." Accordingly, at midnight, bottle after bottle was dropped from the cabin porthole into the sea. (This scene is depicted on the right-hand side of the front picture.) While this operation was being performed by the captain himself, his face bore so solemn an aspect, and his whole mien was one of such evident determination that Mr. McLaglen could not help laughing aloud. "What are you laughing at?" the captain inquired. "I am laughing with joy to think how admirably and effectually you have dodged the devil," was the reply, and the whole scene was fitly terminated by a most solemn season of prayer to God, and of thankfulness for the miracle of grace which had been so unexpectedly wrought, for not only had the drunkard been reclaimed from his besetting vice, but as a sinner he had sought forgiveness through the atoning blood of Christ.

A REVIVAL ON THE SHIP.

From this time forth the captain boldly gave testimony of the great change which had been experienced, and his example for good became as beneficial as previously it had been pernicious. A regular service was established among the men, of which he took the lead, and at the first meeting he said, "Men, I am very sorry to think what a wicked, drunken life I have lived, but I have now seen my sinfulness, and God, for Christ's sake, has graciously forgiven it all; and now I want you too to forgive me for all the unnecessary inconvenience and wrong, I have inflicted upon you. I am now determined, if God will help me, to serve Him on board ship, and I want you to do the same too." The hardy sailors were melted to tears, and the Holy Spirit strove with several of them so effectually that they, too, soon realized a like change to that which had been experienced by the captain, and, like him, were filled with the joy of Christ's salvation.

When the ship at length arrived at Falmouth, Mr. McLaglen had to separate himself from the captain and crew, but some time afterward, when attending a meeting at Mr. Spurgeon's Tabernacle, he was surprised to see the captain sitting three seats distant from him, and after the service was over had the satisfaction of finding that he had been kept faithful in his allegiance to Christ.

AMONG RAILWAY EMPLOYES.

Having been favored by a friend in the Mauritius with a letter of introduction to Lady Russell, he found in her ladyship a most cordial sympathizer and friend, and in her hospitable home remained for several days. One evening, while he was walking in the street, and attempting to cross a road, he was knocked down by a fishmonger's cart, and just as he was rising from the ground after the misadventure, the first person whom he saw was the late Major Malan, whose unwearied labors for Africa's enlightenment and evangelization, are familiar to all who watch with interest the spread of Christ's Gospel among the long-neglected peoples of the earth. Through his brotherly interest fluence, Mr. McLaglen subsequently commenced mission work, finding his first sphere among the navvies employed in railway work, in the county of Sussex, and in which enterprise he gained the confidence and secured the love of the families of the navvies, and was rewarded by manifestations from God. On January 26th, 1881, a widow of Newick, near Lewes, presented him with a valuable watch and other gifts in token of their affection and appreciation.

McLaglen has been employed in visiting the sick and others, at the East End of London, the Model Lodging-houses which abound in the poorest and most neglected region. He is now chiefly engaged in visiting for various charitable and philanthropic purposes in behalf of mission work in South Africa, and has succeeded in arousing the attention of the Christian community to that dark

SOCIAL LIFE AMONG ZULUS.

At one of his lectures on Zululand and the Zulus, delivered at the India Dock Club and in London, Mr. McLaglen gave the following particulars: "Polygamy in Zululand is practised according to a man's means—the more wealthy he has the more wives he has, or rather buys, as he has from six to ten cows to the parents of each wife he chooses for his wife. The marriage festivities last for weeks, feasting and noisy entertainment—singing, dancing, yelling, eating, and drinking—being kept up night and day. Should a woman be the first child in the family, she is usually most likely to be sent back to her parents, rather than to be sold for cows, whereas a girl who has no marketable value, beside being very young, is kept. The wives sleep in separate huts, and one result of being a wealthy man in the Zulu country is that the husband does no work but makes his wives work for him."

TWO BOYS RESCUED FROM DROWNING.

Mr. McLaglen's life has been one of considerable adventure and incident, as might have been deduced from the districts in South Africa in which he has lived and labored. One day, when at Port Natal, two boys, about ten or twelve years old, were bathing in the sea, which was running somewhat heavily upon the beach. The current swept the lads off their feet into the sea beyond their depth, and they were in imminent danger of drowning. Their agonizing shrieks were promptly responded to by Mr. McLaglen, who happened at the moment to be walking on a kind of jetty which extended some little distance into the sea. Without waiting to divest himself of any of his clothing, and not stopping to consider the risk he was running, he breathed a prayer to God for help and success, and plunged into the water.

Displaying himself with the agility of a practised swimmer, he soon reached the boys, who were struggling to each other, and grasped them just as they were sinking beneath the surface never to rise again. One of the lads seized Mr. McLaglen's hand with such a death-like grip that his fingers were almost severed from his hand, and to this day he has a scar which conclusively demonstrates the strength with which he was held. It was a narrow escape for both Mr. McLaglen and the boys, but for the mercy of God the shore was safely reached, amid the plaudits of an excited multitude. (This incident is shown on the left-hand side of the frontispiece.)

PERILOUS ENCOUNTER WITH A SNAKE.

On another occasion, while he was upon a mission tour among the Basutos of South Africa, Mr. McLaglen had occasion to visit one of the Basuto villages, which are somewhat numerous in that region. Passing along between two rows of huts, he was startled by a piercing shriek, and a moment later, a woman, with horror depicted on her face, came running toward him, screaming at the top of her shrill voice, "A snake! a snake in the house!" The window of the house from which she came was just emerged, being the missionary at once leaped through, and in time enough, was a huge and venomous rattlesnake crawling about upon the floor. Mr. McLaglen, catching a blanket from the bed, threw it upon the snake and then jumped upon it. But, to his horror, the monster forced itself from underneath the blanket, and rearing its angry crest, hissed forth its rage, and showed a determination to fight. A quick as thought, the missionary seized a poker, began to strike with all his might, and continued his efforts until he had conquered, and the horrible creature fell to the ground, when he was speedily dispatched. Upon measuring it, it was found to be about eight feet in length, and as thick as a man's arm. The entire village came to see it, and loaded its victor with the most enthusiastic congratulations and presents of live stock. (See the left-hand panel of the front page.)

VISITS CETEWAYO.

Mr. McLaglen was naturally interested in the recent visit to England of Cetewayo the captive King of the Zulus. During his early life in Africa, he had seen much of the evils of Cetewayo's rule, and he was devoutly anxious that Cetewayo's visit to England, might be blessed to his soul. He knew well how incalculable would be the benefit to Zululand if the renewal of his power should be accompanied by a change to a more civilized and Christian policy; accordingly among the numerous visitors who called upon him at Kensington, was Mr. McLaglen, who being thoroughly acquainted with the Zulu language, greatly delighted and gratified the king by interpreting to him the articles which had appeared in the press in support of his cause, and made him the medium of communicating his wishes and gratitude to the English people and Government in reference to his re-installation in Zululand.

One of the most interesting episodes in Cetewayo's visit to England, was the presentation to him, just before his departure, by Mr. McLaglen of a handsome Bible, and seven copies of the Book of Common Prayer in the Zulu language. (The presentation ceremony is shown in the right-hand of the frontispiece.) The king seemed very thankful for the gift, and said that Mr. McLaglen was the first person who had given him a Bible in England. A Prayer-book was also given by Mr. McLaglen to each of the chiefs, as well as to every member of the suite. One of the latter, on receiving the presentation, said: "It is high time we had some books of this kind to read." The volumes were all in the Zulu language. When the Bible was offered to the king, he inquired, "What is it?" "The Bible—the Book Queen Victoria loves, and the source of her greatness." He seemed surprised at the answer, and promised to read it, that he might understand all about it. If he keeps his promise and its reading is blessed to his soul there will be good news soon heard from Zululand. The influence of the king is all powerful and missionaries will have opportunity under his protection to preach the Gospel under favorable circumstances.

EGYPT AND JUDEA IN PROPHECY.

Some Remarks in a Recent Sermon at Liverpool by the Rev. Canon Taylor.

THE Jews shall be gathered out for a restored nationality in Judea. Events are now hastening on toward that. Why? Because Palestine, so long kept under by the Mohammedan power, must be emancipated. Turkey has lost its power. The Mohammedan power is being contracted. At this moment they are looking upon the events of this year with great concern, because, according to their own prophecy, the Mohammedan Messiah must come about this period. The Mohammedan epoch dates from 622, exactly 1260 years ago, and their own prediction is that about the present time their Mohammedan Messiah is to come, and their epoch is to come to a close. They do not know what is coming. They are losing their provinces here and there. That accounts, of course, for the extraordinary fanaticism of those who have led the revolt in Egypt at the present time. They do not know what is coming. Province after province has been taken from them. The mystic Euphrates is drying up (Rev. 16:12).

In Isaiah 18:1 and 66:19, we are told that the Jews shall be gathered to Jerusalem by the agency of the land overshadowing with wings, making use in part of ships, and in part of other appliances, and whether it be by ships or by railroads, by one means or another, there is the command, "Go, ye sweet messengers, and bring My people back." Another reference is in Zephaniah 3:10. "From beyond the rivers of Ethiopia (Cush) My supplicants, even the daughters of My dispersed, shall bring Mine offering." The ships of Tarshish—Tarshish was in the West—stands for a great maritime power.

ENGLAND IS THE TARSHISH OF THESE TIMES, and her sons are called young lions of Tarshish in the prophecy of Ezekiel 38:13. Our national symbol is a lion. And I cannot for my part fail to draw the conclusion that we are justified in applying this passage to our own beloved country marked out on the plain page of prophecy for great and high purposes in connection with His ancient people. You perceive how the present crisis bears on this point. In the providence of God there has arisen a war in Egypt, and God help our poor soldiers. At this very hour, while we are sitting peaceably in Chrysostom's Church listening to the exposition of God's Word, what are they doing? I do not know, and my thoughts would rather shrink from entertaining this subject, because there may be now a fierce battle raging, amid the sighs of the wounded and the dying. May God help the suffering and the dying on either side! We believe that we are on the side of right. God give us the victory to establish peace and law in that distracted land. God will overrule the present events for good. There is Egypt, at the present time, that has long been connected with the history of God's ancient people. There we have God's ancient people beyond the eastern Cush. I believe God's ancient people, the ten tribes, are to a great extent there. I know some people identify

THE ANGLO-SAXONS WITH THE TEN TRIBES.

Far be it for me to say that there may not be many of the old Israelites among the Anglo-Saxons. This may probably be. I say it is quite possible that in the wide dispersion of the ten tribes some of them may have come over Europe and West, and even to the Anglo-Saxons, and are among the Anglo-Saxon race. But

GOD'S ANCIENT PEOPLE ARE IN THE EAST somewhere, I don't mean as a people, but they are more or less as a nation. Then you have the Jews also, beyond the eastern Cush and the western Cush. A war is now going on which must have some further influence upon the Mohammedan empire as such, and have an influence upon Palestine as such. But we can all see that there must be a controlling power. England's influence must be felt there, and felt on the adjoining country, on the north and Palestine. This present crisis is in all probability a link in the step of God's providence to carry out the restoration of Jewish nationality. England may be in God's providence the agent to carry out that in one way or another. Let England's rulers, if this be the case, see England's place on the page of prophecy, and let us be prepared to do what God will point out to us in His providence to do, whatever it be. If it is God's intention that the Jews should go back again now to their own land, and England should aid them, let us not set ourselves against them, but be ready to take the part of God's people. Above all things, let us never be found on the side of the enemy of the Jews. God has preserved them for a purpose. Let us do what we can to give the Gospel to the Jews since we got it from them. Let us never be found against that people, "terrible from their beginning hitherto." Those who are found against Israel and Judah in the last great struggles of the nation will incur the severe judgments of God.

Let us make them partakers of the blessings which we enjoy, that they may love Christ, and that they may rally around "the Ensign on the mountains," that they may hear the blessed trumpet of the Gospel, and rejoice in the salvation which we at the first received from them. "For salvation is of the Jews." Let us ever promote their interest in every possible way. And, when in God's providence the door is open for them to go to their own land in security and safety, let England be ready with her swift ships to take them and protect them.

DEGRADATION OF MODERN POLITICS.

Dr Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning,
October 8, 1882.

"This place shall no more be called Tophet, nor The valley of the Son of Hinnom, but The valley of slaughter."—JEREMIAH 19: 6.

A Fit Symbol of the Condition of Politics—What the Straight Ticket may Mean—Young Citizens Introduced to the Carcasses—The Degradation of the Past—The Aaron Burr Episode—A Scuffle in Congress—The Spirit of Assassination at work before Garfield—Dead Parties Slain by Corruption—Last Year the Blackest Year—The Debauch at Yorktown—The Garfield Funeral Carousal—The Albany Scandal—The Politicians at Spuyten Duyvil—The River and Harbor Bill—Star Route Thievery—Saratoga Forgeries and Frauds—Brooklyn Outrages—Consolation from Disintegration—A Model Platform—Preamble and Planks—Where is the Moses?

THIS was Gehenna, or the valley outside of Jerusalem. The carcasses of animals were thrown there; the offal of the city was deposited there. Fires were kept perpetually burning so that the place would not breed a pestilence. The place has sometimes been used by religious writers and speakers, as a symbol of perdition. I use it as a symbol of the condition of modern politics. But this Gehenna instead of being in the suburbs of the city is in the centre of every neighborhood and every town and every village and every city of the United States. Its carcasses rot on the steps of the City Halls of this country, and its fires hiss and simmer and crackle through the long night of official corruption, and those who have noticed how the bodies and the minds and the souls of men have gone down under the influence need not be told that like the valley of Hinnom in the text, it ought to be called "the valley of slaughter."

The condition of State and national politics to-day is appalling. I speak without any allegiance to any political party. I have all the time purposefully kept myself aloof from partisan organization that I might independently discuss every moral question pertaining to each or both of them. By this I do not mean that I sit on the fence in matters of politics, for I have always voted ever since I was of age, save when by change of residence, or by necessitated absence at the time of registration I had no right to vote; but I have never voted what in this country the parties call a "straight ticket." When a man tells me he always votes the "straight ticket," that he always goes for everything on the ticket of his particular party, he makes me think of a man who should buy a barrel of apples and then boast that he ate them all, not only the good apples, but the worm-eaten and the gnarled and the rotten, so as to be consistent. I propose to make a selection of apples.

Within our memory in nearly all the states both political parties have at some time been in supremacy, and it seems to me there has been to lower corruption. Ever and anon a party cries out: "put me in power and I will effect a great reform." The new party comes into power, and generally the only difference is a new roll of officers. Hark to that crash. What is the matter now? Why, the machine of some Republican or Democratic party has been crushed to pieces, and we say, "thank God for the demolition." But before another election comes another machine is in action—a machine with larger crank and stronger wheel and wider hopper. We have been killing political bosses for the last fifteen years in this country and there never were so many political bosses as to-day. There are young men here who are to enter soon upon the discharge of their civic or public duties, and they, before entering the arena, ought to know some of the lions they will have to meet, or, to come back to the suggestion of my text, these young men need to come forth with shovels and spades and ploughs to turn under the carcasses of the Gehenna of modern politics.

PAST DEBASEMENT.

I propose to give you some illustrations of the present debasement of public affairs, drawing my illustrations for the most part from the last year.

There has never been anything to boast of in the purity of American politics. Do you know that Aaron Burr, the debauchee, came near being President of the United States? He got as many votes as Thomas Jefferson, the patriot. It was a tie vote. Then the election was thrown into Congress and Thomas Jefferson, the patriot, beat Aaron Burr, the debauchee, by only one vote. In the Congress of the United States, in 1798, a member by the name of Lyons spat in the face of a member by the name of Griswold, and Griswold struck him with a hickory stick, and then Lyons seized the tongs and struck Griswold, and then the two rolled over on the floor of the national legislature in a scuffle from which their friends extricated them.

When Thomas Jefferson was inaugurated President of the United States, the Sentinel of Boston wrote the obituary of the American nation, saying: "Monumental inscription: Expired yesterday, regretted by all good men the Federal Administration of the Government of the United States, aged twelve years. This monumental inscription to the virtues and the services of the deceased is raised by the Sentinel of Boston."

All the way down it has been a scene of scurrility and defamation. President Van Buren was always pictorialized as a fox or a rat. Horace Greeley was mauled into the grave by political injustice. After serving this land with all the concentrated energies of mind, body and soul, he was practically by American politics put to death. The chief campaign document against President Jackson was a picture—a copy of which I recently saw—a picture of ten or twenty coffins in allusion to the deserters whom he had ordered shot.

Last autumn people were surprised at the spirit of assassination abroad in this country. Why be surprised? The same spirit attempted to shoot Andrew Jackson, President of the United States, returning from the funeral of a congressman, and the President would have been slain but for the fact that a gentleman beside him struck down the assailant to the floor. The same spirit attempted to poison at the National Hotel, Washington, President Buchanan the day before his inauguration, two of my personal friends dying from the poison that day distributed through the hotel. The Hon. Mr. Houston, of Texas, in 1832, because of some derogatory words uttered, bludgeoned the Hon. Mr. Stansberry, of Ohio, and the President of the United States approved of it, saying in so many words: "After a few more such examples in Congress, the members will learn how to have decent tongues in their heads."

The two political parties of thirty years ago were slain by their corruption. The Whig party compounded with iniquity was hung by the neck until dead. The Democratic party as it was then organized, was slain. It went out of power, the ablest member of the new Democratic party saying this last week in an editorial in regard to the old Democratic party: "The Democratic party like every other organization long continued in power begot abuses that could not be cured save by the turning of the party out of office and power." Those two political parties of thirty years ago slain by their corruptions.

But why should I go away back when in American politics is the year between October, 1881, and October, 1882? I will give you some illustrations. I draw one illustration from the Yorktown carousal. On the 19th of October, 1781, the British forces under Cornwallis surrendered to Washington and the long agony of our Revolutionary fathers was ended. Last autumn was the centennial celebration. Sons of distinguished foreigners who had helped us in achieving American independence came across the water and were our guests. The programme for the service and celebration issued. The Congress of the United States made appropriation for that celebration. Multitudes of people went to the quaint village of Yorktown and preserved their patriotism and their respectability; but to a great many of our public men it was a drunken carousal.

I refer you back to the correspondence in the different papers about that time. Look whiskey bill, look at the wine bill, look at the bill of those times, and then consider the fact there were innocent men and women insulting those times and during that celebration—ing it sure that the October of 1781 was no glorious than the October of 1881 was infamous! Ah! they saluted the English flag, and they the French flag, and they saluted the American flag; but all the flags together cannot cover the shame of that debauch. The politicians up the celebration, the politicians conduct celebration, the politicians ended the celebration the politicians forever besmirched that October. I bring it as an illustration of the degradation of modern politics.

reaching from Washington to Cleveland, and Cleveland back to Washington. On that day at that time when this nation was sick with such as has seldom befallen any nation, there public men who guzzled and swilled and drank and caroused, and at the expense of the nation, and I helped pay for it if we have paid our The city of Cleveland, as beautiful and as nice city as we have in all the land, never had so much drunkenness and debauchery in it as the night before Garfield's burial while the mayors and common councilmen and the politicians from the cities were there waiting for the obsequies arraign it as an appalling indecency, as an insult to God and the American people. I arraign an illustration of the degradation of modern times.

THE LAST ALBANY LEGISLATURE.

Look over the record of the ayes and noes the dodgings on the Convict Labor Bill, on the General Street Railway Bill, on the Grain Importation Bill, on the Canal Bill, and get your eyes so wide open will never get them shut. As a specimen voted to destroy forever the grandest street on earth—Broadway, New York—by running a road through it. There never has been a greater sense of relief in this State than when it was announced that the legislature had gone home.

I draw another illustration from the Spuyten Duyvil disaster that Friday afternoon when the Hudson River rail car was crowded with politicians and by their drunkenness and their obscenity turned the car into a pandemonium and overpowered the conductor until he testified on solemn oath he could not manage the train, and then one politician jerking the rope to the air brake the train halted, and another train swept around the curve and the lives of some of our most valuable citizens and the bright and happy bridal tour in horror and massacre, the flames coming what the collision left. The politicians get management of the train, and I charge that care not what the coroner's jury may say, I charge them with the murder. They halted the train.

I bring as another illustration of the degradation of modern politics

misappropriation. Millions of dollars voted by Congress, and voted away in dead waste. Men wanting to be re-elected to Congress around this country trying to fix that up, but never be fixed up this side the day of judgment that will fix it down. I saw last summer two places for which large appropriations were by Congress in the way of improvement and development. One of these places was in Virginia. Thousands of dollars voted by Congress to develop what is there, or what was there during the war, a dry creek. There was not one drop of water in it, and in the winter time it very seldom has more than two or three feet of water, could see looking there where some time there been water. The creek started nowhere especially and ended nowhere especially. Thousands of dollars voted for the development of that place doing no more good to the public than an appropriation for the development of rivers or harbors on the top of your City Hall! of no more use than an appropriation to run a railroad from the Church steeple to the moon. Swindle. All

Nothing but swindle. Then I saw this sum—o another place for which a large appropriation had been made. It is on the coast of Massachusetts. A sea captain familiar with all the coast out to me where the improvements were to be, he told me that the only use of that large appropriation by Congress of the United States for development would be to pile up the ice in and impede navigation.

A LAUGH OF DERISION

One all around this country about that national outrage; but the people who pay taxes are so stupid they cannot see the joke. How easy it is to vote away other people's money.

Some of the leading men of both political parties were in that national insult, that God-defying outrage. Oh, how much more beautiful it would have been if the Congress of the United States had practically said, "the people of this country have since the war been taxed until they are lame. Now let them up. Let us through the surplus in the Treasury lower the taxes, give a surprise party to the people and lift up the poor, and let the toiling men and women of America have an easier chance to earn a livelihood for themselves and for their families." Ah! let the people sweat. Grind harder the backs of the poor. Draw the buckle of the harness tighter. Let Dives come to finer linen and the dogs take care of Lazarus' sores. I tell you, oppressors of the common people have had their look out. God will mash some of them yet. As in His Word, "He will wound the hairy man who goeth on still in his trespasses." While I have noticed that a few more Republicans than Democrats went for that River and Harbor Bill, I notice to balance it when they move made for the reduction of the peoples' taxes the Democratic votes were a little larger in number; so side by side the two parties go, shoulder to shoulder in infamy. People ask me whether I am a Republican or a Democrat. I tell you once and for all, neither, thank God neither! I give another illustration of the degradation of our politics from

THE STAR ROUTE THIEVERY.

It is a beautiful revelation! All the miscreants and enterprise confirmed politicians. Their greed roved beyond all doubt, and if they had been men they would have had a trial of four days and would have long been in the penitentiary; but they were a large amount of money to draw on, and had four months of trial and they are comparatively free. There is condemnation, great condemnation in this country for a man who steals an $100,000.

It was beautifully consistent that this Star Route crime should employ as its counsel the infidel of America. Without the Bible there is no system of morals and there is no good government. The prominent infidel of the country did not see anything wrong in his clients. Nor did he. There is no God. There is no Judgment Day. There are no commands of divine authority. Let every man do as he pleases. Such a theory as that would turn this land into a pandemonium. Oh, I am glad that modern infidelity tells us at last what it believes in. I lift this fact up before the eyes of America. I want it understood. I am glad now modern infidelity has gone out of the realm of the abstract into the realm of practical life and we know what it sanctions and what it

I came down into this present autumn for illustration of the degradation of modern politics. There were three factions in factions. The forged telegram to the State Committee has been excoriated from one end of the country to the other and so it ought to be; but it is one fraud that has not been ventilated and I propose to ventilate it; I propose to turn on all lights this morning. If you are going to take cancer, take it all out root and all. There was in that Saratoga Convention an hour of me excitement. It was found that Judge Folger would get the most votes. Then a member of the Oneida delegation in as bold a spirit of fraud as was ever practised this side of Pandemonium, arose and declared that the entire Oneida delegation would now go over from Wadsworth to Cornell, trying to get a stampede in that direction, and without the consent of the men of that delegation. The bold fraud would have been successful but for the fact that a member of that misrepresented Oneida delegation arose and said in stentorian voice: "I am from the Oneida delegation and I turn my vote over to Judge Folger." Then there was a great cry among the men of the convention: "Call the roll of that delegation. Let us see where they stand." The roll of the delegation was called and instead of finding as that man had represented, that defrauder had represented, that all the delegation had gone over from Wadsworth to Cornell, it was found that seven went for Cornell, and four for Wadsworth and two for Folger. The forged telegram was to help Folger. The Oneida fraud was to help Cornell. While you denounce the one you must anathematize the other.

Well, my friends, it seems that in that case righteousness was crucified on the centre cross, while on the right and the left were the two thieves—the forged telegram and the fraud, the latter six times worse than the first because the forged telegram misrepresented one man, while the Oneida fraud misrepresented six men. Now I see people in holy horror talking about one fraud or another fraud. Cornell men I see standing with holy horror, their hands outspread toward this forged telegram, while with their skirts they are trying to cover up the Oneida abomination. They cannot cover it up. I haul it out in the presence of the American people as another illustration of the degradation of modern politics.

BROOKLYN OUTRAGES.

But there are more illustrations than I have time to bring in our own beloved city. We wanted a new Raymond Street Jail. A large sum of money was voted for a new Raymond Street Jail. We got a new Raymond Street Jail—one of the meanest specimens of jail on earth. Money! Money! Who has the money? We have a bridge from New York to Brooklyn. It was to cost six or seven million dollars. Some people think it will cost fifteen or twenty millions before they get done. Money, money, who has got the money? That is the game we are all playing now!

Oh, my friends, it seems as if it is time to call a halt in the practices of American politics.

A GRAVE DIGGER WANTED.

To me there is a personal consolation in the fact that both political parties seem to me split beyond reparation. No one will doubt there is an important split in the Republican party. The split in the Democratic party seems bridged over; but if anybody thinks that Tammany is dead because Tammany is silent, they make a very great mistake! Oh, you will see lively times when there comes a distribution of offices. But I believe by the time 1884 comes there will be a better state of things in this country. No doubt the political parties of the day have had a mission and they have done a great many bright and beautiful things; but their work is ended. In the estimation of all who look at it from a Christian standpoint, they are dead, and I wish that some grave digger would stuff his nose with cologne and put them fifty feet under. Oh, we want in this land—and I shall live to see the day if God spares my life a few years longer—in this country that shall first of all recognize as its dominant principle the presence of the eternal God in the affairs of men and governments. The trouble is we have no God in American politics. We have a devil, a cohort of bad principles—the devil of office seeking, the devil of fraud, the devil of injustice, the devil of wastefulness, but no God. We have plenty of gin and plenty of old rye, and plenty of schnapps, and plenty of Congressional infamy, and plenty of congressional outrage, but no God. I am far from wanting to see a union of church and state in this country, but I would like to see a party that would recognize openly and above board and without disguise and without cant the God in whose name Columbus took possession of this country, and in whose name Washington achieved our independence, and in whose name so many blessings have come to us—the God of the last three great wheat crops; the God of these genial skies and these industrious rivers; the God who protected our armies in 1776 and 1812 and 1864; the God of our peaceful and beloved homes—blessed be His glorious name forever.

WE WANT A PARTY

"Oh," says some one, "that wouldn't be fair to put a

RECOGNITION OF GOD ON A PLATFORM

of a political party when there are so many people that do not believe in a God." Well, my friends, there are a great many people who do not believe in chastity, a great many people who do not believe in the sanctity of the marriage relation, a great many who do not believe in the rights of property, a great many people who do not believe in any style of government—people who would rob and steal and murder. Do you refuse to make laws against criminals because there are criminals? Will you refuse to recognize God in governmental affairs because there are men who do not believe in a God? All the good people believe in a God. Your political parties come on with a preamble and they say, whereas this, and whereas that, and it is simply a hash of old political hacks. There is overwhelming victory to that party which shall come up and have enough courage to say in

A PREAMBLE:

"Whereas, this nation has been blessed of God as no other nation has, blessed in its harvests, blessed in its health, blessed in its civilization, blessed in its protection against foreign enemies; therefore we in convention assembled acknowledge His goodness and pray for the continuance of His mercy, and in the name of God we now set up our banners." A party that has the strength to say that, establishing such a preamble, followed by commonsensical and righteous resolutions as to what you will do for the agricultural, the commercial, the manufacturing, the mining, the literary, the artistic, the moral interests of the country will sweep this whole land from sea to sea with an overmastering triumph.

There is another plank that must go into that platform and that is the economic plank. The running of this government costs too much money. Away with this machinery of diplomatic correspondence with other nations. Why is it necessary for us to have expensive establishments in foreign nations, to settle disputes international. No minister plenipotentiary ever settled a dispute. It always has to be referred home to the government after all. Beside that, while such machinery may have been necessary in the time when it took a letter three weeks to go to London and four or five weeks for the answer to come back, in our time when the Government of the United States can rise in the morning and in one hour talk with St. Petersburg, and talk with London, and talk with Italy, and talk with Madrid, and all the nations of Europe, there is no use of such lumbering and expensive machinery. Beside that, it seems to me that it ought not to cost $200,000 to hang one Presidential assassin.

There are people who seem to think that the United States Government is something merely to steal from. The shoveling out of the national treasury without discrimination and without right is enough to sicken the heart of every philanthropist. Now, let a man arise, north, south, east or west, with enough talent and with enough good character to lead forth in a movement in which the moral and the economic ideas shall be dominant over all others, and then you will see the Gehenna of modern politics fumigated and ploughed under. I wait for the formation of such a party. I wait for the coming of such a man.

WHERE IS THE MOSES?

Where is the Joshua? We are as a nation on the way to either reformation or destruction. A flight of doves discovered to Columbus the direction of the land. We shall come to new and regenerated America by a flight of prayers. We need in our homes, in our common schools and in our churches, the principles of pure patriotism inculcated. We want to live in a national atmosphere cleansed of all moral contamination and the dust of our graves untouched by the feet of the demagogue and the despoiler. God save the State. God save the nation.

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

ACUTE RHEUMATISM CURED.

Rev. J. S. Moyer of Pleasant Valley, Bucks County, Pa., sends the following narrative: Ida Bright, daughter of Engelhart Bright, in her twentieth year, living two miles east of Pleasant Valley, Bucks County, Pa., was sick for nearly three years. Her sickness began with rheumatism, and became afterward consumptive, and dropsical. Her back and legs became very weak. She was unable to walk except, at times, a little in the room with two crutches. She had to be carried up and down stairs. Her appetite was in general very poor. Physicians gave her up as incurable; some thought there might be some hope for her, if she would be taken into a hospital, and her lungs were not too much affected.

During her sickness the Lord blessed her with great spiritual blessings. I visited her many times and called on several occasions her attention to the healing by the prayer of faith according to James 4: 14, 15. Upon her request I wrote to Dr. C. Cullis of Boston, through whose prayers many obtained help already, and promised to unite with him in prayer for her. He appointed July 11th, 3 o'clock P.M. as the hour of prayer.

At the appointed time I read to her the promises of the Lord for hearing our prayers. Then I asked her some questions, which she answered freely, after which we prayed over her according to the word of James 5: 14, 15, and claimed the promises in the name of the Lord, according to His will. After the prayer was closed she lay for about ten minutes as in a calm repose; then she arose and walked through the room and back again. After a rest of half an hour she arose again and walked the same distance. She then laid down and slept for about fifteen minutes. We then prayed once more. I then went out to go home. She followed, and leaning on the arms of her sister, walked first out in the yard to and fro, and then to the barn, where I left her. From that time she has been able to walk alone without cane or crutches. She has a good appetite. The sickness seems to have left her. [On September 26th Mr. Moyer wrote us that Miss Bright was still well and gaining strength.—ED.]

Miss Carrie F. Judd publishes the following incident in her work "Triumphs of Faith":

A PAINFUL DISEASE.

Mrs. M. E. Stone, writing from Waverly, Pa., August 23d, 1882, says: In the winter of 1873 I began to be afflicted with a kidney trouble. I continued to grow worse until spring, when a physician was employed. He did what he could for me, but there was no change for the better.

In June another physician was employed. He told me he did not think I could ever be cured, but thought he could give medicine that would help me and make me more comfortable. My suffering was great. My muscles were so sore that I could not laugh, cough, draw a long breath, or bear a jar, and sometimes it was almost impossible for me to lie down. All this, together with the powerful medicines taken, brought me down to my bed in a very weak condition. To check the cold sweat, which for days stood on my countenance, my physician ordered me to take ten drops of elixir of vitriol every night and morning. I was providentially hindered from taking it more than once. But this so closed the pores of my skin that not until more than a year and a half was natural and healthy perspiration restored, and that through the interposition and blessing of God.

On the seventh of July a prayer meeting was appointed at my home. In the morning a dear Christian lady asked me if I was asking the Lord to heal me. I could not say I was. I knew Jesus as a personal Saviour from sin, but I did not know Him as the "Lord that healeth." Soon after a minister came in and asked the if I was looking to be healed by faith. He said he felt sure God was going to heal me. I was much impressed with this new thought, and began to feel in my soul that God was going to wonderfully bless me, and in my body I began to experience marked changes for the better. With assistance I walked to the room where a few of God's trusting children were assembled. Before prayer it was requested that all present should be agreed in asking God to heal me. The prayer of faith did save the sick. I arose and confessed that God had healed me. God gave me just what my faith claimed—a perfect removal of my kidney trouble with all the bloating and soreness, and so strengthened me that I commenced doing light work and walked and rode with ease.

But another trial and another triumph awaited me. The effects of the powerful medicines taken during my illness brought about another series of weaknesses which confined me to my bed in January, and for about six months I was almost helpless.

Weeks and months passed and no healing came, but I was learning patience, trust and submission. And then my loving parents had not quite yielded me to God to be used in missionary work. As they yielded my health improved. In August I attended a camp-meeting. I felt so anxious for the conversion of sinners that I scarcely thought of myself. But God showed me to pray and receive the healing of my body.

I prayed and others prayed for me, but the last regular service of the meeting closed and I was not healed. Tongue or pen could not describe the agony of soul I felt. But about ten o'clock that evening some friends proposed to go into one of the prayer-tents and unite in prayer for some souls who were seeking pardon. Though weak and weary I went, and God met me and talked to me. He asked me by His Spirit if I would take Him as my physician in every sickness. At first I felt startled at the thought, but realizing His power I said, "Yes, Lord." I had desired and prayed, and now I saw I might believe. With heart and voice I cried out, "Lord, I do believe with all my heart."

That moment the power of God came upon me, and I felt in my body that I was healed of all weakness and disease. I was much tested in regard to my healing for a week or two, but the victory I claimed by faith I was able to hold by faith; and God did make me well and even stronger than I had ever been before.

Since then God Himself has united me in the bonds of holy matrimony to one of His dear servants, and we have Jesus for our family Physician. We need no other. Very many times we have called upon Him in sickness and He has always heard us, and often has instantly relieved us from severe suffering.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A King's Future Associates.—The Rev. James Scott said at a recent meeting: "A king was once asked why he gave so much attention to those people called Christians, instead of giving all his time to his nobles and princes. His reply was, 'I am thrown but for a short time among those who are called my nobles and princes here, but in the future I shall be associated with those who are now despised, but who there will be kings for all eternity; and I desire to get acquainted with my future associates, in whose company I shall spend the longest portion of my existence.'"

A Backsliding Good Templar.—Rev. James Scott said: "I was speaking to a wrecked and ruined man last night, in the Cowcaddens meeting, of whose salvation I have great hopes. Tears were running down his cheeks as he told me that he had come to the meeting with a desire to obtain power to follow Christ. He had been a Good Templar for some time, and saved up a sum of money, but now it was all in the pockets of the grogseller, and he was convinced that his only chance for this world, or the world to come, was to become a Christian, and eagerly did he listen to the message of salvation as it was spoken. Let us pray that his desire may be granted. He is not far from the kingdom of God."

The Inventor of the Lifeboat.—Mr. W. R. Bradlaugh said: "When visiting South Shields, I walked through the churchyard of St. Cuthbert, where I saw the tombstone erected in memory of the man who invented the lifeboat, and read thereon the inscription: 'Sacred to the memory of William Wauldhab, parish clerk of St. Cuthbert's, and inventor of the lifeboat. Died, September 28th, 1821.' It is more than sixty years Wauldhab's lifeboat began to rescue people from wrecked vessels. But how many has to rescue because it could not reach them the world justly holds the inventor in great God saw that men whom He had made were completely sinwrecked, and provided boat by which every sinner may be saved they will step into it; and He calls plead them, 'Come unto Me'; yet how few do so few honor him! Step into the lifeboat a put out thy hand and grasp the extended Jesus, and He will rescue you now."

A Disputed Account.—The Rev. James related the following incident: "A lady insisted her son to pay certain accounts. Shortly afterward one of the tradesmen called and asked payment of his bill. The lady was astonished told the tradesman that her son had paid the man replied, 'There is no appearance books of such a sum having been paid.' 'I will see about it when my son comes home.' The day the lady called upon her would-be son and told him that her son was positive that he had paid his claim. 'Madam,' answered the man, 'I have such a high opinion of your son I will take his word for it, although my book does not show that the money has been received. The tradesman was doing honor to the lady's that he took his word in preference to his business books. If we put aside our own feelings and take God's Word and promises, and His offers of pardon, just as we are, then we are doing Him honor.'"

How a Teetotal Governor was Made. Robert Simpson said: "Some years ago a father of a family in Kansas, daily ill-treated his patient wife. His little son looked on while mother was being beaten and abused, and growing of hatred to the drink and the drink which caused such misery in his home, was planted in his soul. As time passed his abhorrence deepened into a fixed resolve to would attempt to suppress, in his native State, the iniquitous trade. Years rolled on that boy is now Governor St. John, of the State of Kansas, one of three States in the States of America which have passed prohibitions against the sale of intoxicating liquors where within its territories. Through the influence of that drunkard's son aided by a noble band of Christian ladies and gentlemen, it will be in his power to make or sell, in a legal way, any of harmful fluids throughout the State of Kansas."

Saved at Sixty.—Mr. Jack said: "A time ago I was speaking to a gentleman over years of age, who was very anxious about his health. When I showed him God's way of salvation, he asked, 'Do you mean to tell me that I have nothing to do?' 'Read the Bible for yourself, friend,' I said. 'I have not my spectacles with me,' he rejoined. I then read a few passages to him, and said, 'Do you believe I have these verses correctly?' 'Yes, I know you have followed you carefully.' 'Well; what do you say about it?' 'I will trust Christ at once for my firm reply. When we had prayed together I assured me, 'I can't tell how I came in this meeting. I did not know anything about that it was to be held. I was going along well Street, and saw a lot of people going in, just followed to see what it was; but I thought that I did it.' 'You will, like the Ethiopian eunuch, go on your way rejoicing now?' I said. 'Yes, that I will,' he gladly answered."

A Widow's Prayer Answered.—Mr. Jack said: "A God-fearing widow was in great distress, she had struggled along and brought up only one son, and now he was just beginning to do something to help her. One day before I received any wages the poor woman had no crust in the house, nor money with which to buy anything. She and her son had divided the morsel at the dinner hour. In her distress she cried to the Lord for help, and continued on her knees all the afternoon, but no help or answer came till her boy came in at night. So fully she said to him, 'James, I have nothing to give you; I have neither money nor bread.'"

Hardly had she said so, when a knock was heard at the door. Opening it, she saw a lad with a basket on his head, 'Is this Mrs. —'s.' 'Yes.' 'Weel this is for you.' 'What is it?' 'It's bread, tea, sugar, and butter.' 'It canna be for me, laddie, I never ordered sickna lot o' stuff in ma life.' 'Aye it is for ye, if ye're the woman they ca' Mrs. —.' 'That's ma name, laddie, but wha sent a' thae things.' 'Ah, a maunna tell ye that.' 'Now God heard that widow's prayer. Will He not hear yours if you trust Him? You cannot appeal to Him in vain.'

A Converted Wrestler's Temptation.—Mr. Jack said: "One of our elders in the country is now remarkable for his holy, consistent manner of life. Before his conversion he was renowned in the district as being the best wrestler and boxer in it. When he gave up his old companions, and cultivated the friendship of Christian people, he was jeered and mocked at when walking down the street, and every device was put into practice in order to make him go back to his old pursuits; but he was firm, as he was resting on God, and not on himself. Seeing that nothing could be made of him in this way, his former boon companions determined to make a final assault upon him. One of their number was selected to put their plan into force. This man was not a match for my friend, but he was primed for the business. Way-laying the old wrestler, this man deliberately insulted him, and, getting no answer, struck him in the face with his fist. In a moment all the old fire of raging anger filled the heart of my friend, and, as he told me, his first inclination was to take his tempter by the collar, and give him a severe punishment; but the Spirit of Christ prevailed, and although his feelings were crying for revenge, he rushed to his house and bolled himself in his room to plead with the Lord for power over himself. For twenty-four hours did he wrestle against the tempter, and by the grace of God he was the victor over a more powerful antagonist than any he had wrestled with before."

ENGLAND IN PROPHECY.

ISA 23: 15-18: "And it shall come to pass in that day that Tyre shall be forgotten seventy years, according to the days of one king; after the end of seventy years shall Tyre sing, as a harlot. Take a harp, go about the city, thou harlot, that hast been forgotten: make sweet melody. Sing many songs, that thou mayest be remembered. And it shall come to pass after the end of seventy years, that the Lord will visit Tyre, and she will turn to her hire, and commit fornication with all the kingdoms of the world upon the face of the earth. And her merchandise and her hire shall be holiness to the Lord: it shall not be treasured nor laid up; for her merchandise shall be for them that dwell before the Lord to eat abundantly, and for durable clothing."

"One king." The explanations here are various and conflicting, and the word "king" is supposed to be put here for "kingdom," as at Dan. 7: 17; 8: 20. The "one king," is supposed to be the first of the four kings of Dan. 7 or the Chaldean Sovereignty. Compare Dan 2: 38, 39-44; 7: 23, 24; 8: 20, 21; Isa. 14: 4; Jer. 25: 11, 12. The seventy years of this king reach from the first of Nebuchadnezzar to the first of Cyrus. These seventy years limit the duration of the Babylonish Monarchy. The political oblivion of Tyre was to be of the same length. Its land was first conquered, and later the whole city was overthrown after a long siege (Ezek. 29: 17-19), but in the first year of Cyrus it re-appears as ministering help once more to Israel."

Verse 16: These words are not the quotation of a song, but the prophet's own address to Tyre, using his own figure to predict the restoration of her commerce after a season of judgment, but with no return of her former greatness. The last verses point forward to a time when heathen rites would be replaced by a purer and holier faith."

The fulfilment of the prophecy was complete. Tyre, after its destruction by Nebuchadnezzar, did recover its ancient trade, wealth, and grandeur, as it did also after a second destruction by Alexander. It became Christian early, with the rest of the neighboring countries; St. Paul found many Christians there. (Acts 21: 3, 4). It suffered much in the Diocletian persecution. It continued Christian till it was taken by the Saracens in 639. After being retaken by the Christians in 1124, it was finally taken by the Turks in 1517. Since that time it has sunk into utter decay; it is now a mere ruin, a bare rock, "a place to spread nets upon," as foretold by the prophet (Ezekiel 26: 14). It matters not by what means these prophecies have been verified; for the means were as inscrutable and as impossible to have been foreseen by man as the event. The fact is beyond a doubt that they have been literally fulfilled, and therefore the prophecies are true. They may be overlooked, but no ingenuity can pervert them. No facts could have been more unlikely or striking, and no predictions respecting them could have been more clear.

The views of two commentators will appropriately close this review of England's future history, as they believe it is revealed in prophecy; and, although the first has more especial reference to her position as one of the future ten kingdoms of the Fourth Beast of Daniel 7 and Rev. 17 the truth and the power of the language cannot be gainsaid.

"Another difference in the dealing of the Divine Hand which has tended to preserve a marked distinction between the Eastern and Western divisions of the Roman Empire, is this: the East was the early home of civilization, and the place where the light of truth peculiarly shone; but these privileges were abused and iniquity abounded. On this judicial visitation came. Desolation has fallen upon almost every ancient city of the East; from Babylon to Jerusalem, and from Jerusalem round about unto Illyricum."

The ruin of these countries has been so complete that many have applied to the apostasy of Mahomedanism, and the subsequent desolations the prophecies respecting Antichrist and the judgments of the final hour. Doubtless these things are to be regarded as premonitory. . . . Although the kingdoms of the West have never received any blow resembling in severity that which has prostrated the countries of the East; yet, with only one exception, they have all been heavily chastened.

ENGLAND ALONE ESCAPED

the wide-spread infidelity of which the French Revolution of 1792 and the succeeding desolating wars were the consequences. England escaped, and has for ages pursued a steady course of uninterrupted prosperity; * but it is an affecting thought that England, so highly favored as she has been, is using her advantages in nurturing the very principles out of which the last systematized form of human evil is to be formed.

At present this nation is holding a position of effective influence. Its principles are fixed and determined, and it is earnest in propagating them. The governmental principles that it seeks to spread are those of popular monarchy. The pillar of its political and social system is commerce and commercial wealth. Its relation to the false religions of the earth is, that it fosters as well as protects all. It seeks to accommodate itself to influential institutions rather than to supplant them by truth. These principles are doubtless well-adapted to the character of the latter days; and are most sure to prosper. . . . Such influence appears to be neutral in its character, but it is not really so. It can neither be retained nor used except by sanctioning, and not unfrequently employing the very systems which have sunk the world in superstition and idolatry. What, then, is more to be dreaded than a system seemingly neutral, which really sustains and gives effect to all Satan's ancient instruments of deception?

THE CITY OF LONDON.

The final result of this influence, and what will be constructed under it, may be seen in Rev. 17 and 18. No city at present in the earth corresponds so nearly as London to the description of Rev. 18. No scene which the earth has ever yet beheld answers so nearly to Ezek. 27 and 28 as that which is about to be presented in that city. The object of the central part of Ezekiel appears to be this, to show what kind of power Israel finally seeks unto for shelter, now that their iniquities have grieved away the cherubim-power of God, under the shadow of which they once rested.

The power which they select as their guardian is that energy which searches out and develops all the resources of earth—a power by and by to be again connected with Tyre, which was its ancient seat.

Thus Tyre, as the representative of this energy, is described as occupying God's mountain—i.e., the Divine place of authority toward Israel; and being as Israel's oracle and cherub—the true cherubic power having been grieved away. There is bitter irony in the expression, "Thou art the anointed cherub that covereth, and I have set thee so" (Ezek. 28: 14). God has appointed that this glorious but evil power should be as the cherub of Israel for a season. The several principles connected with this great commercial system are now fully developed; but the ephah is seen long before the woman, or moral system, hidden therein, is manifest. The energy which visits every region, and collects and develops all the riches of the earth, must be guided by some definite principles; and if they are not the principles of Christ, they are the principles of Satan. St. Paul speaks of the "mystery of wickedness" there working (2 Thess. 2: 7) and of its final development; but says nothing of its intermediate history. In Zech. 5 we find that "at the time of the end" wickedness "becomes connected with the woman hidden in the ephah."

That the system of mercantile greatness finally to be established in the East, and of which England is at present the acknowledged head, will be infidel when fully developed, is plain from Scripture and from facts. The Land of Shinar will be the place—the Ten Kingdoms the sphere—and Antichrist, as the king of Tyre, "the functionary and head of the developed apostasy."—(B. W. Newton, "Prospects of the Ten Kingdoms of the Roman Empire, 1849;" pp 62-65, 180).

Scott says: "As those cities which have successfully tyrannized over the nations of the earth, have successively been made monuments of the Divine vengeance; so here those likewise which have been the marts of nations. It behoves the inhabitants of the great commercial capital of Britain to be still for a short space, and to contemplate the fate of Tyre. Like that ancient city of commerce, that city and nation are replenished by the trade of the whole earth; claim the sovereignty of the ocean, and receive resources from distant seas and rivers, not less abundant than the harvest of their fertile plains: and London is at least as 'joyous a city' as ever Tyre was; though it does not boast of so great an antiquity. But Tyre is now 'laid waste,' and 'there is no house, no entering in'; silence and solitude have erected their empire where this busy merchant city stood; and her inhabitants are all either extinct or removed to other lands! Yet when this prediction was delivered probably its wealthy inhabitants could not have believed it possible that such a change should ensue.

"This report may well cause London's wealthy citizens to be sorely pained and alarmed; Tyre's merchants were, and hers are, 'princes and the honorable of the earth.' But they gloried and trusted in, and abused their prosperity: and the Lord took His counsel against them on purpose 'to stain the pride of all glory, and to bring into contempt all the honorable of the earth,' that they who had forgotten Him should feel His superiority and sovereignty, that the vanity of all earthly prosperity might be manifested, and to show how soon infamy must overwhelm all those who do not seek the honor which cometh from God. He is able to raise up enemies against England also from the most obscure nations, and to bring them from the remotest corners of the earth: and at His commandment some savage conqueror may arise to execute His righteous purposes; nor can any distant country give rest to those of whom God hath said, 'there is no rest for them.'"

CURRENT EVENTS.

Judge Folger's Letter Accepting the Nomination of the New York State Convention for the Governorship was published on October 3d. It is one of the most remarkable documents of its kind on record. The candidate seemed anxious above all things to apologize for his position and to convince the people that he had no hand in bringing about his nomination. In that statement the people generally have full confidence. The difficulty Republicans are in, is not of Judge Folger's making. It is the fact that unworthy methods were adopted in the convention to secure his nomination, which arouses hostility, and which has caused such vigorous Republicans as Mr. Henry Ward Beecher, Mr. George William Curtis, and Dr. Cuyler to refuse to vote for the ticket. The interference of the administration in State politics, and the forgeries committed to control the convention, are the circumstances which have led certain prominent Republicans to decide that they will not support a candidate so nominated, and so to rebuke the methods employed. The fact that Judge Folger is personally a man for whom they would conscientiously work and vote makes no difference, because they regard the selection of so good a man as a mere ruse, used to cover with his unimpeachable character designs that need some respectable cloak. Judge Folger's comments on the platform, which emphasize its good points and shed light on others which were ambiguous, show that his intentions are upright, and that if elected he would be a capable governor, and on this ground doubtless many conscientious men will vote for him. It is evident, however, that in spite of the nomination being made unanimous in the convention, the nomination will not command the hearty support of the Republican party of New York.

A Serious Blow to the Prospects of the Republican ticket is the letter published on the same day from Mr. Hepburn declining the nomination for Congressman-at-large. Mr. Hepburn is personally popular, so that the withdrawal of his name weakens the ticket. Mr. Hepburn expresses his full appreciation of the honor conferred upon him, but bases his decision of declination on the lack of confidence the party in the State have in the convention. He says: "It is quite apparent that, owing to the unfortunate circumstances that have come to light since the adjournment of the convention, a very large portion of the Republicans of the State are not disposed to accept its conclusions as an authoritative utterance of the party. Nothing should be left undone to secure the unity and harmony of the party, and I don't think it right to enter upon the canvass without an earnest effort in that direction." The State committee will have to select a substitute for Mr. Hepburn.

The Unusual Announcement is Made that the revenue of the post office during the fiscal year which ended June 30th, 1882, exceeded the expenditure. The surplus is $1,500,000. The saving has been effected chiefly in the Star Route Department for which the amount appropriated was $7,900,000. Brady estimated that he must have $8,200,000, but Congress gave him $7,900,000. It now appears that under honest management the expenditure was about $5,900,000, or $2,300,000 less than Brady's estimate. This is the first year since 1845 that so large a surplus has been shown. In fact since 1851 deficiencies have been the rule in the department. In 1860 the deficiency was $10,500,000; in 1863 $2,800,000; and in 1867 nearly $4,000,000.

Polygamists in Utah are Refusing to Relinquish office as required by the law. Governor Morgan in the execution of the duty imposed upon him has appointed a number of officials throughout Utah. In defiance of this law and the Edmunds bill, which disqualifies polygamists, the appointees of the Governor have been refused the records and places to which they have been appointed. This organized nullification is in obedience to the orders of the Mormon leaders. Those who think it criminal to hold over "are whipped in by counsel and threats, and the polygamists are holding on." Writs of mandamus were applied for on September 27th, to enforce the title of the officials appointed. The action of Governor Murray in firmly executing the law in the face of the Mormon leaders is approved by all law-abiding people in Utah.

The Trustees of the Slater Educational Fund which has been already described in these columns, have requested the general agent to draw up a plan of operations based on suggestions made at a meeting of the trustees over which ex-President Hayes presided. Among the suggestions were, that the scholarships shall be of such an amount as will help the deserving, but will not be adequate to their entire support, so that the spirit of self-dependence under encouraging circumstances may be constantly cherished; that so far as is practicable the scholars receiving the benefit of the fund shall be trained in some manual occupation simultaneously with their mental and moral instruction; that the recipients of the Slater Fund aid shall be encouraged, when they are able, to return, in whole or in part, to the institution through which they are assisted the amount received from the fund, in order that it may again be devoted to the encouragement of others.

The Verdict of the Coroner's Jury in the case of the slaughter in the tunnel of the New York and Harlem Railroad was rendered on October 6th. The jury say that the telegraph operator and the brakeman were guilty of culpable negligence, the conductor of gross and criminal negligence, and they blame both railroad companies for neglecting to provide a sufficient number of employes, and charge the companies with the responsibility for the deaths that occurred. It is evident, however, that no notice will be taken of this verdict by the companies, who though enormously wealthy will continue to increase their wealth at the daily risk of the lives of their passengers, by employing at low wages men unfit for the work. There will not be any hope of this wicked policy being checked until a law is enacted compelling them to do their duty, and there will not be any hope of such a law being passed while senators and assemblymen hold free passes over the road.

The Evangelistic Efforts of Dr. Edward Judson, who left a prosperous church, to labor among the poor of New York city, are being signally blessed. Some idea of the Christlike character of his work may be gathered from the following extract from a letter he sent lately to Mr. Deane, who recently gave him five thousand dollars to assist in carrying it on: "In order to win people to Christ in this part of the city, we have found it necessary to engage in philanthropic co-operations. We have an employment bureau, by means of which over fifty persons have been put in positions of usefulness. A public ice-water fountain at the corner of our church has through all the hot weather been daily quenching the thirst of hundreds of men, women, and children who not only drink themselves, but carry away the water in pails and pitchers for use in shops and tenement houses. We have also a flower mission. The ladies of the Orange Church provide us with a large quantity of tasteful bouquets twice a week, and our women and girls carry them to the bedsides of the sick. I have taken over seventy of our Sunday-school children and placed them for two weeks in delightful homes in and around Hamilton. We have thus found the summer season peculiarly rich in opportunities of touching people on the physical side, and I believe that such work is mellowing the soil so that we may look for abundant harvests in the autumn."

At the Meeting of the American Board of Foreign Missions at Portland, Me., on October 5th, Secretary Alden said that a great burden was upon the Prudential Committee. The missions demanded for the coming year $100,000 more than the committee saw any prospect of receiving. Immediately persons whose regular contributions were $1000 or more, arose, one after another, sometimes two at a time, and pledged themselves to double their annual subscriptions. In ten minutes nearly $20,000 were thus pledged, and then, under the lead of Dr. Webb, those in the audience who felt disposed to double their gifts were invited to rise. Probably one half of the required advance was pledged in the closing fifteen minutes of the prayer-meeting.

A Christian Poet's Golden Wedding will shortly be celebrated. Dr. Ray Palmer, the author of "My faith looks up to Thee" and other prized hymns, has been married nearly fifty years and it is the same length of time since his ordination as a minister. His friends among whom are Theodore Dwight Woolsey, John G. Whittier, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Howard Crosby, James McCosh, and Edward A. Park have united in recommending that the occasion be taken advantage of for a substantial tribute that shall gladden the hearts of himself, wife, and two invalid daughters. Dr. Palmer is now residing at Newark, N. J.

The Prospects in Ohio are Still Regarded as doubtful even by enthusiastic Republicans. It is now certain that the liquor men will vote the Democratic ticket unanimously. It is also certain that the Prohibitionists will not give general support to the Republican ticket, though it is expected that in some districts they will vote it. The efforts of the Republican managers are now directed to the effort to bring out every Republican vote.

The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children makes an appeal to the charitable for children's partly worn clothing. Many of the poor children rescued by the officers of the society are nearly naked when found, and it has been difficult to transfer them to the society's reception rooms for protection. Parcels may be sent to the rooms of the society, at No. 100 East Twenty-third Street, New York, or they will be called for.

The Lost Drafts Forwarded to Rev. W. C. Van Meter, of the Howard Mission in New York, and Superintendent of the Italian Bible and Sunday-school Mission, which have caused him considerable annoyance and led to unfounded charges, have been traced. Mr. Van Meter stated at a public meeting recently that on his way to Rome he was robbed of a draft of several hundred dollars, money contributed to carry on his mission, and that with it he lost the memorandum of the bank in London on which the draft was drawn, thus making it impossible for him to communicate with the bank till he heard from America. Upon his arrival in Rome he found that another draft of $1000 was missing, which had been sent him for his mission work, and soon after he discovered that the third draft sent him from Canada was also missing. The letter containing the draft of $1000 was found among the dead letters at Rome, and has been paid. The draft from Canada was traced to the Dead Letter Office at Ottawa, Canada.

A Robin's Plaintive Reproaches have Rendered a dog miserable at one of the summer resorts during the season. A guest at an hotel had with him a favorite dog which killed the young of a robin having her nest in the park. Every time the dog makes his appearance since he committed the cruel act, he is followed about by the bereaved bird, who flies along above his head or alights in a tree near him when he stops, all the time exciting the sympathies of the guests by her plaintive cries. The dog himself appears to be aware that his misdeed is being publicly denounced, and puts on an appearance of shame. It would be well if some profligates who have led to ruin and spiritual death innocent victims could be thus humiliated, instead of being welcomed by society (Prov. 6 : 18).

A Suggestive Inquiry is Published in a New York journal from one of its correspondents who asks the editor if he knows whether there is any instrument that will point in the direction of mineral ore or hidden money. He will probably be disappointed by the reply the editor has given him, which is to leave off trying to find hidden money, and to set himself to work for money by digging potatoes rather than digging for concealed treasures. Advice still more valuable might be given to such a man. Whether he find money, or earn it by hard work, it will not avail alone to secure him happiness. Disappointment will surely wait upon him as it has done on thousands who have made the acquisition of wealth their chief end in life. The only source of happiness and contentment, is one far different from that, and Jesus gives it to those who believe on Him whether they are poor or rich (Eccles. 5 : 10).

A Dancing Party on a Railroad Car held a ball during a journey a few days ago on the Chicago, Milwaukee and St. Paul railroad while the train was travelling at the rate of forty miles an hour. The ball-room was in a large baggage car, sixty feet long by fifteen wide. The floor was elegantly carpeted, the walls beautifully painted, hung with pictures, and decorated with bunting, evergreens, and garlands of roses. There was an orchestra of eight pieces, and refreshments were passed around every hour. This is probably the first time a ball was ever held under such circumstances, but it has often seemed to the earnest Christian, impressed with the value of time and the fleeting nature of all earthly things, that light-hearted dancers are, like those in the railroad car, being whirled along very rapidly toward their destination. And there is ground for apprehension that the destination is one of which they little think, and in which they will mourn over time wasted on frivolous amusements (Isa. 5 : 12).

An Unaccountably Withered Grass-plot in a gentleman's garden at Pittsford, N. Y., has for some time puzzled the gardener, who vainly endeavored to discover the cause of its condition. A few days ago a number of birds were observed thrusting their beaks through the sod with much alacrity and satisfaction. The gardener had the curiosity to turn up a portion of the punctured turf, and discovered to his amazement that the earth beneath was alive with a greedy multitude of large, white grubs, which had completely consumed the roots of the grass. He continued the work, and at every fresh removal of the sod, the same phenomenon presented itself, until quarts of the larvæ were gathered and destroyed. The grub is to be examined by the entomologists of Pittsford, and it is hoped identified. It is to be feared that the lack of vigorous life in some portions of Christ's vineyard, the church may have a similar cause. The root of the piety of the members is being destroyed by Satan's worms of avarice, ambition, and love of worldly pleasures (Rev. 3 : 15-18).

An Incident of Tenement House Life Described by a reporter of the New York Times shows how in a great city happiness and misery elbow each other unwittingly. In one of the tenement houses on Sixth Avenue, several families live upon the second floor. In the front room was a woman who the same morning had given birth to the infant which lay upon her breast. In the rear dwelt a family which had been bereaved by death, and a stricken mother mourned the loss of her only son. While at either end of the same floor the two extremes of life were represented, a merry party was in progress in the intervening apartments. The strains of the violin regulated the movements of amateur step dancers and happy vocalists added at times to the general entertainment. As the fun grew faster it was interrupted by a knock at the door. The host answered the summons, and beheld the undertaker straining at one end of the coffin containing the remains of the dead man. The professional inquirer requested that the door might be opened in order to enable them to turn the casket in the narrow passage. The request, of course, was complied with, and the funeral procession passed slowly down the staircase and from the house. The exclusiveness and want of neighborly feeling which is a growing feature of our city life is to be deplored. Christian families living in the same house, yet ignorant of each other's sorrows and afflictions are not living in obedience to their Saviour's injunctions; yet there are many such in all our great cities. The sufferer has the solace of knowing that God sees his affliction and that he has an Almighty consoler, but those who should have shown him sympathy and who have neglected their duty cannot escape condemnation (Matt. 25 : 44, 45).

An Electrified Church Fence Alarmed the janitor of a church at Newark, N. J., last week. He arrived at the church about seven o'clock to open it for evening service, when on taking hold of the gate he received a severe electric shock. Two subsequent attempts to enter met with a like result. He gave an alarm and some passers-by came to his assistance. They found that the whole iron fence was strongly magnetized. A large crowd gathered about the church, and a number of experimenters discovered that two adjoining buildings having iron columns were so charged with electricity that the hand could not touch them without receiving the current. It was said by employes at the office of the Western Company that an escape occurred through the contact of a wire with the iron girder on an adjacent building, and that electricity was thence carried to the store and to the church fence. It was not until the current was switched off, that the gate could be completely opened. The strange freak of the electricity caused no little wonder in the city, and it was undoubtedly an unusual occurrence. If the history of the church were related, however, it would be found that the shocks received from the fence on that particular night, were far less wonderful than spiritual revolutions which have been effected inside the church. The mysterious influence of the Holy Spirit changing heart, character, and life, is a miracle far more astonishing than any natural phenomena (John 3 : 8).

A Californian Stage-Driver's Courage and heroism in the midst of extreme personal danger, is described by a correspondent of the New York Tribune. A stage was being driven one night over a precipitous mountain road, with a rocky wall on one side, and a precipice on the other. The only outside passenger was awakened from a doze by a sharp jerk, and was alarmed by finding that the seat beside him, where the driver had been sitting, was empty. He knew perfectly well that the stage unguided would soon be upset, so he reached down to gather up the reins but he could not feel them. The driver must have taken them with him when he fell. The team was going at a fast trot and the passenger knew not what to do. Death stared him in the face, and he was giving himself up for lost when he heard the driver's voice from behind directing him how to put on the brake and stop the coach. He obeyed, and as the team halted the driver crawled from under the coach, having held on to the reins when he fell and been dragged by them along the rough road, preferring injury and danger rather than to risk the lives of his passengers by letting go. The passengers stood aghast as they realized the danger from which the driver's heroism had delivered them, and their gratitude to him as he stood covered with dirt, and bruised, knew no bounds. It is by such incidents that the sinner is able to realize how he has been delivered from eternal destruction by the self-sacrifice of Jesus who actually gave His life that we might be saved (Isa. 53 : 3-8).

ONE WAR OVER AND ANOTHER BEGUN.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And when Gideon perceived that he was an angel of the Lord, Gideon said, Alas, O Lord God! for because I have seen an angel of the Lord face to face. And the Lord said unto him, Peace be unto thee; fear not: thou shalt not die. Then Gideon built an altar there unto the Lord, and called it Jehovah-shalom."—Judges 6 : 22-24.

THESE Midianites were wandering Bedouins from Arabia, and from the east country round about the Holy Land. Like those who represent them in the present day, they were masters of the art of plundering, and knew no bowels of compassion. They generally lived a hard life themselves, and when they had an opportunity to feast on the spoils of others, they rioted without stint, and left a famine behind them. Most fitly does the Scripture compare them to grasshoppers, for both in number and in destructive force they were like those terrible devourers. God had brought them upon Israel to scourge that nation because it had been so foolish and so ungrateful as to set up the gods of the heathen, and to forget the one mighty God who was so specially and graciously their patron and defender.

They were impoverished and ground down to the very last degree by these plunderers, who left no food either for men or cattle. The poor Israelites, creeping forth from their dens and caves, attempted to carry on the work of husbandry, and sowed the land; but when the time came for reaping, the marauders came forth once more, took away their harvest, and despoiled their pastures again. Then, as usual, Israel cried unto Jehovah, and His ear was open to their groaning. Their afflictions made them weary of their idols, and caused them to say, "We will return unto our first husband, for it was better with us then than now." God in His great mercy raised up for them a deliverer, Gideon, of valor, who distinguished himself in various skirmishes with the foe! His name was already a terror to Midian, for he who dreamed of the barley-cake which smote the tent, and it lay along, said to his fellow, "This is none other than Gideon, the son of Joash."

His character has never been sufficiently admired; Scripture names much less bright than his have been preferred before him by the general ministry; yet he deserves far better treatment. He was a man gentle and yet strong, cautious and yet venturesome; a searching inquirer, and an intense believer. While he was a sort of foreshadowing of David, he had much of the after-glow of Joshua. He was a truly great man, though his latter days were overshadowed by a grievous religious error, and a sad moral fault. Despite his failings he was one of the greatest of the heroes of faith.

This man went to his work with the Bedouin in much the same manner as that which has proved so successful in Egypt during the past week. He was not in a hurry to venture upon a pitched battle, but waited his time, and then by a sudden and unexpected attack he struck the whole host with panic, so that they fled at once, and Midian was smitten as one man. It is very singular how history repeats itself, and how all events go to exhibit the singular truthfulness of the Bible record. These wild Arabs can clearly be overcome by a single blow if it takes them when they feel secure. Formidable as they are as plunderers, and great as they are at boasting, they are not able to stand against a hand to hand onslaught; true valor drives them before it like a rolling thing before the whirlwind, scattering them like chaff before the tempest.

Let us think for a while of Gideon, in order that we may see that we ourselves are or may be somewhat parallels with him. We may not have to smite the Bedouin as he had, but unto

A SPIRITUAL WARFARE

God has called many of us; and though He intends to use us, and to get unto Himself victory by us, yet it may be that at this moment we are in fear. We are now passing through the same mental processes as those which educated Gideon, and we are being prepared thereby for future conflict and conquest.

I. I shall begin by asking you to dwell for a minute upon for he loved not war, but pined for quiet. He called the name of the altar—"Jehovah-shalom," which the margin reads, "The Lord send peace." You see, therefore, that deeper down in his spirit than any desire for warlike honor there was a yearning after peace. He wanted not the spoils of princes; he only desired to plough, and sow, and reap in peace.

And do you wonder at it, when the ills of war were all around? He had for a long time seen in the cases of his friends and neighbors the desolating effects of war: their property was taken from them, their bread was stolen out of their mouths, their children were slain, and themselves made to hide away upon the tops of mountains or in caverns among the hills. Life became intolerable amid such privations and dangers. Ah, little can you and I imagine of the horrors of war. We read of it, and our sympathies are touched, but we know not the multiplied murders, the painful wounds, the desolating rapine, and the fierce crimes which attend the track of armies. If we saw battle with our own eyes, we should with burning fervor cry, "Send us peace in our days, good Lord."

Moreover, he had not only seen war, but he sighed for peace, because he was himself feeling the mischief of it. The dread of the conflict had come to his own mountain farm at Abiezer. There he was himself, threshing wheat by the wine press, in an unusual place, in an inconvenient place, that he might hide a little grain, for winter's food, from the Midianites who were eager to devour it. Ay, and when carnage smokes at your own door, and rapine is at your own gate, when you yourself are straitened and are hiding for fear, then comes from the deep recesses of the spirit the cry, "Oh, that God would send us peace, for this is a weary oppression; these ravens and wolves devour us utterly." Let us bow our heads and thank God that He has long blessed this favored isle with unbroken peace; and as an act of thankfulness to God let us set our faces against the war-spirit which so readily inflames our fellow-countrymen.

The way of peace was sufficiently well known to Gideon: the prophet of the Lord had indicated to the people that the only way of peace was for Israel to return unto Jehovah, her God. The great sin of departure from the glorious living God was set before them, and they could readily draw the inference that they would never have peace from their enemies till first of all they had made their peace with God. They must surrender to their sovereign, and renew their loyalty, and then He would drive out the foe from their land. Gideon probably knew this before the prophet came; it was deeply imprinted on his thoughtful spirit, and as he was a man of faith in God, he did not doubt but that if Israel returned unto Jehovah then peace would follow. Much is gained when we know this, if our knowledge leads to practical action.

While Gideon was meditating and working, an angel appears to him and gives him the assurance that with him at least God was at peace. The covenant angel said to him, "Jehovah is with thee, thou mighty man of valor." Methinks his spirit ought greatly to have rejoiced at that assurance, and perhaps it did; for what better thing can happen unto any man than to receive such a token for good? If God be for us, who can be against us? We know how sweet is the assurance that being justified by faith we have peace with God.

It is well with us when we are assured that the Lord is with us, our helper, our shield, our portion for ever and ever.

But there arose in his mind

A GRAVE ANXIETY.

His was a very careful, thoughtful soul, for he was a man of prudence, large-hearted, far-seeing, and given to look at things coolly and steadily; and there arose in his heart a question serious and vital, "Is this the voice of God to me, or am I deluded? Is God at peace with me, or am I like the rest, plunged in a horrible warfare against the living God?" Therefore he puts a question, and he asks a sign that he might make sure of what he was about. Brethren, in spiritual matters you and I had need be sure. If we have peace within our spirit let us make certain that it is the peace of God; for still are there voices that cry, "Peace, peace," where there is no peace. None are more quiet than the ungodly when they are given up to a strong delusion. The Psalmist says of them, "There are no bands in their death: but their strength is firm." It was not so with Gideon: his anxiety made itself visible. He was not the man to leap at a shadow: he sought for substance. If he was to have peace, he must have it from God: if he was to be delivered, he longed to have victory plain and permanent. The favor which he asked was requested because anxiety troubled him, and he wished to make assurance doubly sure. He desired to know from God Himself that his mission was authentic and his success certain.

I believe that many of us have been, and perhaps are, in Gideon's position. Of course we have not his errand, but we have one of our own, and we are troubled because we are not personally sure of our peace. We are grieved by our past sins and their consequences. This is the lot of many men. The fowls which they have reared have come home to roost: they have been guilty in the past, and their sins have returned upon them, so that they are sore vexed. They have cried unto the Lord in their trouble, beseeching Him to deliver them out of their distresses, and now a consciousness of sin is upon them, and they fear lest their prayers should be rejected. Have you ever been in that condition? I know you have if the Lord has loved you and ordained you to his work.

Has God at such a time sent you a message of mercy? Have you searched the Scriptures and found a precious promise? Have you heard a faithful servant of God preach under his Master's anointing, and have you been comforted? Even then I should not wonder if the darkening thought has arisen like a cloud, "Is this the right comfort for me? May I really enjoy it? Will it be presumption or assurance?" There is often a fine line, thin as a razor's edge, between the two, and woe unto him who makes a mistake about it. O God, save us from carnal security. Prevent our crying "Peace, peace, where there is no peace." Better that we write bitter things against ourselves, if they be true, than that we say smooth things and flatter ourselves to destruction. Therefore, I should not wonder if you are asking the Lord to give you a token for good. Brethren, we must make sure work for eternity: we cannot afford to have a question on that matter. A note of interrogation here will be a note of alarm. It will be a thorn in our side.

II. From Gideon's longing, panting desire to obtain peace with God and then peace for his country we turn to look a little further into which he met with in the way of peace. "An angel" appeared to him—so saith the text in the Authorized Version; but in truth it was the angel of Jehovah, and this should have comforted him, even as it has comforted us. Do we not sing,

"But if Immanuel's face appear,

My hope, my joy begins;

His name forbids my slavish fear,

His grace removes my sins?"

One would have thought that Gideon would have leaped for joy when he beheld his God veiled in angelic form, but instead thereof the shadow of death fell upon Him. Here was a man panting for peace, and firmly following the way of peace, and yet afraid with a deadly fear. It usually happens that when God is bringing men into peace with Himself, while the operation is going on thoroughly and soundly, there is a degree of trembling in the soul. I suspect that conversion which has no trembling in it: note the prodigal's cry, "I am not worthy to be called thy son."

Why was Gideon afraid? Not because he was a coward—you will scarcely meet with a braver man in all Scripture than this son of Joash—but because even brave men are alarmed at the supernatural. When the living God draws very near to a soul, even though it be in the person of Christ Jesus, that soul is struck with awe, and trembles before the Lord. It cannot well be otherwise. Recollect how it was with the beloved John. "When I saw Him," says John—that was, his own dear Master, upon whose breast he had leaned his head—"when I," the disciple whom Jesus loved, "saw him, I fell at His feet as dead." You do not wonder, therefore, if a poor soul full of doubt and anxiety, vexed with a sense of sin, and greatly troubled by affliction, is full of fear when Jesus draws near. Though He comes with no feeling but of love, no thought but of mercy, no sentence but of free forgiveness, yet the heart is awe-struck at the wondrous sight.

Alas, some of you know not what it is to have the Lord drawing near to your spirits. If you did you would not think it strange that certain awakened ones have acted in a singular way, and for a while have forgotten to eat bread. I marvel not that this mighty man of valor was grievously disturbed. Who among us would have been otherwise?

Moreover, Gideon had been ill-taught by tradition. There was a rumor abroad which was derived from truth, and yet was false, namely, that no man could see a heavenly being and live. It is true that the Lord expressly told His servant Moses that he could not see His face and live; but He did not say, "Thou canst not see an angel and live;" nor had He said, "Thou canst not see my veiled presence and live." The tradition was an accretion to the truth and a corruption of it. We may not see the face of God, but we may see Jesus; in fact, we live because we see Him.

BEWARE OF THE MOSS

which grows upon a truth. Many a heart bleeds because it is wounded by its own imperfect ideas of God; and so when God does draw near, when the great Almighty overshadows it, there is a slavish dread for which there is no need.

Besides, Gideon was in a state of mind in which he could be easily cast down. He was a brave man, but long affliction had cast a tinge of sadness over him. His usual conduct in life is well pictured by which God gave him. When all the people around him were with excitement, like the threshing floor, heated and dry, he, like the fleece, was cool and composed: and then, again, when all around him like the wet floor, were damped with discouragement, he alone remained in his ordinary condition, with not a drop of cowardice within him. That was the kind of man: calm, quiet, determined, brave. And you, dear heart, if you are seeking after peace with God I should not wonder if fear follows fear, and yet no fear drives you from looking unto the Lord. It is but natural that you should be overawed, but oh, be not despairing, for there is the surest reason for hope. Still look to Jesus, and He will surely in His due time send you a blessed deliverance.

One thing is noteworthy, namely, that Gideon's greatest fear arose out of a sign which he had himself asked for. He said, "Show me a sign," and when he had that sign, namely, God's coming to him, then it was that he was afraid. Be very chary how you ask for signs; for they may work your discouragement rather than your comfort. I have known some say, "I shall not believe I am a child of God unless I feel a deep sense of sin," and when they have entered into that feeling they have exclaimed, "I will never again ask for this." I have heard of others who thought they could come to Christ if they were gently drawn; and the Lord has been gently drawing them, and then they have wished that they had been more troubled and distressed. They imagine that they could have believed more readily had their despair been greater—a strange notion certainly.

The fact is, we are prone to unbelief: this noxious weed grows without sowing, and only the sweet love of Jesus can teach us how to believe. We are ever busy in manufacturing fresh doubts, and for raw material we use the very tokens for which we so earnestly besought the Lord. We cry aloud, "Show me a token for good," and when the token is given we are amazed at being heard, and fall to fearing more sadly than before. Therefore pray for such boons with bated breath, and say twice over concerning such things, "Nevertheless, not as I will, but as Thou wilt."

All this while, beloved friends, Gideon had one truth before him which ought to have prevented all his fears: for the Lord had spoken to him, and said, "Go in this thy might, and thou shalt save Israel from the hand of the Midianites: have not I sent thee?" See, he goes home fearing that he will die, and yet that could not be. How could he die if he was to deliver Israel? he must be a live man to do that, and yet, you see, he forgets to reason for his own comfort, but takes care to argue for his fears. Have I never seen my hearers doing this? I have often caught myself at it—refusing to use my logic for the strengthening of my faith, but perverting reason in order to assist my unbelief. Is not this foolish and wicked? We sharpen the knives with which to cut ourselves; we nurture in our bosom the viper which will bite us; we stuff our pillows with thorns, and fill our cups with wormwood, and all to no purpose but the increase of despondency.

That sweet singer of the sanctuary, Miss Havergal, beautifully writes:

"They say there is a hollow, safe and still,

A point of coolness and repose

Within the centre of a flame, where 'life might dwell

Unharm'd and unconsum'd, as in a luminous shell,

Which the bright walls of fire inclose

In breachless splendor, barrier that no foes

Could pass at will.

"There is a point of rest

At the great centre of the cyclone's force,

A silence at its secret source—

A little child might slumber undistressed,

Without the ruffle of one fairy curl,

In that strange central calm amid the mighty whirl.

"So, in the centre of these thoughts of God,

Cyclones of power, consuming glory-fire—

As we fall o'eraw'd

Upon our faces, and are lifted higher

By his great gentleness, and carried nigher

Than unredeem'd angels, till we stand

Even in the hollow of his hand—

Nay, more! we lean upon his breast—

There, there we find a point of perfect rest

And glorious safety."

So dwell we in the heart of God, who is a wall of fire round about us, and the glory in our midst. He who shall have had everything burned up within him that can burn shall find in the presence of God the element of his life. Oh, the splendor of the life of faith! God bring us fully into it. Thus have I spoken of Gideon's fear while he was in the path of peace.

III. Now let us spend a few minutes in considering of His servant. "The Lord said unto him, Shalom—peace be unto thee; fear not: thou shalt not die." The Lord would not have His Gideons disturbed in mind. If we are to trouble the enemy we must not be troubled ourselves. "Comfort ye, comfort ye my people, saith your God. Speak ye comfortably to Jerusalem, and cry unto her, that her warfare is accomplished, that her iniquity is pardoned." This is how God would have His prophets speak, and this is how He speaks Himself. He wants His workers to be full of comfort while they labor.

Then the Lord added, "Thou shalt not die," thus meeting the special form of his dread. This is what the Lord says to every poor trembler who is holding to Him by the desperate grip of faith—"Thou shalt not die. Thou shalt not die the second death: thou hast no sin to die for, for I have laid thy transgressions on My only-begotten Son; Thou shalt not die, for Jesus died. Thy spiritual life cannot expire, for thy 'life is hid with Christ in God,' and because Jesus lives thou shalt live also." When Jehovah speaks to comfort His people they are comforted indeed, and I pray Him this morning so to speak to any of you who wish to enjoy perfect peace. May the peace of God which passeth all understanding keep your hearts and minds by Christ Jesus. May you walk down those aisles saying, "Yes, I have peace with God: I have no fear now: I shall never die, for Jesus says, 'He that liveth and believeth in Me shall never die.'" What a morning without clouds will this be to your souls.

IV. Let us now look at

GIDEON'S MEMORIAL.

His fears being banished, and being at perfect peace, Gideon now goes to work. Are any of you questioning whether you are saved or not? Do not go out preaching yet, for you may, perhaps, put others into bondage. Are any of you half afraid that you are not at peace with God? Be careful what you do! Strive after peace, lest you weaken your testimony. I recollect the lesson which I learned from my Sunday-school class: I was taught, if the other boys were not. Though yet a youth, I was teaching the Gospel to boys, and I said, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." One of them asked somewhat earnestly, "Teacher, are you saved?" I answered, "I hope so." The boy replied, "Teacher, don't you know?" As if he had been sent to push the matter home to me, he further inquired, "Teacher, have you believed?" I said, "Yes." "Have you been baptized?" I said, "Yes." "Well, then," he argued, "you are saved." I was happy to answer, "Yes, I am;" but I had hardly dared to say that before.

Look at certain of our brethren who preach and have no conversions. What is the reason in some cases? Is it not that they fish all the week for frogs to feed the people with, and people do not care to receive such food? I mean this. If some new doubt is hatched; if some philosopher thinks he has found out a flaw in the gospel, next Sunday these worthies discourse upon it, for they think every new query must be answered. As for me, I do not care a fig what all the philosophers find out, for they cannot disprove the facts of my experience. When I come across a fresh piece of infidelity I do not hurry to proclaim it to you, and so do the devil's advertising for nothing. Let others follow their business, if it be their business; as for me, my business is to preach the truth of God which I have learned from His infallible word by the teaching of His Spirit. God would have His people be at peace with Him, and know that they are so, for if they are fretted with, and worried in reference to their God, how can they fight the battles of life?

When Gideon is fully at peace, what does he begin to do for God? If God loves you He will use you either for suffering or service; and if He has given you peace you must now prepare for war. Will you think me odd if I say that our Lord came to give us peace that He might send us out to war? Gideon's first work was to go and cut down his father's sacred grove, which stood on the top of the hill, and inclosed an altar to Baal. He could not effect this business by day, because the foolish worshippers would have rallied to the defence of their dumb idol, and have overpowered the reformer; therefore with his ten men he performed the work by night. I think I see him and his people in the dim darkness, with their axes and saws, doing the work as quietly as they can felling all those trees. A splendid clearance was made that night.

"Now," cries he, "over with that detestable altar to Baal." Some people would have said, "Spare it as a fine piece of antiquity." Yes, and leave it to be used again! I say, down with it, for the older it is the more sin it has caused, and the more likely is it that it will be venerated again. I often wish the reformers had been more thorough in their destruction of idolatrous images and Popish trumpery. In many a parish church of this land everything is ready for the restoration of the Roman idolatry. The nests were not half pulled down, and the rooks are likely to be back again. Many a window, full of saints the Bible never knew, only waits for the martyr-burners to be back again. Gideon cast down every stone, and it was bravely done.

But see, by the Lord's bidding he piles a new altar of earth, or unhewn stone; and when that is done, he fetches his father's bullock and slays it for a sacrifice. How steadily they went about this re-establishment of the pure faith! See, they use the wood of the grove for burning the sacrifice, and the heavens are red with the blaze. I think I hear the gallant leader say, "Let them wake now; they cannot prevent our worshipping the Most High, nor can they cause the grove to grow again."

Beloved, if God has given you peace, go home and begin your reform. I would preach up the overthrow of every sin. Down with every idol. Have you one left? Over with it, and present a sacrifice to God. Every true Christian should pass a reform bill at home, and carry it out.

"The dearest idol I have known,

Whate'er that idol be,

Help me to tear it from its throne,

And worship only thee."

TO PULL DOWN IS NOT ENOUGH.

Plenty of people can do that. Gideon, as we have seen, builds an altar to Jehovah. When you are at perfect peace with God, think what you can do for Him: think of a new plan of work, or consider how to do the old work better: advance any part of divine truth that has been forgotten, any ordinance that has been neglected, any virtue that has been despised. Especially make prominent Christ Jesus, the altar and sacrifice so dear to God. Now that you have begun the fight by cutting down Baal's grove, complete it by building an altar for the Lord. Instead of a fortress and high tower, declare the atoning sacrifice of the Lord Jesus, and hold that fort till He shall come.

See, brethren, and with that I finish, there may sit here this morning a young man who does not know what God is going to make of him. The capacities of service that God can infuse into a single individual are marvellous. At present you are disturbed in mind, afflicted in heart, ill at ease; you need perfect peace, but you have not found it yet. Rest not till you have it. At God's own altar, where Jesus died, you will find it, and only there. Where Jesus' blood makes peace with God there is your peace. I desire that down in the deepest caverns of your nature there may reign a profound calm which nothing can disturb. Oh for the valor which will smite everything that is sinful. "The sword of the Lord, and of Gideon" be our watchword. As our Master was sent to destroy the works of the devil, even so do we bear the same commission, using only his weapons—love, truth, and self-sacrifice. Amen.

The Efforts of a Converted Jewish Preacher among his co-religionists in Russia have been attended with some success. In writing from Odessa, Mr. Aaron Sternberg says that during a four months' journey through Southern Russia the Lord has blessed his efforts. The late persecution has humbled many a proud and obstinate spirit, and they seem now to cling to any one who offers to show them kindness, however averse they may at first be to the doctrines of the New Testament. Mr. Sternberg adds: "I am convinced that a great work can be done for God among the four millions of Jews in Russia, if done quietly, and as 'unto the Lord.' My opinion is that many Gentiles would indirectly feel the good influence, for among the hundred millions of souls in Russia, there are masses who have never seen, much less read, the New Testament."

Saluting an African Chief.

SALUTING AN AFRICAN CHIEF.

THE abject servility with which the Hottentot regards his chiefs is displayed in all his actions, but in none so conspicuously as in the salutation he makes on coming into his presence. Then he prostrates himself in the dust, as shown in the illustration on this page, and offers homage more profound than some civilized people often offer to the Creator. The chief as he walks abroad is greeted in the same way as when he sits in state to receive the visits of his people. In a casual meeting, like that depicted above, the man sets down his burden, casts himself upon the ground, and there grovels, uttering loyal protestations meanwhile, the chief being at liberty to walk upon him, or kick him, or dispose of him in any way he thinks proper. As a rule, mollified by the attitude of reverence, the chief is magnanimous, though a trifle haughty, perhaps, and is gracious enough to accord permission to his subject to rise and "stand up upon his feet as a man."

M. F. Coillard, a missionary in Africa, relates in his letters many interesting details of the ways of these chiefs. Among them is that of the conversion of Chief Moshesh, of Basutoland, one of the most powerful warriors of South Africa. In the year 1870, being seized with an illness, he was led through the instrumentality of the Rev. F. Coillard, to accept the religion of Jesus Christ. From being a dreaded chief he became an exemplary Christian. During a prolonged season of weakness he never complained, but his heart was full of unspeakable joy. On the morning of his death, he suddenly cried out, "Help me, that I may fly! Help me, that I may fly!" One of his sons rushed to his bed and raised him in his arms, but the spirit had fled, and nothing was left but its earthly envelope. The funeral of the old belligerent chief was an imposing one, and his conversion to Christ and happy, triumphant death considerably accelerated the evangelization of the Basuto people, among whom M. Coillard is now laboring.

In the very heart of the "Dark Continent," along its pestilential western coasts, and in its extensive southern districts, as elsewhere, the missionaries are encouraged by tokens of God's blessing. Tribes of savage natives are being civilized, reclaimed from their degradations, taught the value and dignity of individual life, and collected into villages. The Gospel of Christ has been faithfully preached, and in many instances attended with the power of salvation. Christian churches have been organized, and prayer and praise ascend to Heaven in places which were formerly the scenes of debasing idolatry, war, cruelty, and blood. This measure of success is an encouragement to perseverance, and an incentive to renewed efforts on the part of all who love Christ. Fields of labor are constantly opening up and the missionary societies are ready to occupy them for Christ if they only had men and money to extend their operations. There are few facts so humiliating as the one that there are thousands upon thousands of men who have never yet heard the name of Jesus, but who would gladly receive missionaries; yet the missionary societies cannot reach them for want of money. As we look around us at the lavish display of wealth, at the luxury of our fellow-citizens, at our half-filled churches, and think then of those benighted people living untaught and unsaved, we cannot avoid asking ourselves the question, Will not God for these things bring us unto judgment?

A TALK ABOUT THE COMET.

ABOUT an hour before sunrise on a recent morning, a number of people were gathered on a village road which led to the nearest railroad station twenty miles off. There was a reason for the assemblage of so many people at that unusual hour. A minister of the gospel highly respected in the village, was to set out that morning for a three months' tour. A severe illness had prostrated him, and as he slowly regained strength the doctor insisted on change of air and scene. The people loved their minister, and his recovery was made the subject of many prayers, so when the doctor's order was made known a meeting was held in the village school the same night, and a sum of money was subscribed so that the good clergyman might have a real, enjoyable holiday, and take his wife with him. So it was all arranged and as the minister and his wife drove from their home in the early morning, they were met on the outskirts of the village by a large number of their friends who had turned out to say farewell and God-speed to them. A hearty shake of the hand and the minister and his wife were whirled away on their journey followed by the blessings of their friends.

As the party broke up to return to their homes, some few of them who were going in the same direction resumed a conversation which the minister's arrival had interrupted, about the comet which was then and still is so conspicuous an object in the morning skies. George Harding, the young school teacher, with whom from boyhood astronomy had been his best-loved study, was one of the group, and as they strolled homeward he was appealed to for information. He told them how the unexpected celestial visitor was causing discussion as to its identity, some astronomers contending that it was a comet, the orbit of which was gradually contracting, and every revolution drawing closer and closer to the sun, while others identified it with comets which had appeared in certain years long gone by. He told them that it had been proved that the tail was at least fifty millions of miles in length, that it was believed to be 36,000,000 miles from the earth when first seen, and its rate of travel is 1,500,000 a day, and that it was expected to approach within 15,000,000 miles of the earth. From this point the conversation proceeded to other astronomical topics, until the party separated on their respective roads.

Amid all the speculations the spectacle of this wonderful comet has aroused, and the awe-inspiring accounts astronomers give us of this and the other celestial bodies, one thought above all others fills the Christian's breast. As he reads of these immense worlds travelling around in their orbits and is impressed with the vastness of the subject, he thinks, "My father made them all." We know not whether the stars are inhabited, whether they may be the abodes of beings who have never fallen, but this we do know that they are sustained in their places and kept in their courses by Him who lived and died for our salvation, and that He who guides the stars has promised that whosoever believeth in Him shall be called the Sons of God and shall live in His presence and the light of His countenance throughout eternity. Truly "the Heavens declare the glory of God and the firmament sheweth His handiwork" (Psa. 19: 1).

AMY'S COQUETRY.

"GOOD morning, Amy! How long have you been on the sands? I have been looking for you for half an hour. I have something very particular to say to you." This was the greeting of a gentleman, tall and faultlessly attired, to a young lady—his niece—whom he met on the sands nearly half a mile from the hotel at which they were staying.

"Something disagreeable, of course, uncle," she said; "it always is when you have 'something very particular to say.' Really, I declare one might as well be an old woman at once as—"

"As what, Amy? There are many worse things, I assure you, than being an old woman. For instance, if I were a young lady like you I should dread much more the reputation of being a hollow-hearted coquette; that is worse than the approach of life's mellow autumn-tide, with its chastened beauty and kindly grace."

Amy Russell grew more patient and subdued as her uncle uttered his gentle reproof, and her eyes drooped under his steady gaze.

Maurice Harley had since her childhood faithfully and lovingly cared for his sister's only child, who had lost both her parents in her infancy. Amy was now budding into womanhood. Her features, though not of classic regularity, were well-defined and betokened considerable intelligence; and when kindled into radiance by the force of inward feeling, had a charm cold, regular placid beauty never has. Amy was a good-hearted girl, never designedly hurting the feelings of others; but yet hurting them very often through lack of thought. Her impulsive warmth of disposition, the absence of restraint in her intercourse even with strangers, had led more than one young man to fancy that she loved him. It must be admitted too that Amy took no pains to deceive them when she became aware of their sentiments, but rather enjoyed the fun of a little love making in which her own heart was not engaged. But she was like a child playing with fire, and was doing more harm than she knew. It was fun to her, but the most sacred feelings of men's hearts had been trifled with, and they spoke of her as a heartless girl. Her uncle's reproof, therefore, was not unmerited, especially as he had that morning received a letter which he believed to be a new illustration of Amy's heedlessness.

"Amy," said her uncle, "have you given any encouragement to Percival Hastings, which justifies him in thinking that if he obtains my consent, you will regard him as your accepted suitor?"

"I think it's really too bad of you, uncle, to put such an absurd question to me. Why, what is Amy Russell's Defence of Flirting.

Percival Hastings to me more than others, I should like to know? I am not answerable for his feelings, or the conclusion which he draws from his own wishes, am I?"

"No, Amy, not for conclusions drawn from his wishes; but Mr. Hastings has written me a letter, in which he says that he has your sanction for asking my consent to your engagement with him."

"Mr. Hastings misunderstood me, uncle. I gave him no authority to say such a thing. Last week, when he was here, he bothered and teased me with all sorts of nonsense, and asked if he might write to you, and I said, 'Write to Uncle Maurice? Why, of course you may, if you want to.' But how was I to know what he was going to write about?"

"That answer is unworthy of you, Amy. You must have been pretty well satisfied as to what he implied by asking you if he might write to me. You must have encouraged him as you have done others or he would not have written this." Mr. Harley was grieved, and he showed it by the unwonted severity of his manner. "What am I to say to Mr. Hastings?" he asked at length.

"Tell him I don't want anything to do with him;" and with a musical laugh, Amy suddenly turned round and tripped lightly back toward the hotel, leaving Uncle Maurice standing alone, amazed and sorry.

But Amy was not so light-hearted about the matter as she endeavored to make it appear. Not that she cared for Percival Hastings. In that she spoke truly. But her uncle's sorrow and vexation had touched her, for she loved him dearly, and his reproof had sunk into her heart more deeply than might have been supposed. When she was alone in her own room, she threw herself on the lounge and burst into tears. She called herself an ingrate for hurting the feelings of one who had been to her a father. She felt no remorse about her disappointed lovers, but over her uncle's grief she sorrowed deeply. It was not, however, of very long continuance, for her naturally high spirits soon asserted themselves and she rose from the lounge, washed the traces of tears from her face, and prepared to descend to her aunt's room. As she turned from her mirror her eyes fell upon a needlework text 'her dead mother's own work, "Come unto me all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." That was not for her, she told herself. Life was very bright to her, and her path had been so smoothened that she was neither weary nor heavy laden, and she passed on eager for the pleasure before her.

But years afterward, in that same room, to which she went oppressed with bitter sorrow, grieving over the inconstancy of one to whom she had given her heart's love, her eyes fell on that same text with changed feelings. To her then One who promised rest to those who came to Him was one to be sought by her. In that hour, Amy Russell was upon her knees in prayer, making her own the words of the familiar and pathetic hymn, "Just as I am, and waiting not." And there was joy that day, "in the presence of the angels of God," for this soul which had given itself to Christ. The sorrow, which God had seen she needed to drive her to the Saviour, had fallen upon her, and she craved the rest only He can give. She lived to see the day when she could say of the grief that in that bitter moment rent her heart, "Precious sorrow, it was the seed of joy unspeakable."

ONLY A TRAMP.

The Tramp Turns Detective.

"BUT why do you come to me?" asked Mr. Copleston of the mayor. "Was it any one whom I know, then?"

"Well," said the mayor, "that is rather a puzzling question to answer, simple as it sounds. But anyway, all we want is for you to be good enough to tell us how to get hold of him, to make him let us at least thank him for the tremendous service he has rendered us. At present all the information that Enid has been able to glean from her preserver about himself is meagre—that he has known you since Sunday last, that his address, is the fields round Silverdale, and his name—a Tramp."

"Ah—h!" ejaculated Mr. Copleston softly. "Ah! I began to suspect who it must be. And Enid found his conduct—that of a gentleman?"

He had scarcely uttered that latter question when a queer, amused look in his companion's eyes made the color mount into his own forehead. He added quickly, in a low tone of apology, "Of a man, I will say, if you prefer it. It means the same thing, or should do so. A gentleman is not a creature dependent on birth and breeding."

The mayor smiled. "No, no, Vicar, I know that; and I hope in the Christian sense of the title,

I do merit to be called a gentleman; but the blacking's not been invented yet, I'm afraid, that'll give me the outside polish."

"And never need be," said the Vicar, grasping his friend's brave, honest hand in a warm grasp.

"None the less for that," said the ex-tinker, being the first to break a short silence, "none the less for that, there's no calling for a man to get rid of the brightness when he's once got it. Though I haven't it myself, I take it it's a good gift, like everything else that's pleasant, and meant to be made the most of. However, that's neither here nor there at the present minute, more than it concerns the fact that, according to Enid, the young fellow who came so in the nick of time to her aid has a very good share of it I suppose."

"Enid is quite right," said Mr. Copleston. "In all his wanderings he has lost little in speech or manner of what he must have gained in boyhood in the Welsh vicarage. I confess that he has made a most favorable impression upon me, in spite of his present wretched plight, and I would most gladly give him another chance to retrieve his character and position."

"Ah!" exclaimed the mayor, "now we are coming to the gist of the matter. That is the very thing. Human sympathy, or Christian sympathy—"

"Both combined," interrupted the Vicar, smiling.

"Aye, aye! well, of course, both combined," assented Mr. Barnes with an answering smile. "Both combined in our heart make you wish to help the poor fellow—'Mr. Tramp,' as my birdie calls him. But it is something far stronger than sympathy with his misfortunes, whatever they may have been, that makes me long to be of use to him, as you can well understand. I feel as if I deserved to be shied over into that chalk pit myself for every hour that I leave him starving, ragged, and homeless. Can you give me any idea where I am likely to find him?"

"More than an idea—a certainty, I believe," said Mr. Copleston. "And for that matter, although he chooses still to remain ragged and homeless he is no longer starving; for even his scrupulous determination to spurn anything that can bear the appearance of charity, consents to receive sufficient day's wage to pay for a day's food. His strong arms have done me a service as well as Miss Enid; for he did the greater part of the work, I can assure you, toward getting in my field of corn before the thunder-storm. He was at it early and late Tuesday and Wednesday, declaring that the weather was going to break sooner than any of us imagined."

"Umph!" ejaculated the mayor, "he seems to have a lot of capabilities."

"But to be master of none," sighed the clergyman. "I think I shall have to preach a sermon upon restlessness. I had no idea before last Sunday of what a very terrible evil it might prove. This poor fellow might have been not only a respectable, but a highly-honored member of society long ago, I feel convinced, but for this wretched restlessness—never satisfied, never still."

"Then," said Mr. Barnes, with cool determination, "we shall have to chain him here somehow, as they do dogs, until he has learnt to like the place and people too well to care to leave it."

"I only hope you may be able," was the hearty agreement. "You'll find him any time to-day, I believe, at work among my young apple trees on the border of that bit of debatable land between Silverdale and Farmer Jenkins's place in the next parish."

His companion raised his eyebrows. "Well, Vicar, I don't think—forgive my saying so, but I really don't think that I should have chosen that precise place to send the unknown vagrant to. Why, that bit of debatable land is the haunt of any ragamuffins there may be lurking in the whole countryside. Depend upon it, my journey there will be useless. The restlessness you speak of will have taken him off with some of them before I get a chance to put on my chain. I hoped he was round here, under your eyes."

Mr. Copleston looked doubtful and anxious himself for a few moments, when he began to answer, but his tone grew firmer as he proceeded. "No, my friend; there, I trust, you are wrong. You have not seen this stranger, and spoken to him, as I have done. I acknowledge that last night when I was puzzling what employment I could find him next, and the idea first occurred to me that I might send him to see what he could do for me about those trees, I did have some hesitation myself on the grounds you mention; but I came eventually to the conclusion that if he were really one to be so very easily led astray as all that, he had better go his way before he had gained any firmer hold on our friendships."

Mr. Barnes had soon skirted the village, and then, to avoid the heat of the sun, he turned off from the sunlit lanes into Mossley Wood. It gave him a longer walk, but a very beautiful one, taking him round one edge of the troublesome debatable land, and so up again to the vicar's apple plantation.

Three or four years ago the Deadman's Plot had belonged to a miserable old miser, uncle of Farmer Jenkins, father of an only ne'er-do-well son, whom he had cut off with a shilling. To Farmer Jenkins he had left some small portion of his property, to a mad asylum the greater part of it, and this slip of rich land to "Timothy Snooks, of Tasmania," a being whom every one suspected had no existence even in the miser's imagination. But the spiteful joke meantime did as much harm, while vain efforts were made to find this unreal Mr. Timothy Snooks, as the miser had desired. Gypsies and vagabonds of all sorts made it a camping-ground. Now and again, with the thankful connivance of his neighbors, Farmer Jenkins took some little portion of it into cultivation, and for the sake of his own crops gave the whole plot some useful supervision.

But although by this means the neighborhood was kept clear of the ordinary troublesome class of vagrants, some one or more of a subtler description invariably contrived to gain footing on the place just on the ripe eve of gathering the outlying crops and never once yet had Farmer Jenkins contrived to reap much advantage from his efforts to frustrate his uncle's mischief for his own good. However, he was gifted with a certain amount of dogged obstinacy proper to a class of men whose whole occupation teaches them a waiting policy, and the very difficulty of getting a profit out of the wasting land made him the more desirous to do so. This year he had planted a good large patch with wheat, which was doing finely, although it was not so forward as that of his brethren in his own and the adjoining parishes. The wood which sheltered it from cold winds likewise kept off some of the sun.

It also afforded harborage and concealment to any one who might wish to injure it, and such an one was hiding there now as the mayor came slowly on.

A mean, miserable, crouching creature was the hiding miscreant, peering out of his lair with the cunning eyes of a half-sober drunkard at the unsuspecting pedestrian. He did not know that he also, in turn, was being watched by one whom nature and habit had combined to render singularly keen-sighted and keen-witted. This second watcher had thrown himself down just within the shelter of the wood for a five minutes' rest, and to eat his bread and cheese dinner, the first meal he had allowed himself that day, at the moment when a high shouldered, slouching fellow came skulking along within a few feet of him, and looking so anxiously behind him for observers who were not there, that he did not see the one before him who was noting his suspicious movements with such silent closeness.

The coward ne'er-do-well came on another creeping, cautious step or two, and then turning his back upon that little-dreamt-of companion, he crouched down, muttering with a sort of tipsy chuckle of sly malice:

"Ah, my fine cousin; now to cry quits again! And what could be better for me than the crazy-pated parson's benevolence. It's easy to guess now on whose head the mischief-cap will be fitted; and, once more, 'poor Joe, who's nobody's enemy but his own,' will get off scot free with the added sweet drop of revenge."

The bread-and-cheese eater left off eating, and lay perfectly still, with increased comprehension of impending mischief, and just anger in his heart at the cruelty implied in the last sentence. For one moment he thought of rising and disclosing his presence; but an instant's reflection convinced him that such a measure would be in the highest degree imprudent. It would wain off the evil-doer for the present, only to leave him at liberty to fulfil his base designs at some future opportunity, when no one might be at hand to frustrate them. The two, the watcher and the watched, were both within a few feet of Farmer Jenkins's patch of corn, standing up bright and golden in the sunlight, and very little the worse for the two hours' storm of yesterday morning.

A hot afternoon, a hot night, and the present brilliant sun had made it and the ground forget that any rain had fallen within the past month. The man dragged himself closer to it, closer yet, until he was close up. Then he drew a match-box from his pocket, and from a tin can a quantity of ends of turpentine-soaked rope. At this moment he caught sight of the mayor, and drew himself closer together, and cut of sight, until Mr. Barnes had slowly paced on upward with his back instead of his face toward his hidden neighbor and the corn. Thus pursuing his way toward the apple-tree ground, the mayor caught sight of a man lying in deep shadow behind the felled trunks of a couple of silver beeches. He stood still and looked at the man, himself unseen. This watcher was much too intent on the movements of the would-be incendiary to be gazing about him for other objects of interest.

A very vexed expression overspread the mayor's shrewd, kind countenance as he stood thus, looking between the baffling shadows of the many trees hetwixt him and that other human being. If yonder lay the object of his search, as he felt convinced he did, Mr. Barnes saw signs of what he considered a far greater obstacle to the progress of the man he was so desirous to befriend, than the restlessness of which Mr. Copleston had spoken. As he had been walking along he had thought of many employments with a good deal of change and variety in them that he might manage, with a little thought and trouble, to provide for the satisfaction of restlessness, but the sight now before him hinted at something far more hopeless—a dreamy indolence, a wretched, down-dragging slothfulness.

"How little can girls judge of character," he murmured softly. "Poor little birdie! What would she think now if she could see her knight wasting his great strength, and the best hours of the day at the same time, snoring on the ground? What can she or any of us do to cure inbred laziness?"

Meantime, while he thus moralizes, it may be remarked that, however appearances might be in favor of his opinion of the laziness of the individual he was watching, the mention of "snoring" was decidedly not justified by facts. The recumbent figure was silent still, scarcely breathing in fact, till all of a sudden, with a great cry and bound, he rose: the mayor turned at the same moment, and he too uttered a breathless exclamation of concern and indignation as he saw a great blaze among the corn of Farmer Jenkins, and a man flying along the edge of the field, evidently startled by the shout behind him.

Before Mr. Barnes could recover presence of mind to speak or move, or make any effort to attract the notice of the person whom he now found he had been judging so wrongly, the man had started off in pursuit of the flying scoundrel, who had gained some advantage in the race by being already free of the tangled undergrowth, which two or three times tripped up the over-eager steps of one who was too excited to be cautious. However, both were too fleet for the worthy mayor's ponderous frame to compete with in a running match. He took the wiser part of hurrying back down the path, pulling off his coat as he went, and flinging it on the top of a ragged one, which had already reduced to volumes of smoke the scarcely caught straw.

Then he made his way to Farmer Jenkins's home, where he arrived at the nick of time to see an excited group gather in the farmyard, the centre of the group consisting of the farmer himself, and two wild, disordered, crimson-faced men. One, a great, tall, broad-shouldered fellow, ragged to a degree, and lean-cheeked and coatless; the other, decently clothed, but with a bleary-eyed, cringing face; at the present moment he had a half-throated-looking face too, for his stalwart companion had his fingers knitted with a tight, strong grasp in the collars of both coat and shirt. The farmer was staring at them both with a countenance in which anger and wonder struggled for mastery. The first to speak was the tatterdemalion. Standing square and upright, and looking every inch a man, as Miss Enid Barnes, or any woman or fellow-man either, must have declared, he exclaimed, giving at the same time a shake to his caitiff captive, as of an honest mastiff shaking a thievish mongrel cur:

"There, sir, your corn has just been set on fire, and you see before you the two blackguards who were in its neighborhood when the deed was done. Either he did it, or I. You have but the word of one blackguard to set against the word of another. He told you, as I dragged him into this yard, that he did the abominable deed; I charge him with it. His looks are enough to hang him; my appearance and utter want of character are enough to hang me. You can believe neither. Send me to jail, but send him there also."

This rapid, passionate speech, with its imperative wind-up, had been poured out in such a torrent that none of the listeners appeared to have any wits left, when it came to an end, to make it a reply of any kind. The first to break the silence was the shaking, half-throated drunkard, who whined out:

"Ah, cousin Jenkins, you know well enough he's telling a pack of shameful lies: make him let me go. As if I'd do a finger's turn to injure you after all you've done for me."

THE AGONY IN THE GARDEN.

S. S. Lesson for October 22. Mark 14: 32-42. Golden Text Isa. 53: 4. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

A Truth Divinely Brought Back—Joshua the Sin-Bearer—The Oil-press—The Psalmist's Prophecy—The Last Conflict—An Angel Comforter—Forbearance to the Disciples—A Safe Refuge—The Real Death—The Divine Scapegoat—It is Enough—The Betrayer's Constant Presence.

The passage chosen for our golden text is full of significance. "Surely He hath borne our griefs, and carried our sorrows;" or as quoted in Matthew, and as given in the French, German, and several foreign translations, "Himself took our infirmities, and bare our sicknesses" (Matt. 8: 17). The Lord is bringing back to us the precious truth that spirit, soul and body are but parts of one whole, which He wills to be wholly sanctified and "preserved blameless (or entire R. V.), unto the coming of our Lord Jesus Christ" (1 Thess. 5: 23). True, we shall never know thefulness of Christ's redemption until death "the last enemy," "shall be destroyed" (1 Cor. 15: 26), and until the church shall have ceased her roaring, "waiting for the adoption, to wit the redemption of our body" (Rom. 8: 23) from "the bondage of corruption" (Rom. 8: 21). But let us not therefore fail to claim all we may, all which the primitive church claimed and possessed, in freedom from sin, the world, sickness, and self.

"Himself took our infirmities." "The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all." We behold our Joshua (the same name as Jesus) "standing before the angel of the Lord, and Satan standing at His right hand to resist Him" (Zech. 3: 1). How does He stand? "Now Joshua was CLOTHED WITH FILTHY GARMENTS."

Whence came they? "The Lord hath laid on Him the iniquity of us all;" "Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses." Sin, self, sickness, in all their hideousness, in all their horror, in all their agony, lay there upon Him. He must deal with them, or we must be delivered over to their power. If God deal with us about sin, every soul of man is lost, not one can raise his head for a moment, "God hath concluded all under sin." If God deal with us about the consequences of sin, sickness and death, then not one of us can claim exemption; "death passed upon all men for that all have sinned," and sickness—the chastisement under the law for failing to hearken unto the voice of the Lord and to obey Him (Ex. 15: 26; 23: 20-25; Deut. 7: 12-15; 28: 15, 21, 22, 27-29, 35, 58-61), and equally so under the New Testament (1 Cor. 11: 30-32), who can claim exemption from it as a personal right? Surely not one. But He who is not ashamed to call us brethren, He who has indeed done a Brother's and more than a Brother's part, He whose raiment is shining exceeding white as snow; so as no fuller on earth can white them" (Mark 9: 3) took upon Him the filthy garments of our sins, and our sins' consequences. And standing before the shekinah in the temple of the Lord, i.e., in the immediate and manifest presence of God, He, the Father "answered and spake unto those that stood before Him, saying, Take away the filthy garments from Him."

therefore from us only as we take and retain our place in Him. "Without Me ye can do nothing." As members of His body, of His flesh, of His bones, as having no life, no right, no claim but in Him, all which He bore for us is taken away, and in Him we find other garments; righteousness and cleanness of heart instead of sin, health instead of sickness, the life of Christ instead of self. In Him there is power and certainty in resisting all the attempts of Satan to overcome us through sin and its consequences, and we can say with authority, "The Lord rebuke thee, O Satan."

No wonder the scene of our beloved Lord's agony was Gethsemane the oil-press, for there He was pressed as the olive-berries were. "They came to a place which was named Gethsemane: and He saith to His disciples, Sit ye here, while I shall pray." How little knew those disciples, and how little can we enter into, what was there about to be done. In that brief hour the eternal destinies of millions had to be secured, the claims of God's holiness vindicated, the voice of the adversary stilled; and all lay on One who had taken upon Him the form of a Servant, and who as Man stood there pleading the cause for all men. "And He taketh with Him Peter and James and John, and began to be sore amazed, and to be very heavy: and saith unto them, My soul is exceeding sorrowful unto death: tarry ye here, and watch."

Here, as well as upon the cross, the crushing load was upon Him and the words of the Psalmist were undoubtedly prophetic (Ps. 38: 1-7). Oh, how this description of physical and mental suffering combined, explains those filthy garments upon our High Priest, that bearing of sin and sickness! Surely every form of sin and sickness lay upon Him; twice He says, that there is no soundness in His flesh, and every expression of His spiritual suffering is intense, "Thy hand presseth Me sore; Mine iniquities are gone over Mine head; as a heavy burden, they are too heavy for Me; I am troubled; I am bowed down greatly." The oil-press was doing its terrible work, He cried, "I am feeble and sore broken: I have roared by reason of the disquietness of My heart."

At last His endurance almost gave way, "My heart panteth, My strength faileth Me; as for the light of Mine eyes, it also is gone from Me." Surely it was at this point that "He went forward a little, and fell on the ground, and prayed that, if it were possible, the hour might pass from Him. And He said, Abba, Father, all things are possible unto Thee; take away this cup from Me; nevertheless not what I will, but what Thou wilt." "And there appeared an angel unto Him from heaven, strengthening Him" (Luke 22: 43). Was it under this new strength that

HE CAME TO HIS DISCIPLES?

"He cometh and findeth them sleeping, and saith unto Peter, Simon, sleepest thou? couldst not thou watch one hour?" Where was the devotion which had boasted, "Although all shall be offended, yet will not I. . . . If I should die with Thee, I will not deny Thee in any wise?" O how human nature would have been inclined to feel contempt for Peter, how human nature would have detailed its wrongs at being thus left alone to suffer, while the love of the disciples was not equal so much as to keep them from sleeping at such an hour! Yet there was no bitterness in Jesus. He only exhorted them, "Watch ye and pray, lest ye enter into temptation. The spirit truly is ready, but the flesh is weak;" finding an excuse for them, while He, at that very moment, lay under the curse of their sin!

And again He went away and prayed, and spake the same words. Was it this second time that He prayed as Luke records, "Father if Thou be willing to remove this cup from Me: nevertheless not My will, but Thine, be done" (Luke 22: 42, margin). He "offered up prayers and supplications, with strong crying and tears unto Him that was able to save Him from death, and

WAS HEARD IN THAT HE FEARED"

(Heb. 5: 7), yet He did not avail Himself of the answer, but drank the cup of the wrath of God to the very dregs for us. O God, teach us to understand such love! A second time, and a third time He returned to the disciples in the midst of His terrible struggle, and found them sleeping. They were not witnesses of the awful scene when, "being in an agony, He prayed more earnestly: and His sweat was as it were great drops of blood falling down to the ground" (Luke 22: 44). And our eyes are heavy now; the enemy of souls and bodies, the enemy of God, seeks to keep our eyes closed against these great realities, that he may deprive Jesus of our heart's love, and of the glory of saving us from sin and its consequences. While the enemy of souls seems to attack us he aims higher, and stands at the right hand of our High Priest in our hearts, "to resist Him." If we take our stand in Jesus and not in ourselves meeting the enemy's attacks in Him, we in Him are invulnerable; Satan cannot penetrate the wings of the Almighty under which we take our refuge.

The struggle was over, the real death was already accomplished, the sacrifice was already being consumed and He who had been taking the place of priest was going to take the place of victim manifestly before the world. Like the scapegoat, the iniquities of a world had been placed upon His head, and He was being led out into "a land not inhabited" (Lev. 16: 21, 22). "He cometh the third time, and saith unto them, Sleep on now, and take your rest." Yes He had made provision during that hour of agony, for the peace and rest of soul of all who will come to Him. And yet how heartless seem the disciples, and oh, how heartless are we, unless our whole being responds, and our whole life takes its tone from this one great Sacrifice of Jesus

"IT IS ENOUGH"

He said, Yes, thank God, it is enough; nothing less could have redeemed us, but praise God, it takes nothing more," nothing but the blood of Jesus. O how all our miserable efforts sink into insignificance, how full of senseless presumption they are, when we see the divine side of Redemption. If God says, "It is enough," let us at least forbear to add anything of ours. But if indeed "it is enough," let us then claim for the honor and glory of our Lord, all which His redemption has purchased us. Let us take unlimited freedom from sin, its condemnation, its power, its consequences, that our devotion to our Lord may also be unlimited, in service, in endurance, in suffering of persecution, trial, death if needful, for His sake.

"It is enough, the hour is come," behold, the Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners. Rise up, let us go; lo, he that betrayeth Me is at hand." The disciples knew not the opportunity they had lost. It was the last hour they had the chance of watching with Jesus, and they lost it. Oh, how often has He watched with us, in sickness, in sorrow, in trial, in temptation, but when do we watch with Jesus? What do we know about fellowship with His sufferings, about watching with Him? Oh, how few of us are occupied with His interests, rejoicing in His joys, sad with His sorrows. Everywhere, in every church, in almost every family, he that betrayeth Jesus in some way or other is at hand. Lord teach us, burn into us, the lessons of Gethsemane.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Fate of Arabi Pacha still Hangs in the balance. The commission before which he and his fellow-conspirators are to be tried has commenced its sittings. Arabi petitioned for a trial before English judges but his request was refused. An impression prevails that the Khédive is determined that Arabi shall be executed, but in England and other European countries the vindictive feeling against him has abated, especially since the statement has been made that no genuine documents implicating him in the massacre of Alexandria have been found.

A Most Painful Sensation has been Produced in England by the report circulated by the military correspondent of the Cologne Gazette, who makes the most serious charges, and strongly fortifies them, against the English soldiers at Tel-el-Kebir. He states that the Egyptians lying wounded and helpless in the trenches after the assault were butchered and robbed by the soldiers. Eight wounded Egyptians were shot in his presence, another stabbed, and robbery was carried on right and left. Strict investigation is called for by the English press and if it is shown that the soldiers so disgraced themselves and their country they will undoubtedly be severely punished for conduct so repugnant to English principles.

The Destruction of Bibles at Alexandria during the bombardment, is one of the sad incidents of the war in Egypt. The British and Foreign Bible Society's depot at Alexandria, with its stock of Scriptures, valued at $2000, was totally destroyed by fire during the conflagration which occurred at the time of the bombardment. The total loss of the Society was about $5000.

Mr. John Bright has Suffered in Popularity by his denunciation of the war in Egypt. Even Radical journals which for many years have been his enthusiastic admirers attack him with acrimony. The Liberal machine is also opposed to him, and it is even said that at the next election he will lose his seat for Birmingham just as he lost his seat for Manchester at the time of the Crimean war. Mr. Bright has been one of the representatives of Birmingham in Parliament for twenty-five years.

A Cyclone Swept over Ireland on October 1st. At Cork more damage was done on land than had been caused by any previous storm for twenty years past. The American ship, Harvey Mills, from Liverpool for New York, lying at Queenstown, was driven ashore, and several yachts were sunk in the harbor. At Newry a large number of houses were greatly damaged, and the town was flooded. At Limerick twenty feet of the spire of a Catholic church was blown down during service, causing a panic among the congregation, which was, however, quickly allayed. The county jail was damaged. The gale was severely felt at Bangor and Killarney and along the whole southern coast of Ireland. It is feared that serious shipping casualties occurred.

The Hope of Discovering the Murderers of Lord Frederick Cavendish and Mr. Burke which was almost abandoned, has been revived by the discovery of the weapons used by the murderers. They were found concealed in the rafters of a stable in the rear of a house belonging to a man who was recently sentenced to penal servitude for intimidating an informer. It is alleged that the informer was the driver of the car in which the assassins rode on the night of the murder. The weapons found were four knives, nine inches long, with blades three-quarters of an inch wide. They are quite new and very sharp, and are evidently surgical dissecting knives. There were discolorations on them, which on chemical analysis proved to have been made by human blood. The police believe the murderers are still in Ireland.

A More Hopeful Prospect of Peace in Ireland is reported by the European correspondents of American journals. Mr. L. J. Jennings of the New York World says: "The announcement of the closing of the Land League Fund by the Irish World in New York is very generally regarded here as affording conclusive proof of the successful working of the 'Kilmainham treaty.' The belief is very strong that Mr. Parnell and his followers intend working with the Liberals during the adjourned session of Parliament which is soon to open, under, it is supposed, a promise of further concessions next year. The followers of Mr. Davitt and Mr. Dillon have scarcely had time to rally themselves, and their future course is very uncertain. The probability, however, seems to be that under the double influence of the good harvest and the energetic enforcement of the law, Ireland will be more peaceful for the next few months than it has been."

Queen Victoria has Suffered a Bereavement which though not of a family character appears to have caused her sincere sorrow. The Dean of Windsor who was a nephew of the great Duke of Wellington died on September 24th, and the Queen who had listened to his preaching when at Windsor Castle for twenty-eight years, had become deeply attached to him. The Court Circular which is the Queen's organ, says: "The loss to the Queen, to whom the Dean had been a devoted, valuable, and dear friend, as well as a wise counsellor, is irreparable. He had been for thirty-three years domestic chaplain to Her Majesty, and for twenty-eight years Dean of Windsor. His loss will also be deeply felt by the royal family and by the whole of the Queen's household, by whom he was much beloved." The London Times says Her Majesty is reported to have said that he was the last survivor of her early friends. A portrait of him, painted specially for Her Majesty, hangs in the vestibule leading to the private apartments at Windsor, opposite to the picture of the late Dean Stanley. She presented a copy of this portrait to him as a mark of her esteem.

Mr. Henry M. Stanley the American Explorer of Africa and the discoverer of Dr. Livingstone, is now paying a brief visit to London. It is stated that his ultimate intention is to revisit Africa. He expresses the belief that the great lakes and rivers of Central Africa can be made easy channels of trade. He says that his last expedition confirmed his opinion that the African population, if properly managed and better treated by European and especially the Arab traders on both coasts, would soon allow access of their territories to trade and explorers. North and Central Africa and the Equatorial regions yet can afford much field for exploration to upset the actual mistaken notions of geographers. He has grown stouter and looks much older and more bronzed, but is in good health.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey have Made a most successful tour through some of the largest towns of South Wales. In every place vast crowds attend their services, and many profess to be converted through their instrumentality. Swansea and Cardiff have been greatly blessed by their visit. On Sunday, September 17th, they commenced in Newport, Mon., in the Victoria Hall, which was rented by the local committee for two weeks. This is the largest building in Newport, and was continually crowded. There were meetings for Christian workers and children, as well as the ordinary evangelistic services, and so dense were the multitudes, that overflow meetings were held in the Stow Hill Baptist Chapel. A notorious infidel has been brought to Newport, and held forth in the Albert Hall, right opposite to the Baptist Chapel; but the Lord's work went on successfully, many at the evangelistic meetings professing to have found peace and salvation through faith in the blood of Christ. An English journal says Mr. Moody expected to commence services in Paris last Sunday.

The Procession Carrying the Sacred Carpet from Cairo to Mecca, set out on October 5th. The correspondent of the New York Herald says: "The Egyptian route is from Cairo on the track taken by the ancient Israelites across the desert to Suez, and from thence across the 'great and terrible wilderness' of North Arabia to Akaba, at the head of the eastern branch of the Red Sea. Striking southward it proceeds through the desolate and dangerous regions of West Arabia until at length, after a journey of 1000 miles, the sight of Mecca, gives the pilgrim hope of rest and safety. The trials to which 'faith' is exposed in this journey are almost beyond endurance. Fatigue kills many, Thirst destroys many more. Ablution and cleanliness are impracticable. The caravan, as it toils its slow length along scorched by the sun, suffocated by dust, and followed by the famished vulture, is a moving miasma." When the caravan was journeying to Suez on the way to Mecca, the canopy over the Sacred Carpet was caught and overturned by a telegraph wire, and the venerated emblem was exposed to view. The dervishes in charge were greatly excited by the accident. It is not certain but that the caravan will have to return, and the superstitious ceremony be performed over again in Cairo.

The "Blue Ribbon Gospel Army," Which is a special organization under the presidency of the Rev. M. Baxter, editor of The Christian Herald, and is one of the various companies of the general Blue Ribbon Movement, is carrying on successful evangelistic work in England and Scotland. Nine important centres have already been established from which the movement is spreading around the adjacent country. Its aim is to rescue the drunkard from his thralldom through faith in the Saviour, and to lead him to believe to the salvation of his soul. Contributions in aid of the enormous expenses of this organization if sent to the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, will be forwarded to Rev. M. Baxter.

Experiments with Alcohol have been Made on hogs by two French doctors at Grenelle, who have conducted them at the expense of a rich Swedish philanthropist, for the purpose of ascertaining the effect of alcohol on the internal organs of drunkards. Fifteen pigs were treated daily upon various descriptions of alcohol, and then killed after the process of alcoholization had gone on for some time. Each pig had a different description of liquor. One had whiskey, another brandy, a third absinthe, and so on. When killed their vital organs were found to be marked with small spots resembling ulcers. Their flesh was sound, but when sent to market it was seized as unfit for food.

A Christian Women's Conference was Recently held at Brighton, England. Among the speakers was Miss De Broen, whose portrait appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of April 14th, 1881, together with some account of the wonderful work she has been enabled to accomplish in Paris. She said: "Now that France is leaving Romanism, the devil lays hold of the people for infidelity, the number of blasphemous publications issued from the press was appalling. She produced three of these, parodies on the Bible and the Life of Christ. People had also said to her, 'Why did you not bring us the Gospel sooner, you might have spared many a revolution.' She did not know how long things could go on as they were, the moral condition of Paris was so dreadful."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BINDER.

NUMEROUS applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case, in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding, at the end of the year. To meet this demand a stock of such covers has been prepared and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address, on the receipt of one dollar. Applications should be made to THE MANAGER, 63 Bible House, New York.

IT has of late years become the fashion in many circles to regard the profession of religion as a comparatively unimportant matter. Men go about their daily business, and those who meet with them, and are in their society during the day, do not know, and do not care whether they belong to the church or to the world. It is considered that religion is a mere affair of Sunday, and consists in regular attendance at some church and the observance of certain ceremonies. It is a mere question of opinion or inclination, and if a man prefers to spend his Sunday in that way—well, it is a free country, let him do as he likes. In this way our young people are coming to have views of religion of a very loose and inadequate character. They cannot too soon or too thoroughly learn that religion is something far other than that. They should know that conversion means a change of motive, of thought, of principle, and of life. That after conversion a man has a new object in life, that his motives are different, and that his very thoughts are turned into a new groove—that religion is a power not a theory, a life not an empty creed.

There is no better way of impressing this fact than that of the study of such a life as that of the lady whose portrait appears this week on the front page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD. She had at her command ample wealth, yet instead of spending it in luxuries she devoted it to philanthropy. Her time was her own, yet instead of spending it in pleasure she used it in visiting the degraded outcasts of society, and telling them of the Saviour who loved and died for them. It was a course of life which is not easily understood in these days. People naturally ask why she should so have exerted herself and why she should have voluntarily surrendered ease and pleasure. The answer is that she was influenced by religion; she tried to follow her Saviour's example. That is what true conversion does. After reading such a life can it be said that religion is a mere theory?

Elizabeth Fry was born in Norwich, England, on May 21st, 1780. She was the third daughter of John Gurney, Esq., of Earlham, in the county of Norfolk, and Catherine, daughter of Daniel Bell, a merchant in London, whose wife was a descendant of the ancient family of the Barclays, of Ury, Kincardineshire, and granddaughter of Robert Barclay, the well-known apologist of "the Friends."

In 1792 the mother of Elizabeth died, leaving eleven children, the eldest scarcely seventeen, the youngest not two years old. Thus seven daughters were to pursue the difficult path of early womanhood, unprotected by sympathetic maternal care. They appear to have been rich in attraction and ability, lively and original, possessing freshness of character combined with singular purity of purpose and warmth of affection. But their faith was obscure, and their principles unfixed and wavering. They appreciated the beauty and excellence of religion; but it was natural rather than revealed religion with which they were acquainted. But He who had purposes of mercy toward them gradually led them, each one, into the glorious liberty of the children of God.

THE MEANS OF HER CONVERSION.

Among the various honored instrumentalities employed for this purpose, was William Savery, an American Friend, who in February, 1798, had visited England on a religious visit, and in the course of his travels arrived at Norwich. He appears to have been sound in the Christian faith, and to have laid appropriate stress on the fundamental doctrine of the Atonement. He was earnest in urging a faithful obedience to the immediate guidings of the Holy Spirit, and careful lest from any want of watchful humility the youthful mind should be led into error.

One day the seven sisters attended the Friends' Meeting-house, and William Savery was constrained to preach. His discourse was the means of awakening Elizabeth to the consideration of eternal realities, and she returned home greatly agitated, and weeping. The next morning, during breakfast, Mr. Savery, after pointing the sorrowing penitent the way to the cross, confidently prophesied that "God would lead her into a high and important calling." The results were most powerful and clearly evident to all. From that day her characteristic love of pleasure and of the world became a thing of the past, and she resolved to live for God and His service.

During the summer of that year, Mr. Gurney, with his daughters, took a journey into Wales and the South of England. Elizabeth dwelt with pleasure on the beautiful scenery through which they passed; but to the works of man, however imposing, she was comparatively indifferent. She visited cathedral cities, she saw localities of high historic interest; castles, whose walls, if endowed with speech, could reveal dark tales of other days; but she scarcely mentions them, and if she notices them at all it is only to draw some moral inference, or give point to some familiar religious truth.

VISITS REYNOLDS, THE PHILANTHROPIST.

But by far the greatest interest afforded her by this journey, was the prospect of seeing different members of the Society of Friends, and becoming better acquainted with them and their principles. The travellers paid a visit to Colebrook Dale, the residence of the Christian philanthropist, Richard Reynolds, and there Elizabeth remained for some days in the companionship of her cousin, Priscilla Hannah Gurney. In September she returned home, and resumed her usual habits of self-occupation and usefulness to others; visiting the poor, especially the sick; reading the Bible to them, and instructing their children.

On August 19th, 1800, she was married, in Norwich, to Mr. Joseph Fry, then engaged with his elder brother, William, in business in London. Although on her wedding-morning "she awoke in a sort of terror at the prospect before her," and on driving through Norwich for the last time, "the very stones of the streets seemed dear to her;" yet within a few days she writes cheerfully of her arrival at Plashet, near Stratford, Essex, the residence of her husband's parents, and of the cordiality of her welcome there; she "is much pleased with the place," and "admires the kindness of its inhabitants."

FEAR OF A FRENCH INVASION.

Three years later she again visited Earlham where the whole family assembled. But the unity was soon broken again, for the fear of a French invasion, and the daily expectation of their landing took such a hold of people at this time, that Mr. Joseph Fry was summoned by his brother "to be at his post." On his return he found preparations had been made for flooding the marshes of the river Lea, and breaking down the bridges on the Essex Road; while his father-in-law was also prepared, as soon as the French should land, to convey his daughters into the Isle of Ely, still regarded by the East-Anglian portion of England as a "camp of refuge."

MRS. FRY'S PUBLIC MINISTRY.

Upon the death of her father, in 1809, a new era commenced in the life of Elizabeth Fry. On the day of the funeral, November 3d, her heart was so full that she "could not hinder utterance," and, to use her own words, "I fell on my knees, and began, not knowing how I should go on, with these words, 'Great and marvellous are Thy works, Lord God Almighty; just and true are all Thy ways, Thou King of Saints.'" Two years later, in 1811, she was publicly acknowledged by the Society of Friends as one of their ministers, and in the month of December undertook her first journey in that capacity, and until she was called to her eternal rest in 1845, thirty-four years afterward, was indefatigable in publishing, on every available occasion, the glad tidings of salvation.

PRISON VISITATION.

But in 1813 commenced the great philanthropic work of her life, that of prison visitation, with which in the annals of high Christian enterprise her name is imperishably identified. In her journal, dated February 16th, we read, "Yesterday we were some hours at Newgate with the poor female felons, attending to their outward necessities; we had been twice previously. Before we went away, dear Anna Buxton (her sister, wife of Sir Thomas Fowell Buxton, Bart.) uttered a few words in supplication, and very unexpectedly to myself I did also. I heard weeping, and I thought they appeared much tendered—a very solemn quiet was observed; it was a striking scene, the poor people on their knees around us, in their deplorable condition." (One of many such visits is represented in the frontispiece.)

Thus simply and incidentally is recorded Elizabeth Fry's entrance upon the scene of her future labors. The seed was sown, but it took time to germinate, and four years were to elapse before the way should be made clear for her to put forth her hand to the great work of her life. It was in January of that year, that four Friends, all well known to Elizabeth Fry, had visited some persons in Newgate gaol, who were about to be executed, and it has always been understood that the representations of these gentlemen, particularly those of William Forster, one of their number, first induced her personally to inspect the state of the women, with the view of alleviating sufferings occasioned them by the inclemency of a winter of unwonted severity.

THE INSIDE OF NEWGATE JAIL.

At that time, all the female prisoners in Newgate were confined together in two wards and two cells, comprising about one hundred and ninety superficial yards of space, into which, at the time of these visits, nearly three hundred women with their numerous children were crowded; tried and untried misdemeanants and felons, without classification, without employment, and with no other superintendence than that given by a man and his son, who had charge of them by night and by day. Destitute of sufficient clothing, for which there was no provision; in rags and dirt, without bedding, they slept on the floor, the boards of which were in part raised as a sort of pillow. In the same rooms they lived, cooked, and washed.

With the proceeds of their clamorous begging, when any stranger appeared among them, the prisoners purchased liquors from a regular tap in the prison. Spirits were openly drunk, and the ear was assailed by the most terrible language. Beyond the restraint necessary for safe custody, there was little check upon their communication with the world outside the walls. Into this scene Mrs. Fry entered, accompanied only, as we have seen, by one lady. The sorrowful and neglected condition of these depraved women and their miserable children, dwelling in such a vortex of corruption, deeply sank into her heart, although at this time nothing more was done than to supply the most destitute with clothing.

In the year 1816, Mrs. Fry was in the midst of her chosen work of prison-amelioration, which prompted the poet Crabbe to pen the following lines in his "Tales of the Hall"—

"One, I beheld! a wife, a mother, go
To gloomy scenes of wickedness and woe;
She sought her way through all things vile and base,
And made a prison a religious place:
Fighting her way—the way that angels fight
With powers of darkness—to let in the light.
Yet all she braved! she kept her steady eye
On the dear cause, and brushed the baseness by,
So would a mother press her darling child
Close to her breast, with tainted rags defiled."

A SCHOOL FOR THE PRISONERS.

The progress and development of the work may be learned from the following interesting entry in her journal: "Second Month, 24th, 1816.—I have lately been much occupied in forming a school in Newgate, for the children of the poor prisoners, as well as the young criminals, which has brought much peace and satisfaction with it; but my mind was also been deeply affected in attending a poor woman who was executed this morning. I visited her twice. This had been a time of deep humiliation to me, thus witnessing the effect and consequences of sin. This poor creature murdered her baby; and how inexpressibly awful now to have her life taken away! The whole affair has been very affecting to me; to see what poor mortals may be driven to, through sin, and how hard the heart becomes, even to the most tender affections."

Having obtained the cordial permission of the sheriffs of London, the Ordinary, and the Governor of Newgate, Mrs. Fry, accompanied by her friend, Miss Sanderson, and a prisoner named Mary Connor, as mistress, a school for the children and young persons under twenty-five years of age was opened; but from the limited dimensions of the room they had the pain of refusing admission to many of the women, who earnestly entreated to be allowed to share in their instructions. A picture of the inside of the women's prison in the initial stages of the movement, is presented in the words of Miss Sanderson, in describing it to Sir F. Buxton. "The railing was crowded with half-naked women, struggling together for the front situations with the most boisterous violence, and begging with the utmost vociferation. She felt as if she were going into a den of wild beasts, and she well recollects quite shuddering when the door closed upon her, and she was locked in with such a herd of novel and desperate companions."

A DESPERATE FELON CONVERTED.

Something similar must have been the effect on that faithful coadjutor in this work, Elizabeth Pryor, at a somewhat later period, upon seeing the women, "squalid in attire and ferocious in countenance, seated about the yard." From the prison-door one issued, "yelling like a wild beast;" she rushed round the area, with her arm extended, bearing everything of the nature of a cap from the heads of the other women. The sequel, too, is important; for this woman, through the grace and mercy of God, became humanized under the instruction of the ladies. After having obtained her liberty she married, and for years occasionally visited Mrs. Pryor, who considered her a well-conducted and religious person, her appearance being always most respectable.

In April, 1817, Mrs. Fry, with the wife of a clergyman and eleven members of the Society of Friends, formed themselves into "An Association for the Improvement of the Female Prisoners in Newgate." Their object was "To provide for the clothing, the instruction, and the employment of the women; to introduce them to a knowledge of the Holy Scriptures, and to form in them, as much as possible, those habits of order, sobriety, and industry, which may render them docile and peaceable while in prison, and respectable when they leave it." It was at this time, also, that a matron was introduced into the gaol, and the prisoners placed under her superintendence.

REMOVING WOMEN FOR TRANSPORTATION.

At that period, and for many years afterward, convicted criminals were sent by the English Government to work out their sentences in the colonies. This practice was continued until the protest of the colonists induced the government to discontinue the practice. The Christian ladies who visited Newgate gaol were often pained by the scenes accompanying the removal of female convicts for transportation, and the circumstances under which they were to pass the long and dreary months of confinement on board ship. It was the practice among the female transports to have a sort of saturnalia, or riot, before leaving Newgate; breaking windows, furniture, or whatever came within their reach. They were generally conveyed to the waterside in open wagons; went off shouting amid assembled crowds, and were noisy and disorderly on the road and in the boats. Mrs. Fry prevailed on the Governor to consent to their removal in hackney-coaches. She then promised the women, if they would be quiet and orderly, that she and other ladies would accompany them to Deptford and see them on board; accordingly, when the time came, no disturbance took place; the women in coaches, with turnkeys in attendance, formed a procession closed by her carriage, and from first to last they behaved well upon the road.

SOLEMN SCENE ON A CONVICT SHIP.

The last time that Mrs. Fry was on board the "Maria," while she lay at Deptford, was a solemn and interesting occasion. There was great uncertainty whether the convicts would see their benefactress again. She stood at the door of the cabin, attended by her friends and the captain; the women on the quarter-deck facing them. The sailors, anxious to see what was going on, clambered into the rigging, or mingled in the outskirts of the group. The silence was profound when Mrs. Fry opened her Bible, and in a clear, audible voice read a portion from it, while the crews of the other vessels in the tier, attracted by the novelty of the scene, leaned over the ships on either side, and listened with reverent attention. She closed the Bible, and after a short pause knelt down on deck, and implored a blessing from God. Many of the women wept bitterly, all seemed touched; when she left the ship they followed her with their eyes and their grateful farewells, until, her boat having passed out of sight, they saw her no more.

And, now, during the next few years, we find her visiting the prisons in all parts of Great Britain, and successfully interesting herself in the welfare of the convicts in New South Wales. She also opened communications on the same subject with the government at St. Petersburg, through the medium of Mr. Walter Venning, and with the authorities at Turin, and at Amsterdam. Amid her numerous vocations, she compiled a small "Text-book" containing a passage of Scripture for every day in the year. As soon as it was completed she began its distribution, and thousands of them were circulated. Many instances of their usefulness came to light, one of which may be mentioned here.

A RATCATCHER'S WIFE CONVERTED.

Two or three years after their publication, one of the text-books bound in red leather, which Mrs. Fry had given to a little grandson, Samuel Gurney Cresswell, fell out of his pocket at the Lynn Mart, where he had gone to visit the lions. He was much disconcerted at the loss of his book, for his name was in it, and it was the gift of his grandmother, written by herself. Nearly a year afterward, the Rev. R. Cox, the clergyman of Watlington, a parish near Lynn, gave the following history of the lost book: He had been sent for to the wife of a man, living on a wild common at the outskirts of his parish, a notorious character, between poacher and ratcatcher. The message was brought to the clergyman by the doctor who attended her, and who, after describing her as most strangely altered, added, "You will find the lion become a lamb," and so it proved. She who had been wild and rough, whose language had been violent, and her conduct untamed, lay on a bed of excruciating suffering, patient and resigned.

Her child had picked up the text-book, and carried it home as lawful spoil. Curiosity, or some feeling, put into her heart by Him without whose leave a sparrow falleth not to the ground, had induced her to read it; the Word had been blessed to her, and her understanding opened to receive the Gospel of truth. She could not describe the process, but the results were there. Sin had in her sight become hateful; blasphemy was no longer heard from her lips. She drew from under her pillow her "precious book," her "dear little book," which had taken away the fear of death. She died soon afterward, filled with joy and hope in believing, having in these detached portions of Scripture found a Saviour, all sufficient to bear her heavy burden of guilt, and present her, clad in His own spotless righteousness, before the throne of God.

VISIT TO THE PRINCESS VICTORIA.

In April, 1831, Mrs. Fry paid a visit to the Duchess of Kent and her daughter the Princess, now Queen Victoria. "Recording the fact in her diary, she says: 'We were received with much kindness and cordiality, and I felt my way open to express, not only my desire that the best blessing might rest upon them, but that the young Princess might follow the example of our blessed Lord, that as she 'grew in stature, she might grow in favor with God and man.' I also ventured to remind her of King Josiah, who began to reign at eight years old, and did that which was right in the sight of the Lord, which seemed to be well received. I had long felt an inclination to see the young Princess, and endeavor to throw a little weight in the right scale, seeing the very important place that she is likely to fill. I was much pleased with her, and think her a sweet, lovely, and hopeful child." (This visit is depicted on the front page.)

LAST DAYS AT RAMSGATE.

But our space is exhausted. In multiplied Christian activities at home and on the Continent of Europe, especially on the convict galleys of Toulon (as shown on the frontispiece), the years passed away. Public attention and responsible oversight had been secured on behalf of prison inmates through her instrumentality, and her philanthropic conceptions had become embodied in all the codes of prison discipline and management. For years she had endured considerable suffering, and in 1845 she removed to Ramsgate, for change of air and scene. There she distributed tracts when she drove into the country, or went upon the pier in a Bath chair. Meanwhile she was being rapidly ripened for the glory into which she was soon transferred. One morning in October, with one of her daughters beside her, she uttered in a slow, distinct voice the words, "Oh, my dear Lord, help and keep Thy servant." They were the last words she spoke upon earth; she never attempted to articulate again.

Suddenly, there was a change in her breathing; it was but for a moment. The silver cord was loosed. Unutterably blessed was the holy calm—the perfect stillness of the chamber of death. She saw "the King in His beauty, and the land that is very far off."

A Request that Thanks be Offered for the recovery of a sick daughter, was read last week at the Fulton Street Prayer Meeting. The letter stated that the father of the child heard, by telegram, that his daughter, up among the mountains, was sick. A telegram said she was at the point of death. The stern necessities of business made it impossible for him to leave on the moment. What should he do? In his great sorrow and anxiety, a despatch was sent to the Fulton Street meeting, asking prayer for the daughter's recovery. He had heard and graciously brought up the sick girl from the gates of death. She has since returned home, and is making rapid improvement.

Smoking in Public Thoroughfares is fast becoming a positive nuisance, and in some instances constitutes a source of peril. In the London Times recently the following incident was reported: "A woman was passing along Argyle Street, Gray's Inn Road, when her dress caught fire from a lighted cigar-light which had been thrown down upon the pavement, and she was so seriously injured that she now lies in the hospital in a precarious condition. Such carelessness is not to be lightly spoken of as mere want of thought. When not only the air is polluted, but even life endangered, by this practice of indiscriminate public smoking, it is surely time that smokers themselves should begin to exercise a little self-denial in the interests of public comfort, health, and safety."

A Cancer is said to have been Cured by Faith and prayer at Frankfort, Ky. A young lady named Carrie C. Graham, residing on Madison Street between Broadway and Clinton, has sent a brief narrative to the journals of Indianapolis, in which she states that she was afflicted with cancer, but that having heard of many cases of faith healing she put herself in the hands of the great Physician. Prayer was offered for her recovery; she was anointed with oil, and without any other human agency she was healed. Very few details are given in the published account, but the restored sufferer invites the afflicted to visit her and learn "that when human agency is powerless, the great Physician can heal diseases." Miss Graham sent the account to the Indianapolis journals because she had heard that a minister of that city had publicly avowed his scepticism as to the cure by faith and prayer of any but nervous diseases.

THE RED DRAGON.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning,
October 15, 1882.

"Behold a great red dragon, having seven heads and ten horns, and seven crowns upon his heads. And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven."—REV. 12:3, 4.

The Great Monster of Intemperance—The Coming Political Party—Its Mission—War on Intoxicating Liquor—The Rapid Progress of the Prohibition Party—A Prohibition Nomination for 1884—What is Needed—An Amendment to the Constitution—The Results of the Traffic—Financial Loss—Social Ruin—An Experiment in Illinois—A Great National Work—Who would Join the Party—Drunkards—Physicians—The Women—A Ghastly Domestic Scene—All the Churches—Two Curiosities for the Museum of the Future—A Vision of Two Lakes and Two Scrolls—All the Patriots—The Battle-Cry for Twenty-Five Years.

SOME commentators think that this red dragon of the text means one thing, and other commentators think it means something else, and there is such a wide difference of opinion that I feel at liberty to think that it may be suggestive of

THE GREAT MONSTER OF INTEMPERANCE, fiery and all devouring, with at least ten horns hooking and lacerating society, and by taking possession of so many governments may be said to wear seven crowns, and by dragging down kings and queens and orators and poets and so many illustrious men and women from their firmament of power, that it may be said to draw the third part of the stars of Heaven after it. Alcoholism the worst of all red dragons.

Last Sabbath, in my discourse, I reprehended the degradation of the two political parties of this day, and suggested that as probably they might have fulfilled their mission, the loss of both of them would not be a very great loss. The Republican party was organized to kill slavery. Well, slavery is dead and damned. The Republican party having accomplished its object, if it should pass out of existence, I could see no very great loss. The Democratic party was formed by Thomas Jefferson to oppose the law of primogeniture by which all the inheritance came to the oldest child, and to drive out from this country all foreign titles, and to give equal rights to all classes of people. These things having been achieved, if that party should pass off the face of the earth it would not be a very great damage.

I said to you last Sabbath there needed to be in this country some great party with God-given sublime idea. I said to you that the first principle of that party ought to be the recognition of the eternal God in the affairs of men and governments. I went on also to show you that such a party ought to be antagonistic to all national wastefulness, and the friend of all national economy. This morning, I take a step further and say that such a party ought not only to whisper but to thunder against the curse of curses, the abomination of abominations, the infernalism of infernalisms—the intemperance of this country, and that with national prohibition it ought to go forth to slay this red dragon of my text.

If you have any idea, my friends, that in Kansas and in Iowa is a fanatical paroxysm, you have made a very great mistake. In six years the Prohibition party will hold the balance of power in every State of the American Union. It may not have a majority of the votes, but it will hold the balance of power; so that no man can be Governor, or Lieutenant-Governor, or Secretary of State, or hold any important position in the State until he is a pronounced Prohibitionist, and in twelve years it will have its President in the White House.

No party has ever risen into power so rapidly as the Prohibition party is now rising. The anti-slavery party came out from under the mountain of scorn and contempt to take the Presidential chair and both Houses of Congress; but the Prohibition party, if you will watch the statistics, is coming with four times the celerity. American slavery was a pet lamb as compared with this red dragon. All the families which have been robbed of fathers and brothers and sons by the rum traffic;

all the States of the Union that have been despoiled of their mightiest men; all the churches of Jesus Christ which find the chief obstacle to the advancement of religion in the appetite for strong drink; and all the intelligence, and all the patriotism, and all the enthusiasm of the land will yet pack itself into an avalanche that will come crashing down upon this, the worst evil that ever afflicted a nation.

I give fair notice to all politicians in America of what is coming. Better lead off than follow in afterward as stragglers. Many of the strongest men in both political parties, North and South, see the rising tide of this reformation, and they are preparing to fight the red dragon. There may be many defeats before we get the final victory, but victory will come as surely as there is a God in heaven, and that this nation was not intended for one great drunkenery.

A PROHIBITION TICKET FOR 1884.

I nominate for President and Vice-President of the United States in 1884—caring not which is the first or which the second name on the ticket, although one is a Republican and the other a Democrat, and the one a Western man and the other a Southern man, but both pronounced prohibitionists—Governor St. John, of Kansas, and Governor Colquitt, of Georgia. The far West ought to have by this time a man in the White House; and now that the war is over let us prove that it is over, and that we realize that it is over, by nominating to the highest or next to the highest office the illustrious Georgian.

O my Lord and my God, what a country this would be with no dramshops, no poorhouses, no penitentiaries, fever broken hearts, and fewer desolate homes. No woman brought up in luxury, afterward married to a man who sets her, with shrivelled arm and hollow eye and pallid cheek and consuming lung, to fight back the wolf that thrusts its nostril through the window-pane, snuffing for the blood of her helpless babe. Let the contention between the great temperance societies of America cease, and the 70,000 men belonging to the temperance societies of the State of New York join hands with the hundreds of thousands of temperance men in other States, and the millions of men who belong to no temperance society, but who are anxious for the sobriety and the disenthralment of this country, and the work will be done, and done in less time than I tell you.

First of all, we want

of the United States, ratified by three-fourths of the States—an amendment prohibiting the manufacture and the sale of alcoholic liquors in all the States and Territories, except for medicinal, artistic, mechanical, and scientific purposes, and a prohibition of the importation of foreign alcoholic liquors except for the same purposes. We want a great national convention this year, or next year, or the year after, to demand an amendment to the Constitution of the United States for national prohibition, and to nominate men for the higher positions, and I invite such convention to come to Brooklyn; and as on this platform, in this house, last winter, Governor St. John, of Kansas, and Governor Colquitt, of Georgia, stood side by side in a temperance meeting, I ask that national convention to hold their session in this house of God.

The mere prohibition of the manufacture and the sale of intoxicating liquor in a State, perhaps, may only drive that intoxication and that alcoholic liquor into another State; but let us have national prohibition, and then one half the iniquity tumbles off into the Atlantic Ocean, and the other half of the iniquity tumbles off into the Pacific Ocean—drowned in two oceans of cold water! Let there not be, from the Canadas to the Gulf, room enough for this red dragon to put one of his feet. That State legislatures have the right to prohibit the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors was established by the opinion of John McLean, of the United States Supreme Court, and by Judge Waterbury, and by Judge Grier, and by Judge Daniel, and by Chief-Justice Shaw, of Massachusetts, and by Chief-Justice Harrington, of Delaware, and by Chief-Justice Mason, of Nebraska, and in that memorable case where Daniel Webster and Rufus Choate made the argument, and Judge Taney, of the Supreme Court, supported by all his associate judges, declared that there was nothing in the Federal Constitution or the laws of Congress to hinder any State legislature prohibiting the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquor. But when it is established as a State right, we want also the boldness and the decision and the courage and the aggregate force of all the good people of this country to come together and demand that it be a national prohibition.

We want a national movement so that the stronger States in this matter can help the weaker States, and so that the country districts can help the dissipated cities. We want a national movement. "Oh," says some one, "the United States Government gets so much tax from the liquor traffic; the liquor traffic pays the United States Government millions of dollars a year as tax, and we can't afford to let that tax go." I tell you where the liquor traffic pays the United States Government one dollar, it steals ten in the proper destroyed, in the criminal trials that are necessary in the poorhouses, the almshouses, the penitentiaries that are required to take care of the victims. The United States Government makes as much out of the rum traffic as you would make as a merchant if you sold a man a knife for one dollar, and after he had paid you the one dollar for the knife he should thrust the blade through your son's heart—as much as if you sold a box of matches and after the customer had paid you for the matches, he opened the box and with the first match struck set fire to your dwelling.

ONE MILLION DRUNKARDS

in the United States to-day, sixty thousand of the annually dying in the United States, one hundred thousand men and women thrust into prison as a result of the liquor traffic—two hundred thousand children by this infamy thrown helpless on the world, or gathered up in the institutions of charity, thirty thousand maniacs in the United States as a result of the rum traffic; while England pays annually $400,000 to support the alcoholic insane paupers. Twenty-eight thousand prisoners in Canada, and twenty-one thousand of them the victims of rum. Judge Allison, of Philadelphia, whom I know very well as a man who gives honest statistics, says that four-fifths of the crime in the United States is chargeable to the rum traffic. Mrs. Comstock, the Quaker missionary says that out of 115,000 prisoners, 105,000 were victims of strong drink. Ninety-nine one hundredths of the children of America kept out of school, the children of drunkards. A statistic was made some time ago, when the evil was not as great as it is now—that the cost of and ruin by rum in the United States annually is twelve hundred millions of dollars.

Oh, they talk about

by which they mean that which escapes the tax of government; but, I tell you, all whiskey is crooked because it makes a man's path crooked and his disposition crooked, and his business crooked, and his fortune crooked, and his example crooked, and his destiny crooked. Crooked whiskey, crooked gin, crooked wine, crooked cognac, crooked schnapps, crooked everything that intoxicates. I am all crooked. We talk against this evil and good is done; but the work will not be done until there is national prohibition.

In Edwards County, Illinois, twenty-seven years ago they resolved they would have no rum in the county, and for twenty-five years, for a quarter of a century, there was but one man sent from that county to the State prison and he committed his crime under intoxication from rum he got in a neighboring county. The county jail for the most part empty. Only two or three paupers in the whole county. Taxes thirty-two per cent less than in the neighboring counties, although the roll of the taxes showed there was more valuable property in that county than in any other county of the State of the same size. Good citizens of America, I do not know how you feel, but I confess that I am tired of paying taxes to fix up the work of these infernal grogshops that are tossing tens of thousands of people into crime and suffering. Out with em from Brooklyn! Out with them from the nited States. I here and now proclaim war for e rest of my life against that abomination. State ohibition. National prohibition.

"Oh," says some one, "if a law of that kind ere passed it could not be executed." Why, it is been executed in parts of Maine, in parts of assachusetts, in parts of Rhode Island, in parts Maryland, in parts of Iowa, in parts of Kansas, id in some of those states throughout and oughout. Give us such a law in these Atlantic ties, and if the authorities did not execute it ve ould do as the "Forty-niners" did in California, id we would form vigilance committees, and we ould make quick work with the offenders. Give uch a law of prohibition in Brooklyn and if the uthorities did not execute it, some Sabbath, anding in this place, I would marshal a battalion strong-armed men, and we would go out, and the name of our homes, and in the name of the ord God Almighty we would shut up all the rogshops in Brooklyn. It can be done and it will e done; but it will not be done until the whole ation wakes up. State prohibition will not ac- omplish it. It must be national prohibition.

uch a party?" I will tell you. In the first place, undreds of thousands of drunkards who, un- ble to endure the temptation, wish that these lurements were taken out of their sight. These oor tempted men cannot run the gauntlet of the ar-rooms and the wine-cellars. From morning til night they cannot get out of the way of these iscinations which are before them, behind them, n either side of them, an all encircling fire of emonic bombardment. For God's sake, give ese men a chance and make it possible for them o walk the whole length of Fulton Street, Atlantic treet, and Broadway, and Lascelle Street, and hestnut Street, and Pennsylvania Avenue, with- ut the inhalation of alcoholic malodors. Let a etition to the Congress of the United States ask- ing for national prohibition be well circulated ough this country, and you will find on that etition the straggling signatures of hands tremu- ous with dissipation which have fought an unsuc- cessful war against these dissipations for a long hile, signatures, if it were necessary, made with ens like those of the Scotch Covenanters, dipped n the blood of their own veins—if that would ake the signature to the petition any more im- ortunate.

That was an exciting scene last Tuesday, when a madman with a sharp compass rushed through he crowd at Broadway and 14th Street, striking ight and left and stabbing men, women, and chil- ren, until the city ambulances were filled with the ounded. It was well done when a stout man rasped the demoniac and threw him to the earth, nd others helped disarm him. But I have to tell ou that there are a thousand armed maniacs of oholism rushing through the streets of all our ities, striking right and left, stabbing many homes o the heart, stabbing the state to the heart, stab- ing the American Union to the heart.

Who will rise up and help the United States overnment to throw the demoniac? Who will ull the wounded out from under the paw and the ooth of the red dragon? Yes, belonging to a reat national prohibition party will be of the United States. I have the names of 123 rominent physicians of New York and Brooklyn ho petition for state and national prohibition, the onfining of alcoholic liquors to medicinal, mechan- cal and artistic purposes, and that petition, which as made some years ago, carried through this ountry would get nine hundred and ninety-nine ut of the thousand of all the doctors. Those gentlemen know the ravages of this red dragon. They have not only gone to bind up the wounds of he sot tumbled into your station-houses, but they ave, in some of the brightest and the most beau- iful and the wealthiest homes of your great cities, one in among masterpiece pictures, and under orgeous canopy, to hold down or help hold down n an embroidered pillow the victims of delirium remens into whose imagination all the jungles of the tropics have seemed to pour their reptiles, and all perdition to have poured its devils. The physi- cians of this country, than whom there is no more self-sacrificing class of men, will all be on the side of prohibition.

Yes, I have to tell you

will be on that side. "Oh," says some one, "that makes no difference, they can't vote." They can and they do. Are you not willing to acknowledge that the wives and the mothers of America are the mightiest power extant? The women carried Iowa and Kansas for state prohibition, and the women will carry the United States for national prohibi- tion. Every man with a wife who is not a fool is affected by her moral sentiment. If a business man want business advice he goes to a business man; but if he want moral advice he asks his wife unless he is resolved on immorality and then he asks no one.

Woman understands the ravages of this dragon. She has seen one of its feet on the nursery, and another foot on the wardrobe, and another foot in the empty bread tray, and the other foot saturated with the tears and blood of a desolated home. Woman knows what rum does by its fiery wake. She understands it. Charles Dickens laughs at the punch bowl, and poets garland the wine cup, and many an impersonator has made audiences roar with mirth at the step of the drunkard; but woman sees but little fun in that dramatization. She looks beyond the footlights of the comedian until she sees the blue, cold, shoeless feet of little children, and the daughter by destitution turned into a life of infamy, and the gash across the wife's temples from the edges of a decanter, and a wild, disheveled man standing midfloor, uttering a halloo that makes the children shriek and the wife drop on her knees, looking toward a God who for ten years has not seemed to care anything for her—that maniac with one fist dashing to pieces the mirror at which his bride once arranged her tresses, while with the other hand he throws the family Bible with the marriage record into the flame, and with cracked lips curses the God who will yet avenge the cause of His children, though His judgments tarry long. There is not much fun in all that for woman. Oh, we shall have in this country a million Deborahs ready to help the Baracs in this conflict, and who will go forth and demand of the United States Government with us, national prohibition.

Yea, my friends, the churches of God, of God will come in solidly on this subject. The world may scoff at Christian people as insignificant. But banded together for any great moral movement they can carry anything at the ballot box or in Congressional assembly. The trouble is they have never yet massed their forces. The rum-drinking professors of religion will go clear over to the devil who owns them now from hat to heel, and the Methodist Church, and the Baptist Church, and the Congregational Church, and the Episcopal Church, and the Presbyterian Church, led on by some Dr. Guthrie, and the Roman Catholic Church led on by some Father Mathew, will come in on this cause, and then the question will be so thoroughly settled and the work will be so thor- oughly done that after you and I are dead and gone, and far on in the future, in a museum in this country, there will be standing on the same shelf the lachrymatory of an ancient tomb and the demi- john of a modern wine cellar, both alike curiosities, and the antiquarian in his lecture will explain to his students how one of them was a receptacle of tears for the dead, and the other was the fountain of tears for the living.

There will arise some man in the Senate of the United States, or the House of Representatives, ordained by the laying on of the hands of the Lord Almighty and by the laying on of the hands of all the righteous people of America, who will demand that the right arm of the American Government be raised to stop this plague, and into his speech he will intone the plaint of hundreds of thousands of little children, and the groan of womanhood reach- ing from ocean to ocean, and from earth to Heaven. While that senator shall stand before the national legislators making his plea, those legislators will see

A VISION OF TWO LAKES

—a lake of tears and a lake of blood, and a vision of two scrolls one scroll like that which Ezekiel saw written within and without with lamentation and mourning and great woe, and the other scroll containing the proclamation of emancipation mightier than the one Abraham Lincoln signed, freeing more slaves from worse bondage, and de- claring that under the swords and the bludgeons and the heels of an indignant American nation shall come down this red dragon which has so long been hooking with the ten horns and reigning with the seven crowns, drawing the third part of the stars of Heaven after it.

Yea, all the patriots in both parties will come forth, the men who are tired of building asylums and penitentiaries and poorhouses, the men who want nothing themselves but who want to have the land saved from drunkenness and crime, and to become a paradise for comfort and prosperity—domestic, social, national. For the church of God, for all patriots—Republican and Democrat and Greenbacker—for all good women as well as all good men, let for the next twenty-five years be, "down with the rum traffic! National prohibition! No quarter for the license system! Eternal smash for the wine bottles! Death to the red dragon!" I take the sword of the Lord and of Gideon, and I thrust the old grizzly monster through and through and through and stamp on the execrable carcase, and I cry with the angel that St. John saw standing in the sun at the time the beast was slain, saying to all the fowls that fly in the midst of Heaven: "Come and gather yourselves together to the sup- per of the great God!"

Sir Garnet Wolseley at Sunday-School was the subject of remark made at the thanksgiving services held in Dublin, on September 21st, at Harold's Cross Church, by the Rev. Dr. Askin, who said that in 1842 Sir Garnet Wolseley, who was then eight or nine years of age and lived with his parents at Garnet Lodge, county Dublin, at- tended the Sunday-school in connection with the church. The attendance roll showed that even at that early age he had formed habits of extra- ordinary punctuality and regularity.

The Arrival in China of the Rev. Griffith John, the eminent missionary, whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of May 25th, is reported. Mr. John, writing from Hankow, says: "Notwithstanding the unpromis- ing nature of the soil in which we attempt to sow the Divine seed in this land, the results are such as to show that our labors are not in vain. My heart was greatly cheered on my return to find that, with few exceptions, the converts had re- mained firm during my absence, and that several valuable accessions had been made to our num- ber. It was a joy also to hear from the brethren of the Wesleyan Mission that the past year was the best they have had since the establishment of the mission in these parts."

The Gospel in Missouri.—The Following In- teresting account of mission operations is sent by a missionary of the American Sunday-School Union who writes from Seymour, in Southern Missouri: "This is a new town on the Kansas City, Spring- field and Memphis Railroad, where, two months ago, was a wilderness, now laid out regularly, and having eight stores. I held the first religious meeting here, and organized a large and promising Sunday-school in an upper room over a store; and we expect soon to have a building for Sunday- school and church uses, and then to have a church organization. This new railroad is open- ing a vast region hitherto overlooked—a new mis- sionary field among a people before secluded. A minister, who has preached here twenty-five years, had never been on a railroad, and asked me if it were safe; God permitting, I shall follow the track as it is laid, and lay foundations of churches in Bible-schools at every station down to Memphis."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Rich Old Man's Difficulty.—At a Meeting in St. Andrew's Hall, Mr. Varley said: "An old rich gentleman sadly remarked to me recently, 'You have no idea, sir, of the difficulty which a man over sixty years of age, who is as rich as I am, has in parting with his money. Strength of body and mind seems to slip from them and their only strong point is the influence of money.' Of course this man simply spoke out his own feelings, and these were not of a noble or generous kind, but we are reminded thereby of the words of Christ, 'How hardly shall they that have riches enter into the kingdom of God.'"

An Inconsolable Rebel.—The Rev. Lachlan McLachlan said: "I was speaking to a Christian lady the other day who was mourning the loss of a friend. I said: 'You must put yourself in the hands of God, and take the comfort which He will give you, then you will have cause to thank Him for the loss you have sustained.' She replied rather coldly, 'I have not yet reached that stage of Christian life.' 'Until you do,' I rejoined, 'as the Bible tells you, you will not have the peace you desire. If you read the thirteenth Psalm you will see that David was inconsolable when he began to write it, but ere he finished, his faith and hope in God enabled him almost involuntarily to lust the bonds of mourning which Satan was winding around him.'"

The Dying Consumptive's Song.—"I Visited another lady who was lying on her bed in the last stage of consumption. The valley of the shadow of death seemed to her a dark dread reality. Her heart was failing, and she could get no light because her eyes were fastened on herself instead of on Christ. I prayed with her and after a short conversation, she turned her eyes from herself to the Light of Life. On my next visit we sang a hymn. When the hymn was finished, she said, 'Oh, if it is so sweet to sing of Jesus here what will it be to sing of Him in Heaven?' 'It will be unspeakable,' I replied. 'Oh but I have got the better of you,' she answered, 'I will be there very soon, but you may have to wait a long time.' This lady has gone through the valley and is already rejoicing in the light of God's presence."

The Bit of Blue.—Mr. Martin S. Grady said, "Many people who are in earnest upon the temperance question, laugh at the adoption and utility of the blue ribbon. I will give evidence of its usefulness. Last night I was standing at the corner of the street when a man came to me, and pointing to my blue ribbon, said, 'Can you tell me where I can join the Blue Ribbon Army?' 'Yes, I can,' I answered. 'Just sign this card, and a visitor will call upon you. 'Are you a Christian?' 'Yes; but I have fallen back owing to the drink. I wish I had a bit of blue ribbon now.' 'That wish will soon be gratified,' I said, and took the ribbon off my own coat and fastened it on his. 'This will be the happiest day my wife has had for some time,' were his parting words. Every Christian should wear the blue ribbon."

A Bottle of Poison in her Pocket.—Mr. Muir, missionary, said: "I have just come from the tent, where William Taylor, of California, told the story of a poor woman who came into the tent two years ago with a bottle of poison in her pocket, and was saved from suicide and from sin by the preaching of Christ. While we were singing the last hymn, I said to him, 'You shouldn't have told that story; the woman may be here, and may feel hurt by this reference to herself. Has she been attending the meeting since then?' 'Yes, regularly, and is now a decent, sober woman,' was Mr. Taylor's answer. Never hear in silence the statement that God cannot save a drunken woman. Two years ago that woman was as bad as a human being can be, yet now, through the grace of Christ, she is clothed and in her right mind."

A Wise Fortune-Teller.—The Rev. James Scott said: "I remember a wise old man who was much consulted by those who wanted to know the future, more especially if they were emigrating to another country. When any one wanted to learn the kind of people they would live with in their future home, he asked, 'What kind of people are your neighbors at present?' If the reply was, 'Very disagreeable, indeed,' then he pretended to consult the cards on the palm of his hand, and told them that they would not have good people as their neighbors; but if the reply was, 'They are good, kind-hearted folk,' then he said, 'You will have kind and pleasant people about you in your new home.' In like manner if you, while here on earth, make your peace with God, and live in His presence, then in the future you will have peace and joy with Him; but if, on the contrary, you live on bad terms with Him here, how do you expect to be better in the future?"

A Poor Woman's Investment.—The Rev. James Scott said: "Some years ago I was visiting in Stockwell Street, and found a poor woman lying on a sick-bed. I sat down beside her, and began to tell her how Jesus, the Son of God, came down to the earth and lived as a working man, and then died for us. She interrupted me with, 'Ah, sir, but that happened eighteen hundred years ago.' Yes, it did, but He lives, interceding with God for us, and He says to us, 'Come unto Me.' I had to leave her then, as she was very weak, so that she could not listen longer. When I called again, she greeted me with, 'Well, sir, I have committed my whole case to Him—my past, my present, and my future. I think He will manage it for me in some way.' I said, 'That is what I did many years ago, but I can say I know He will manage it for me.' Not many days afterward the poor woman also could say 'I know He will do that which He hath promised.' Her soul was saved, and she rejoiced in Christ's salvation."

Two Weeks More of Sin.—Mr. Scott also said: "I spoke to a young man who had come to our evangelistic meetings for years. Many friends had done so already. I really did not know what to say to him, but I asked, 'Are you willing to become a Christian?' 'Of course I am,' he answered; 'have I not been coming to the second meetings for that purpose?' I therefore said to him, 'Don't misunderstand me; I do not ask if you are willing to go to Heaven, but will you, now, when you leave this place, confess Christ in your home, in your workshop, and wherever you go?' He honestly confessed that he was not ready to do that. 'Well,' I inquired, 'when will you be ready—in two years?' 'Oh, not so long as that.' 'In one?' 'In less time than that,' and so on, till he came down to a fortnight. In two weeks he would give up his loved sins and confess Christ before the world; but, no, not then. I never saw him at a meeting again, and there is only too conclusive evidence for fearing that he has sinned away the day of grace and lost his soul."

Small-Pox Detected by Photography.—At the noon-day meeting in Glasgow, on September 13th, Mr. Millar said: "A young lady in Paris went into a photographic studio in apparently perfect health. When the operator examined the negative, he saw the face covered with small spots. He thought that something had gone wrong with the chemicals, but on making another attempt to obtain a clear likeness, the same spots appeared. No one could understand it, as the lady's face was to the eye perfectly pure, and free from the disfiguring spots which appeared on the negative. Although they were not visible to the unaided eye, two days afterward she was laid upon her bed with small-pox. The truthful sun had brought to light defects which the eye failed to detect. So, if we live in the light of God's truth, we shall learn the diseases which sin brings upon us, and thus avoid them, or at least take them to be cured by Christ, the Great Physician, at the living fountain."

How Jim was Cured of his Fun.—At the same meeting Mr. Scott said: "There are many people who make fun of revival meetings, and while some were being held not long ago, at a village, a few young men decided to get a little amusement out of them. As they were on their way, a merchant of the place spoke to them, and after a little conversation, offered the leader of the young men sixpence, if he would read a chapter from the New Testament before his shop door. The offer was accepted, and the 15th chapter of Luke was selected. Standing on the curbstone the reader began, and as he went on his companions who were around him were struck with the similarity of story which he was reading to his own life, and verse after verse was read, one called out, 'W Jim, that's thy case,' another, 'That's thee, Jim' and so on, till Jim broke down entirely, and instead of making fun out of the meetings, he went there to seek the pardon of his Heavenly Father."

A REMARKABLE FAITH CURE.

Three Weeks of Trial.

MISS CARRIE F. JUDD has received the following narrative from Fredonia, N. Y., which she publishes in her excellent work "Triumphs of Faith." It is from J. A. K., a Christian worker who had previously experienced faith healing and who is now engaged in active service.

The first of May I went into a very malarial climate; my system yielded to the change, and the fourth day after my arrival I had three chills, followed by feverish tossings. I realized myself to be very sick, but was confident that He who had before spoken me back to life, when so near death's door, was able to keep that which I had committed to Him, and that this experience would be sanctified to my own good and that of others. The day following the chills was one of weakness and the night as it came on brought great pain and distress to my whole body. The whole night I was in a chill. My mother, who came to my bedside in the early morning, tucked me up with loving care, and left me, with a prayer; I knew that relief would come speedily. I fell asleep and awoke in two hours in a profuse perspiration and feeling quite well. I could not but recall the many efforts which had been made in previous years when similarly afflicted, to produce perspiration and never with the least success. Later in the day, upon lying down, and falling asleep, I again awoke in a perspiration, and thus ended the malarial attack, which ordinarily lasts from three to four weeks.

The following week I went into the country and took a severe cold; at once I had symptoms of THE OLD BRONCHIAL DIFFICULTY of which I was healed February 17th, 1880. I did not feel to doubt the Lord, but the trial seemed very great. I had come home, and oh, how I longed that the healing which I had claimed should be apparent. Steadily "looking unto Jesus" I did every duty that presented itself. One night as soon as I dropped into a doze my lungs would seem to collapse, and I would awake heating the air for relief. "I cried unto the Lord" and the memory of the sweet peace which came to me fills my heart with gratitude as I write.

In two days I was to return to the city of E. and from there go by stage into the country eight miles to attend a meeting of the Women's Foreign Mission Society and deliver an address. My friend said "You cannot go." I replied that the engagement had been made through Divine direction and I could not give it up unless I was confined to my bed. I took the trip, leaning hard on Jesus, feeling restful and trustful in the strong arm which seemed, so surely, my support. The day preceding the evening I was to speak, I could not utter a word without coughing, and the enemy would continually suggest "How then shall you be able to speak in the evening?" But I was enabled to look to the Lord, and believe that what He had given me to do He would give me strength to do; how, it was not possible to understand. The strength which came to me was not from within, for I was perfect weakness. It did not come from remedies, for I did not use anything. "I cried unto the Lord and He heard me, and delivered me."

Through the address of forty minutes there was not the least tendency to a cough, while my voice was natural and at times strong. I did not fail to give God the glory, and I thought the victory had come. I rested very comfortably through the night, but during the ride of eight miles back to the city I coughed incessantly. In the afternoon I again took the train and returned to my home. That night I was not able to get any sleep because of my distressing cough.

The next day was full of work which had accumulated during my three weeks' absence. Any number of letters to answer, sick ones to visit, etc. What should I do? Nurse my cough, take care of myself, or do the duties which were waiting to be done?

SHOULD I REST, OR GO

and minister to those who seemed to need me? The command came to go, and so I went, feeling like one blindfolded and led how and whither they knew not. Now instead of bringing all the pains and aches to the surface of this long trial of my faith, I wish I could make plain the rest and peace I found in trusting where I could not trace Him. He bade me go, and I went, taking up any work that came. In our Faith-meeting it devolved on me to lead the singing. The voice came from the Lord when I opened my mouth. A dear old lady in one of my calls asked me to sing with her as well as pray. I opened my mouth and the Lord sent forth the sound.

Saturday night there was no sleep for me, my cough was so distressing and I felt my prostration more keenly. The morning dawned at last with every weakness upon me I had ever known, and I had been through the whole catalogue. In my weakness Satan came to me and tried to show me it had been presumption to allow this cough to run, and said "now you are where you must rest, and no doubt you will be here for a long time to come." For a little time the Lord seemed to hide His face from me, and the tears would fall, but soon I was permitted to feel that the sympathetic heart of Jesus still beat for me and that the trial of my faith would bring a blessing. I said, "Lord, go with me and I can go through the precious privileges of this holy day."

The first meeting was at ten o'clock, which took me up a long flight of stairs, very hard to climb. Every step I took was one step gained. The meeting in that "upper room" was a very precious one. Then came public service and after that Sunday-school with a young men's Bible class to teach. Every exercise of faith brought strength and I went home full of thankfulness. In the afternoon while in prayer and meditation the complete victory came. My cough left me, every difficulty was removed. I felt strong and well and have been ever since. The lessons were many which I learned through those three weeks of trial. Sweetest of all comes the assurance that what He bids me do He will surely give me grace to perform.

THE ANTE-TRIBULATION REMOVAL.

By Rev. Richard Chester.

A Radical Difference of Opinion—When the Removal of Living Christians will Occur—Grounds for Supposing it will be After the Tribulation—Scriptures Misunderstood—The Elect in the Tribulation—Who they are—A Jewish Remnant—The White-Robed Throng—The Twenty-four Elders—The Nominal Christians in the Tribulation—Misunderstood Motives—Promises of Escape and Preservation.

THAT it is at all events highly probable, if not positively certain, that the removal from the earth of living believers, by their being "caught up together with" the risen "dead in Christ" as set forth in 1 Thess. 4 : 16, 17, will take place before the setting in of "the Great Tribulation," is the well-known belief of many of those students of God's prophetic Word who are at present expecting the Second Advent of our blessed Redeemer.

There are, however, many expectants of this same event who object very strongly to this belief, and who, while admitting the existence of an interval between the two stages of the Advent—the Lord's coming for, and coming with His saints—hold very firmly to a belief that the first of these two stages, and the consequent change and translation of living saints cannot take place until after the Great Tribulation. This IMPORTANT DIFFERENCE OF OPINION, thus dividing into two classes those who are otherwise agreed in looking for the coming of the Lord, is surely well worthy of our serious and impartial consideration. There are some objections entertained against the expectation of any such Ante-tribulation removal which it may be well that we should consider.

The first and most serious of all such objections is undoubtedly the statement, frequently and confidently made, that there are several passages of God's Word which clearly teach that all believers who shall be living at the time, will have to pass through the tribulation, and therefore cannot be removed before it.

This, if it be true, at once decides the question. But is it true? Two of such alleged passages, Rev. 20 : 4-6 and 15 : 2-4, have been already fully considered in the article on Coming Events and the Coming Kingdom in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of July 20th; and it has, I think, been shown that they do not, either of them, establish the point which they have been adduced to prove or, in other words, that they do not disprove the possibility or the probability of the Ante-tribulation translation.

Another passage also confidently appealed to for this purpose, and not previously considered, is the language of our blessed Lord, Matt. 24 : 21, 22, where, speaking of this period of Great Tribulation, he says that, "Except those days should be shortened no flesh shall be saved, but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." Here we are told, and so far truly told, that it is positively affirmed that "the elect" shall be in the tribulation. But we may surely ask to what class, and to how many, of the elect may we regard these words as applying? Not to all the elect most assuredly. They can only refer to some of such who shall be actually living upon the earth at the time, not to any who have been previously removed by death, or who may possibly have been previously removed by translation. And further to what particular body of the elect do those who are thus here spoken of belong?

Do they belong to the body of true believers who constitute the Church of this present dispensation? Or, do they rather belong to and constitute AN ELECT REMNANT OF THE JEWISH PEOPLE? That they belong to the latter, not to the former, seems to me to be evident from the context of the passage. In ver. 16 we read, "Then let them which be in Judea, flee unto the mountains," etc. In vers. 20, 21 we read, "But pray ye that your flight be not in the winter, neither on the Sabbath Day," language which no one can regard as applicable to Gentile members of the Christian Church. But ver. 21 proceeds to assign the reason for the flight, and for the prayer, which are enjoined in the preceding context. "For there shall be great tribulation"—tribulation so great that "except its days should be shortened, no flesh should be saved." And, finally, for the comfort of those for whom the entire passage is specially intended, and who, I submit, are exclusively Jews, not Gentiles, members of an elect Jewish remnant, not of the elect Christian Church, the promise is added—"but for the elect's sake those days shall be shortened." For sure warrant for regarding the term "elect" as in some instances referring to Jews, as distinguished from the Church of this dispensation, we need only refer to Isa. 65 : 9 and 22.

I submit therefore that Matt. 24 : 22 can by no means be regarded as proving that living believers belonging to the Christian Church, must needs pass through the Great Tribulation; or as overthrowing the belief of their removal by translation previous to its commencement. Nor, for the same reasons, can we so regard Matt. 24 : 29-31.

THE WHITE-ROBED THROG.

Another passage no less confidently appealed to for this purpose, and which was only incidentally referred to in the article already named, is Rev. 7 : 9-17. Here, it is said, we find a company "redeemed out of all nations and kindreds, and people, and tongues, standing before the throne and before the Lamb, clothed with white robes and palms in their hands, and who have washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb." Who, it is asked, can these be unless they belong to the present Christian Church? But if so, it is expressly affirmed of these, ver. 14, that "they have come out of the tribulation—the great one" (Greek). Therefore it is concluded that all members of the Christian Church, who shall not have died previous to the commencement of this tribulation must pass through it. But does this multitude represent, or does it include among those whom it represents, the then risen and living members of the Christian Church who are to be translated at the first stage of the Second Advent?

I venture to affirm that it is very far from being certain, or, from being probable, that it represents or includes any of such. Such, as it seems to me, have been clearly shown to be represented by (Rev. 4 : 5).

THE TWENTY-FOUR ELDERS.

But if so, they cannot also be represented by the great multitude of chap. 7, which is not described as either enthroned or crowned, the true and glorious portion of the translated saints, but on the contrary, as "standing before the throne and before the Lamb." Does not this great uncrowned, unenthroned multitude seem rather to represent a large and most blessed "harvest" of saved souls (see Rev. 14 : 15), of which the risen and translated dead and living of the Christian Church shall constitute the "first fruits?"

I cannot, therefore, but regard it as very evident that Rev. 7 : 9-17 does not by any means, or any more than Matt. 24 : 22, overthrow the possibility or the probability of an Ante-tribulation translation. On the other hand, regarding this passage in the light in which I have here endeavored to present it, is it not very blessed and joyful to see a warrant in it for being able to hope that after the rapture foretold in Thess. 4 shall have taken place, and the separation between "the one taken, and the other left" of Matt. 24 : 40, 41, Luke 17 34-37 shall have occurred, there may be many nominal and consequently unwatchful, unready, members of the visible Christian Churches, who shall therefore be among "the left," and nevertheless to awaken and to convert whom the Spirit of God may employ the very fact of some of those nearest and dearest to them having been thus, with to them awful suddenness taken away? Is it not also glorious to look on, and to see warrant in God's blessed Word for believing, that in addition to these there will be very many more from among the nations of the earth who shall be converted to Christ by that solemn and awakening Gospel of intermingled mercy and judgment, which, subsequent to the completion and rapture of the Church—as the connection in which the passage stands seems manifestly to imply—is to be preached "to them that dwell on the earth?" (Rev. 14 : 6, 7.)

All of such we can well regard as having to pass through the Great Tribulation. They form no portion, it would appear, of that portion of the Christian Church, whose distinctive privilege, according to "the exceeding riches of God's grace" it is, as "the Bride, the Lamb's wife," to share with Him immediately in the sovereign, governmental, administrative glory of His kingdom. But yet they shall each and all have their own distinctive places and offices in that wondrous kingdom—in the glory in which each class and individual shall differ only as "star differeth from star!"

THE "GREAT MULTITUDE."

And is it not in exact accordance with the fitness of things, that—while the elect Church, which is to reign with Christ over the kingdom, and which is spoken of as "a little flock," with reference to which and to the gathering of which, in this present dispensation, it is said of the way of life that "few there be that find it," should have its symbolic representation in the twenty-four elders—this far larger body of the subsequently saved should in like manner be represented by the "great multitude which no man could number" of chap. 7 : 9-17 and Habakkuk 2 : 14? Is there not thus a magnificent prospect opened up to us, not of a restricted glory, or a narrow salvation confined to a comparatively small Church alone, but of glory and

and world-embracing, worthy of the great redemption price that has been paid for it in the blood of God's dear Son, and leading us as we meditate upon it to exclaim with the inspired Apostle, "Oh, the depth of the riches both of the wisdom and knowledge of God!" and to sing with the choristers of heaven, "Worthy is the Lamb that was slain!"

READERS should understand that when an article published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD bears the name of the writer, that writer must be held individually responsible for the views therein advanced. The ministers whose sermons appear in this journal, and other contributors, must not be regarded as always endorsing views about which there is a wide divergence of opinion, even among Christians of eminent piety and learning.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Total Amount of Three per cent Bonds issued to date is $259,370,500. The total saving in annual interest by the exchange of the three and a half per cents into three per cents is $1,296,852.50. A few applications for the new bonds have been received since the exchange was suspended, on September 20th, but they will not be considered until after November 1st, and the three per cent bonds thereafter issued will only bear interest from November 1st. A Treasury official has made the prediction that notwithstanding the large appropriations for the River and Harbor Bill and on account of Pensions the current fiscal year will yield a surplus of one hundred millions. He bases his calculations on the revenue receipts of the past three months.

The Result of the Election in Ohio has Given a genuine shock to Republicans throughout the country. The Republican press describes it as little short of a revolution. The present representation of Ohio in the House is fifteen Republicans and five Democrats. Under the new apportionment Ohio is entitled to twenty-one representatives, and according to the reports, as at present made up, thirteen of these in the next House will be Democrats, and eight of them Republicans. Official returns from fifty counties show a net Democratic gain of 35,299, which the thirty-eight counties remaining will probably swell to 40,000. This would give the head of the ticket a plurality of about 16,000. Several causes are assigned for this remarkable change of position. Chief among these is the liquor question. It was evident when the Republican Convention adjourned that the party had gone far enough in the direction of prohibition to alienate the liquor sellers and not far enough to ensure the support of the temperance men. The result was a vigorous campaign on the side of the Democratic ticket by the liquor men, and apathy among the temperance wing of the Republican party. An analysis of the returns shows that the Republican stay-at-homes were unusually numerous this year, of whom some were temperance men, and others Garfield Republicans dissatisfied with the present federal policy. One of the most remarkable features of the election is that General

Keifer should have been one of the Republicans re-elected. There are probably local reasons for this result, but his conduct as Speaker and his subservency to Robeson excited so much comment, that his failure to secure a re-election would not have occasioned surprise in the country. The Prohibitionists express their conviction that the reaction in the State will tend to the advancement of temperance and temperance legislation.

Mr. Cleveland's Letter Accepting the Democratic nomination for Governor of New York was published on Tuesday, October 10th. He expresses cordial approval of the platform adopted by the convention and advocates the adoption of more efficient measures to ensure to the primaries absolutely free and uncontrolled action. On the question of the freedom of the canals which is to be submitted to the people at the election, Mr. Cleveland prudently refrains from committing himself. He denounces in emphatic language the practice of levying assessments and as to the reform of the civil service he says: "Subordinates in public places should be selected and retained for their efficiency, and not because they may be used to accomplish partisan ends. The people have a right to demand here, as in cases of private employment, that their money be paid to those who will render the best service in return, and that the appointment to and tenure of such places should depend upon ability and merit." With respect to the operation of monopolies which is at the present time the most vital question affecting the interests of New York, Mr. Cleveland says: "Corporations are created by the law for certain defined purposes, and are restricted in their operations by specific limitations; acting within their legitimate sphere they should be protected; but when by combination or by the exercise of unwarranted power they oppress the people, the same authority which created should restrain them and protect the rights of the citizen. The law lately passed for the purpose of adjusting the relations between the people and corporations should be executed in good faith, with an honest design to effectuate its objects, and with a due regard for the interests involved."

The Utah Conventions Held last Week Show how bitterly party strife wages there. The Mormons have nominated John F. Caine to fill the vacancy caused by Mr. Cannon's rejection by Congress. Mr. Caine is a monogamist, is the manager of the Church Theatre, is city clerk and auditor, and part owner of the Salt Lake City journal. The Mormon authorities have issued orders to Mormons settled in other states to oppose the re-election of every congressman who voted to declare Cannon's seat vacant, and it is expected that in several cases they are sufficiently numerous to effect their purpose. The Liberal Convention which closed its sessions on October 12th, nominated Phillip T. Vanzile, United States District Attorney for Utah, for Delegate to Congress. The platform adopted arraigns the Mormon Church for making Utah disloyal to the Government, retarding its growth, and setting its people at variance with the people of the United States, and declares there can be no fair and impartial civil Government in Utah while the Mormon Church is permitted to control the law-making power. It repeats the demand of the last Territorial Convention for a Legislative Commission, and indorses Governor Murray and the Edmunds Election Commission. To the latter it tenders its thanks for their judicious conduct of the registration of the voters under great and peculiar difficulties. The Mormons are sanguine of the success of Judge Jere Black in his attempt to upset the Edmunds Bill.

An Appeal for Help from Pensacola, Fla., has been issued. A telegram received in New York from D. S. Brent, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the Board of Health of Pensacola, says: "Reports of our distress are not exaggerated, but fall short of the truth. We need help for present necessities, and are deeply concerned and uneasy at the prospects of the future. The fever is of a more fatal character than heretofore." On Saturday last fifty-eight new cases of yellow fever and two deaths were reported, making the total cases to date 1543 and the total deaths 135. The weather is seasonable and pleasant, but gives no hope of an early frost. A family of Norwegians, utterly unaccustomed, who arrived on Friday were removed to the woods, a few miles away, by the Board of Health. Edwin W. Adams, Chairman of the Maritime Relief Committee of New York, has authorized the Board of Health to draw on him for $1000, collected by the committee. Mayor Grimes, of Columbus, Ga., has $580, contributed by citizens of that city. The citizens of Apalachicola sent $92, and a few minor contributions have been received. A telegram sent to New Orleans says: "Bad as is the progress of the epidemic, and appalling as are the scenes of death and woe resulting therefrom, the extent of the destitution grows daily, and it is very disheartening to those who stand by and listen to the voices of distress or make it their business to investigate such instances of suffering. This condition of affairs is attributable to the fact that the population of the city is largely made up of workingmen, the wages of the majority of whom ceased at the first outbreak of the pestilence." The Young Men's Christian Association has issued the appeal for assistance.

A Vigorous Denunciation of the Republican candidate in Illinois for the office of Superintendent of Public Instruction was made by the Liquor Dealers in their State Convention. They objected to him because of his temperance record. A Chicago journal explains the reason why Mr. Charles T. Stratton, the candidate in question, is a temperance man. Mr. Stratton is, it appears, a man minus both legs, amputated at the knees. When a boy he was driven out of the house on a cold winter's day, and sent for a jug of rum, by a drunken father. On his way home he became lost in the snow and both his legs were frozen off. "Is it strange," asks the Chicago Daily News, "that Mr. Stratton should be a temperance man? The gentleman may be an unsuitable man for the office, but don't, in the name of humanity and common decency, attack him for his temperance record."

The Wreck of the Ocean Steamer, Herder of the Hamburg-American Packet Company's Line is reported. The Herder left New York on the afternoon of Thursday, October 5th, and had fine weather up to Sunday night, when a dense fog set in, and necessary precautions were taken to avoid accidents if possible. Everything went on as usual, and no danger was apprehended until two o'clock the following morning, when the ship suddenly, and before her officers were aware of her proximity to land, ran on the rocks immediately eastward of the head of Long Beach, about three miles west of Cape Race. The passengers and crew were all landed safely at daylight in the eight boats belonging to the ship, and were well cared for by the few families living near the scene of the wreck. Reports have been circulated of drunkenness among the officers and crew, but they have been denied and an official investigation of the charges will take place.

The Year Book of the Young Men's Christian Associations now issued, states that there are in the United States and Canada 779 associations, and 82,375 members. The property owned by these associations is valued at $3,330,000, and their annual expenditures aggregate $500,000. The International and State Committees expended in the work of supervision and caring for the associations in 1881, $43,000. Two hundred and fifty-five persons are employed as general secretaries and agents of local associations, and of the State and International Committees.

An Answer to Prayer was Acknowledged after twenty years at the Fulton Street Prayer-Meeting last week. Two ladies from England who attended the meeting handed to the missionary a letter, which read as follows: "Twenty years ago a lady wrote to you from England to ask your prayers in a terrible affliction, that through that deep sorrow the Lord would bring glory to Himself. She would return thanks for the support she has had given to her through the twenty years past, and she would earnestly ask prayer for three remaining children, that they may be more earnestly drawn to the Lord Jesus and become truly converted Christians."

The Christian Convention which Assembled at Chicago on October 11th, has been numerous attended. Over two hundred clergymen were at each meeting. Among them was Mr. Charles Spurgeon, one of the twin sons of the pastor of the London Metropolitan Tabernacle. Dr. McKay, whose addresses on Prophecy in New York four years ago attracted renewed attention to that important subject, was another distinguished Transatlantic visitor. At the session of October 13th, Mr. Ingersoll, Railroad Secretary of the International Committee of the Young Men's Christian Association, gave an outline of the extent of the association's work. The body comprised in all parts of the world 2671 associations. Bishop McManara, of New York, presented an interesting statement on the independent Catholic movement in this country. In the evening Gospel addresses were delivered by Dr. McKay and Mr. Spurgeon.

A Diamond Among the Coal was found recently by a farmer in New York State. Theulton Times of September 29th, says: "A few days ago a well-known farmer living in the south part of the town of Volney, N. Y., purchased his inter supply of coal in this village and drew it home. A few days after, having occasion to go to his cellar, a bright, glittering object caught his eye among the coal. It flashed and sparkled so brilliantly that he went to it and picked it out and carried it into the sunlight. Satisfied that it was gem of value he preserved it carefully, and it proved to be a valuable diamond." How the diamond came to be in so strange a place is not explained and will probably never be known. It is fact, however, for which we have Divine assurance that in the day when God makes up His jewels many of the brightest gems will be those and in the dark places of the earth and amidst dreary surroundings (Mal. 3: 17).

The Blunder of a Panic-Stricken Man was costing him his life recently. An Irishman in Indian Orchard, near Springfield, Mass., fell into the river and was carried over the dam and impelled to cling to a rock, in imminent peril, for two hours before a rope could be successfully thrown to him. When he finally got hold of it, he was so nearly crazy that he began tying the rope about his neck, and it was with some difficulty that the rescuers on the shore were able to make him understand that he had better fasten the cord lower down on his body. Had the rescuers not closely observed the man's actions they would have caused his death by strangulation while saving him from death by drowning. Some sad cases of backsliding on the part of converts made in seasons of wild religious excitement, suggest the fear that a similar mistake is sometimes made in spiritual matters. The awakened sinner needs Scriptural teaching or his last state may be worse than his first (Luke 11: 24-26).

Bound with Red Hot Iron Rods was the terrible experience of an iron worker at Cleveland, Ohio, on October 6th. The Cleveland Leader says that on that day a worker in the Cleveland Rolling Mills named Battersby, was attending to his duties which involved his standing directly in front of the set of rolls through which the red-hot rods pass with almost lightning rapidity. Sometimes the end of a rod will strike an obstruction and the whole piece of iron will be coiled up at the end of the roller. Such an accident occurred on Friday, and Battersby, being unable to get out of the way, the rod was wound around his legs. The hissing iron soon burned through his clothing and into his flesh. It was some time before the man could be extricated, and when he was at last freed he had been burned in a shocking manner. He was removed to his home, and surgeons were summoned, who decided that both legs must be amputated. We are naturally horrified at such a calamity, but as we move about in our great cities we pass multitudes of men in a worse situation is even worse. The drunkard and the sensualist encircled by the chain of their vices, and the victims of the hideous, hateful morphine habit, the number of which is now being recruited rapidly from the most refined and intellectual strata of society, are morally in worse plight and in greater danger for them, especially for the morphine users, can only be purchased by excruciating suffering. For such men our sympathies should be ever active and we always ready to point them to the way of escape God has provided (Matt. 1: 21).

A Worm-Eaten Church is Said to be Standing at Andover, Mass. A local journal says: "Within the last four years boring insects have attacked the timber of which this church is built. Their work was first noticed by reason of the little piles of dust they left upon the carpet near the wall. It has gone on until much of the woodwork of walls and pews is riddled with holes. In some places the shell which the borers have left is hardly thicker than paper. The church people are afraid that what is left of their church will some day tumble on them. It is believed that in this country no other instance is known of such a devouring of church property." It must not, however, be supposed that no instance exists of an evil of which this may serve as a type. There are churches in this and other countries the life and spirituality of which have been undermined by the worms of pride, worldliness, avarice and false doctrine, until all strength and vitality have perished (Rev. 3: 16-18).

The Bite of a Tarantula Caused some Alarm last week to a family in New York. Louis Gurado, an Italian fruit-vendor, who keeps a stand at Second Avenue and Fourth Street, was bitten on October 7th, by a tarantula, and was nearly frightened to death. He was in the act of cutting a banana from a bunch on his stand, when the insect, which was evidently hidden on the stalk of the bunch, stung him on the right thumb. Gurado struck at the insect and killed it. Soon after he felt a sharp pain in his thumb, began to feel dizzy and uncomfortable, and in a few minutes fell on the pavement like a man under the influence of liquor. His hand and arm swelled to an unnatural size, and the swelling increased and communicated to his face and neck. His wife, who was with him at the stand, became alarmed and cried out that her husband was dying. An ambulance was summoned, and Gurado was sent to Bellevue Hospital. When he arrived at the hospital the man was examined and a preparation was applied to the wounded thumb, which relieved the pain and reduced the inflammation. The next morning having fully recovered, he was allowed to go to his home. The venomous creature secreted among the fruit reminds us of Satan's favorite ambush. It is among the pleasant things of this world that his presence may be suspected, and when we are enjoying what are called the good things of life it is most necessary to be on our guard (Eccles. 11: 9).

An Absent-Minded Bridegroom Resides in Augusta, Me. Until his marriage, a few weeks ago, he had resided in the house owned by his father in one of the suburbs of the city; but when that important event in his life occurred, he leased a house and commenced his married life in another locality not far away. One evening recently, after completing his day's work, he left the office, went up street and purchased his evening paper, and then climbed the hill to his father's house. Entering its familiar precincts he marched to the washroom, made his toilet, and then presented himself at the table. The family, who had been watching his operations, eyed him with amazement, and at last his mother softly inquired, "My son, have you procured a divorce thus early in your wedded career?" A deep flush suffused the young man's face, and he gasped, "I forgot all about being married." Leaving the table amid a roar of laughter the young man hurried out and walked hastily home where his young wife was impatiently awaiting his coming. The lady probably was not easily appeased, for her husband's absent-mindedness showed that she had not been so prominently in his thoughts as young wives expect to be, and the slight would have to be atoned for. A lapse of this kind is very unusual, but it is alas, a too common occurrence to see those who have forsaken their old associations in the world and pledged their souls to the Saviour, return to their former place and remain there without a blush (2 Peter 2: 19-22).

BOCHIM; OR, THE WEEPERS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And it came to pass, when the angel of the Lord spake these words unto all the children of Israel, that the people lifted up their voice, and wept. And they called the name of that place Bochim: and they sacrificed there unto the Lord."—Judges 2: 4, 5.

LET me give an outline of the chapter, that we may put the text into its proper setting.

God had brought His people out of Egypt, and divided Jordan that they might march through dryshod into the land which He had promised to their fathers. He charged them to drive out the Canaanites, a race that had become so loathsome in God's sight that He decreed their destruction, and appointed the tribes of Israel to be their executioners. It was for the good of the universal world that this pest-house should be broken up, and that the filthy races should be destroyed; and God gave His people that charge to carry out.

Those who quarrel with this arrangement should remember that this is not the only instance of aboriginal tribes being driven out by a superior race. Our Anglo-Saxon nation drove out the original inhabitants of this island, who survived only in the mountains of Wales and Cornwall, and in the highlands of Scotland. It certainly will not be wise on our part as Anglo-Saxons to condemn Israel for doing under divine command what our forefathers did for their own aggrandizement. Alas, in more modern times lands have been seized and nations extirpated by the white man without divine warrant or reasonable excuse. We do not justify all this; but if any complain of Israel for obeying the sentence of God, let them first raise their voices against the driving out of ancient races by colonists of our own race.

The order to slay the Canaanites had a second object, namely, that Israel might dwell alone in the land, and might keep themselves to themselves—the great

NONCONFORMIST OF THE UNIVERSE

—separated from all the rest of mankind both by residence and by manners, not following the customs of the nations round about them, or falling into their sins. That they might be sanctified they were to be separated. "The people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations."

Now, mark and note right well that it is an evil thing, under any pretext whatever, to depart in any degree from the commandment of the Most High God. Whatsoever may be the law which God gives, either to the whole race or to His chosen, they will find their safety in keeping close to it. But Israel forgot this. Soldiering was hard work—storming cities and warring with men who attacked them with chariots of iron was heroic service. All this required strong faith and untiring perseverance, and in these virtues the Israelites were greatly deficient; and so, in certain places, they said to the Canaanites, "Let us be neighbors: let us dwell together." They thought, perhaps, that they had abundant reason for this easy mode of ending the dispute; for those who would correct infallible wisdom have usually a great deal to say for themselves.

Certain persons thought in those days that the religious notion of God's requirements was too severe, that He was, after all, a mass of mercy, and that the best thing that they could do was to be kindly tolerant of these Canaanites and make the best terms they could with them. They said that perhaps, after all, it was a pity to be so old-fashioned and so rigid in carrying out the divine order, and it would be better to learn something of the civilization of the Canaanites, something of their arts and sciences, something of their theory of religion; for men ought to have liberal views, and believe that there is latent truth in all forms of worship. At any rate, it could do no harm to study their archæology, and go to their temples, and see the gods they worshipped, and get a general acquaintance with the advanced thought of the period; for the Canaanites were a greatly advanced people, they were the advanced thinkers of the period. They had thought out he-gods and she-gods, Baal and Ashtoroth, and their lesser deities were many; they were, in fact,

They did live with them, and fell into their ways. Tolerance led to imitation, and Israel became as vile as the heathen whom the Lord had condemned, and the Israelites became a mixed race, in whose veins there flowed a measure of Canaanite blood. Yes; if you depart from God's word by a hair's breadth you know not where you will end. It needs but a little to degrade the Christian into a Ritualist, and still less to turn the Ritualist into a Romanist. We shall go far if we once start on the downhill road. I would to God that in these degenerate times we had back again somewhat of the stern spirit of the Cameronians and the Covenanters; for now men play fast and loose with God, and think that anything they please to do will satisfy the Most High. The offer and the refuse will suffice for sacrifice for Him; but as to strict obedience to His word, they can by no means abide it. Mischief will surely come of this lax state of things to the churches of this day as surely as affliction came to Israel of old.

But then comes in a truth which, though it may seem black in the telling, is bright in the essence of it. God did not leave His people without chastisement. Had He let them alone, to be given up to their idols, their case would have been hopeless. For mercy's sake they must be punished for their transgression; but this was a gracious punishment, that they might not lie and wallow in their transgression and become altogether like the swinish nations that surrounded them. God began to punish them by their own sin. He suffered the Canaanitish nations to grow strong, so that they grievously oppressed Israel. He put the Israelites under the yoke of those nations which they ought to have utterly destroyed. If they would not be conquerors they should be conquered. If they would not lead captivity captive they should be led captives themselves. The Lord laid His blows upon them thick and heavy.

But, before He did this, He sent a messenger to rebuke them. It is ever to give space for repentance ere He executes vengeance. The axes which were carried before the Roman magistrates by the lictors were bound up in bundles of rods. It is said that when a prisoner was before the magistrate the lictor began to untie the rods, and with these the culprit was beaten: meanwhile the judge looked in the prisoner's face and heard his defence, and if he saw reason for averting the capital sentence, because of the repentance which the offender expressed, then he only smote him with the rod, but the axe remained unused. But if, when every rod was taken off, the culprit was still hardened, and the crime was a capital one and clearly proven, then the axe was used; and used all the more sternly because space had been given for penitence, and the rods had been used in vain. When the rod is despised the axe is ready. It is certainly so with God; He waiteth to be gracious, but when patience cannot hope for penitence then justice takes her turn, and her stroke is terrible.

The Lord on this occasion commissioned to rebuke these people, for He sent an angel. I leave it to your own judgments to discover who this angel was, if it be discoverable. It may have been an ordinary angel, but I think it must have been the angel of the Lord. He is so styled in the fourth verse, and, beside, he uses language which an ordinary angel could not have used. He begins, "I made you to go up out of Egypt." Note, he does not say that the Lord said this or that, but the angel himself says it—"I made you to go up out of Egypt, and have brought you unto the land which I swear unto your fathers." Who could this have been, then, but that covenant angel who, on other occasions, appeared to holy men, and who on this occasion preached a sermon to the assembled multitude at Shiloh?

He began first by telling them what mercies they had received. Read the chapter. "I made you to go up out of Egypt, and have brought you unto the land which I swear unto your fathers." Brethren, this subject should most readily lead us to repentance, that God should have dealt so well with us should make us grieve that we have behaved so ill to Him. Do I address a backsliding child of God? I do not think that any exercise is more likely to benefit your heart than to remember what God did for you in years gone by.

Then the angel passed on to mention the mercies guaranteed to them: "I said, I will never break my covenant with you." Oh, that is a blessed theme. If indeed you are a believer in the Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord has pledged Himself to make you perfect and to bring you home to Himself with exceeding great joy. You shall not perish. Christ has said, "I give unto My sheep eternal life; and they shall never perish, neither shall any man pluck them out of My hand. My Father, which gave them Me, is greater than all; and no man is able to pluck them out of My Father's hand." The angel pleads this longsuffering, eternally-enduring love, and pleads it well. I know of no two greater arguments than mercy received and mercy promised. Let us not sin against these. May the Holy Spirit hold us fast with these cords of love.

And then the angel came to close grips with them, and he said, "Ye shall make no league with the inhabitants of this land; ye shall throw down their altars; but ye have not obeyed my voice: why have ye done this?" He came to their sin, he put his finger on their failure, their omission and their commission. The angel expostulated in most chosen words, saying, "Why have ye done this?" Why have ye turned away from God? Backslider, are you here to-night? Have you gone aside from church fellowship and left the profession of religion? Why have you done this? Can you mention a reason which will hear the light? We know you cannot. There is no sense in sin, no justification for iniquity. Ungodliness is madness.

IRRELIGION IS IRRATIONAL.

Then the angel completed his discourse by declaring to them that further chastisements would surely follow. He was not sent to preach the Gospel, and therefore mercy is not his theme. He was sent to preach the law, and he did preach it. Listen to the judgment which he denounces: "Wherefore I also said, I will not drive them out from before you; but they shall be as thorns in your sides, and their gods shall be your ruin," so some read the passage. It was a just but terrible threatening that he thus thundered in their ears. Notice it. They were to be punished by their own sin. The Lord as good as said, "You would not drive them out, and now I will not drive them out. Your negligence and time-serving shall come home to you, and place thorns in your suffering flesh. Your omission shall sting you where you will feel it. You have sowed thistles, and thorns shall stuff your pillows."

What a sermon that was! As I have said, there was a great occasion, a great congregation, a great preacher, a great sermon, and, as far as one could see on the spot, a great movement produced. Now I want you to notice what looks like and we shall talk of it under two heads. The people, when they heard this solemn discourse, lifted up their voice and wept, yet they continued as they were. How hopeful! How disappointing!

I. First, how

HOPEFUL.

One could not desire anything better apparently than this. They were all attentive hearers.

There was not one that looked about him, or that forgot the pointed words that were spoken. The all seemed to open wide their ears, and take in the divine admonition. There they stood before the Lord, all of them amazed and confounded, while the angel delivered his solemn message, and then returned to Him that sent him. It is a great thing to win people's attention, and it is not every one that can do it; for there are congregations that act as if the word had nought to do with them, leaving the poor preacher to prophesy to dead walls. These Israelites took the warning and drank in the truth. They were attentive hearers, and anybody would have said, "Blessed be God, that sermon has done a great work. Blessed be God for such an attentive congregation: the nails are fastened in a sure place."

Moreover, they were

for they felt what they heard. What would you think to-night if the congregation should suddenly cry out? "They lifted up their voice and wept"—wept aloud. I have no doubt that many who were there at that time were right with God and said, "What a wonderful opportunity! Glory be to God for such a revival!" That one sermon has stirred the people through and through. Thank God that He has sent such a messenger with so fitting a message, and blessed it so, for certainly these people are all converted, otherwise they would not cry out and weep." They were all turned into weepers, and they called the name of that place Bochim, or the place of weepers. You would think, "Surely this is full of promise, every eye is filled with tears as they stand before God." Alas! that such drops did not precede a shower of grace, but passed away as the morning cloud.

Ay, and they all became professing hearers; for as soon as ever that service was over they held another, and "They sacrificed unto Jehovah." They avowed themselves to be Jehovah's servants, and they took the sacrifice which He had appointed and offered it for their sin, and outwardly they all of them became ardent worshippers of the Most High, and true penitents.

Well, dear friends, all this looks very hopeful, because it is what we may expect when God presses home the law upon the consciences of men. When sin is laid before a man, should he not weep? Hope glitters in every tear. Oh, that men were sane enough to weep for their transgressions! I wonder that some of you can read your Bibles with dry eyes. Unsaved, and rejecting the Saviour, can you read the four evangelists without weeping? That Saviour whom the Jews crucified you reject, and so, in fact, you crucify Him too.

Oftentimes this deep emotion does come with true conversion—often, though not always, as I shall have to show you. Men convinced of sin may well weep. I have seen a strong man weep under a sense of his guilt—weep as though the fountains of his eyes would be exhausted, and the eyes themselves would turn to coals of fire. Frequently people are unable to restrain themselves, and wish to break out even in the midst of the congregation, and cry to God for mercy. It is not wonderful. It is what we should expect. It is not undesirable, for it is an effect which frequently accompanies real conversion to God. It may well go with sorrow for sin, and sorrow for sin is essential to eternal life.

Repentance is an old-fashioned doctrine, which in these days has been despised; but, if I stand alone, I will hear testimony for it. They say that repentance is nothing at all, that it is merely, according to the Greek, a change of mind. That shows what a little Greek they know. A little of such knowledge is a dangerous thing. A pity that they do not learn more. Repentance is a change of mind; but do you say that it is only a change of mind? That is a pretty big "only." A change of mind, a radical change of mind, from the love of sin to the love of holiness, is that a small affair? It is always attended with sorrow and regret for past sin; and, if there is a man here who thinks that he will get to Heaven by a dry-eyed faith, he will be mistaken. He that never mourned for sin has never rejoiced in the Lord. So this place Bochim looks extremely hopeful, does it not?

II. Now let me turn to the other side, and show you that there was nothing permanently good in Bochim's sudden water-floods. These people were made weepers through hearing the angel's sermon, but their weeping was

VERY DISAPPOINTING;

I half suspect that their tears and lamentations were produced as much by the preacher's person as by anything else. It was the angel of the Lord, and who would not be moved at his presence? God gifts certain speakers with the power of moving the natural feelings, and that gift abundantly rested upon the covenant messenger. Some men so preach that it were almost impossible to remain unsoftened. There is a pathos about them, or there is an earnestness so intense, so manifest, that for the heart of the hearer to be touched is a natural consequence. But be sure of this, that which comes to you from a man will come to an end before long. A temporary cause cannot produce an everlasting change. "Ye must be born again," not of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but by the Spirit of God.

Again, I am afraid that the repentance of these people had a great deal to do with their natural softness. They were tender and excitable because there was little grit in their nature, their manliness was of a degenerate type. They feared to go to battle for God; they dreaded the noise and the slaughter. They were moreover easily moved by their fellow men, and took shape from those who lived near them; they went to worship Baal because their neighbors said, "Come and worship Baal." And they worshipped Ashtaroth because their friends said, "Come, let us reverence the goddess." They were malleable, pliable, ductile. We have numbers around us of that kind. What shall I call them—creatures of india-rubber? They go to be shaped even by your finger, like clay upon the potter's wheel, not yet hardened in the fire. No one knows what their shape will be when they leave the wheel. Some have been here for many years, and have often been moved and moulded by the preacher, and yet they are not saved, while stout-hearted rebels have stood in the aisles with half a sneer, and God has brought the hammer down upon their flinty hearts, and broken them to pieces, and now they are saved by mighty grace, and rejoice in the Lord. Some have a natural tenderness which hinders the attainment of spiritual softness.

Now, mark you, that which is natural may be used of God toward that which is spiritual, but still it is not in itself spiritual. All that readiness to cry, all that readiness to receive the word with joy, and to leap at once into faith may be just nothing but mental weakness. Some men weep profusely because they have been drunkards, and that gives them a drop in their eye; this is a miserable business. I like the strong man who cries within, and is chary of the visible rain-shower. I know really tender-hearted men who could not shed a tear for their lives, but feel a far deeper anguish than those whose griefs are shallow and watery.

It is very beautiful to talk of the tears streaming down their faces, but many converts have never shed a tear, and perhaps never will; but this does not prove that they are not converted; far from it; the tear is but a natural drop of moisture, and soon evaporates; the better thing is the inward torrent of grief within the soul, which leaves an indelible mark within. You know how we sang just now—

"Tears, though flowing like a river,
Never can one sin efface;
Jesus' tears would not avail thee,
Blood alone can meet thy case;
Fly to Jesus!
Life is found in his embrace."

One grain of faith is better than a gallon of tears. A drop of genuine repentance is more precious than a torrent of weeping.

There is another thing about the weeping of these people, and that is, that it was caused a great deal by threatnings of punishment. I am afraid that they did not weep because they sinned, but that they wept because God said that He would not drive out any more Canaanites. Ay, and you may preach the fires of hell till men are willing to abandon darling lusts of the more glaring sort. To such we would put searching questions. Is there any holy salt in your tears? Is it sin that you weep for? Is it sin that you repent of? Every murderer repents at the gallows, they say; that is, he repents of being hanged, but he does not repent of having killed others. He might do the same thing again if he had the opportunity. We ought clearly to discern between the natural terrors that come of vivid descriptions of the wrath to come and that real spiritual touch of God the Holy Ghost which breaks and melts the heart and then casts it into another mould. These people were deceived as to the depth and sincerity of their own feelings. Their feeling was but as a meteor's blaze, shedding strong but momentary day.

"What sadder scenes can angels view Than self-deceiving tears?"

They give you hope, a hope untrue,
Then deepen all your fears."

We are quite sure that these people, though they wept, were none the better for that, because, if they had been, they would have cried "come, brethren,

GET YOUR SWORDS.

Let us go and fight these Hivites and Hittites, and cast down their altars, and sweep away their images and groves." No, they kept their idle swords in their scabbards, and made treaties with the condemned races. In addition, they very likely confessed and deplored their own laxity, and went the length of saying, "It is very grievous that we should be so obstinate. It is really a dreadful thing." I heard one say, "It is an awful thing to be a slave to the winecup; I wish that I had never tasted it. The first opportunity I get I will turn over a new leaf." He did not say what the new leaf would be, but he was going to do any quantity of reforming work. Alas! he never did anything at all, for he was drunk again the next day. A beautiful penitent to look upon; but a wretched hypocrite in due time. If you repent of sin, down with sin! In God's name, down with sin! When repentance is hearty it is practical.

Next, these people had not repented, for they did not bring their children up rightly. The next generation, it is said, knew not the Lord, neither the mighty works of the Lord. That was because their parents did not teach them. Not that parents can teach children so that they know the Lord in their hearts; but God has so put it, "Train up a child in the way he should go; and when he is old, he will not depart from it." That is the great general rule of God's moral government. If parents make known the things of God to their children it cannot be said that the children do not know the works of God. If parents teach with affectionate earnestness, their children learn at least the letter of the truth. I do not believe in your repentance for sin if you tolerate your child's living in it.

I know that these people did not repent aright, because they went from bad to worse. They went from weeping before God to worshipping Baal, like some I have heard of who are found crying in the house of God on Sunday night, and are laughing at the theatre on Monday night. O base hypocrites!

PENITENTS—AT A DANCE!

Broken-hearted sinners on Sunday, crying "Lord, have mercy upon us, miserable sinners," and whole-hearted drunkards before the week is up, yelling "We won't go home till morning." Look at the miserable sinners, see what they are at. Are these your weepers? These your men of tender conscience? Their Bochim is all a lie—a mere pretence. The more tender you are, if afterward you harden yourselves, so much the greater will be your guilt; and, if you humble yourselves before God in mere appearance, so much the more terrible will be your doom if that humbleness departs, and you go back to the sin from which you professed to turn.

I know that these people were not penitents, because God did not take away the chastisement. The punishment which He threatened He brought upon them; he gave them over to the spoilers and sold them to their enemies. But where there is a heartly repentance of sin, God will never lay punishment on a man. He will forgive him and receive him to His bosom and restore him.

To sum up in a word all that I have said, salvation lies not in feeling, but in believing; salvation lies not in weeping, but in trusting in Christ. Repentance is not to be measured by outward manifestations of sorrow. The prophet saith, "Rend your heart, and not your garments." Let your hearts be rent away from sin, and from everything that leads to sin; and then shall you weep acceptably before God.

The Lord bless this word to those it is meant for. I do not know who they are, but He does; and may He send His blessing by His Holy Spirit. Amen.

Lost Money Traced and Recovered by Prayer.

At the Fulton street prayer meeting last Thursday, a friend returned thanks for prayer answered in reference to some money which was missing. His son went to Texas a year ago, and some weeks since sent his savings for a year to his father to pay for money borrowed when he went to Texas. But the money did not come to hand as it ought to have done, and with some anxiety about it the father of the young man asked prayer at the meeting, and a few days afterward came to announce that it had been traced and is perfectly safe, and the grateful father expressed his gratitude.

An Amputation Necessitated by the Smoking Habit.—A rather unusual case of poisoning by nicotine is remarked upon by the Paris medical journals. The victim, a man in the prime of life, had been cleaning his pipe with a clasp knife, and with this he accidentally cut one of his fingers subsequently; the wound, however, being of a trivial nature, no attention was paid to it. But, five or six hours later, the cut finger grew painful and became much swollen, the inflammation rapidly spreading to the arm and shoulder, and giving such intense pain to the patient as to cause him to take his bed. Medical assistance was called and the ordinary remedies proved ineffectual. The sick man, questioned as to the manner in which he cut himself, explained the use to which his pocket knife had been applied, adding that he had omitted to wipe it after cleaning the pipe. The case was now understood, and, it becoming alarming, removal to the hospital followed; there the doctors decided amputation of the arm to be the only hope of saving the patient's life, and this was immediately done.

A Heroine of the Sepoy Mutiny in India in 1857. Mrs. Harriet Campbell, has recently died at Southgate, near London. She was the wife of Captain J. Douglas Campbell, R.E. During the early days of the Mutiny, Mrs. Campbell was the leader of a large number of the fugitives from Morar, Gwalior, where disaffection was rife and the escape of the ladies and children from the cowardly fiends in human shape, who were outraging and murdering all the ladies they could find, was in a great measure due to her energy, resolution and courage. When the terrified and weary band of which she was the leader gave up hope after walking for days and nights with hardly a morsel to eat, under a burning sun, while yet a great distance from Agra, and expecting every moment to be massacred by the hostile villagers, this heroine's spirit and resources did not fail her. She managed to get a short note conveyed to her husband. It contained only a few words, detailing their fearful plight and situation, which having no pen or ink with them were pricked with a pin on a scrap of paper. Captain Campbell, in spite of great dangers and difficulties, succeeded in obtaining and bringing out native carts and an escort, by which means they were able to reach Agra in safety.

The Late Dr. Pusey.

EDWARD BOUVERIE PUSEY, D.D.

DR. PUSEY'S name has been a prominent one in the Christian world for nearly half a century. Though he did not originate the movement in the Episcopal Church that we know by the name of Puseyism, he was so prominent in the ranks of its advocates, and was so ready with tongue and pen to engage in the conflict in defence of its doctrines and practices, that his name was appropriately given to the movement.

Edward Bouverie Pusey was born in 1800. He was allied by birth to several noble families in the British peerage, and when he selected the church as a profession his brilliant talents and his profound scholarship led to his being placed in a position of high honor and responsibility. He was made Regius Professor of Hebrew in the University of Oxford, and Canon of Christ Church. He thus occupied a position in which he might exercise a potent influence over the minds of young men who were being trained for the Christian ministry in the Episcopal Church.

It was in 1833 that Dr. Pusey's teaching first excited public concern. In that year the well-known "Tracts for the Times" were issued, and Dr. Pusey became identified with those who through them preached doctrines previously held in abhorrence by the Protestant Church. The sermons which Dr. Pusey preached before congregations chiefly composed of the undergraduates in the university, increased the feeling of alarm first aroused by the "Tracts for the Times." In those sermons, and notably in one of them entitled "The Holy Eucharist a Comfort for the Penitent," Dr. Pusey taught the doctrine of Transubstantiation or the real presence of Christ in the emblems of the Lord's Supper, and advocated the practice of confession. The theory that men by virtue of their ministerial office became priests, and had the power to forgive sins and absolve the penitent after confession, was one naturally attractive to the embryo clergymen, and the movement grew rapidly in numbers and power. John Henry Newman, who was one of the leaders was a man deeply loved in the university, and attracted to the movement many promising young men. Ultimately, he withdrew from the Church and entered the Church of Rome in which he is now a cardinal. Dr. Pusey, unlike his friend, remained in the Church of England, and endeavored to bring the doctrines of that Church into closer accord with those of Rome.

That the Ritualists of our day are followers of Dr. Pusey, even they would not claim. While holding the doctrines Dr. Pusey held, they have devoted a closer attention to details of ritual than he ever approved. He was concerned with the substance, the kernel; they were concerned with the shell, the mere externals which symbolized their creed. He endeavored, though not with much success, to restrain their excesses in dress and ceremony while emphasizing the doctrines those excesses typified. But while he thus sought to control his admirers he was ever ready to defend them from the onslaughts of their opponents, and in doing so he has often been misunderstood by people who imagined that he approved of practices which he really believed to be injudicious if not positively wrong. The current to which he gave impetus has flowed into channels Dr. Pusey was indisposed to enter, and it would not be too much to say that it has become more shallow as it proceeded. The fundamental doctrines of salvation by faith in the Saviour, and of the indispensable necessity of the New Birth, have been kept in abeyance while the virtue of the sacraments and the observance of ceremonies and the ritual have been held up conspicuously. Thus, the religion taught has become a mere formalism, a thing of externals altogether apart from the conception of Dr. Pusey. It is, however, a result which has come naturally and inevitably from his teaching.

Dr. Pusey, in spite of his advanced age, was to the last very active in his duties, and the sight of him passing to and fro in the precincts of the university wearing the skull cap which he invariably kept on his head, was one very familiar to Oxford men down to the present year. Only two weeks before he died he was actively engaged in preparing in his vacation the Hebrew lectures of the October term, to be ready for a new course in special relation to the regulations of the Board of Theological Studies. He was seized with an attack of nervous prostration, such as he had several times had before, in each case with imminent danger, but such as he had recovered from, after periods of long exhaustion. He had been enfeebled by several other severe illnesses, by bronchitis, by pleurisy, and failure of the heart, in the last few years. He failed to rally and expired on September 16th. The premier, Mr. Gladstone, who was his intimate friend, was one of the pallbearers at his funeral.

Widely diverse estimates are formed of Dr. Pusey's intellectual standing. A writer in the London Daily Telegraph says: "Those who are best acquainted with the deceased divine never attributed to him any great logical powers; on the contrary, his thoughts seem often to have followed each other in an order which it was difficult for anybody but himself to understand. Even in his sermons Dr. Pusey attracted large congregations to St. Mary's, Oxford, rather by the mere force of his own personality than because any powerful rhetoric or convincing chain of reasoning was anticipated."

Dr. Pusey's literary labors have been chiefly controversial. His published sermons are numerous; but his chief and most valuable work is his "Commentary on the Minor Prophets." He was also joint editor of the "Library of the Fathers."

MR. CHARLES W. SAWYER.The Gospel Temperance Evangelist.

CHARLES W. SAWYER, whose portrait appears on this page, was born at Gloucester, Mass., on September 2d, 1838. His father was an officer in the United States naval service, and his mother was a devout Christian woman. Mr. Sawyer had a good common school education, and at the age of seventeen entered the warehouse of Messrs. Jordan, Marsh & Co., of Boston, where he remained several years, afterward entering the employment of Messrs. H. B. Claflin & Co., the well-known dry goods house in New York, as salesman.

DELIVERANCE FROM THE DRUNKARD'S DOOM.

Mr. Sawyer early fell under the terrible power of the intoxicating cup, and he gradually sank into its thralldom until after a few years his case was pronounced thoroughly hopeless. On November 27th, 1872, after a protracted drinking bout, and while still under the influence of liquor, he strayed into a lawyer's office in Poughkeepsie, and seating himself in one of the chairs, fell into a heavy sleep. Five hours later he became conscious of his position and arose to retire, but a word of kind admonition arrested him. "No, I don't want to be talked to," he said, "it is too late. I must drink. I want a drink now." Another encouraging word from the lawyer, met with only the despairing answer, "I must drink!"

Placing his hand kindly upon the shoulder of the unfortunate man, the lawyer urged: "A good supper will be better for you; here's a dollar to get it with." Such unlooked for treatment brought tears of penitence to eyes unused to weep, and from an open Bible the faithful lawyer proceeded to read the story of Him who came to seek and save the lost.

"So simple, only to bathe in Jordan," and he bathed; as that Christian lawyer has since often and gladly said, "bathed seven times and was cleansed—cleansed from unbelief, cleansed from drinking, cleansed from gambling, cleansed from smoking, cleansed from chewing, cleansed from Sabbath-breaking, cleansed from every evil way."

WORK WITH MR. MOODY.

About a year after his conversion to Christ, Mr. Sawyer accepted an appointment as manager of a temperance journal, which position he abandoned at the suggestion of Mr. Moody, with whom, during the meetings at the Hippodrome, he began his work as an evangelist, in which, during the last few years, he has been engaged, laboring in Chicago, Boston, and other cities, as well as on the other side of the Atlantic.

Since his reclamation he has been laboring as he has been led by the will of God as manifested to him, believing that God's hand led him even in his saddest days, allowing him to go down into the depths, that he might be the better prepared for the work of rescuing those who are perishing.

HOW GOD LED HIM TO BOSTON.

On one occasion, in Chicago, where an encouraging and attractive field was opened before him, which offered comfort, rest, and a home, he received an urgent call to Boston. Boston had been his early home. In Boston from a position of usefulness and responsibility he had fallen, and upon a respected name had brought disgrace. Boston had been the scene of his darkest days. In Boston he was shunned and despised; and his whole nature shrank from the effort. But a more urgent call came, and quickly upon that another "Come." Kneeling down, he asked God to give him a sign from His Word of the course to pursue; then rising, he opened his Bible and read thus:

"Thou, therefore, gird up thy loins, and arise, and speak unto them all that I command thee; be not dismayed at their faces, lest I confound thee before them. For behold I have made thee this day a defenced city, and an iron pillar, and brazen walls against the whole land, against the kings of Judah, against the princes thereof, against the priest, and against the people of the land. And they shall fight against thee, but they shall not prevail against thee; for I am with thee, said the Lord, to deliver thee."

And so he went, and the Lord blessed him there.

HIS WORK AT THE COOPER INSTITUTE, NEW YORK.

For the past three years, and until invited by Mr. Moody to go to Scotland, and follow up the temperance work which had been inaugurated in Glasgow, Mr. Sawyer beside active work in connection with the Young Men's Christian Association, has conducted evangelistic, temperance, and philanthropic meetings in the hall of the Cooper Institute, New York, and hundreds have been led to Christ, from among the most degraded and hopeless sections of fallen humanity, through his loving, brotherly labors.

Mr. Sawyer recently went to Great Britain at the request of Mr. Moody, whom he followed through the cities of Scotland. As Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey left one place to go to another, Mr. Sawyer took up the work and continued the meetings seeking to render permanent and carry to practical results the enthusiasm Mr. Moody and Mr. Sankey had aroused. His efforts have been productive, according to the reports in the British Christian press of the best results, a temperance crusade has been organized in all the towns of Scotland in which Mr. Moody has labored, and many will have cause to rejoice in the beneficent consequences of Mr. Sawyer's genial ministrations. The work in Cooper Union still continues. Meetings are held there for the promotion of Gospel temperance every Sunday evening, and on Tuesday and Friday evenings similar meetings are held in a hall close by on Fourth Avenue. The expenses of both places being defrayed by voluntary contributions.

JOHN DIGBY, THE BURGLAR.

JOHN DIGBY lay in his cell awaiting his trial for burglary. A Christian lady, Mrs. Fairholme, who for several years had regularly visited the prisoners, sought an interview one afternoon with John, but in response to her inquiry, "May I speak with you?" she received only the answer, uttered in sullen tones, "I can't speak with any one." "But I will be your friend, if you will let me," urged the lady, and moved by her evident sympathy, the prisoner in a few moments rose to give her welcome.

At once Mrs. Fairholme asked him his name. "Name?" he replied, "Oh, how I wish I had no name! Oh, I wish I had no one to grieve for me—no wife, or child, or aged mother! What disgrace I have brought upon them all! I wish I had died before I was brought here!" "My poor friend, there was no need of your coming here," said the lady. "I know it—I know it," replied John Digby; "but I was led on from bad to worse; and now I shall be convicted as a felon, and never be trusted, or looked up to, or respected again. Oh, I wish I might die!"

The Burglar's Interview with His Mother.

The sight of his strained and bloodshot eyes, and brow corrugated with wrinkles, was very pitiful, but he seemed to ask the question, "What shall I do?" "Repent, and look to Christ for salvation!" answered the visitor solemnly; "Remember the promise of God, 'Though your sins be as scarlet, they shall be as white as snow,' and then she asked him to join her in prayer, and kneeling down on the stone floor she pleaded for the repentant man at her side. She left him soon afterward solemnized and thoughtful.

A day or two afterward Mrs. Fairholme again visited the jail, and once more went to the burglar's cell. In the course of conversation, the lady asked him, "Does your wife or mother know of this?" His answer was given with a look of such anguish as the human face but seldom assumes. He said, "My wife and child are far away in the country, they do not know of it yet; as for my mother, I fear it will break her heart."

Mrs. Fairholme had not left the prisoner long, and he was absorbed in most painful meditations, when the key was heard to turn in the lock of the great door, and the voice of the jailer was heard giving the order, "Evans, show her Number Fifteen." The man started up, and he wildly cried out, "Who is it? Tell me—tell me who is it? I can see no one; I will not see any one," and he flung himself face downward upon the bed.

Just then there appeared at the grating a gentle, careworn face, bathed in tears. It was that of a woman more than sixty years of age. "Where is he?" she asked, in a voice of deep distress. The form on the bed shook from head to foot; and as the voice again said, "My son! John!" he sobbed as if his heart would break. Mrs. Fairholme, with true Christian sagacity, had been the means of this meeting between the aged mother and her criminal son.

When the mother was admitted to the cell she bent over her prostrate son with that tenderness only a mother can feel. As the sobs shook his frame she sat quietly by his side her hand stroking his head with a caressing motion, while down her aged cheeks the tears stole silently.

It was long before John was sufficiently composed to speak, but his convulsive grasp of his mother's hand showed how deeply he was moved by her presence. At length he rose and moving to the ledge which served as a seat, hesitated beside his mother. "Now, John," she said "tell me all about it." With his hand clasped in that of his mother, John told his story. It was the old tale of evil companions, love of liquor, loss of employment, and consequent poverty. Then in an evil hour under due temptation the breaking into a store and his capture. As he told the shameful story, John Digby eagerly watched the face before him, but he saw there no sign of anger, nothing but pity and sorrow. At its conclusion the old lady folded him in her arms and kissed him. It was the token of a mother's forgiveness.

Soon afterward she left the prison promising to return in a day or two. They were busy days in which she went from place to place pleading for her son. She induced others to intercede for him, too, with the result that on his pleading "guilty" at his trial he escaped with a light sentence. Mrs. Fairholme, too, was constant in her ministrations and had the satisfaction of seeing all the old sullenness depart from the prisoner, and in its place arise a genuine faith in which joy over sin forgiven was tempered by sorrow for the past. At the expiration of his sentence, John Digby commenced a new life with brighter hopes because they were based not on his own strength, but on the strength of Him who is mighty to save.

ONLY A TRAMP.

The Tramp Accepts an Offer.

"BLESS me, Mr. Mayor, to see you!" exclaimed Farmer Jenkins in a tone of great relief; but contenting himself with a brief nod by way of acknowledgment of the greeting for the present, "Mr. Mayor" came forward, addressing himself to the ragged man in his shirt-sleeves:

"Loose your grip of that scoundrel," he said in a tone of irritable remonstrance; "how can you go on sully your fingers with contact with a thing so despicable?"

A gleam of gladness came into the young giant's face, and a thankful light into his eyes, as he asked eagerly, "Ah! do you then believe that I am myself anything better?"

"I should have believed it anyhow, once I got a good look at you," was the calmly-confident answer; "but as it happens there is no need for faith in the present case, for I saw the whole affair."

The delight of hope that he had been trusted for himself faded out of the vagrant's face at these words, but it gave way to a very satisfactory one of regained tranquillity, and he instantly flung his captive free with a final shake, while Farmer Jenkins hastily dismissed his people to their several duties; and taking upon himself the task of guardian to his cousin, just relinquished by another, and asking Mr. Barnes and the stranger to follow him, he led the way into his house, to hear the tale of unprovoked crime in private.

"Only to think," he exclaimed in just indignation when all had been told—"Only to think, Joe, of you serving me such a mean trick after all I've done for you!"

"Cheated me out of my father's property by way of generosity!" came the savagely-sullen answer.

"Done nothing of the sort, false witness, and you know it," was the angry reply. "The bit of money your father left me would never have been left to you any more than any of the rest was, and you know it; and one way or the other I've given you the worth of more than ever I got under the will, and you know that too. And one thing more you know, that I would have made it straight over to you, but that I knew it would all find its way in a month into the ale-house."

"And if you'd given it me shouldn't I have had a right to do as I would with it?" came the surly retort.

"No," said the farmer sternly; "not a bit of right in my way of looking at things, seeing as after it was gone you'd have come upon me again to keep you, or else disgraced my poor mother by letting the neighbors see her brother's son in the workhouse."

The hardened drunkard gave a spiteful chuckle. "And now she'll have the disgrace instead of seeing her brother's son in prison, if she's polite enough to call upon him."

The poor farmer shrank from that reminder as if he had been struck; but Mr. Barnes stepped to his side, and laid his hand kindly on his shoulder.

"Jenkins, there is indeed, let me assure you, far less shame for your family in that, than in having him perpetually hanging about the neighborhood, a blot on your fame. It's I, not you, who shall bring this charge against him, and I shall be more gratified than I can tell you to have such an opportunity of giving him yet a chance of gaining time to think and, it may be, to repent, on this side of the grave. In prison he cannot drink himself heart drunk and conscience drunk from one year's end to the other, with never a chance of a minute's perfect soberness to reflect where his crimes must land him."

"Such a mean, cowardly thing to try and destroy another fellow at the outset of his efforts to raise himself from the slough!" exclaimed Mr. Barnes, pulling himself up in his rapid tramp up and down the vicarage lawn.

"What have you done with my Mr. Tramp?" asked Enid coming in at the moment. "Has he gone off to prison as well as Joe Robins?"

"To prison indeed! What's my silly bird thinking of? What should he go to prison for? to look after that rogue?"

"No, papa. But if he isn't gone to prison, why has he not come here with you?"

"Because he's an impracticable ass!" burst out the mayor angrily. Poor man, there was some excuse for him. He had got very over-heated and tired, and agitated by the morning's events. But his young daughter understood his mood very well. She got up from her pleasant seat beneath the roses, and coming out to where her father stood in the hot sunlight and scorching August heat, she slipped her little hand silently into her father's arm, and with the other gently stroked his sleeve. At last she asked gently:

"What's that tiresome Mr. Tramp been doing to worry my dear old dad?"

"Tiresome Mr. Tramp" indeed, murmured the mayor, bending to kiss his child's fair forehead, "run back into the shade, lassie, and I'll go my way into the vicar's library and wait there for his return, that I may get a word with him before lunch."

"And meantime forty winks?" queried Miss Enid mischievously, as she withdrew her hand and ran back to the arbor, with its roof of sweet-scented pink blossoms.

But in spite of the drowsy weather the mayor felt no inclination whatever for the indulgence at which his young daughter had hinted. The up-and-down march, wild-beast fashion, in which he had been indulging on the lawn, was continued for a few minutes up and down the carpet when he entered the library.

The mayor of Southford was one of those men with whom the affairs of life generally go smoothly by sheer force of their firm, strong wills; a desire for things reasonable and worthy of desire, and steady, resolute efforts to attain them. But the members of this race of men, without whom the world would be but a downhill, dawdling sort of place, have one failing, it must be confessed, very especially belonging to themselves; they are apt to turn restive when hitches occur in quite unexpected, out-of-the-way directions, in the machinery they have set in motion. A very minute hitch of this kind had occurred now in the mayor's plans, and he was very much put out. He had come out on a charitable errand, toward the end of a week that happened to be a very important one in his business, and his plan had been to accomplish his errand with high-handed good-nature.

That kind and pleasant matter successfully arranged, then he had purposed to eat a hurried lunch, and get back for a long afternoon in his warehouse, to wind up with a couple of hours in the counting-house, to repair the loss of the morning to his own pressing affairs. That had been his programme, and now it was thrown out by coming in contact with a resolution as firm as his own.

The mayor had got Farmer Jenkins to send one of his men after the tramp to bring him back, saying he wished to speak to him; but the tramp had returned the answer, "he was very sorry he could not come; he would walk over in the evening if the mayor wished to question him on any points of evidence, but he could not come then, as he owed his time till six o'clock to his employer, and had already been away too long."

If the man would not come to the mayor, the mayor might have gone to the man, after Mahomet's alternative, but unfortunately he felt too hot and tired to undertake another expedition. A hitch had occurred, and the mayor returned to the vicarage grumbling that his daughter's preserver was an impracticable ass.

Once heard a clergyman say, in the course of his sermon, that trials were sent to us for a purpose, and that our heavenly Father was far too merciful to remove them until they had effected their purpose, and we had had time granted us to learn to say, "Thy will be done."

Thus it was now with the mayor of Southford. Constant success in everything he undertook, even in his good endeavors to aid those about him, was beginning to have just the first tiny tendency toward an unconscious, but soul-destroying self-assertion.

"My power and the might of my hand have gotten me this wealth," was the half-felt but unacknowledged boast beginning to grow in the heart of the prosperous and genial-tempered man. There was not a man, woman, or child living within a radius of four miles of Southford who would not have eagerly run to do his bidding at any time, whosoever else's work had stood still the while; and more still, there was not an employer of labor of any kind, who would have wondered or complained that it was so; and the mayor had begun to accept this state of things as a matter of course, and a due tribute to his many fine qualities.

He needed a reminder, and he received it. A poor, ragged, half-starved, miserable tramp wandered into his neighborhood, and he determined to go to some trouble to do good things for him. And, behold, the beggarly tramp sent a message to the wealthy, autocratic, generous-hearted mayor of Southford, to say that he must wait his leisure. That was the first check he had ever had since the time of his wealth set in.

The trial had done its work. An earnest prayer was scarcely breathed when a sound outside made him drop his hands hastily, and immediately after Mr. Copleston pushed wider open his library window, and entered through it from the garden, accompanied by another man, who kept too much in the background for the mayor to recognize him before the vicar exclaimed, with a laugh:

"Ah, Mayor, then your saucy little maiden was right. I would not believe her when she declared that I should find you taking a nap."

Mr. Barnes rose and came forward. "I have, at any rate, been usurping your chair," he said with a slight, grave smile.

"And writing my sermon ready for me to preach next Sunday, I hope?"

"Preaching one to myself instead," was the low answer, and then he broke off, catching sight of the stranger for the first time, and looking so surprised that Mr. Copleston said, in a tone of equal surprise:

"Why, Mayor, have you seen our friend here before?"

"To be sure I have, an hour ago, at Farmer Jenkins's, and wanted to see him again, and he would not come."

"Oh! Then you were the gentleman he said had sent for him, to speak to him about some evidence against an incendiary?"

"Nothing of the sort," said Mr. Barnes. "I was the gentleman who sent for him truly enough, but not to speak about evidence for or against anybody. My whole object with him was to speak about himself, and he wouldn't come; and, to make a clean breast of the matter, I confess I felt in a towering rage with him for a bit; but I've got the better of that now, and can say that his refusal to waste his employer's time at the bidding of anybody under the sun is the best testimony to his straightforward honesty he could have given, and I shall be only too glad if I can requite your many kindnesses to me, Vicar, by getting the transfer of such faithful services from you to myself."

Mr. Copleston laughed as he answered, "Ah! well, I will bear you no grudge. My own man comes back to-morrow, and then I shall no longer be able to find work for this good fellow."

"I am sorry," said the tramp quickly—

"And I am equally glad," said the mayor, as quickly; "for I am afraid that if Mr. Copleston could have made the smallest feint of wishing to keep you I might have whistled long enough before I should have won you away. You saved my only child's life yesterday, and—"

"I beg your pardon," interrupted the man, "you are good to say so, but—"

"But," interrupted Mr. Barnes in his turn, "I do say so, and my daughter says so, and Vicar here will tell you that it is neither right nor polite to contradict a lady. She told me one or two things about you that gave me my first notion that there were capabilities in you for being something better than the tramp you call yourself, and I have seen something of you for myself to-day which has turned that notion into a certainty. If, therefore, you will enter my factory, say so; if not, of course you are a free man in a free country; but you will give me more pain than has been inflicted upon me for many a long year past."

"And prove yourself a very foolish fellow into the bargain," said Mr. Copleston, more impulsively than he generally permitted himself to speak. But there was such a look of doubtfulness on the man's face, such a hesitation in making any reply to the generously trustful offer, that a well-wisher might indeed feel it was time to put in a warning word to urge him against the neglect of his own greatest opportunity. The tramp turned to the clergyman deprecatingly:

"It has such a mean look, sir; don't you see that yourself? to take advantage of an offer made like this, on the spur of the moment, in a sudden fit of gratitude for a service that any man would have rendered, and which a frightened young girl has magnified into something heroic!"

Mr. Copleston was about to answer this appeal with some impatience, but the mayor answered it instead:

"Look here, you young fellow!" he exclaimed, "I should like to have had just such a big, broad-shouldered, clear-voiced fellow as you for my son; but I can tell you this, if you had been I expect you'd have come in for a few good raps over the head with my walking-stick now and again, to cure you of some of the fancy you seem to have got in it for fine-drawn argumentation. There's nothing in the world so bad as a turn that way for spoiling time and temper. I make you a fair offer I'll give you a fair month's wage for a fair month's work, take it or leave it alone, only stand up like a man, and look me in the face boldly, as you did that rogue and Farmer Jenkins, and tell me up and down, with no more beating about the bush, will you or won't you? Now, yes or no? and have done with it."

"Yes, then, since you wish it; and I thank God, who has delivered me in my sorest time of tribulation. It is not that I do not know and appreciate the value of your offer that I have wavered in accepting it."

"No, no; no, no; I know, I understand," said Mr. Barnes. "But tell me now, how came you to be here after all? for I don't understand that matter, now I come to think of it, unless you repented of the message you sent me, as to not wasting your master's time, as soon as the messenger had left you."

"I am afraid Florry would say that you are a very bad guesser," said Mr. Copleston, smiling. "When my work was done, I walked round to my apple-trees, with the double purpose of seeing how they were getting on, and of hearing if you and my new gardener had come to any agreement. Lo and behold, I learn that, as far as he knows, you have never met at all! Of course I walked him straight off here to ensure the interview, if possible, myself."

"And you have my hearty thanks for doing so," said his friend. "And so now, to make a finish of the matter at once, Mr. What's-your-name—I suppose you have another name than that you gave my daughter?"

"Charles Wynn."

"Well, then, Charles Wynn, you will be so good as to make your first appearance at my works next Monday morning. But I shall expect you to go into residence in one of my row of bachelor cottages to-night. You'll be under no obligation to me for the two nights' lodging before you begin work. I always give the cottage rent free for the first week, instead of paying to have it cleaned down for a new tenant. If he's a handy fellow, he can do the work himself; and if he isn't, I don't care to have him in my employ; and I believe that is all there is to be said at present."

JESUS BETRAYED AND TAKEN.

S. S. Lesson for October 29. Mark 14: 43-54. Golden Text Ver. 47; Luke 22: 48. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Eternal Now—The Bitterness of a Friend's Treachery—The Void in the Heart of Judas—The Chord in Worldly Sympathy—Betrayals in Our Day—The Kiss of Treachery—The Betrayal Consummated—Priestly Indifference—Peter's Impulsive Blow—Men Swept Away by a Current—Who Fight Against God—The Flight of the Disciples—The Lesson of Instability.

"THE Son of man is betrayed into the hands of sinners," such were some of the concluding words of last Sunday's subjects, and such is one of our olden texts for to-day. Jesus did not say, "The son of man is going to be betrayed;" He spoke of that which He knew must come, as being already present. With God all is now; past and future are nothing to Him, He is an eternal Now. Jesus had said, "Rise up, let us go; lo, he that betrayeth me is at hand." And immediately, while He yet spoke, cometh Judas, one of the twelve, and with him a great multitude with swords and staves, from the chief priests and the scribes and the elders."

it simply one whom He had healed, but one who had healed others in the name of Jesus; not one only who had heard His Word, but one who had so preached it to others; one of the inner circle, the chosen twelve, whom He had ordained to "be with Him" (Mark 3: 14). Like David's complaint of Ahitophel which was probably prophetic, our beloved Lord might have cried, "For it is not an enemy that reproached Me; then I could have borne it" (Ps. 55: 12-14). Or like the prophet Zechariah, when the question is asked of a prophet, "What are these wounds in thine hands?" Then he shall answer, "Those with which I was wounded in the house of my friends" (Ech. 13: 6). Oh, if we were sure that only unconverted people are the real enemies of Jesus, theaviest part of our life's sorrow would be done away, but He is wounded in the house of His friends, His foes are "they of His own household." When we hear of, when we see, faith in Christ joined to a spirit which is of the earth, then our precious Lord is betrayed, wounded, wronged in the house of His friends.

And he that betrayed Him had given them a token, saying, Whomsoever I shall kiss, that same is He; take Him, and lead Him away safely. And as soon as he was come, he goeth straightway to Him, and saith, Master, Master; and kissed Him." And Jesus received that kiss, and felt no enmity to the traitor who gave it Him; there was no mark of indignation in His words, "Friend, wherefore art thou come?" (Matt. 27: 50), nor yet in His question, "Judas betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" How indignant are men of the world, when any one presumes upon some acquaintance with them, and makes use of their names to gain his own ends! how it exasperates them! Yet here was Judas making use of his acquaintance with Jesus in order to betray Him into the hands of His enemies! Oh, that we better understood how closely we are bound up with our Lord, how every profession of love to Him, is a challenge to the world to see in us what there is in Him. The enemies of Christ could plainly see that silver was worth more than his Lord in the eyes of Judas; they saw that this wonderful Man who went about doing good had, in any case left a void unfilled in the heart of the betrayer; they found that they had something in Judas, there was a chord which they could touch, he was not impregnable.

When we see men of position, talent, and some measure of wealth, giving up all to enter the Salvation Army where none of the gifts and testimonials which the worldly church so loves are allowed; where God and souls are in the foreground, and man in the background, and renouncing all but the bare necessities of life—when we see the Moravian missionaries going with their lives in their hands to parts of the world where other missionaries are afraid to face the dangers—we have proof positive that there is enough in Jesus to fill a heart completely, where the meanness of self has been conquered, and cast out by Him. We cannot measure how much of our hearts, homes, time, money, family, etc., we will give to Jesus, if He has not all, He has nothing to any purpose; He wants a people whom He can count upon, and if we are not that, we may betray Him any time with a kiss.

Surely the outward devotion, the genuflections and external reverence, the repeated services of our Romanistic and Ritualistic brethren, while the world too often is in their hearts, and in many cases real and known sin is hidden beneath, surely this is too like the kiss and the betrayal of Judas. But again the pride of right doctrine combined with an incomprehensible indifference as to the salvation of other men's souls, which we find among many of our evangelical brethren, is not this again like the kiss of Judas? Oh, how God desires "truth in the inward parts," Oh, how His holiness demands from us that we should also be single-eyed and holy.

BETRAYAL WAS CONSUMMATED,

"They laid their hands on Him and took Him," and from that hour it became history that Judas Iscariot had betrayed his Lord, and that which was done could not be undone. And yet we have no ground for thinking there was conscious enmity to Jesus in the heart of Judas. The eleven had not understood more than Judas himself did, that Jesus should really suffer, die, and be raised again. The unhappy man probably counted on the exercise of the power of Jesus on His own behalf, in extricating Himself from His enemies, as He had previously done at Nazareth (Luke 4: 28-30). And when a few hours later, He had been condemned by the high priest, bound and sent to Pontius Pilate, the governor, "then Judas, which had betrayed Him, when he saw that He was condemned, repented himself, and brought again the thirty pieces of silver to the chief priests and elders" (Matt. 27: 3). He would willingly have drawn back from his bargain, but it was now too late,

THE DIE WAS CAST.

Like Esau, "he found no place of repentance" (Heb. 12: 17). What was the silver worth now that his awful mistake was discovered? he loathed the very sight of it; but he had played with the love of money too long, and he must retain it; he might throw down that now hated silver in the temple, but he did not cease to be the owner of it; he it was who had been the agent in the traffic. "I have sinned," he said, but neither hope nor sympathy was found by the sinner in those priests, who took part with him against Jesus, he had betrayed "the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world," and no other means of taking away his sin could be found.

Poor lost Judas. "I have sinned," he cried, "in that I have betrayed the innocent blood." Oh, that he had said so at the passover feast, but now it was too late, men, aye priests, who were doing the work of the arch enemy, said,

"WHAT IS THAT TO US?"

See thou to that." Oh, how horrible! Men whose outward profession was that of leading sinners to reconciliation with their God, whose hands were daily laid on the head of the victim imputing the sin to him, when a real cry of agony from a really convicted sinner reached their ear, showed their true colors, "What is that to us? See thou to that." This is the true state of the case with every minister of the Gospel who is not really engaged in leading souls to Christ. And the betrayer? Unable to bear the awful weight of remorse which pressed upon him, he cast down the silver, "departed, and went and hanged himself" (Matt. 27: 2-6). Yes, but his responsibility follows him. In hell as well as upon earth, Judas is the Lord's betrayer.

"And one of them which stood by (Simon Peter, John 18: 10), drew a sword, and smote a servant of the high priest, and cut off his ear." Peter had yet to learn that are not carnal" (2 Cor. 10: 4). Jesus neither needed nor would accept such defence. But most tenderly and lovingly he repaired the fault of His ardent, forward disciple. He said, "Suffer ye thus far. And He touched his ear and healed him" (Luke 22: 51). Could it be possible that they would persist in their enmity against One, who healed the very enemy who helped to seize Him? Yes, so mad was their rage, so blind their hatred! When men give themselves over to a popular current, they do not stop to consider the justice of their cause.

It was just at this juncture that our beloved Lord said "unto the chief priests, and captains of the temple, and the elders which were come to Him (Luke 22: 52), Are ye come out as against a thief with swords and with staves to take Me? I was daily with you in the temple, teaching, and ye took Me not: but the Scriptures must be fulfilled" (Luke 22: 53, "this is your hour and the power of darkness"). Up in arms against their best Friend! But

ARE THEY ALONE?

Is not every unsaved sinner in the same case although he knows it not? All sin and all unbelief is taking up arms against our God. But they might have spared their pains, it was settled in the court of Heaven that their Lord should fall into the hands of wicked men, and unknown to themselves they were fulfilling the very Word of Him whom they sought to slay. Oh, how puny men are when fighting against God! Oh, how honored when used as His instruments!

It was just now that the disciples "all forsook Him and fled." It would seem as though they were laid hold of by the multitude; for one of them in his eagerness to escape, left his garment in the hands of the persecutors, and not one remained with Jesus; "I have trodden the winepress alone; and of the people there was none with Me" (Isa. 63: 3). Judas had chosen money before his Lord, the rest of the disciples esteemed themselves above Him, not one stood true. But they were learning the great lesson of their own instability, they were finding out that they could not rely upon themselves. But there was a difference between them and Judas; early in his career, there must have been evil in his heart, which was not brought to light, and a maintenance of his position with his Lord notwithstanding; a full year before, Jesus had said of him, Have not I chosen you twelve and one of you is a devil (John 6: 70, 71). What a lesson to us all of the danger of letting uncleansed sin remain within us!

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Arabi Pacha has been Arraigned Before the Committee appointed by the Khédive to conduct his trial. The formal examination was arranged to take place on Monday, October 16th. Eight other generals will be tried with him. The indictment against the rebel chiefs contains three counts. First, instigating massacres; second, directing the burning of Alexandria, and third, abusing the flag of truce. When the rebel prisoners were delivered to the Egyptian authorities the English insisted that they be allowed legal assistance, and Mr. Wilfrid Blunt who has defended Arabi in the English press, retained a prominent member of the British bar to conduct the defence. The Egyptians contended that their promise did not bind them to permit the engagement of foreign counsel, and an appeal was made to the British Foreign Office, which has instructed the Hon. Mark Francis Napier, a young English barrister to defend him. Arabi Pacha believes that his life is in danger, and he points out that there have been certain incidents which might demoralize the Circassians guarding him. One of the Khédive's palace officials has been heard to say that he would like to administer to Arabi a cup of bad coffee, and the Khédive has remarked that he and Arabi could not live in the same country.

The Subject of the Future Government of Egypt is under consideration in the cabinets of Europe. It appears improbable that the Anglo-French control will be resumed. Sultan Pacha, President of the Egyptian Chamber of Notables, who was interviewed with the view of obtaining an expression of Egyptian preferences expresses the opinion that Turkish intervention in Egypt would mean anarchy. He spoke favorably of the control, but maintains that its cost was extravagant, and that $2,000,000 might be saved annually by the substitution of efficient native for foreign officials. He admits that the mass of the population is unfit for a representative government. The République Française, an influential French journal, refuses to believe that Lord Granville, the British Foreign Minister, will set aside the Egyptian control without consulting France. A disposition, however, has been manifested on the part of England to concentrate in her own hands the power over Egyptian policy, and the Khédive who is aware that he owes his throne to English intervention is disposed to show his gratitude by relying on England and ignoring France, who he considers was jointly responsible with England for his difficulty from which she refused to aid in rescuing him.

The Chilian Occupation of Peru Appears to be drifting into a military despotism. One of the Chilian journals states that martial law will shortly be proclaimed in all parts of Peru and Bolivia occupied by Chilian forces. Any opposition offered to the occupation will be punished by the instant execution of the opposers. Members of the Montoneros, or guerrilla forces, will be shot when captured. Ministers of the Calderon government, members of the Chorillos congress, delegates of the provisional government of Montero, or any persons who have held office under that government during the Chilian occupation, are to be sent to the Chilian penal colony on the Straits of Magellan. All Chilian civil employes are to be replaced by military, and custom house, telegraph and postal employes retained only on a strictly military basis. A Chilian force numbering 15,000 men is to be put under arms, and the Chilian national guard mobilized with an increase of pay.

Two Speeches made by Members of Mr Glad-stone's administration during the past week are accepted as indications of the Egyptian policy of the English Government. Mr. Leonard H. Courtney, one of the joint Secretaries of the Treasury, speaking at Torpoint said, Egypt must eventually become independent of foreign control. The cost of the war should be defrayed by Egypt, but it was only just that the bondholders would have to forego something. It was not for them that England undertook the war. It would be necessary to consult the Powers in regard to a resettlement. Mr. Courtney concluded by saying that the policy of the government was to detach Egypt from the Sultan, to look after the Suez Canal and to allow the Egyptians "to stew in their own juice," and in so acting warn the Khédive that his future position depended upon his management of affairs. The second speech was that of Lord Northbrook, First Lord of the Admiralty, who speaking on October 12th, in Liverpool, said that there no doubt was a feeling of sympathy among Mohammedans with the Egyptian insurrection, but the Indian Mohammedans knew that the Queen had made no distinction between her subjects, and that the government had no desire to annex or govern Egypt. The Great Powers were satisfied that England had no other object than to prevent anarchy and the closing of the canal, whether in peace or war.

A Threat to Murder the Prince of Wales has been made by a man who is apparently a crank. The cable reports state that a commercial traveller named Brookshaw has been committed for trial in the Bow Street Police Court for threatening to murder the Prince of Wales unless he received money from him. The threat was made in a letter to Colonel Teedale, equerry to the Prince. The prisoner said he served several years in the United States Army.

The Programme of the Irish National Con-ference which is summoned to meet in Dublin on October 24th, is thus described by the Irish correspondent of the New York Herald: The main business to come before the Conference will be the proposition to found a new national organization, probably under the title of the Irish National League. The Conference will be invited to select an organizing committee to settle the details of the new organization. The committee will be empowered to summon a regularly-elected convention, which will choose an executive to whose guidance the affairs of the League will be intrusted. A statement of the balance of the Land League Fund now on hand will be submitted to the Conference, and a detailed account of the expenditure will be made to the new executive for audit. It is believed that the principal object of the Irish League will be the prosecution of a vigorous agitation for the amendment of the Land act as a preliminary to the abolition of landlordism by purchase. Proposals will also be advocated for the purchase of poor, rack-rented estates for the benefit of tenants. The claims of laborers to better dwellings and allotments will be incorporated in the programme. Other points of the programme are the payment of members of Parliament, the extension of the franchise and the establishment of a system of elective county governments. It is understood that at the conference a deputation from the Home Rule League will announce the dissolution of that body and the resignation of its functions into the hands of the new Irish League, of which national self-government will be the basis.

An American College has been Established in China by the Rev. Y. J. Allen for the purpose of giving Chinese youths a thorough literary and scientific training. The number of applicants for admission already exceeds the number that can be accommodated. The scheme has received the powerful support of Li Hang Chang, the Chinese reforming viceroy, and it is hoped that the new college will gradually bring about a change in the Chinese educational system, despite the opposition of the Chinese reactionary party. This party, composed of the literati and the large majority of the officials, are doing their best to close the college and to bring about the expulsion of American missionaries from China. A decree to this effect would certainly be obtained from the empress regent, who entertains a violent hatred of Europeans and Americans, if Li Hang Chang were compelled to resign office.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey's Services at Newport, in Wales, appear to have been of a very interesting character. One of the Christian workers who attended them, says: "The meeting for non-church and chapel-goers was a most remarkable one. The great majority were men with such different faces to those we had been gazing upon for the past week. Mr. Moody spoke, and Mr. Sankey sung, as to souls in terrible darkness. Men buried their faces in their hands; women wept; and one was conscious of an uneasy shiftiness in those present, as if they would like to escape if they could but see a way. We watched the people as they went out, and truly the sight was astonishing. One woman, known to be living in sin, whom the constables present believed had not entered a chapel for years, was seen walking quietly away. 'Why, there goes old —, the biggest rascal in the town. He's been there,' we heard another say. Men in their working clothes loafers at the street corners and about wharves the very 'flotsam' of Newport heard the simple Gospel. The anxious ones were invited to remain. Many responded, and of these twenty-one stood up as being under conviction of sin. Mr. Moody prayed and talked with them, and it is believed many decided for Christ. In the afternoon Mr. Moody addressed an immense gathering of women when some sixty were in soul anxiety."

The Re-Opening of the Argyll Rooms in London was sanctioned by the authorities on Friday, October 13th. The place is a notorious resort for immoral persons of both sexes. It has been closed for two years in deference to public opinion. After a severe struggle the proprietors have induced the magistrates again to grant a license for the building, and to the sorrow of Christian people it will be opened for dancing as before.

A Canon's Narrow Escape from Drowning is reported in an English journal. It appears that two weeks ago Canon Liddell of Durham, fell overboard from a London and Aberdeen steamer while she was passing the Firth of Forth, and though the engines were stopped and a boat was lowered, no trace of him could at first be found. He had been given up entirely, and the boat was being hauled in, when his cries were heard a few hundred yards to the stern of the ship. The boat being again lowered, he was finally rescued after he had been more than a half-hour in the water. During that period of suspense the Canon's wife had been among the excited passengers who were witnessing the painful scene from the deck.

An Earl Donning the Blue Ribbon. At temperance meeting held at Southampton, England, the Earl of Litchfield stated that, having been a "total abstainer" for twelve months, he would now join the Blue Ribbon Army, and he was forthwith decorated with the badge of that association by Canon Basil Wilberforce.

Christian Work is Being Prosecuted in plague-stricken district of Burmah. A railroad is being cut there in which work a large number of Englishmen are engaged. Miss Ingalls, says: "A number of the men have lately died of cholera, nine of these were unprepared for the change of line. One of them joined me in defending the sanctity of the Sabbath-day. He used to hear good minister in Scotland, but I fear his name was not in the 'Book of Life.' I have paid several visits to the hospital to see men who had cholera."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BINDER.

NUMEROUS applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case, in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding, at the end of the year. To meet this demand a stock of such covers has been prepared and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address, on the receipt of one dollar. Applications should be made to THE MANAGER, 63 Bible House, New York.

Of the London Metropolitan Tabernacle.

THIS beloved and distinguished Baptist minister, whose latest Sunday morning sermons are published by special arrangement with him every week in this journal, was born at Kelvedon, England, on June 10th, 1834, and is now forty-eight years of age. (A picture of the house in which he first saw the light appears on page 684.) His grandfather, whom he often visited, was a Congregational minister at Stambourne.

The home influences of the future pastor of the Tabernacle were exceptionally good. He has himself frequently spoken of the eminent piety of his mother. She devoted herself to the nurture of her children, and from her he derived his first religious impressions. He was taken to live with his venerable grandparents when quite young, and their influence upon him was of a decidedly religious character. When only ten years old, he was in the habit of reading the Scriptures at family prayers, and on one occasion caused some surprise in the good pastor's family circle by insisting on hearing a satisfactory explanation of a passage in the Book of Revelation before he would go on.

Here the lad met the late Rev. Mr. Knill, of Chester, who, in the midst of the family circle, lifted the boy on his knee, and struck with his intelligence and force of character predicted that he would, if he lived, become an eminent preacher and would one day preach in Rowland Hill's Chapel in London. Mr. Spurgeon's father was engaged in business, but he was an eminently earnest Christian and regularly preached on Sundays for fourteen years, to an Independent Congregation, at Tollesbury, near Kelvedon, and afterward at Cranbrook, in Kent. (A brief sketch of his life appears on page 679.)

Mr. Spurgeon's earliest school-days were spent at Colchester, and his application and general ability enabled him to carry off the first prizes without difficulty. Thence he entered an agricultural college at Maidstone, an institution which he left at the age of fifteen to become an assistant teacher in a school at Newmarket, the course of life marked out for him at this period being that of a schoolmaster. At the age of sixteen he was converted to Christ. He has told the story with thrilling effect as follows:

MR. SPURGEON'S CONVERSION.

"I went into a Primitive Methodist Chapel one snowy day in January. A thin-looking man came into the pulpit, and read the text, 'Look unto Me, and be ye saved, all the ends of the earth.' Then fixing his eyes on me, he said, 'Young man you are in trouble, and you will never get out of it unless you look to Christ.' And then lifting up his hands and crying out, as only a Primitive Methodist could, he exclaimed, 'Look, look, look! it is only look!' I did look, and saw with my spiritual eye the way of salvation open before me, and I was filled with joy unspeakable." Sixteen years afterward, preaching in the same church, Mr. Spurgeon pointed to a seat on the left hand under the gallery, and said, "I was sitting in that pew when I was converted."

In the following May he was baptized, on a profession of his faith, by the Rev. Mr. Cantlow, and united himself with the Baptist Church in the village of Isleham, a few miles from Newmarket. Shortly afterward he accepted an engagement as assistant teacher in a school at Cambridge, where he attached himself to the congregation which had been ministered to by the late eloquent Robert Hall, and commenced religious work as a tract distributor.

HIS FIRST SERMON.

The young tutor's first sermon was delivered at a cottage service, at Teversham, a short distance from Cambridge, whither he accompanied a friend a little older than himself whom he supposed to be the preacher of the evening. The friend supposed the same of his companion. The predicament was fortunately discovered before the cottage was reached, and young Spurgeon threw himself into the breach. (We give on page 684 a picture of the cottage in which he preached his first sermon.) Mr. Spurgeon gives the following interesting account of how he was led to accept the position:

"It was not my first public address by a great many, for both at Newmarket, and Cambridge, and elsewhere, the Sabbath-school had afforded me ample scope for speaking the Gospel. At Newmarket, especially, I had a considerable admixture of grown-up folks in the audience, for many came to hear 'the boy' give addresses to the school. But no regular set discourse to a congregation met for regular worship had I delivered till one eventful Sabbath evening, which found me in a cottage at Teversham, holding forth before a little assembly of humble villagers.

THE PREACHERS' ASSOCIATION.

"There is a Preachers' Association in Cambridge connected with St. Andrew's Street Chapel once the scene of the ministry of Robert Robinson and Robert Hall. A number of worthy brethren preach the Gospel in the various villages surrounding Cambridge, taking each one his turn according to plan. In our day the presiding genius was the venerable Mr. James Vinter, whom we were wont to address as Bishop Vinter. His genial soul, warm heart, and kindly manner were enough to keep a whole fraternity stocked with love, and accordingly a goodly company of true workers belonged to the Association, and labored as true yoke-fellows.

"I had one Saturday finished morning school, and the boys were all going home for the half holiday, when in came the aforesaid Bishop to ask me to go over to Teversham next Sunday evening, for a young man was to preach there who was not much used to services, and very likely would be glad of company. That was a cunningly devised sentence, if I remember it rightly, and I think I do; for at the time, in the light of that Sunday evening's revelation, I turned it over, and vastly admired its ingenuity. A request to go and preach would have met with a decided negative, but merely to act as company to a good brother who did not like to be lonely, and, perhaps, might ask me to give out a hymn or to pray, was not at all a difficult matter, and the request, understood in that fashion, was cheerfully complied with. Little did the lad know what Jonathan and David were doing when he was made to run for the arrow, and as little did I know when I was cajoled into accompanying a young man to Teversham.

A STARTLING COMMUNICATION.

"Our Sunday-school work was over, tea had been taken, and I set off through Barnwell, and away along the Newmarket Road, with a gentleman some few years my senior. We talked of good things, and at last I expressed my hope that he would feel the presence of God while preaching. He seemed to start, and assured me that he had never preached in his life, and could not attempt such a thing; he was looking to his young friend, Mr. Spurgeon, for that. This was a new view of the situation, and I could only reply that I was no minister, and that even if I had been, I was quite unprepared. My companion only repeated that he even in a more emphatic sense, was not a preacher, that he would help me in any other part of the service, but that there would be no sermon unless I gave one. He told me that if I repeated one of my Sunday-school addresses it would just suit the people, and would probably give them more satisfaction than the studied sermon of a learned divine.

"I felt that I was fairly committed to do my best. I walked along quietly, lifting up my soul to God, and it seemed to me that I could surely tell a few poor cottagers of the sweetness and love of Jesus, for I felt them in my own soul. Praying for divine help, I resolved to make an attempt. My text should be, 'Unto you therefore which believe He is precious,' and I would trust the Lord to open my mouth in honor of His dear Son. It seemed a great risk and a serious trial, but, depending upon the power of the Holy Spirit, I would at least tell out the story of the cross, and not allow the people to go home without a word.

"We entered the low-pitched room of the thatched cottage, where a few simple-minded farm-laborers and their wives were gathered together; we sang, and prayed and read the Scriptures and then came

MY FIRST SERMON.

How long or how short it was I cannot now remember. It was not half such a task as I had feared it would be, but I was glad to see my way to a fair conclusion, and to the giving out of the last hymn. To my own delight I had not broken down, nor stopped short in the middle, nor been destitute of ideas, and the desired haven was in view. I made a finish, and took up the book, but to my astonishment an aged voice cried out, 'Bless your dear heart, how old are you?' My very solemn reply was, 'You must wait till the service is over before making any such inquiries. Let us now sing.' We did sing, and the young preacher pronounced the benediction, and then began a dialogue which enlarged into a warm, friendly talk, in which everybody appeared to take part.

"How old are you?" was the leading question. 'I am under sixty,' was the reply. 'Yes, and under sixteen,' was the old lady's rejoinder. 'Never mind my age, think of the Lord Jesus and His preciousness,' was all that I could say, after promising to come again, if the gentlemen at Cambridge thought me fit to do so. Very great and profound was my awe of those gentlemen at Cambridge in those days."

HIS FIRST PASTORATE AT WATERBEACH.

A beginning having been thus made, Mr. Spurgeon preached frequently in the villages around the old University town, where he soon attained a popularity which invariably secured for him a large congregation, and he became familiarly known as the "Boy Preacher." About twelve months from the date of his first sermon, he was solicited to become the pastor of the Baptist congregation at Waterbeach. He was then only a lad of seventeen! To Waterbeach he went, and labored there for two years, with God's blessing, and winning many souls for Christ.

Mr. Spurgeon now seriously meditated entering Regent's Park College to prepare for the ministry. Dr. Angus, the accomplished Principal, called to see him, but a dull servant did not inform him of it, and he missed the opportunity. The congregation urged him to stay, and the project of a college or university training for his future life-work was abandoned. In 1853, he made an address at Cambridge, at a meeting of the Sunday-school Union. It was not remarkable in any way, but it deeply impressed one gentleman from Essex, who, visiting London shortly afterward, recommended Mr. Spurgeon to the deacons of the New Park Street Chapel, Southwark, which was then without a minister.

THE NEW PARK STREET CHURCH.

It was in December, 1853, that Mr. Spurgeon, being then nineteen years of age, accepted an invitation to preach as a "supply" at New Park Street Chapel, London. The regular congregation was very small, and the chapel seemed to the preacher large and gloomy. This invitation led to his acceptance of a request to occupy the pulpit for six months on probation, but the term of probation was never fulfilled. The attendance at the chapel increased so rapidly, and Mr. Spurgeon's preaching met with so much favor, that on April 10th he was unanimously invited to become pastor of the church.

Crowds flocked to hear the young preacher, then in his twentieth year; the newspapers called attention to his remarkably precocious powers; he grew in grace and effectiveness instead of wearing out; people who heard him once were not satisfied till they heard him again, and in a little while he

Needham, entitled "Life and Labors of Charles H. Spurgeon, the Faithful Preacher, the Devoted Pastor, the Noble Philanthropist, the Beloved College President, and the Voluminous Writer, Author, &c." But as never been a sign of such an event. He ver more popular than at the present time, ully attested by the crowds which every h besiege the doors of the Metropolitan acle, and which flock to hear him whenever he is announced to speak, on whatever subject, whether in the busy metropolis, or amid the rural scenes of country life. On one occasion he preached at the Crystal Palace at Sydenham to more than twenty-three thousand persons; and in May, 1867, while the Tabernacle was undergoing repairs, the Agricultural Hall, at Islington, was occupied for several weeks, with an estimated attendance of twenty thousand at every service,

HIS PRINTED SERMONS.

The circulation of Mr. Spurgeon's printed sermons has been abundantly blessed. Mr. Spurgeon writes that "seldom does a day pass, and certainly never a week for years past, without letters from all sorts of places, even at the utmost ends of the earth, describing the salvation of souls by means of one or other of the sermons." Thus the Pulpit and the Press, like twin angels, have compassed the world with the utterances of one man, who stands out in bold relief, not, indeed, as the most accomplished orator, but as the most popular preacher of his age.

HIS SUCCESS AS AN AUTHOR.

But Mr. Spurgeon's popularity is not confined to his preaching, or his sermons. His success as an author would make a good reputation for half a dozen smaller men. His "John Ploughman's Talk," a small book of homely common-sense and genuine humor, has reached the astonishing sale of 250,000 copies.* His other literary productions comprise "The Treasury of David," an original exposition of the Psalms; "The Interpreter," a large book for use at family worship; "Lectures to My Students;" "Commenting and Commentaries;" beside a number of smaller works, including the monthly magazine "The Sword and Trowel."

THE PASTORS' COLLEGE.

The history of the Pastors' College verges upon the romantic. The work began in 1856. A young man—Mr. T. W. Medhurst, now of Landport, Portsmouth—who had distinguished himself by his ability in open-air preaching, was placed for theological tuition with Rev. George Rogers, then minister of Albany Road Congregational Chapel, Camberwell. Mr. Medhurst was followed by others who had shown preaching capabilities, until, "encouraged by the readiness with which the young men found spheres of labor," says Mr. Spurgeon, "and by their singular success in soul-winning, I enlarged the number, but the whole means of sustaining them came from my own pocket. The large sale of my sermons in America, together with my dear wife's economy enabled me to spend from $3000 to $4000 in a year in my favorite work; but on a sudden, owing to certain circumstances my entire resources from that 'brook Cherith' were dried up. I paid as large sums as I could from my own income, and resolved to spend all I had, and then take the cessation of my means as a voice from the Lord to stay the effort, as I am firmly persuaded that we ought, under no pretence, to go into debt."

ORIGINATION OF THE COLLEGE FUND.

When Mr. Spurgeon's resources were at the lowest ebb, help appeared in an unexpected quarter. He writes, "I was brought to the last pound, when a letter came from a banker in the city, informing me that a lady, whose name I have never been able to discover, had deposited a sum of $1000, to be used for the education of young men in the ministry." With the gift of that money the tide turned. Mr. Spurgeon's publishers gave a dinner to celebrate the five-hundredth issue of his weekly sermons, when the diners gave $2500 to the College funds. Mr. Phillips, a deacon at the Tabernacle, acting upon a happy idea, commenced his annual supper for the friends of the institution, at which large sums are invariably raised; and shortly afterward, at the instance of Mr. Murrell, another of the deacons, Mr. Spurgeon's church initiated the weekly offering on its behalf, and this is now a permanent and important source of income.

THE NEW COLLEGE.

For a long period the students met for instruction in the rooms beneath the Metropolitan Tabernacle, but as their numbers increased this accommodation became both insufficient, uncomfortable, and unhealthy. An adjacent plot of land was secured, and a commodious building erected and furnished at a cost of about $75,000, exclusive of the purchase of the freehold. The new College was opened in 1864. Over four hundred students have already left the Pastors' College to enter upon ministerial duties at home or in the colonies, and to become missionaries abroad; and some of them, such as Edwin Gorsuch Gange, Archibald G. Brown, and William Cuff, are only second in popularity to Mr. Spurgeon himself.

HOW THE ORPHANAGE COMMENCED.

One day in 1866 Mr. Spurgeon received a letter from a lady who was quite unknown to him, stating that she wished him to take charge of $100,000 for the purpose of founding an orphanage. The recipient of the letter naturally thought that there was some mistake about the amount, and that probably the sum meant was $1000, or that the whole affair was a hoax. But truth is stranger than fiction. The munificent donor was Mrs. Hill-yard. Two acres and a half of land in Stockwell were purchased as the site of the Orphanage in the following January; and it was decided to erect a number of "homes" rather than one large building, so that the children should be located in families, instead of being massed together on the poor-house system. Nearly three hundred orphans are now cared for, educated, and trained for after life at the Stockwell institution. To feed this fatherless and motherless host, more than fifty dollars a day are needed in addition to the income from invested legacies. But the money and the means come in. Warm hearts give in kind as well as in coin, and the gifts vary from a pig to four pots of preserve and a mince pie. A humorous friend once sent six dozen bunches of turnips, and said "I hope some one will send you the mutton." The hope was abundantly realized, for about an hour afterward a farmer sent a sheep. (Our frontispiece gives a bird's-eye view of the entire block of Orphanage Buildings, as it will appear when completed early next year.)

OTHER INSTITUTIONS.

The other institutions connected with the Metropolitan Tabernacle include the Colportage Association, almshouses for seventeen aged women, several mission stations, and Sunday-schools, a mission to the blind, Ladies' Benevolent and Maternal Societies, and other agencies of usefulness too numerous for mention here. It is sufficient to say that the pastor's example is infectious, and his church may be compared for activity to a hive of bees.

WHY IS MR. SPURGEON SO SUCCESSFUL?

The secret of Mr. Spurgeon's success as a preacher, and his influence as a man, must be traced in a large degree to his downright earnestness, the transparent sincerity of his character, his practical common-sense, his ready utterance, his good old Saxon language, and his sympathy with every effort, no matter where or by whom put forth, for the welfare of his fellow-men. To the influence of his powerful and richly musical voice he adds that of a manner characterized by great freedom and fearlessness, intensely and strikingly natural. When to these also we add the influence of thrilling description, touching anecdote, sparkling wit, apt illustrations, striking similes, all used to illustrate and enforce the deep, earnest home truths of the Bible, we have a combination of elements which must make up a preacher of wonderful attraction and marvellous power.

HIS CATHOLICITY.

Mr. Spurgeon's catholic disposition is indicated by the fact that a Congregational minister—Mr. V. J. Charlesworth—was chosen as head-master of the Stockwell Orphanage, and Mr. George Rogers another Congregational minister, as principal of the Pastors' College. Thus harmoniously, under the influence of one master-spirit, with many efficient helpers, and with a church of over five thousand members, is Christian philanthropy carrying forward a work which for magnitude and variety is without a parallel in ancient or modern history.

GARRISON DUTY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, October 22, 1882.

"As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."—1 SAM. 30:24.

If you have never seen an army change quarters you have no idea of the amount of baggage—twenty loads, fifty loads, a hundred loads of baggage. David and his army were about to start on a double quick march for the recovery of their captured families from the Amalekites. So they left by the brook Besor their blankets, their knapsacks, their baggage, and their carriages. Who shall be detailed to watch this stuff? There are sick soldiers, and wounded soldiers, and aged soldiers who are not able to go on this swift military expedition, but who are able to do some work, and so they are detailed to watch the baggage.

There is many a soldier who is not strong enough to march thirty miles in a day, and then plunge into a ten hours' fight, who is able with drawn sword lifted against his shoulder to pace up and down as a sentinel to keep off an enemy who might put the torch to the baggage. There are two hundred of these crippled and aged and wounded soldiers detailed to watch the baggage. Some of them, I suppose, had bandages across the brow, and some of them had their arm in a sling, and some of them walked on crutches. They were not cowards shirking duty. They had fought in many a fierce battle for their country and their God. They are now part of the time in hospital, and part of the time on garrison duty. They almost cry because they cannot go with the other troops to the front. While these sentinels watch the baggage, the Lord watches the sentinels.

There is quite a different scene being enacted in the distance. The Amalekites, having ravaged and ransacked and robbed whole countries, are celebrating their success in a roaring carousal. Some of them are dancing on the lawn with wonderful gyration of heel and toe, and some of them are examining the spoils of victory—the finger rings and earrings, the necklaces, the wristlets, the head bands diamond starred, and the coffers with coronets and carnelians and pearls and sapphires and emeralds, and all the wealth of plate and jewels and decanter and the silver and the gold banked up on the earth in princely profusion, and the embroideries and the robes and the turbans and the cloaks of an imperial wardrobe.

The banquet has gone on until the banqueters are maudlin and weak and stupid and indecent and loathsomely drunk. What a time it is now for David and his men to swoop on them. So the English lost the battle of Bannockburn because the night before they were in wassail and bibulous celebration, while the Scotch were in prayer. So the Syrians were overthrown in their carousal by the Israelites. So Chedorlaomer and his army were overthrown in their carousal by Abraham and his men. So our Northern forces were defeated at Fredericksburg because one of the commanders was drunk. Now is the time for David and his men to swoop upon these carousing Amalekites. Some of the Amalekites are hacked to pieces on the spot, some of them are just able to go staggering and hiccuping off the field, some of them crawl on camels and speed off in the distance.

David and his men gather together the wardrobes, the jewels, and put them upon the back of camels, and into wagons, and they gather together the sheep and cattle that had been stolen, and start back toward the garrison.

YONDER THEY COME,
yonder they come. The limping men of the garrison come out and greet them with wild huzza! The Bible says David saluted them. That is, he asked them how they all were. "How is your broken arm?" "How is your fractured jaw?" "Has the stiffened limb been unlimbered?" "Have you had another chill?" "Are you getting better?" He saluted them.

But now came a very difficult thing, the distribution of the spoils of victory. Drive up those laden camels now. Who shall have the spoils? Well, some selfish soul suggests that these treasures ought all to belong to those who had been out in active service. "We did all the fighting while these men stayed at home in the garrison, and we ought to have all the treasures." But David looked into the worn faces of these veterans who had stayed in the garrison, and he looked around and saw how cleanly everything had been kept, and he saw that the baggage was all safe, and he knew how that these wounded and crippled men would gladly enough have been at the front if they had been able, and the little general looks up from under his helmet and says: "No, no, and he rushes up to one of these men and he says, "Hold your hands together," and the hands are held together, and he fills them with silver. And he rushes up to another man who was sitting away back and had no idea of getting any of the spoils, and throws a Babylonish garment over him and fills his hand with gold. And he rushes up to another man who had lost all his property in serving God and his country years before, and he drives up some of the cattle and some of the sheep that they had brought back from the Amalekites, and he gives two or three of the cattle and three or four of the sheep to this poor man, so he shall always be fed and clothed. He sees a man so emaciated and worn out and sick he needs stimulants and he gives him a little of the wine that he brought from the Amalekites. Yonder is a man who has no appetite for the rough rations of the army, and he gives him a rare morsel from the Amalekitish banquet and the two hundred crippled and maimed and aged soldiers who tarried on garrison duty get just as much of the spoils of battle as any of the two hundred men that went to the front. "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."

The impression is abroad that the Christian rewards are for those who do conspicuous service in distinguished places—great martyrs, great patriots, great preachers, great philanthropists. But my text sets forth the idea that there is just as much reward for a man that stays at home and mends his own business and who crippled and unable to go forth and lead in great movements and in the high places of the earth does his whole duty just where he is. Garrison duty as important and as remunerative as service at the front. "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarrieth by the stuff."

The Earl of Kintore said to me in an English railway, "Mr. Talmage, when you get back to America I want you to preach a sermon on the discharge of ORDINARY DUTY IN ORDINARY PLACES, and then send me a copy of it." Afterward an English clergyman coming to this land brought from the Earl of Kintore the same message. Alas! that before I got ready to do what he asked me to do, the good Earl of Kintore had departed this life. But that man, surrounded by all palatial surroundings and in a distinguished sphere, felt sympathetic with those who had ordinary duties to perform in ordinary places and in ordinary ways. A great many people are discouraged when they hear the story of Moses and of Joshua and of David and of Luther and of John Knox and of Deborah and of Florence Nightingale. They say: "Oh, that was all good and right for them, but I shall never be called to receive the law on Mount Sinai, I shall never be called to command the sun and the moon to stand still, I shall never be called to slay a giant, I shall never preach on Mars' Hill, I shall never defy the Diet of Worms, I shall never be called to make a queen tremble for her crimes, I shall never preside over a hospital."

There are women who say, "If I had asiant a sphere as those people had, I should be brave and as grand; but my business is to get children off to school and to hunt up things they are lost, and to see that dinner is ready a keep account of the household expenses and hinder the children from being strangled by whooping cough, and to go through all the a ances and vexations of housekeeping. O sphere is so infinitesimal, and so insignificant and clear discouraged." Woman, God place on garrison duty, and your reward will be just as great as that of Florence Nightingale, who n so often night by night with a light in her through the hospitals, was called by the wor the "lady of the lamp." Your reward will b as great as that of Mrs. Hertzog, who buil endowed theological seminary buildings. Yo ward will be just as great as that of Hannah who by her excellent books won for her adl Garrick and Edmund Burke and Joshua Reyl Rewards are not to be given according t amount of noise you make in the world, n according to the amount of good you do, b cording to whether you work to your full cap according to whether or not you do you duty in the sphere where God has placed you.

Suppose you give to two of your children e and they are to go off to make purchases, a one you give one dollar and to the other yo twenty dollars. Do you reward the boy th gave twenty dollars to for purchasing more that amount of money than the other boy chased with one dollar? Of course not. I give wealth or social position or eloquen twenty times the faculty to a man that He gi the ordinary men, is He going to give t favored man a reward because he has more and more influence? Oh, no. In other wo you and I do our whole duty, and you have t times more talent than I have, you will g more divine reward than I will. Is God go reward you because He gave you more? would not be fair, that would not be right. two hundred men of the text who fainted brook Besor did their whole duty; they wa the baggage, they took care of the stuff, an got as much of the spoils of victory as th who went to the front. "As his part is th down to the battle, so shall his part be th by the stuff."

PERIL AT SEA.

Thirty-six hours we expected every moment to the bottom of the ocean. The waves broke through the skylights and rushed down into the hold of the ship and hissed against the boilers. It is an awful time; but by the blessing of God and the faithfulness of the men in charge we came out of the cyclone and we arrived at home. Each before leaving the ship thanked Captain Andrews. I do not think there was a man or an animal that went off that ship without thanking Captain Andrews, and when years after I heard of death I was impelled to write a letter of condolence to his family in Liverpool. Everybody recognizes the goodness, the courage, the kindness of Captain Andrews; but it occurs to me now that I never thanked the engineer. He stood away in the darkness amid the hissing furnaces of his whole duty. Nobody thanked the engineer, but God recognized his heroism and his courage and his fidelity, and there will be just as much reward for the engineer who worked out of the ship as the captain who stood on the bridge of the ship in the midst of the howling tempest. "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarryeth by the stuff."

A Christian woman was seen going along the shore of a wood every eventide, and the neighbors in the country did not understand how a mother with so many cares and anxieties should waste so much time as to be idly sauntering out evening by evening. It was found out afterward that she went there to pray for her household, and while one evening she wrote that beautiful hymn which is in all ages for cheering Christian hearts:

"I love to steal a while away
From every cumbering care,
And spend the hours of setting day
In humble, grateful prayer."

Is there be no reward for such unpretending everlasting service?

Far back in the country there is a boy who is going to college and get an education. They call him

A BOOKWORM.

Wherever they find him—in the barn or in the field—he is reading a book. "What a pity it is," they say, "That Ed cannot get an education." His father, who works as hard as he will, can no more support the family by the product of the farm. One night Ed has retired to his room and there is a family conference about him. The sisters say: "Father, I wish you would send Ed to college; you will, we will work harder than we ever did, and we will make our old dresses do." The mother says: "Yes, I will get along without any hired help; although I am not as strong as I used to be, I think I can get along without any hired help." The father says, "Well, I think by husking corn I can get along without any assistance." The father is banished from the table, butter is banished from the plate. That family is put down on rigid diet, suffering economy that the boy may go to college.

Time passes on. Commencement Day has come. Think not that I mention an imaginary scene. God knows it happened. Commencement has come, and the professors walk in on the stage in their long gowns. The interest of the occasion is passing on, and after a while it comes to a climax of interest as the valedictorian is to be introduced. Ed has studied so hard and worked so well that he has had the honor conferred upon him. There are rounds of applause sometimes making into vociferation. It is a great day for Ed. But away back in the galleries are his sisters with their plain hats and their faded shawls, and the old-fashioned father and mother—dear me, she has had a new hat for six years, he has not had a new coat for six years—and they get up and look over on the platform, and they laugh and they cry, and they sit down, and they look pale, and then they are very much flushed. Ed gets the garlands, and the old-fashioned group in the gallery have their full share of the triumph. They have made that scene possible, and in the day when God shall more fully reward self-sacrifices made for others, He will give grand and glorious recognition. "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarryeth by the stuff."

DISABLED CHRISTIAN VETERANS.

There is high encouragement in this subject also for those who once wrought mightily for Christ and the church, but through sickness or collapse of fortune or advanced years cannot now go to the front. These two hundred men of the text were veterans. Let that man bare his arm and show how the muscles were torn. Let him pull aside the turban and see the mark of a battle axe. Pull aside the coat and see where the spear thrust him. Would it have been fair for those men crippled, weak and old, by the brook Besor, to have no share in the spoils of triumph? I was in and I saw there some of the men of the first Napoleon, and I asked them where they had fought under their great commander. One man said, "I was at Austerlitz." Another man said, "I was at the Pyramids." Another man said, "I was in the awful retreat from Moscow." Another man said, "I was at the bridge of Lodi." Some of them were lame, they were all aged. Did the French Government turn off those old soldiers to die in want? No; their last days were spent like princes.

Do you think my Lord is going to turn off His old soldiers because they are weak and worn and because they fainted by the brook Besor? Are they going to get no part of the spoils of the victory? Just look at them. Do you think those creases in the face are wrinkles? No; they are battle scars. They fought against sickness, they fought against trouble, they fought against sin, they fought for God, they fought for the church, they fought for the truth, they fought for Heaven. When they had plenty of money their names were always on the subscription list. When there was any hard work to be done for God, they were ready to take the heaviest part of it. When there came a great revival, they were ready to pray all night for the anxious and the sin-struck. They were ready to do any work, endure any sacrifice, do the most unpopular thing that God demanded of them. But now they cannot go further. Now they have physical infirmities, now their head troubles them. They are weak and faint by the brook Besor.

ARE THEY TO HAVE NO SHARE

in the triumph? Are they to get none of the treasures, none of the spoils of conquest? You must think that Christ has a very short memory if you think He has forgotten their services.

Fret not, ye aged ones. Just tarry by the stuff and wait for your share of the spoils. Yonder they are coming. I hear the bleating of the fat lambs and I see the jewels glint in the sun. It makes me laugh to think how you will be surprised when they throw a chain of gold over your neck, and tell you to go in and dine with the king. I see you backing out because you feel unworthy. The shining ones come up on the one side, and the shining ones come up on the other side, and they push you on and they push you up, and they say, "Here is an old soldier of Jesus Christ," and the shining ones will rush out toward you and say, "Yes, that man saved my soul," or they will rush out and say, "Oh, yes, she was with me in the last sickness." And then the cry will go round the circle, "Come in, come in, come up, come up; we saw you away down there, old and sick and decrepit and discouraged because you could not go to the front, but 'As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarryeth by the stuff.'"

There is high consolation also in this for

AGED MINISTERS.

I see some of them here to-day. They sit in pews in our churches. They used to stand in pulpits. Their hair is white with the blossoms of the tree of life. Their names marked on the roll of the General Assembly, or of the consociation, "Emeritus." They sometimes hear a text announced which brings to mind a sermon they preached fifty years ago on that same subject. They preached more Gospel on $400 a year than some of their successors preach on $4000.

Some Sunday the old minister is in a church and near by in another pew there is a husband and a wife and a row of children. And after the benediction the lady comes up and says, "Doctor, you don't know me, do you?" "Well," he says, "Your face is familiar, but I cannot call you by name." "Why," she says, "You baptized me and you married me and you buried my father and mother and sisters." "Oh, yes," he says, "My eyesight isn't as good as it used to be."

They are in all our churches—the heroes of 1820, the heroes of 1832, the heroes of 1857. By the long grave trench that cut through half a century, they have stood sounding the resurrection. They have been in more Balaklavas and have taken more Sebastopols than you ever heard of. Sometimes they get a little fretful because they cannot be at the front. They hear the sound of the battle and the old war horse champs his bit. But the 60,000 ministers of religion this day standing in the brunt of the fray shall have no more reward than those retired veterans. "My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof." "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarryeth by the stuff."

CHEER UP,

men and women of unappreciated services. You will get your reward, if not here, hereafter. When Charles Wesley comes up to judgment and the thousands of souls which were wafted into glory through his songs shall be enumerated, he will take his throne. Then John Wesley will come up to judgment, and after his name has been mentioned in connection with the salvation of the millions of souls brought to God through the Methodism which he founded, he will take his throne. But between the two thrones of Charles Wesley and John Wesley, there will be a throne higher than either on which shall sit Susannah Wesley, who with maternal consecration in Epworth rectory, Lincolnshire, started those two souls on their triumphant mission of sermon and song through all following ages.

OH, WHAT A DAY THAT WILL BE

for many who rocked Christian cradles with weary foot, and who patched worn-out garments and darned socks, and out of a small income made the children comfortable for the winter. What a day that will be for those to whom the world gave the cold shoulder and called them nobodies, and begrudged them the least recognition, and who weary and worn and sick fainted by the brook Besor. Oh, that will be a mighty day when the Son of David shall distribute among them the garlands, the crowns, the sceptres, the chariots, the thrones. And then it shall be found out that all who on earth served God in inconspicuous spheres receive just as much reward as those who filled the earth with uproar of achievement. Then they shall understand the height, the depth, the length, the breadth, the pillared and domed magnificence of my text, "As his part is that goeth down to the battle, so shall his part be that tarryeth by the stuff."

An Emphatic Warning was Given by a judge in New York last week to a mischievous citizen who was charged with tormenting a blind man. It was stated in court that he had for some time been in the habit of placing obstacles in the way of the blind man who had to pass his store on his way to his place of business, and that he took delight in otherwise teasing and tormenting him. The judge expressed his indignation at such conduct, and warned him that if any further complaints were made of him, he would be severely punished. A man who could find pleasure in rendering such an affliction as blindness still more painful, must in truth be a degraded specimen of humanity, but it becomes us all to be ever watchful lest by inconsistencies of conduct, or heedless language, we place stumbling-blocks in the way of the spiritually blind (1 Cor. 8 : 9-13).

THE ANTE-TRIBULATION REMOVAL.

ALTOGETHER apart, however, from such particular portions of God's Word as we considered last week, and which are thus regarded as militating against a belief in an Ante-tribulation removal of living saints, this belief is objected to very strongly by some as contrary to the undoubted need of that SUFFERING FOR AND WITH CHRIST, which is so frequently and powerfully set forth throughout the Scriptures as to be inevitably undergone by those who are to reign with Him hereafter. And it is sometimes not very charitably implied that the holders of this doctrine cling to it through a desire to escape from such suffering, which, as preparatory to their subsequent glorification, they should rather be well pleased, if not anxious, to have to undergo. To this objection it seems not very difficult to give a sufficient reply.

It scarcely ought to be overlooked in considering this matter—as it seems to have been upon the part of those who argue such an objection—that the number of truly believing Christians who would have to pass through that tribulation, supposing their removal not to take place until subsequent to it—could not only consist of those who shall actually be living upon the earth at the time, and shall be altogether exclusive of "the dead in Christ" from the beginning of the dispensation until then. Therefore the question immediately and unavoidably suggests itself, Why should the comparatively small body of the living Christians of that particular period have to pass through a most intense and peculiar tribulation, from which, or from anything resembling which, in its intensity, all the much larger body of their brethren, who have lived and died throughout two thousand preceding years have, with the exception of the martyr periods of the Church's history, been exempt? There can be no consistent or intelligible reason that I am at all aware of assigned for this, unless it were by those who hold

THE ROMISH DOCTRINE OF PURGATORY, or the doctrine of a needful discipline to be undergone by Christian people in the interval between death and resurrection, which discipline those who shall be removed without dying cannot undergo, and accordingly as a substitute for which they should pass through the Great Tribulation. I do not believe, however, that any of the class of objectors to whom I am now referring, and who are students of God's prophetic Word, and believers in and expectants of the Saviour's glorious appearing, can hold doctrines so unfounded and unscriptural as are these.

It is beyond doubt a plainly-stated truth that all Christ's people shall "in this world have tribulation," that "through much tribulation we must enter the kingdom of God." And all Christian experience in this, as in every other instance, abundantly verifies the statements of Holy Scripture. Christians have suffered and do suffer, some times intensely, from the assaults and devices of Satan, from the power of indwelling sin, from infirmities bodily and mental, from doubts and fears and misgivings, from the hostility and the ridicule and the false accusations and imputations of their fellowmen, not unfrequently of those near and dear to them. They do suffer very much from pain, from sickness, from sorrow, from disappointments, from bereavements, from pecuniary losses and difficulties. But all this suffering, to be received and submitted to with patient resignation as the needed chastening of a wise and loving Father—is one thing. A tribulation which will be, without doubt, overruled for much good to such of the Lord's people as shall have to pass through it, but the immediate agent and instrument in inflicting which shall be the visible incarnation of Satan in

THE PERSON OF THE LAST ANTICHRIST, and the character of which shall accordingly be that there has never been any like it before in the Church's career, and never shall be any like it again, and that except the days of it should be shortened, no flesh should be saved—this is another, very different thing. And to accuse those who desire to avoid such, and who rejoice to see what seems to them a blessed way of escape from it, of an unchristian anxiety to escape from suffering, argues, to say the least of it, a very inexcusable want of consideration upon the part of those who may make or entertain the accusation. To submit cheerfully and patiently to suffering when it comes, and to endeavor to glorify our God in it, and to derive benefit from it to ourselves, is at once the duty and the privilege of every disciple of a crucified Redeemer. But to wish for suffering, to be unwilling to escape it, is simply not human; and nothing that is not human can be Christian, inasmuch as Christ is a man. He prayed, and we may pray, "Father, if it be possible let this cup pass from me!"

AN OBJECT OF HOPE.

If we really believe that we may very probably be among the living at the time when the Lord shall come for His saints, and yet do not regard it as probable, or even possible, that His so coming for us shall take place until after we shall have passed through the Great Tribulation—then surely the prospect of the Saviour's nearly approaching Advent, with this brief but appalling interlude between us and it, cannot possibly be to us, what His Word impressively teaches, that it ought to be, an object of unclouded, unintermingled hope, and joy, and happiness. Then our heart's sincere desire and prayer, in response to His "surely, I come quickly," can scarcely be "even so come, Lord Jesus." Must not our desire in such case rather be one which we have no warrant whatsoever from His word for entertaining, or for, if we entertain it, turning into prayer that death should first come for us, rather than that He should come for us, that we should be "unclothed" rather than clothed upon? (2 Cor. 5:4.) When we offer up the petition which He has taught us, "Thy kingdom come," must there not, in such case, if only we realize what we are praying for, be a secret desire to add, "not in our time, O Lord!"

As to the express warrants from Scripture for expecting that the rapture of 1 Thess. 4:16, 17 is to precede the Great Tribulation, they have been so often and so recently put forward in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, that to enter at any length upon the subject now would be an altogether needless reiteration. The strongest warrant I believe to exist in the incontrovertible fact that if we regard this tribulation as necessarily to precede the Lord's coming for His saints, we cannot possibly occupy the position of daily, hourly watchfulness and expectancy with regard to that coming which His word so repeatedly enjoins upon us. This, however, has been fully treated of in recent articles, and therefore needs not to be referred to again.

It may also suffice to enumerate Genesis 7:7-10 compared with Matt. 24:37-42, Ps. 31:19, 20, 32:6, Isaiah 26:19-21, Zephaniah 2:3, in the Old Testament Scriptures, as indicating such removal. And in the New Testament, Luke 21:36, Rev. 3:10, 4:4, 5:8-10, chap. 12, etc.

PROMISES OF "ESCAPE" AND "PRESERVATION."

With regard to the necessarily implied promise of "escape from all these things that shall come to pass," in Luke 21:36, and the fully expressed promise of being "kept from this hour of trial," (Rev. 3:10), I should wish, in conclusion, to observe that the language in each instance seems altogether to exclude the possibility of fulfilment by the subjects of such promises being made to pass safely through, and to come safely out of, the Great Tribulation.

Could it be truly said of some who had been in a town during the period of its siege or its bombardment, but who had been preserved unslain or unwounded throughout, that they had "escaped all the things" which had happened to the town and its inhabitants? In order so to do should they not have left it before ever the siege or the bombardment had commenced? Or, could it be correctly affirmed of those who, during the prevalence of some terrible epidemic in a town or a district, had been smitten with, but had recovered from it, that they had been "kept from" the disease? Most assuredly it could not. Even so, I am fully persuaded that there will be no shadow of untruthfulness or incorrectness, no iota of reserve, or of shortcoming, in the glorious fulfilment to the very letter of any one of the precious promises of who is "The Truth" itself. To imagine moment that there could be such, I should, part regard as highly dishonoring to my grating Lord and Master.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Paid by Instalments.—At a Meeting

Patrick lately Mr. W. R. Bradlaugh said a benevolent person gave the late Rev. Rowland £100 for a poor minister. Instead of sending the whole sum at once, Rowland Hill sent £5; the envelope was a slip of paper, on which written the words, 'More to follow.' At regular intervals the same sum with the same message was sent until the whole £100 had been forwarded. In like manner every blessing that comes from God is sent with the self-same message, 'And more to follow.' God says, 'I forgive you your sins; there is more to follow. I justify you in the righteousness of Christ, but there is more to follow.' My mercy shall continue with you, and when I land on the golden shores of glory there will be more to follow."

A Child Waiting for Jesus.—Mr. Scott

"On one occasion I had some meetings for children, and at the end of each meeting I said, 'If any of you want to have conversation with stay behind the rest.' Most of them went away, but I saw one little fellow, hardly the height of a pew, waiting. He was so young that I did not think he could understand what I said when dressing the meeting. So I asked him, 'Why you waiting for, my boy—your father?' 'No, your uncle?' 'No, sir.' 'Your mother?' 'No, sir.' 'Who, then?' With a look so tender and simple that it went straight to my heart, he said, 'Jesus, sir.' I sat down and told him the old story, and I believe that little child there felt Jesus whom he desired to see."

The Danger of Evil Companionships.—At noon-day meeting on September 15th, Mr. Shon of New York, said: "At our meeting the week before last, a young man came in who had converted at one of Mr. Moody's services, but fallen by remaining with his old evil companions who persuaded him to drink so much that he was home on Tuesday night, more drunk than ever had been in his life. His mother, father, and sister were Christians, and the blow to them was great. The sister took to bed with disappointment, and was now lying ill in body and mind. His friends felt his fall worse than if he had died. After the first meeting one of the workers spoke to him, and willingly the poor fellow confessed his sin, and returned to the arms of a loving Saviour. His heart sore with a sense of his unworthiness, but so full of gladness that he could not speak."

A Dangerous Darling.—The Rev. James

Scott said: "There is one thing which I have learned by experience keeps back every class of men and women, those who live in the lowest slums; those who live in the aristocratic mansion—that one darling sin. There was a woman in a good position in the social scale, who seemed to be very anxious about her soul, but she could not find rest although she sought it with tears. At last I learned that she was a secret dram-drinker. I told her at once that she must give up this love sin, but she got very angry and would not listen any longer to me. She wanted to keep her sin as long as she could. As it was impossible for both to live together in harmony, she rejected Jesus and kept the whiskey. That woman, and all who are like her, are on their way to hell. Love to Christ and love of sin cannot live together in the same heart."

"The Worst of Women" Converted.—Mr.

Jack said: "Within the last fortnight one of the worst women in Busby has been converted to Christ. Some weeks ago a few brethren were preaching at one of the corners of the street, and this woman stood listening along with a few others. At the end of the address, these Christian men spoke individually to those who gathered round them. They were strangers in the district, and did not know that this person had been leading so bad a life that none of the Christians in the district thought of speaking to her. Apparently their words were spent in vain. Weeks passed on, and then the Lord brought the words spoken to her on that day back to her mind in such a way, that in the dirty dark hovel in which she lived, she cried to God for mercy and obtained it. When one of the brethren visited her, she said, 'I feel happy all over, from the crown of my head to the sole of my feet.' Yet she had no outward cause for joy, for her past course of life had left her poor and miserable; but the joy of the Lord filled her soul, and made her forget her present state of wretchedness.

Saved from Suicide.—Mr. Shorey, of New York, said: "I was much impressed by the meeting of the 'Mizpah' band, at which I was present last night. There I saw a large number of intelligent men, many of whom have been raised from the gutter and led to Christ. A tall, red-faced man came in, with his little boy. He was under the influence of drink. He had tried to kill himself several times that day, and at the very time the attention of one of the 'Mizpah' band was called to him he was on his way to make another attempt upon his life. Miss Mary White and Miss Annie McPherson, of London, who were present, spoke to him so kindly and gently, that the big tears streamed down his face like rain. Then the meeting joined in prayer for him, and at the close two men took him and his little boy home. The 'Mizpah' band are already doing good work, and will I am sure, do a greater work than has ever yet been done in this or any other city in the same way."

Safe under the Colors.—Mr. Millar said: "In one of the islands of the Pacific a civil war was raging until the stronger party had almost exterminated their opponents. One of the defeated chiefs and his followers fled to the house or compound of the British Consul for protection. Were they refused the help and refuge they claimed? No. What then? the Consul had neither soldiers or sailors nor arms to defend them. How was he to save them from their implacable foes? He simply opened his gate to let the beaten men in, then hoisted the British Ensign, and kept it flying night and day until the victors retired. If at any time these men had ventured outside the gate of the compound, death was his portion, but so long as they remained under the colors not a foe dared touch them. That is exactly our position. If we keep our colors always flying, and rest under our Saviour Jesus Christ, none can harm us, nor make us afraid. It is when we go outside and away from Christ that we place ourselves in jeopardy."

An Obstinate Old Woman.—Mr. Scott said: "When Duncan Mathieson was holding Gospel meetings, there was an old woman who detested them. Her usual phrase in speaking of them was, 'I won't go; any one who likes may go, but not me.' Though she would not go to the meetings, to her great surprise and anger, they came to her, for Duncan pitched upon a spot right opposite her door on which to hold his open air service, and having a voice of great power he could make himself heard distinctly in houses a good way off. Quite excited, the foolish woman shut and locked her door, and as the voice still came in through the window she closed the shutters, but still the word came in, for as she sat in the dark at the fireside, the preaching came down the chimney, and reached her heart, till she gradually became interested. Then she opened her shutters, and opened her door, till at last she could not restrain herself, but went outside and joined the meeting, where the Lord changed her opinion of revival meetings, and of herself. She saw her lost state, and sought Christ, and His healing hand was laid on her."

Saxpence to Tak' th' Pledge.—"I saw a man in this meeting not long ago, who told me that his wife one time was scolding him for drinking, and he told her, 'If ye gie me saxpence ta pae for th' caird I'll tak' th' pledge noo.' 'Ah, a ken what yer aifter ma mau,' the wife answered. 'Ye wud jis gang in tae th' neist public hoose an' get a dram.' 'Na, na, wife, if ye gie me th' saxpence, I'll keep ma wurd.' 'Weel, here it is, gang yer ways an' dae it,' said the woman. Off he went to the League office in Hope Street, where he took the pledge, and bought the finest card he could get. He left the office feeling quite proud and elate that at last he had done it. At the door he met one of his companions, who saluted him with, 'Hilloa, Tom, what are ye daein' in there.' Tom's pride fell, and shame took its place, so that instead of boldly telling what he had done, his reply was, 'O just a message for the wife.' 'Weel, come awa in yonder an' share a half ane,' said Tom's companion. Tom did not want the dram, but his courage was gone, and he could not tell the tempter that he had signed the pledge only five minutes ago, thus falling in less than five minutes after signing a promise not to touch any kind of intoxicating liquor. This man afterward came to the feet of the Lord and asked for power over his fear of companions and his appetite for drink, and the Lord answered his prayer and saved him."

A Youthful Recruiting Sergeant.—The Rev. James Scott related: "Eight years ago during Messrs. Moody and Sankey's first visit to us, there was a young boy who was the means of winning as many souls to the Lord as any one I knew in Glasgow. His plan was to watch men as they came out of the hall, or church, where the evangelistic meetings were held, and judge by their faces if they were anxious, or awakened, but had not decided to wait till the second meeting. The boy courteously and respectfully approached them, and tried to persuade them to return and give themselves to Christ. When he succeeded in his efforts, he would get an experienced worker to speak to those whom he brought in. I have seen him bring in two men at a time, and generally he had several at every meeting. If your hearts are aglow with love to Christ, you can do as much as this little boy, and an equally great blessing will rest upon you."

The Subject of a Bet.—Mr. Shorrey said: "There was a man in Fall River, Mass., whom I knew very well. When living a life of sin and drunkenness he was one of my boon companions. After my conversion to Christ, my mission was to tell what the Lord had done for me, in the places where I formerly showed plainly what the devil was doing to me. I, therefore, returned there to preach the Gospel. After the meeting I met a band of my old companions; they did not laugh or jeer, but after shaking hands all round the man to whom I refer, said, 'We have just been speaking about you; they have given you six months to try you, and we have bet five hundred dollars that you will be as bad as ever after that time; but if you have got the thing of which you speak, I am sure you will stand firm.' 'Frank,' I replied, 'what do you know about the thing, as you call it, of which I spoke?' 'Nothing, practically,' he answered, 'but you said that you had the love of Christ in your heart, and if you have that, you won't fall.' Was this not remarkable testimony from an unconverted man?"

THE REV. JOHN SPURGEON,

Father of the Rev. C. H. Spurgeon.

Born in 1810—Converted at an Early Age—Enters Business—Pastorate of Tollesbury Congregational Church—Ministry in Kent, and in London—Resigns Pastoral Responsibility—Engages in Itinerant Work—An "Honorable Family."

THE REV. JOHN SPURGEON, whose portrait appears on the front page this week, is second son of the late Rev. James Spurgeon, of Stambourne, in the county of Essex, England. He was born on July 15th, 1810, and is therefore now seventy-two years old.

He was brought to Christ at an early age, and in course of time became conscious that God would have him preach the Gospel. For twenty-six years he discharged the double functions of clerk and traveller for two business firms. But for fourteen years of this protracted period, he sustained the honorary position of pastor of THE CONGREGATIONAL CHURCH, TOLLESBURY, driving there and back, a distance of thirteen miles from Colchester, every Sunday, and attending to the claims of business during the week. His ministrations were so acceptable to the people, and so graciously blessed of God that the chapel was continually crowded, and eventually it was found to be absolutely necessary to erect a more capacious and commodious structure. Before, however, the erection was completed Mr. Spurgeon felt it to be his duty to resign his connection with his attached people, but to-day the beautiful enlarged chapel and minister's house, remain as material monuments of his faithful ministerial work in the place. His spiritual triumphs and the large number of sinners whom he was the means of leading to the feet of Christ, the great day of final adjudication alone will make manifest.

MINISTRY IN KENT AND LONDON.

Mr. Spurgeon left Colchester, where he had spent so many happy, useful years, and responded to an invitation to become the pastor of the United Congregational churches of Cranbrook and Iden Green, situated four miles apart, in the county of Kent. Here he remained for five years, both churches greatly prospering, and large additions being made to the membership. At the end of the period named, however, he conceived the idea that he could do more work for the Master in London, if only his way were made plain to go there. Soon he was introduced to the historic church in Fetter Lane, London. From his first services in the old chapel it was apparent that God was with him; long-standing members of the Church were re-energized, as with the breath of Heaven, and the Church and congregation rapidly increased. In five years the cause, which for some time prior to Mr. Spurgeon's advent, had been in an unprosperous condition, became self-supporting, and a means of manifold blessing to the densely peopled neighborhood around.

His next sphere of ministry was Islington, where he assumed the pastorate of the Congregational Church in Upper Street. Apart from the fact that his name acted like a magnet upon many of the hitherto indifferent and non-church going residents of the locality, Mr. Spurgeon's own intrinsic qualities—his unflagging industry, prayerful spirit, and earnest, simple preaching of the Gospel—secured the same Divine blessing and approval which had cheered and enriched his ministry elsewhere. Here, again, the building had to be enlarged to afford scope for the increasing energies of the Church, and a considerable number of sinners were brought to Christ.

SUBSEQUENT ITINERANT WORK.

A few years ago he terminated his pastoral association with the Islington Church, and though he has been frequently pressed by appreciative friends to accept other ministerial charges, he has not thought it wise to do so. He now confines himself to supplying vacant pulpits and the preaching of sermons on special occasions—such as Sunday-school Anniversaries, the opening of new chapels, etc. For five years he preached on the first Sunday in every month, and administered the Lord's Supper, at St. George's Congregational Baptist Church, at Ramsgate; and as the result of his interest in it the church became so much consolidated and enlarged, that he recommended the friends there to secure the services of a regular pastor. This course they have since adopted, and the Rev. R. Wood is now doing a good work in the place.

For nearly six years the Rev. John Spurgeon has been travelling from place to place about his Master's business. "One year," he says, "I travelled 9885 miles, preached 116 sermons, delivered my son's lecture on 'Sermons in Candles' twenty-four times, administered the Lord's Supper twelve times, gave twelve addresses to Sunday-schools, collected nearly £1000 for poor places, and encouraged many of the Lord's stewards."

AN "HONORABLE FAMILY."

Mr. John Spurgeon's father once said to him, "John, we are an honorable family; not rich in this world's goods, but where is there a family with five preachers making known the Gospel every Sunday? Very few indeed." "Now," says the honored subject of this sketch, "I am the old man, and we have seven preachers in the family—myself, two sons, two grandsons, and two sons-in-law—making known the love of God every Lord's day. What hath God wrought?"

CURRENT EVENTS.

An Important Report Deserving Serious attention was issued last week by Mr. Burchard the Director of the Mint. In the present condition of business the figures ought to be closely studied for they indicate that there may come a time when a panic may be induced, or its worst features aggravated by our present financial policy. It appears, from Mr. Burchard's estimates, that on the 1st of July, 1882, the total paper and specie of the country amounted to $1,543,710,432. One year previous it had amounted to $1,469,342,603. This represents an accumulation within the twelve month of about $74,500,000. Of this accumulation, $28,500,000, or a little more than one-third, was in gold coin and bullion; some $28,000,000 was in silver coin and bullion, and the remainder was in the notes of national banks. Bringing the statistics down to the 1st of October, the amount of gold coin and bullion awaiting coinage was at that date about the same as it was on the 1st of November of the previous year, while the silver had increased $29,000,000. Mr. Burchard reports that the production of gold for the fiscal year is estimated at $31,500,000 and that of silver at $44,700,000. This is a gain of $2,600,000 over the previous year's production for silver and a loss of $5,000,000 for gold. To rightly understand these figures it must be remembered that in our foreign trade the gold is sent out of the country while the silver is retained.

The Second Assistant Postmaster-General who controls the Star Route service has issued his report which attracts unusual interest owing to the disclosures made in the recent trials. It appears from the report that the cost of railroad mail transportation was $10,373,515, against $9,793,155 for the previous year. The increase in mileage was 8994 miles, or 8.9 per cent increase. This is the greatest increase in length of railroad routes ever made in any one year, and is greater than the entire railroad mileage in 1851. The appropriation for the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1883, is $11,130,000, and the estimate for this item for 1884 is $12,000,000. The estimated increase is less than is shown for 1882 over 1881, as the probable rate of increase in cost will be reduced as the aggregate mileage is enlarged. There are now more than 100,000 miles of railroad service in operation, reaching every State and Territory of the Union. The item of expenditure for the Star Service during the fiscal year ended June 30th, 1882, was $5,553,849. This was $1,403,506 less than the cost of the service for the previous year. It is believed that $2,500,000 of the appropriation for 1883 will remain unexpended at the close of the year; and the estimate for 1884, is set down as $5,500,000. "This," says Mr. Elmer, "is worthy of note as it will cover the cost of the growth and expansion of the service for the two fiscal years of 1883 and 1884. The "annual transportation," or number of miles travelled in the performance of the Star Route service during the fiscal year 1882 was 76,924,867 miles; the cost, $5,553,849; the annual transportation for 1880, 76,070,995 miles; the cost, $7,321,499; the result, 853,872 miles more transportation and $1,767,650 reduction in cost for 1882, as against the same items for 1880. The estimate for all items of transportation for 1884 amounts to $25,493,120.

Prohibition as one of the Principal Political issues becomes every week still more clearly defined. The New York Tribune says: "The number of candidates of the temperance party in the western part of New York State is surprisingly large. In nearly every Assembly district the party has a candidate for the Assembly. The object of this movement is to pass an amendment to the Constitution prohibiting the manufacture or sale of intoxicating liquors in this State. The effect of the movement will be to draw off votes from the Republican candidates." The Methodist Episcopal ministers of Central and Southern New York at their conference in Elmira on October 17th, resolved that they would not support any man for member of Assembly who would not pledge himself to support the proposed constitutional prohibitory amendment. At the session of the Pennsylvania Presbyterian Synod on October 20th, a resolution was moved in reference to prohibition, the substance of which was that the delegates are in hearty sympathy with all judicious efforts to unite good citizens in securing the adoption of prohibitory amendments to State Constitutions, and that they will support those men as candidates for State Legislature who acknowledge the necessity of prohibitory measures. The resolution was referred to the Temperance Committee for action. In Ohio the Prohibitionists claim to have cast 20,000 votes which is more than the Democratic plurality.

Three Reasons Why the Laws for the Suppression of vice are not enforced in the city of New York are given in a recently published letter from Dr. Howard Crosby, whose experience in connection with the useful society of which he is president, give him the right to speak with authority on the subject. The reasons are that the officials whose duty it is to enforce the laws are participants in the vice; that officials receive pay from the law-breakers; and that political considerations are paramount. These reasons should not be overlooked by the citizens. They imply not only culpability on the part of the officials, but carelessness on the part of the people who elect them or those who appoint them.

The Statement Made on the Subject of Civil Service Reform by Mr. Howard Carroll, the young journalist who has accepted the Republican nomination for Congressman-at-Large in New York, shows how the necessity for the movement has impressed an intelligent observer whose opportunities for watching the currents of national politics have been extensive. In his letter of acceptance Mr. Carroll says: "I shall, if honored by an election, neither directly nor indirectly ask from president, or cabinet, or department, the appointment of any person to any office. Further in regard to the Civil Service I have to say that the exact remedy for evils so great and of such long standing as those justly complained of in connection with it, is not easily found or readily to be applied. So far as the experiment has been fairly tried, however, in the Post Office and Custom House in New York, and to some extent in Washington, it appears to me that the system of admission to the public service, on probation after success in open competition, and subsequent promotion for merit—the system embodied in the so-called Pendleton bill—promises the best results; and I should gladly do all that I could to insure the adoption of that measure. In any case I should do all in my power to take the subordinate offices of the Federal Government wholly out of politics."

The Yellow Fever Scourge at Pensacola, Fla., has not abated in virulence during the past week. Seventy new cases were reported on October 16th; fifty on the 17th; fifty-six on the 18th; fifty-eight on the 19th; fifty-three on the 20th; and forty on the 21st. It is feared that the reduction in Saturday's returns was due not to improved conditions but to the fact that three physicians were off duty. The total number of deaths at the end of the week aggregated 161. One of the physicians has been summoned to the Nix settlement, on Perido Bay, ten or twelve miles from Pensacola, and found a number of cases of the fever there. Several cases are also reported at Powelton, on the Louisville and Nashville road, sixteen miles distant. No intercourse has existed between either of these places and Pensacola since the outbreak of the epidemic. The National Board of Health has sent its contribution of $3812.50, being the amount allowed to October 1st. In sending this instalment the board has considerably overlooked certain informalities in the vouchers furnished them in view of the urgent necessity of the case. A telegram to New York says: "The weather continues almost preternaturally warm, notwithstanding the repeated showers and clearings for some days past."

President Arthur Paid a Visit to Dr. McCosh at Princeton College, N. J., last week. The President dined with the principal and made a brief address to several hundred students. He expressed his thanks for the cordial manner in which he had been received, and said that as a proof of his high estimation of the College of New Jersey and of his confidence in the faculty and students, he intended leaving with them that which he prized more than anything else—his son. After making the address he visited the gymnasium, museum, library and other buildings, and expressed himself as greatly pleased with what he had seen.

The Death of Bishop Paine of the Methodist Episcopal Church South is announced. He died on October 20th, at the age of eighty-three. He was the senior bishop of the church. He was born in Person County, North Carolina, in November, 1799. His first labors in the Christian ministry were in Tennessee, where he labored until in 1830 he was elected President of La Grange College, Alabama. He resigned that position in 1846 when he was elected bishop. Bishop Paine took a prominent part in the work of organization when the Southern Church separated from that of the North, and was chairman of the committee which drew up the reasons for secession. During the war Bishop Paine was actively engaged in every effort made for Christian usefulness in the army, and after peace was proclaimed he entered heartily into the efforts for reorganization. He was the author of "Life and Times of Bishop McKendree," a work which has met with great praise and which was published at the request of the General Conference of his church.

An Impending Financial Collapse was Averted by prayer some time ago. A merchant in relating his experience at the Fulton Street Prayer-meeting last week described an incident of a panic when many business houses were tried by financial embarrassment. Firms, accounted absolutely safe, failed suddenly and disastrously. He was one of the many merchants who were severely put to it to meet obligations. The first time he attended the noon-meeting was when he was threatened with something akin to failure. On that occasion prayer prevailed, and he tided over the difficulty. He said that his experience led him to believe that the noon meeting for business men had done more to save business paper from going to protest than the banks of the city. Men learned that they were dependent upon a higher power than their own, and to believe in God's power and care for them. Thus came peace and calmness of spirit.

An Exemplary Method of Doing Good has been put in operation in Springfield, Ohio. A local journal says: "the Fooms Mission, which is named in honor of Mrs. John Fooms, a lady whose benevolent and philanthropic work is well known, has for its aim a very modest and much needed work—that of introducing into the homes of workmen sound religious literature. THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, an attractive, undenominational, and live periodical, has been selected to aid this purpose. The eastern and southeastern part of the city will be the ground first taken up. Mr. C. C. Taylor is treasurer. The distributing department is in charge of Mr. D. H. Mitchell, who will also report to pastors of the city any of their members who are sick, or may have strayed from their church homes." Letters are constantly received at the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD describing the beneficial influence of the journal and relating instances of conversions which have occurred through the blessing of God on its pages. It is therefore very gratifying to find that efforts such as that at Springfield are being made to extend its influence, and it may be hoped that individual subscribers in other places who know the paper and its work will by introducing it to their friends and acquaintances co-operate in an enterprise which God is signally blessing.

A Fatal Legal Decision which is said to have already involved the loss of six lives, has been pronounced in Chicago. A journal of that city in reporting the drowning of three persons on October 15th, says: "The drowning was the result of the strange ruling of the Supervising Inspectors of Steam-boats that tugs must not, under a fine of $500 for each person carried, take any passengers on board. Tug owners have humanely insisted upon exception in cases where they could save drowning persons, but no exception was allowed. The lives lost on Sunday make up an aggregate of six which have been sacrificed in this harbor as the result of this ruling." If the inspectors have correctly stated the provisions of the law it is high time the law itself was amended or repealed. In matters of life and death, society will not permit red-tape to prevent good being done, though in religious matters unauthorized, unordained seekers after lost souls are often restrained at the instance of men who have neglected the duty (Mark 9 : 38).

A Mad Ride on a Locomotive was Witnessed near Boston on October 18th. Five disorderly men were noticed lurking about the New York and New England depot in that city, and though suspicion was excited, they were not expelled from the premises. About ten o'clock at night, however, an engine was observed moving out of the yard with the five men on board. They had watched their opportunity, and noticing that the engine-driver and his assistant had momentarily left their places, they entered the cab and started the engine. They soon got up a wild speed, and there being no means of stopping them, they ran fourteen miles in as many minutes. Finally their mad freak was brought to an end, without a catastrophe, by the engine being switched off on to a side track in obedience to a telegram from the Boston manager, and they were captured. The madness and folly of such an escapade are apparent to every one, but if the course of impenitent sinners could be seen by them as God sees it, they would know that they are on just such a mad career which must end in destruction unless God mercifully changes their course (Prov. 6 : 14, 15).

A Gallant Rescue from a Mine is Reported in a journal of Virginia, Nev. A man named Roger Stinson was at work in a mine when a fall of rock occurred which threw him to the ground and partially buried him. Two of his companions ran to his rescue, and had nearly succeeded in releasing him when a second fall occurred in which they narrowly escaped death. They recommenced the task of extricating Stinson, though all about them was crumbling and threatening to come in. When he was finally dug out it was found that both his legs were broken. He was carried to a place of safety, when a messenger was sent for a surgeon. As there was a shaft fifty feet in depth to be ascended, and the only way of reaching the surface was by means of a rope and bucket, the miners thought that a surgeon could come down into the mine and in some way so mend the legs of their wounded companion as would enable him to go up in the bucket. When the surgeon came he said it was of no use to try to do anything with the man down in the mine; he must be brought out. The miners descended and set to work upon the problem. The strongest man among them stood erect in the drift, when the other lifted Stinson upon his back. With a long rope the two men were then lashed together, Stinson being so placed that his broken legs were well up from the ground. The miner, with his living load thus lashed upon his back, got into the bucket and was hoisted to the surface, and his broken limbs were set. But for the intrepid conduct of the two miners Stinson's life must have been sacrificed, as the rocky roof where he had been working continued to fall for some time. The poor man under the weight of rock with his broken limbs was a fit type of the sin-crushed human race for the salvation of which Jesus descended from Heaven to die (Rom. 5 : 18).

A Long Imprisonment was Escaped by a convicted prisoner last week in New York, owing to his previous good record. The prisoner had been convicted of theft and when two days afterward he was called up for judgment it was expected that he would get five years in State prison. The Recorder, however, who has made it a rule never to impose sentence without first finding out something of the character of the defendant, addressing the prisoner, said: "You were convicted, and I think very properly, of the crime with which you are charged. In order that I might dispose of your case righteously, I sent for the inspector in whose district you resided, and made a thorough inquiry into your antecedents. I feel satisfied that you have heretofore been an honest man and that this is your first offence. I have ascertained also that at a fire in a tenement house not long since, you, at the risk of your own life, saved the lives of a number of persons, among whom were several children, who would never have been brought out alive had it not been for your bravery. Under the circumstances I feel justified in suspending sentence. You are discharged, and I trust I shall never see you in this court again." Tears stood in the prisoner's eyes as he returned thanks to the court and promised not to offend in the future. The Recorder's desire to dispose of the case righteously led him to make a merciful disposition of it. So the believer in Christ will be saved at the judgment, but not by his own record; his Surety's merit and suffering will be the cancelling power in his case (Rom. 5 : 18).

A Curious Naval Problem has been Exercising the ingenuity of the shipbuilding experts of Montreal. It arose out of a defect in the rudder of the iron steamship Carmona now being repaired in that port. It appears that lately, while the vessel was pitching in a heavy sea, daylight became visible in the iron rudder, between the screw and outside rudder frame. Closer inspection revealed the fact that a very large hole had been eaten into the rudder nearly four feet by three in dimensions. On arriving at Montreal repairs were ordered, and the rudder is being put in good order for the outward voyage. The only solution of the problem of the cause of the hole in the rudder is given by a gentleman who has all his life been connected with the ship-building trade. He believes it due to the galvanic action of a large brass nut at the end of the propeller shaft. This having disintegrated the iron of the rudder, the action of the water washed away the iron piecemeal, until at length the large and dangerous hole was noticed. This remarkable defect will doubtless lead to precautions being taken in the building of vessels in the future. It is a type of a trouble that often happens in the Christian life. When we wonder that men whom we believed to be sincere Christians, are permitted to fall into grievous sin, a more intimate knowledge of the circumstances often reveals the fact that a disintegrating process had been in progress for some time and in their communion with God which would have insured to them guidance and safety, there has been a flaw originating in some secretly cherished sin and extended by the storms of life (Isa. 59 : 2).

ASK AND HAVE.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Ye lust, and have not: ye kill, and desire to have, and cannot obtain: ye fight and war, yet ye have not, because ye ask not. Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss, that ye may consume it upon your lusts."—James 4 : 2, 3.

The Desires of the Good and of the Evil—I. The Poverty of Lusting—Threefold—They Kill—Selfish Competition—Formal Prayers—II. Spiritual Poverty—Desirable Things Sought by a Wrong Method—Prayerless Men and Churches—Attenuated Prayer-Meetings—The Wrong Kind of Prayers—III. The Wealth which Awaits the Use of the Right Means—God's Demand a Small One—The Rule of the Kingdom—Necessary Things Otherwise Unobtainable—The Asking a Privilege—A Belated Scholar's Prayer Answered—Prayer Should be the First Thing—Often the Very Last—What is to be had for Asking—God gives more than He is Asked for—Silence in Heaven.

MAY these striking words be made profitable to us by the teaching of the Holy Spirit.

Man is a creature abounding in wants, and ever restless, and hence his heart is full of desires. I can hardly imagine a man existing who has not many desires of some kind or another. Man is comparable to the sea anemone with its multitude of tentacles which are always hunting in the water for food; or like certain plants which send out tendrils, seeking after the means of climbing. The poet says, "Man never is, but always to be, blest." He steers for which he thinks to be his port, but as yet he is tossed about on the waves. One of these days he hopes to find his heart's delight, and so he continues to desire with more or less expectancy.

This fact appertains both to the worst of men and the best of men. In bad men desires corrupt into lusts; they long after that which is selfish, sensual, and consequently evil. The current of their desires sets strongly in a wrong direction. These lustings, in many cases, become extremely intense; they make the man their slave; they domineer over his judgment; they stir him up to violence; he fights and wars, perhaps he literally kills; in God's sight, who counts anger murder, he does kill full often. Such is the strength of his desires that they are commonly called passions; and when these passions are fully excited, then the man himself struggles vehemently, so that the kingdom of the devil suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force.

Meanwhile in gracious men there are desires also. To rob the saints of their desires would be to injure them greatly, for by these they rise out of their lower selves. The desires of the gracious are after the best things; things pure and peaceable, laudable and elevating. They desire God's glory, and hence their desires spring from higher motives than those which inflame the unrenewed mind. Such desires in Christian men are frequently very fervent and forcible; they ought always to be so; and those desires begotten of the Spirit of God stir the renewed nature, exciting and stimulating it, and making the man to groan and to be in anguish and in travail until he can attain that which God has taught him to long for.

At this time I shall by God's help try to set forth from our text, first, the poverty of lusting—"Ye lust and have not." Secondly, I shall sadly show the poverty of many professing Christians in spiritual things, especially in their church capacity; they also long for and have not. Thirdly, we shall speak in closing, upon the wealth wherewith holy desires will be rewarded if we will but use the right means. If we ask we shall receive.

I. First, consider

THE POVERTY OF LUSTING

—"Ye lust, and have not." Carnal lustings, however strong they may be, do not in many cases obtain that which they seek after: as saith the text, "Ye desire to have, and cannot obtain." The man longs to be happy, but he is not; he pines to be great, but he grows meaner every day; he aspires after this and after that which he thinks will content him, but he is still unsatisfied; he is like the troubled sea which cannot rest. One way or another his life is disappointment; he labors as in the very fire, but the result is vanity and vexation of spirit. How can it be otherwise? If we sow the wind, must we not reap the whirlwind, and nothing else?

Or, if peradventure the strong lustings of an active, talented, persevering man do give him what he seeks after, yet how soon he loses it. He has it so that he has it not. The pursuit is toilsome, but the possession is a dream. He sits down to eat and lo! the feast is snatched away, the cup vanishes when it is at his lip. Or if such men have gifts and power enough to retain that which they have won, yet in another sense they have it not while they have it, for the pleasure which they looked for in it is not there. They pluck the apple, and it turns out to be one of those Dead Sea apples which crumble to ashes in the hand. The man is rich, but God takes away from him the power to enjoy his wealth. By his lustings and his warrings the licentious man at last obtains the object of his cravings, and after a moment's gratification, he loathes that which he so passionately lusted for. He longs for the tempting pleasure, seizes it, and crushes it by the eager grasp. Thus may it be said of multitudes of the sons of men—"Ye lust, and have not."

Their poverty is set forth in a threefold manner "Ye kill, and desire to have, and cannot obtain," "Ye have not, because ye ask not," "Ye ask, and receive not, because ye ask amiss."

If the lusts fail, it is not because they did not set to work to gain their ends; for according to their nature they used the most practical means within their reach, and used them eagerly, too. According to the mind of the flesh the only way to obtain a thing is to fight for it, and James sets this down as the reason of all fighting. "Whence come wars and fightings among you? Come they not hence, even of your lusts that war in your members?" This is the form of effort of which we read, "Ye fight and war, yet ye have not."

To this mode of operation men cling from age to age. If a man is to get along in this world they tell me he must contend with his neighbors, and push them from their vantage ground; he must not be particular how they are to thrive, but he must mind the main chance on his own account, and take care to rise, no matter how many he may tread upon. He cannot expect to get on if he loves his neighbor as himself. It is and every man must look to himself. Do you think I am satirical? I may be, but I have heard this sort of talk from men who meant it. So they take to fighting, and that fighting is often victorious, for according to the text "ye kill"—that is to say, they so fight that they overthrow their adversary, and there is an end of him.

Moreover, they fight with great perseverance, for the text says, "Ye fight and war." Now, war is a continuation of the act of fighting, prolonging it from campaign to campaign, and conducting it by the rules of military art till the victory is won. Multitudes of men are living for themselves, competing here and warring there, fighting for their own hand with the utmost perseverance. They have little choice as to how they will do it. Conscience is not allowed to interfere in their transactions, but the old advice rings in their ears. "Get money; get money honestly if you can, but by any means get money." No matter though body and soul be ruined, and others be deluged with misery, fight on, for there is no discharge in this war. Well, saith James, "Ye kill, and desire to have, and cannot obtain; ye fight and war, yet ye have not."

When men who are greatly set upon their selfish purposes do not succeed they may possibly hear that the reason of their non-success is "Because ye ask not." Is, then, success to be achieved by asking? So the text seems to hint, and so the righteous find it. Why doth not this man of intense desires take to asking? The reason is, first, because it is unnatural to the natural man to pray; as well expect him to fly. He despises the idea of supplication. "Pray?" says he. "No, I want to be at work. I cannot waste time on devotions; prayers are not practical, I want to fight my way. While you are praying I shall have beaten my opponent. I go to my counting-house, and leave you to your Bibles and your prayers." He hath no mind for asking of God. He declares that none but canting hypocrites care to pray, thus confessing that if he were to pray he would be a canting hypocrite.

For a while the carnal man goes on fighting and warring; but by-and-by he changes his mind, for he is ill, or frightened. His purpose is the same, but if it cannot be achieved one way he will try another. If he must ask, well, he will ask; he will become religious, and do good to himself in that way. He finds that some religious people prosper in the world, and that even sincere Christians are by no means fools in business, and, therefore, he will try their plan. And now he comes under the third censure of our text—"Ye ask and receive not." What is the reason why the man who is the slave of his lusts obtains not his desire, even when he takes to asking? The reason is because his asking is a mere matter of form, his heart is not in his worship. He buys a book containing what are called forms of prayer, and he repeats these, for repeating is easier than praying, and demands no thought.

This man's prayer is asking amiss, because it is entirely for himself. He wants to prosper that he may enjoy himself; he wants to be great simply that he may be admired; his prayer begins and ends with self. Look at the indecency of such a prayer even if it be sincere. When a man so prays he asks God to be his servant, and gratify his desires; nay, worse than that, he wants God to join him in the service of his lusts. He will gratify his lusts, and God shall come and help him to do it. Such prayer is blasphemous, but a large quantity of it is offered, and it must be one of the most God-provoking things that Heaven ever beholds. His asking will miss because he asks amiss, that he may consume it upon his lusts.

So much upon the poverty of lusting.

II. Secondly, I have now before me a serious business, and that is, to show how Christian churches may suffer so that they too "desire to have, and cannot obtain." Of course the Christian seeks higher things than the worldling, else were he not worthy of that name at all. At least professedly his object is to obtain the true riches, and to glorify God in spirit and in truth. Yes, but look, dear brethren, all churches do not get what they desire. We have to complain, not here and there, but in many places, of churches that are nearly asleep, and are gradually declining. Of course they find excuses. The population is dwindling, or another place of worship is attracting the people. There is always an excuse handy when a man wants one; but still there stands the fact—public worship is almost deserted in some places, the ministry has no rallying power about it, and those who put in an appearance are discontented or indifferent. These churches "have not," for no truth is made prevalent through their zeal, no sin is smitten, no holiness promoted, nothing is done by which God is glorified. And what is the reason of it?

First, even among professed Christians, there may be the pursuit of desirable things in a wrong method. "Ye fight and war, yet ye have not." Have not churches thought to prosper by competing with other churches? At such and such a place of worship they have a very clever man; we must get a clever man, too; in fact, he must be a little cleverer than our neighbor's hero. That is the thing—a clever man! Ah me, that we should live in an age in which we talk about clever men in preaching the Gospel of Jesus Christ! Alas, that this holy service should be thought to depend upon human cleverness!

Churches have competed with each other in architecture, in music, in apparel, and in social status. The leaders fancy that to succeed they must have something more handsome, artistic, or expensive than their neighbors; hence they build Gothic edifices in which the minister's voice gets up among the timbers, and is never properly heard, or else they purchase an organ with every stop except the full one. The opinion would seem to be widely spread that there is a deal of grace in an organ. To pray to God with a windmill like the Tartars would be very absurd; but to praise God with wind passing through a set of pipes is eminently proper. I never have seen the distinction and do not see it now. Organ or no organ is no now the question, but I speak of instances in which these machines are set up as a matter of rivalry. Is it not the design of many to succeed by a fine building, better music, and a cleverer ministry than others? Is it not as much a matter of competition as a shop front and a dressed window are with drapers? Is this the way by which the Kingdom of God is to grow up among us?

Meanwhile, what is the reason why they do not have a blessing? The text says,

"BECAUSE YE ASK NOT:"

I am afraid there are churches which do not ask. Prayer in all forms is too much neglected. Private prayer is allowed to decay. I shall put it to the conscience of every man how far secret prayer is attended to; and how much of fellowship with God there is in secret among the members of our churches. Certainly its healthy existence is vital to church prosperity. Of family prayer it is more easy to judge, for we can see it. I fear that in these days many have quite given up family prayer. I pray you do not imitate them.

As to the congregational prayer, the gathering together in what we call our prayer-meetings, is there not a falling off? In many cases the prayer-meeting is despised, and looked down upon as a sort of second-rate gathering. There are members of churches who are never present, and it does not prick their consciences that they stay away. Some congregations mix up the prayer-meeting with a lecture, so as to hold only one service in the week. I read the other day an excuse for all this; it is said that people are better at home, attending to family concerns. This is idle talk, for who among us wishes people to neglect their domestic concerns?

But some reply, "there are prayer-meetings, and we do ask for the blessing, and yet it comes not." Is not the explanation to be found in the other part of the text, "Ye have not, because ye ask amiss?" When prayer-meetings become a mere form, when brethren stand up and waste the time with their long orations, instead of speaking to God in earnest and burning words, when there is no expectation of a blessing, when the prayer is cold and chill, then nothing will come of it. He who prays without fervency does not pray at all. We cannot commune with God, who is a consuming fire, if there is no fire in our prayers. Many prayers fail of their errand because there is no faith in them. Prayers which are filled with doubt, are requests for refusal.

Moreover, if our praying, however earnest and believing it may be, is a mere asking that our church may prosper because we want to glory in its prosperity, if we want to see our own denomination largely increased, and its respectability improved, that we may share the honors thereof, then our desires are nothing but lustings after all. Can it be that the children of God manifest the same emulations, jealousies, and ambitions as men of the world? Shall religious work be a matter of rivalry and contest? Ah, then, the prayers which seek success will have no acceptance at the mercy-seat. God will not hear us, but bid us begone, for he careth not for the petitions of which self is the object. "Ye have not, because ye ask not, or because ye ask amiss."

III. Thirdly, I have a much more pleasing work to do, and that is to hint at the use of the right means, namely, of asking rightly of God.

I invite your most solemn attention to this matter, for it is vitally important. And my first observation is this, how very small after all is this demand which God makes of us. Ask! Why, it is the least thing he can possibly expect of us, and it is no more than we ordinarily require of those who need help from us. We expect a poor man to ask; and if he does not we lay the blame of his lack upon himself. If God will give for the asking, and we remain poor, who is to blame? Is not the blame most grievous? Does it not look as if we were out of order with God, so that we will not even condescend to ask a favor of Him? Surely there must be in our hearts a lurking enmity to Him, or else instead of its being an unwelcome necessity it would be regarded as a great delight.

However, brethren, whether we like it or not, remember, asking is

THE RULE OF THE KINGDOM.

"Ask, and ye shall receive." It is a rule that never will be altered in anybody's case. What reason can be pleaded why we should be exempted from prayer? What argument can there be why we should be deprived of the privilege and delivered from the necessity of supplication? I can see none; can you? God will bless Elijah and send rain on Israel, but Elijah must pray for it. If the chosen nation is to prosper Samuel must plead for it. If the Jews are to be delivered Daniel must intercede. God will bless Paul, and the nation shall be converted through him, but Paul must pray. Pray he did without ceasing; his epistles show that he expected nothing except by asking for it. If you may have everything by asking, and nothing without asking, I beg you to see how absolutely vital prayer is, and I beseech you to abound in it.

Moreover, it is clear to even the most shallow thinker that there are some things necessary for the church of God which we cannot get otherwise than by prayer. You can get that clever man I spoke about—the less, perhaps, you pray about him the better; and that new church, and the new organ, and the choir, you can also get without prayer; but you cannot get the gift of God is not to be purchased with money. Some of the members of a church in a primitive village in America thought that they would raise a congregation by hanging up a very handsome chandelier in the meeting-house. People talked about this chandelier, and some went to see it, but the light of it soon grew dim.

There are no mechanical means which will make up for the absence of the Holy Ghost. If the Holy Spirit be not there, what is the use of that clever man of yours? Will anybody be converted? Will any soul be comforted? Will any children of God be renewed in spiritual life without the Holy Spirit? Neither can you get communion with God without prayer. He that will not pray cannot have communion with God. Yet more, there is no real, spiritual communion of the church with its own members when prayer is suspended. Prayer must be in action, or else those blessings which are vitally essential to the success of the church can never come to it. Prayer is the great door of spiritual blessing, and if you close it you shut out the favor.

Beloved brethren, do you not think that this asking which God requires is a very great privilege? Suppose there were an edict published that you must not pray; that would be a hardship indeed. If prayer rather interrupted than increased the stream of blessing, it would be a sad calamity. Did you ever see a dumb man under a strong excitement, or suffering great pain, and therefore anxious to speak? It is a terrible sight to see; the face is distorted, the body is fearfully agitated; the mute writhes and labors in dire distress. Every limb is contorted with a desire to help the tongue, but it cannot break its bonds. The poor creature is in pain unspeakable. Suppose we were in our spiritual nature full of strong desires, and yet dumb as to the tongue of prayer, methinks it would be one of the direst afflictions that could possibly befall us; and our agony would be overwhelming. Blessed be His name, the Lord ordains a way of utterance, and bids our heart speak out to Him.

Beloved, we must pray: it seems to me that it ought to be the first thing we ever think of doing when in need. If men were right with God, and loved Him truly, they would pray as naturally as they breathe. I hope some of us are right with God, and do not need to be driven to prayer, for it has become an instinct of our nature. I was told by a friend yesterday the story of a story which his pastor loved to tell. The dear little child believed his God, and delighted in prayer. His schoolmaster had urged the scholars to be at school in time, and this child always tried to be so; but his father and mother were dilatory people, and one morning, through their fault alone, he just left the door as the clock struck the hour for the school to open. A friend standing near heard the little one cry, "Dear God, do grant I may be in time for school." It struck the listener that for once prayer could not be heard, for the child had quite a little walk before him, and the hour was already come. He was curious to see the result. Now it so happened this morning that the master, in trying to open the school-house door turned the key the wrong way, and could not stir the bolt, and they had to send for a smith to open the door. Hence a delay, and just as the door opened our little friend entered with the rest, all in good time. God has many ways of granting right desires. It was most natural that instead of crying and whining a child that really loved God should speak to Him about his trouble. Should it not be natural to you and to me spontaneously and at once to tell the Lord our sorrows and ask for help? Should not this be

THE FIRST RESORT?

Alas, according to Scripture and observation, and I grieve to add, according to experience, prayer is often the last thing. Look at the sick man in the one hundred and seventh Psalm. Friends bring him various foods, but his soul abhorreth all manner of meat; the physicians do what they can to heal him, but he grows worse and worse, and draws nigh to the gates of death: "Then they cry unto the Lord in their trouble." That was put last which should have been first. "Send for the doctor. Prepare him nourishment. Wrap him in flannels!" All very well, but when will you pray to God? God will be called upon when the case grows desperate. Oh, yes; God is sought unto when we are driven into a corner and ready to perish. And what a mercy it is that He hears such laggard prayers, and delivers the suppliants out of their troubles. But ought it to be so with you and with me, and with churches of Christ? Ought not the first impulse of a declining church to be, "Let us pray day and night until the Lord appears for us; let us meet together with one accord in one place, and never separate until the blessing descends upon us?"

Do you know, brothers, what great things are to be had for the asking? Have you ever thought of it? Does it not stimulate you to pray fervently? All heaven lies before the grasp of the asking man; all the promises of God are rich and inexhaustible, and their fulfilment is to be had by prayer. Jesus saith, "All things are delivered unto Me of My Father," and Paul says, "All things are yours, and ye are Christ's."

when all things are thus handed over to us?

I will mention another truth which ought to make us pray, and that is, that if we ask, God will give us so much more than we ask. Abraham asked of God that Ishmael might live before him. He thought "God has promised me a seed, and surely it must be this child of Hagar. Oh, that Ishmael might live before thee." God granted him that, but He gave him Isaac as well, and all the blessings of the covenant. Hear that poor, dying thief's humble prayer, "Lord, remember me when thou comest into Thy kingdom." Jesus replies, "To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise." He had not dreamed of such an honor. Even the story of the Prodigal teaches us this. He resolved to say, "I am not worthy to be called thy son; make me as one of thy hired servants." What is the answer? "This my son was dead, and is alive again: bring forth the best robe and put it on him; put a ring on his hands, and shoes on his feet." Once get into the position of an asker, and you shall have what you never asked for, and never thought to receive.

At this moment I believe that God's church might have inconceivable blessings if she were but ready now to pray. Did you ever notice that wonderful picture in the eighth chapter of the Revelation? It is worthy of careful notice. I shall not attempt to explain it in its connection, but merely point to the picture as it hangs on the wall by itself. Read on—"When He had opened the seventh seal, there was silence in Heaven about the space of half an hour."

SILENCE IN HEAVEN:

there were no anthems, no hallelujahs, not an angel stirred a wing. Silence in Heaven! Can you imagine it? And look! You see seven angels standing before God, and to them are given seven trumpets. There they wait, trumpet in hand, but there is no sound. Silence unbroken, profound, awful reigned in Heaven. Action is suspended in Heaven, the centre of all activity. "And another angel came and stood at the altar, having a golden censer." There he stands, but no offering is presented; everything has come to a standstill.

What can possibly set it in motion? "And there was given unto him much incense, that he should offer it with the prayers of all saints upon the golden altar which was before the throne." Prayer is presented together with the merit of the Lord Jesus. Now, see what will happen. "And the smoke of the incense, which came with the prayers of the saints, ascended up before God out of the angel's hands." That is the key of the whole matter. Now you will see; the angel begins to work; he takes the censer, fills it with the altar fire, and flings it down upon the earth, "and there were voices, and thunderings, and lightnings, and an earthquake." "And the seven angels which had the seven trumpets prepared themselves to sound."

Down fell the living coals among the sons of men, while the angels of the divine providence, who stood still before, sound their thunderblasts, and the will of the Lord is done. Such is the scene in Heaven in a certain measure even to this day. Bring hither the incense. Bring hither the prayers of the saints! Set them on fire with Christ's merits, and on the golden altar let them smoke before the Most High: then shall we see the Lord at work, and His will shall be done on earth as it is in Heaven. God send His blessing with these words, for Christ's sake. Amen.

QUEEN VICTORIA AND THE SECRETARY OF STATE.

THE following incident, which was made public during the first year of Queen Victoria's reign, made a very pleasing impression upon the well-conditioned portion of the British public. A certain noble minister arrived at Windsbr at a late hour one Saturday night. On being introduced, he said, "I have brought down for your Majesty's inspection some documents of great importance; but, as I shall be obliged to trouble you to examine them in detail, I will not encroach on the time of your Majesty to-night, but will request your attention to-morrow morning."

"To-morrow morning," repeated the Queen; "to-morrow is Sunday, my lord." "True, your Majesty, but business of the State will not admit of delay." "I am aware of that," replied the Queen, "and, as your lordship could not have arrived earlier at the palace to-night, I will attend to their contents after church to-morrow morning." So to church went the Queen and the Court, and to church went the noble lord; when much to his surprise the discourse was on the duties and obligations of the Christian Sabbath.

"How did your lordship like the sermon?" asked the Queen. "Very much, indeed, your Majesty," replied the nobleman. "Well then," retorted Her Majesty, "I will not conceal from you that, last night, I sent the clergyman the text from which he preached. I hope we shall all be improved by the sermon." The Sunday passed without a single word being said relative to the State papers, and at night, when Her Majesty was about to withdraw—"To-morrow morning, my lord, at any hour you please," said the Queen, turning to the nobleman—"as early as seven, my lord, if you like, we will look into the papers." The nobleman said that he could not think of intruding on Her Majesty at so early an hour; he thought nine o'clock would be quite soon enough. And accordingly, the next morning at nine, Her Majesty was seated ready to receive the nobleman and his papers.

MRS. C. H. SPURGEON, The Ministers' Friend.

THE estimable lady, whose portrait appears on the front page, is the only daughter of the late Mr. Robert Thompson, of Falcon Square, London. She was married to the pastor of the Metropolitan Tabernacle, January 8th, 1856. The chapel was densely crowded on the occasion by a deeply interested audience, whose prayers and good wishes for the newly married pair seem to have been abundantly answered, if we may judge from the records of a singularly happy home life, and a more than usual amount of usefulness to others. The two sons, Charles and Thomas, who came together to open a new world of care and blessedness to the husband and wife, have grown to maturity, and are following in their father's footsteps, both having become faithful ministers of Christ's holy Gospel—Charles who is now visiting this country is laboring at Greenwich and his brother Thomas in New Zealand.

HOW THE "BOOK FUND" WAS BEGUN.

During recent years there has been a shadow hovering over the pastor's home, in a distressing chronic illness, under which the wife and mother has suffered. It has served, not to destroy the happiness, but only to temper the brightness.

With a touching and sympathetic pen, Mrs. Spurgeon has recorded the labor of love in which she has been engaged during the last six years of her invalid life, on behalf of poor ministers. In her little annual, "The Book Fund and its Work" for 1880, the opening chapter was entitled "How the Fund became a Fact." As she was reading one of the proof copies of his "Lectures to Students," her husband asked her how she liked it. She replied, "I wish I could place it in the hands of every minister in England." "Then why not do so? how much will you give?" was the pastor's reply. This led to much consideration on her part; but there was money ready to begin the work.

THE HOARDED CROWN-PIECES SPENT.

Mrs. Spurgeon shall tell the story in her own words: "Upstairs in a little drawer were some carefully hoarded crown-pieces, (coins about the size of our silver dollars and worth $1.25 which owing to their weight and clumsiness are rapidly going out of circulation in England). These, owing to some foolish fancy, I had been gathering for years, whenever chance threw one in my way. These I now counted out, and found they made a sum exactly sufficient to pay for one hundred copies of the work! If a twinge of regret at parting from my cherished but unwieldy favorites passed over me, it was gone in an instant; and then they were given, freely and thankfully, to the Lord; and in that moment, though I knew it not, the Book Fund was inaugurated."

INCREASE OF THE WORK.

The publishers aided her by a grant equal to her own; then friends, who heard what she was doing, came to her aid, and now, instead of sending out one volume, she is able to make up a large parcel of eight or nine good-sized volumes to cheer the hearts of solitary laborers for the Master in small towns, country villages, and distant hamlets.

Year after year the good work has been pursued, and annually Mrs. Spurgeon gives account of her stewardship to those who aid her in it. Nobody knows the lightening of the heart's burden which a poor pastor and his wife experience when an unexpected gift of money reaches their home, especially when rent-day is near. Mrs. Spurgeon has received for her "Branch Business," the Pastors' Aid Fund, during the past year, $2125, and for her Book Fund, $6960. She has sent out to poor ministers of all denominations, including Church of England clergymen, 7298 volumes of helpful theological literature. In addition to this, 10,517 single sermons have been sent out for village circulation. The number of volumes presented to preachers of the Word since the Fund was started, six years ago, is no less than 41,630.

ADA THORNTON AND HER STEP-CHILDREN.

IN a plainly, but comfortably furnished room in a farmhouse, four young people were waiting one summer's day. They were exceedingly restless even for children, and the feeling of expectancy that prevailed was obviously not one of pleasure.

"Robert," said Julia, a girl of about twelve years of age, to her brother some two years her junior, "go to your room and take that blue necktie off and put on your old black one. You ought to have known better than put a colored tie on; you have soon forgotten poor dear mamma, and she has not been dead a year yet." The boy obeyed somewhat sullenly, muttering as he did so, that he thought his new mamma would like to see him looking nice.

"That is just it," Julia explained to the other two of her brothers, one of whom was older and the other younger than herself. "I do not wish Mrs. Thornton to think we have forgotten mamma if papa has done so. As for me, I will never call her mamma, and I hope you will not do so."

The boys made no reply, but if the young lady who had married Mr. Thornton a few days before, could have looked in on the group of children to whom the widower had asked her to be a second mother, she would not have been impressed with the prospect of a hopeful future.

Very soon the sound of wheels was heard on the road in front of the house, and the children looking from the window saw their father assisting a lady, some years younger than himself, to alight from the wagon. Robert ran to the door to welcome his father and his new mamma, and was greeted by that lady with a hearty kiss, but his younger brother was detained in the parlor by Julia, who feigned not to notice her step-mother's desire to kiss her, and coldly extended her hand in formal politeness. Edward, the eldest son, was not there, having slipped out by a door in the rear, and so to the front of the house where he was seen leading the horse away to the stable. He had done this to avoid being present at his step-mother's arrival. He did not wish to vex his father by greeting her with coldness, and he had advocated giving her a cordial welcome, but had been overborne by Julia, who insisted that a welcome to the new Mrs. Thornton was an act of unfaithfulness to the memory of their dead mother.

Thus it happened that little Robert only had given any response to the affection the lady was eager to offer to her husband's children. Her heart was wounded, and when she was left alone in her room, to which her husband conducted her, she fell on her knees and prayed earnestly that she might be enabled to win the love and confidence of the children of one who had been to her as dear as a sister, and whose place she had promised she would try to fill. She knew when she promised, it would not be an easy task, and her reception convinced her that it was likely to be even more difficult than she expected. Her confidence, however, was in God's love and power and she now besought it with all earnestness, and when she rose from her knees Ada Thornton was ready to go down to the children strong in her assurance that God who can touch all hearts, would draw the hearts of the bereaved family toward her.

The next few days proved that her confidence was not misplaced. Julia was softened by learning how dearly her dead mamma had loved the lady who was now occupying the place death had emptied, and as for the boys, Julia's rule had been neither pleasant nor wise, and they were soon won over by the kindness and affection of their step-mother. Before the end of a month Ada Thornton found that the prayers she had continually offered to God since she had been married that she might have wisdom given her to win the affection of her dead friend's motherless children were abundantly answered, and that now she needed to change her prayer to one that she might be enabled to use that affection as a means of leading them to the Saviour.

MILLY SPENCER'S STRUGGLE.

"WHERE is Milly Spencer?" asked Mrs. Braithwaite, the manager of an establishment where a large quantity of millinery work was turned out, and where some thirty or forty girls were employed.

"She went out of the room nearly half an hour ago," said one of the girls. "She did not say where she was going, nor why she went away."

Mrs. Braithwaite immediately went in search of Milly Spencer, and opening the door of a room on an upper floor which, during the intervals of work, the girls were accustomed to use as a sitting-room, Mrs. Braithwaite saw the girl kneeling on the floor with her head on the seat of a chair weeping bitterly. Mrs. Braithwaite had ascended the stairs with no very friendly intention; in fact, she meant as she said to give Milly Spencer "a piece of her mind," as she phrased it, when she found her. But this spectacle of grief and distress moved even her heart to a feeling as near akin to sympathy as it ever came. She stood for a minute or two watching the figure, motionless except for the deep sobs that now and again seemed to pass through it as if they would shake it to pieces. Then as the girl had not heard her entrance she was about to call her, when she heard Milly say in a broken voice: "O dear Lord, show me what to do. Have pity on my poor mother and sisters. Oh, give me wisdom and strength to do right in this my hour of trial."

Mrs. Braithwaite was not a religious woman, but she stood solemnly near the door with a sense of awe, as if conscious that she was on holy ground. Milly was clearly engaged in earnest, silent prayer, and Mrs. Braithwaite had the delicacy to respect her occupation, though she did not withdraw. Soon, however, Milly brushed her hair back from her face with her hands and rose from her knees. She saw Mrs. Braithwaite standing at the door and realized that she had committed a breach of the rules in absenting herself from the workroom. She at once offered an apology and said she would stay after the regular hours to make up the loss of time.

"That is right, Milly," the manager said, "business is business you know, but what is your trouble? You have been crying until your eyes are swollen up. What is the matter? Any trouble at home?"

"Not yet," said Milly, "but there will be when

I go home to-night. You said this morning that we were all to come on Sunday this week to finish up the wedding order, and oh Mrs. Braithwaite, I cannot do it. It would be a sin; I dare not do it. And the girls say you will not let me come to work again if I do not come on Sunday, and then what would become of my poor mother and my little sisters!

"Tut, tut," said Mrs. Braithwaite, "you must be sick or you would not get so excited over nothing. You know as well as I do that the work will not be ready if we do not stick to it all day Sunday, and I cannot see why you should make such a fuss over the extra day; it does not happen often. You come on Sunday, and your mother and sisters will have an extra day's pay."

"No," said Milly, "I cannot come; it is the Lord's day and nothing will tempt me to work."

"I have no patience with such scruples," said Mrs. Braithwaite, "and if you will not oblige me in my difficulty I will not have you here again." So saying she left the room and Milly sorrowfully followed her to the workroom.

That was Friday, and the impossibility of completing the order on time without the Sunday's work seemed settled. But Milly knew there were other girls in the workroom who had scruples similar to her own, though they were disposed to defy them rather than run the risk of losing their occupation. She was the only professing Christian there, but she had tried to lead some of her companions to Christ, and in several of them she had been encouraged by signs of a hopeful change. To all those, she knew the proposed Sunday work would be painful, but whatever they might do, her course was clear. Toward evening when the girls were looking for the time of leaving, then near at hand, one of them asked her openly if she intended coming on Sunday.

"No," said Milly, "I have told Mrs. Braithwaite I cannot come and she has refused to let me come again." Milly was too much liked in the workroom for that announcement to pass without evoking sorrow. More than one of them was indebted to her for help in some trying difficulty, and all had learned to love the girl whose gentleness, good humor, and quiet sympathy made her the light of the room. One after another expressed their regret and urged Milly to "come just this once," but she was immovable. Then one girl who had not hitherto spoken said, "Well, girls, we cannot afford to lose Milly, let us have Mrs. Braithwaite in and offer to work all night to-night and come at three o'clock on Monday instead of seven. That will be longer hours than working on Sunday. Milly will do that, and I for one love her well enough to do that much for her. Milly walked right across the room to the girl who had spoken, and throwing her arms around her neck kissed and thanked her.

"Well," said another, "I guess I should be mean if I would not do it too, for when my sister was sick last fall, Milly came and sat up with her all night ever so many times to give us a rest."

So it was settled, and one of them went to find the manager who was soon acquainted with the proposition carried unanimously in the workroom. She was too good a woman of business not to see that she would benefit by the new arrangement, and being moreover unwilling to lose one of her best hands, readily agreed. The arrangement was carried out and the work completed without a stitch being set on Sunday, and Milly continued to be in her humble sphere a light to the workroom as "a city set on a hill that cannot be hid."

ONLY A TRAMP.

The Tramp's Queer Little Friend.

Bobby Balston certainly was a queer little fellow, as his mother was fond of saying. During these hot August days he would disappear for hours together after afternoon school. While the other children were playing in groups on the village-green, Bobby and his broad-brimmed shady hat were indulging in a lonely saunter beneath the shadows of hedges, that came in their way.

Many a strange sight those beautiful brown eyes, beneath the shady hat, saw in those unchild-like rambles, which it has cost naturalists days and weeks of eager trouble and watchfulness to win a glimpse of. For what pair of blinking bird-eyes, or bunch of baby-rabbits should be frightened of a pair of small brown hands that never so much as dreamed moving a finger to disturb them?

And Bobby Balston saw more than birds, and flowers, and insects. One evening he had wandered as far as the edge of Mossley Wood, where it bordered the side of Deadman's Land, touching Farmer Jenkins's property. Bobby had heard of a red and blue gypsy-wagon, with yellow wheels, stationed on the plot of unclaimed-ground, and he wanted to see it. Many other folks had been over to have a look at the brilliant movable home; but the visitors had all hitherto been big and boisterous enough, as they came crunching along through the wood, or plainly visible up the wide lane, to give due warning of their approach, and to let the gypsies see them as well as be seen. They had not needed looking for down among the heather and bracken, or in the green shadows of the nut-bushes. The gypsy-wife never thought of folks being innocently hidden in such places, and guilelessly watching the interesting sight with absorbing delight and curiosity. She went about her own business, or what she chose to consider such, quite comfortably, secure, as she supposed, from all sight-seers for the time.

Seated just within the shelter of the outpost trees of the wood with a little bag of grain in her hand, a small portion of the contents of which she had scattered around her, she kept up a most tenderly conciliatory call of "Chuck, chuck; chuck-a-biddy then; chuck, chuck," to a fat, well-fed, consequential-looking fowl, pacing up and down a few yards from her, and evidently divided in its mind between the sentiments of fear and greed.

"Chuck, chuck; chuck a pretty biddy then; chuck, chuck, chuck," called the woman again, sprinkling down a few more grains.

This fresh shower of tempting gold turned the scale, and greed triumphed. With a sharp decided "cluck," as if to say, "Here goes prudence to the winds," in answer to the woman's "chuck," the bird fluttered and ran forward, and began its extra meal with the usual display of desperate hurry made by all its species, although they have never a train to catch, nor a box to pack in time for it.

With every grain swallowed the feaster appeared to gain increased courage, until it ended by actually making a spring up to take some out of the hand held toward it, when the woman, by a dexterous movement, clutched his legs, and the next moment, in spite of all its strugglings, and cries, and flutterings, had it clasped tight under her arm, had risen, and was preparing to march off with it in triumph to the wagon, for whose owners it was intended to provide that night's savory supper. But there is many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip.

"I ezpects that shicken belongs to Farmer Jenkins, I ezpects it do," said a voice just beside the woman; and with a startled shriek of terror she flung up her hands, dropped the bird, which flew screaming back to its friends in the distant farmyard, and turned to discover her companion. She saw him at last, and began furiously:

"Ah, you little vagabones, you! And how dare you come flustering folks this way? Who set you upon being a mean little, sneaking spy. I'd like to know?"

Bobby Balston's sun-browned cheeks flushed painfully. "I isn't a sneak," he answered earnestly. "I'se bin walkin' frough the wood, and I came to see your beautiful house, and I fought it very pretty to hear you talk to the shicken; and I fought, maybe, you'd like to know where it b'longed, to take it home."

"Umph," grunted the gypsy, but in a tone that had fallen from fierce to fond. "And what would you say if I told you, you little witch-child you, that I didn't care a brass farthing who it belonged to, and that I was going to cook it for supper, and that now I think I've half a mind to pop you in the pot instead, for making me lose it after all my trouble. What would you say then?"

The gravity in Bobby's eyes gave way to smiles, and the red lips parted with a peal of laughter, as he replied, "What would I say? why I would say as you was talkin' fairy tales. Has you got a little boy, and do you tell him fairy tales? Do tell me one, please?"

The woman stared in strange amazement at the trustful child for some moments, and then broke down in heavy, tearless sobs, hiding her face in her hands from the little fellow, until he put his soft fingers on her bowed cheek, and whispered:

"Has you lost your little boy?"

Then she threw her arms around him, and hugged him close to her breast with the tears streaming down her cheeks as she moaned:

"Nay, nay, I ha' my children still, but I'd ha' joyed to ha' lost them, if I might have it to think now as I'd lost them such as you."

When Bobby got home that evening he had a wonderful tale to tell of how the kind gypsy woman, her very own self, had taken him right inside her dear little wagon-house, and shown him her kitchen, and the beds, and her blackbird, and all, and then given him such a heap of kisses, and carried him half the way home.

The wonderful history would have scarcely been believed but for the proofs of his visit which Bobby brought home, in the shape of a gayly painted tin whistle, and a wicker basket, "to gather blackberries in," the woman told me, when she gave it to me," said the child gravely, as though he looked upon the suggestion something in the light of a command from the friend he had won in so singular a manner.

After this adventure some folks wondered that Mrs. Balston let her child go on wandering about the country after his favorite solitary fashion, but she passed her fingers through the thick brown curls, and looked into the large brown eyes, and asked gravely:

"And so the gypsy woman was kind to my bonny, and cried, and kissed him?"

"Yes, muvver," was always the answer whispered back. "And first minute she saw me she called me a little witch-child, but arter she was wif her arm round me, she said I was a little God's lamb."

"God's lamb and nother's lamb," murmured Mary Balston, and the child did as it would, and went where its longings led it.

The small, sturdy feet had once more carried their owner to the very verge of the parish of Silverdale, on the Friday on which the mayor of Southford engaged the strange tramp as a new hand for his factory. It was a quarter to seven in the evening, and conscientious Bobby was reluctantly deciding to leave a great spider to finish his web unwatched, in order to get home by bedtime. Absorbing interest in the progress of this most delicate house-building had led him inch by inch farther and farther into the thick hedge till he was almost covered and enveloped by the summer overgrowth of branches.

Thus shrouded, and still as a small mouse, it was little wonder that a man, slowly pacing through the same field, and wholly occupied with his own thoughts, did not perceive him; even when at last he did cast a hurried look around, the new-comer still supposed himself alone. Just as Bobby was beginning to be troubled with thoughts of time, the man flung himself down within a few feet of him, and as little Balston made his first effort to get free of his leafy net, a great groan burst upward from the very depths of the man's heart, which startled the young hearer far more than the gypsy woman's first angry words had done.

For one terrified instant the child turned back with the frantic idea of pushing his way right through the hedge, and escaping on the other side. But there came another of those sad, bitter groans, and then a moan aloud:

"Oh my God! and too late to save the poor lad who trusted me!"

Little Bobby had got over his fear now. The poor man was very miserable, that was plain enough, and Bobby had a heart that pitied misery, but did not shrink from sharing it. Once more he put up his hands to the thorny branches clutching so intrusively at that broad-brimmed hat of his, and with a little patience he got free, and stepped softly up to the stranger.

"Why, it's my potato-man!" came the low, eager ejaculation. And the man dropped the strong hands from his face that had made so little yesterday of curbing the restiveness of the pony Nelly, and of lifting Miss Enid Barnes out of the unsafe chaise. Those hands were trembling now as much as Enid's own had done, and the great, broad-shouldered man raised his dimmed eyes with a wild look in them, as if longing to fly from his wee companion, quite as anxiously as Bobby had wished to escape from his neighborhood a few moments ago.

"What are you doing here, little chap?" he asked at last, gruffly. But the gruffness was only put on to hide the shame of being caught yielding so completely to his secret sorrow, and Bobby was not at all troubled by the transparent artifice. He answered the man as simply as he had answered the gypsy woman.

"I was watching a monster, ever such a monster big spider, making his wee little freads for his house."

And the boy put up his hands, and pushed back the broad-brimmed hat to get a better look at the stranger. He got a still better view apparently, according to his own idea, a moment after, by dropping on his knees in front of his companion, and so placed, he added a grave question to his piece of information—"Was them potatoes pretty good on Sunday I put in your hat?"

"You put in my hat!" exclaimed the man a good deal surprised. "I thought an old lady gave me my dinner that day in the church-porch, not a small Brownie."

Bobby Balston gave a soft laugh. "Ah, you were asleep when I popped the potatoes in your hat, you know, and I wondered wevver you'd 'fink Lijah's ravens, or fairies, had bringed them. Faver and muvver gave them, and I bringed them, and then Mrs. Sharplin brought the sausages."

"Ah—h!" breathed the tramp, as he leaned forward and drew the little fellow on to his knees. There was a short pause, and then he asked, "And what is your name, little Brownie? I should like to know to whom to say 'thank you' for those delicious potatoes."

"I'm glad they were alicious," came the prompt answer. "But you needn't say 'fank you,' you know, because niuvver had cooked lots more'n we wanted, and my name's Bobby."

As the child uttered his name the touch of the man's hand on his shoulder grew heavier. "Bobby," he repeated slowly. "Ah, little man, you had better run away from me as fast as you can go! I knew another Bobby once, and he loved me, and when I persuaded him to run away from home with me he did it, because I promised to give him all manner of fine things, and what do you think I really did give him?"

Bobby Balston thought a moment or two in silence. The man's face was so very solemn that the gift had evidently been something rather dreadful. At last he whispered doubtfully, "Was it perhaps a whipping?"

A fleeting smile came on the down-drooped lips. "Nay, little Bobby, something far worse than that I gave him. He had had food, and a good bed, and friends, and good air to live in, and I took him away from all these things, and gave him the want of them all. And then, wee Bobby, he died, loving me to the end, and saying I had been 'so good to him.' Ah, Brownie, won't you run away from me now? are you not sorry you gave me those potatoes, when it was too late for your namesake to have any of them?"

The child laid his tired head back against his new friend's shoulder. "No, I isn't at all solly. That other poor, nice Bobby is gone home, you know; Vicar says it's one big home. And our Faver's there you know, and He won't let that Bobby go wifout potatoes if he wants them, nor nuffin else what's nice. Is you going back to Silverdale now?"

The tramp was about to answer "No," but there was a slight tone of anxiety in the question that caused him to change his purpose, and ask instead—"Why do you wish to know, little Brownie?"

"Oh!" rather sleepily, "only because it's late, and you's vevvy big, and I'd like to be carried."

The next instant the man had sprung to his feet, with the boy still clasped safely to him. He had banished all the solemn sadness from his voice when he exclaimed, in glad, ringing tones such as his own ears had not heard for many a long day:

"All right, you most queer and jolly little specimen of humanity. Now, is it to be hush-a-by fashion in my arms, or wide-awake style on my shoulder?"

"Oh, your shoulder!" cried Bobby, clapping his hands with childlike glee, and aroused out of his usual gravity by his companion's sudden accession of cheerful heartiness. "Oh, my!" he shouted delightedly, and clapping his hands a second time as he was mounted on his high perch, "I don't believe not nobody in Silverdale's ever been so far up as this. Will you carry me right in home for Muvver to see me like this?"

If the trustful, tender-hearted child had asked his bearer if he'd carry him round England like that it is quite doubtful if he would have been refused. At any rate, it was not a "no" that he got now, although Charles Wynn had all his steps to retrace to the cottage, which became his new home that night.

Bobby Balston had long been sleeping peacefully, when the tramp sat earnestly bending over the small Bible he had bought last Monday, with a few pence out of his first earnings in the vicar's cornfield. He had found something to suit him. Three hours ago the very fact that the promise of the future looked bright before him made the memories of the past the darker. Agony of mind for the lost friend, endless reproach and remorse for young Aleck Bertie's sufferings and death, had appeared to him then the perpetual cross, hourly increasing in weight, that he must bear to his life's end. Little Balston's confident murmur of assured faith, "That other Bobby's gone home, you know," had fallen into the overburdened heart like healing balm.

The Saviour had borne the agony, the Saviour had borne the cross, to give gentle-hearted Aleck peace and happiness and home in heaven, to give Charles Wynn peace on earth. Tempered sadness he might keep, but despairing remorse had gone, given place to gratitude.

JESUS BEFORE THE COUNCIL.

S. S. Lesson for November 5. Mark 14 : 55-72. Golden Text Isaiah 53 : 7. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Jesus Alone with His Enemies—The Priest False to his Office—Fictitious Charges—Testimony Broken Down—An Appeal to the Prisoner—The Test Question—Christ's Response—The Unanimous Verdict—The Return of One Disciple—Implied Denial in Separation—The Verbal Denial with Oaths—Christ's Look of Reproach.

JESUS was alone, forsaken by all, the chosen twelve, who till now had followed Him leaving their all, their business, their family associations, their homes, yet now that they saw Jesus overcome and taken prisoner, they lost all hope, all confidence, "they all forsook Him and fled." So Jesus was alone with His enemies, one of them just healed by Him, carrying in his body the token of His power and of His love, yet not forbearing to help on the destruction of his Benefactor.

"And they led Jesus away to the high priest; and with him were assembled all the chief priests and the elders and the scribes." The Son of God must first be tried by him who ought to have known Him best, him whose calling it was to "offer both gifts and sacrifices for sins; who can have compassion on the ignorant, and on them that are out of the way, for that he himself also is compassed with infirmity" (Heb. 5 : 1, 2). Surely these men ought to have understood the Sacrifice, surely they ought to have understood the ministry of Jesus. But alas it was not so; the very power of Jesus in awakening men's consciences, His marvellous healing power, the miracles which He wrought, were a striking contrast to the powerless, lifeless ministry of the priests and scribes.

When Lazarus was raised from the dead the chief priests and Pharisees gathered a council and said "What do we? for this man doeth many miracles" (John 11 : 47). They could not but contrast themselves with Him to their own terrible disadvantage, and being unwilling to humble themselves and own that the power of God was with Him, they set themselves to oppose Him. But "Caiaphas being the high priest that same year, said unto them, Ye know nothing at all, nor consider that it is expedient for us that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not" (John 11 : 49, 50); so marvelously did God make the very enemies of Christ to speak the truth which they so little understood.

From the very first the priests were the greatest hindrance to the work of God's Spirit. In the times of the prophets, the priests were they who opposed the real testimony of God (Jer. 10 : 21 ; 12 : 10, 11 ; 23 : 50 ; 6 : Ez. 34), it was they who questioned John the Baptist, who manifested constantly their jealousy of the Lord Jesus, they who imprisoned the first preachers in the days of Pentecost, they who withstood Paul in all the synagogues.

WHAT HAD THEY AGAINST JESUS?

They "sought for witness against Jesus to put Him to death, and found none;" no charge against Him could be substantiated. "For many bare false witness against Him, but their witness agreed not together;" in His mouth they could find no guile; there He stood sinless, and they, the professed enemies of sin and teachers of righteousness tried to make out a case against Him. But no man was found who could say, "This Man has done me wrong," no man could find Him guilty of a breach of the law. He Himself challenged them saying, "If I have spoken evil, bear witness of the evil" (John 18 : 23).

What were they to do? without an accusation they could not condemn Him. To extricate himself from the difficulty the high priest "asked Jesus of His disciples and of His doctrine," but the Lord answered him, "I spake openly to the world; I even taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whither the Jews always resort, and in secret have I said nothing. Why askest thou Me? ask them which heard Me, what I have said unto them; behold, they know what I said" (John 18 : 19-21). Yet some accusation they must make if Jesus was to be slain, "And there arose certain, and bare false witness against Him, saying, We heard Him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and within three days I will build another made without hands. But neither so did their witness agree together."

From the accusations of others nothing was to be gained, they must catch His own words so "the high priest stood up in the midst, and asked Jesus, saying, Answerest Thou nothing? What is it which these witness against Thee? But He held His peace and answered nothing." "He was oppressed, and He was afflicted, yet He opened not His mouth, He is brought as a lamb to the slaughter, and as a sheep before her shearers is dumb, so He openeth not His mouth." They knew it not, but we know that He had our cause in hand, He could not plead "guilty," for it would have been untrue, He would not plead "not guilty" for He had taken upon Him to die for us. Oh, the depth of His love, how can we desire to justify ourselves after such an example!

At last the high priest put

A TEST QUESTION.

"Art Thou the Christ, the Son of the Blessed?" And Jesus said, I am; and ye shall see the Son of Man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of Heaven." "I am." This was His only sin even in their eyes, this was the only ground of condemnation they could establish against Him; He had said He was the Son of God, and this was accounted blasphemy. When a child of God, who has been a slave to jealousy, ill-temper, worldliness, secret impurity, light reading, anxiety, carefulness, covetousness, or evil speaking, has gone in deep contrition to God, to be cleansed by the blood of Jesus from these defiling things, and has obtained the blessing of a clean heart, and tells of the grace of God with gladness, there are many religious teachers who will hold up their hands in righteous horror at such presumption, and count such a confession a deeper sin than any of the sins of heart which have been cleansed away. Why? because they take for granted that the heart is not cleansed and that he who professes it is telling a lie. Some unspiritual ministers take for granted that the profession of conscious forgiveness is a lie, because they themselves have never experienced it, just as the high priest took for granted that Jesus was telling a lie, and that He was not the Christ.

Jesus was condemned to die for saying, "I am Christ." Then the high priest rent his clothes, and saith, What need we any further witnesses? Ye have heard the blasphemy; what think ye? And they all condemned Him to be guilty of death." And then began the reviling, the buffet-ing, the insulting of our beloved Master. Blinded by their jealousy they did not inquire whether His claim was a right one, whether there was any warrant in Scripture for believing that this humble but powerful man had a claim to the Messiahship. It suited their purpose better to take for granted that He was an imposter, and they lost no time in treating Him as such.

And this was my Lord, and this was your Lord, dear reader. How are we treating Jesus? Is He really God's anointed, really God's Messiah? Is He first in everything? Is He Lord of all? These unhappy men, priests though they were, spat on Him, insulted Him, struck Him, what are we doing? Are we holding up Jesus before the world as God's anointed? Are we manifesting in our life a Christ against whom no charge can be substantiated? Can the world see that Christ in us is the same as Christ before the council, silent under condemnation, unimpeachable in life and spirit?

There was one disciple who had forsaken Him with the rest but he soon turned again and followed Him, yet so that he might not be recognized as having anything to do with Him, but he came into the high priest's palace, and sat with the servants, less afraid to be taken for one of those who had taken Jesus, than to be taken for His follower. It was Peter, and even at this hour he did not forget his own comfort, but warmed himself at the fire. This was the man whose profession of devotion to his Lord had been so warm; he had spoken as though prison and death were welcome rather than treachery to Him, and no doubt he thought so, and a feeling of warm love was in his heart when he said so. But Peter did not know that no human feelings of attachment are strong enough to stand proof against the power of the wicked one. He was indignant when Jesus told him that he would deny Him, and now already he had forsaken Him, and had afterward only followed Him "afar off." There was denial already in this. What other object could he have in keeping at a distance than to be disassociated from Jesus?

Those who are proud of belonging to Jesus, do not mind when or where they speak of Him, they are always ready whether smiles or frowns are the result. So was not Peter; and when one of the maids saw him warming himself and remarked, "And thou also wast with Jesus of Nazareth," he "denied, saying, I know not, neither understand I what thou sayest. And he went out into the porch; and the cock crew." But Peter does not seem to have connected this with the words of Jesus concerning him; he had gone out into the porch probably that he might be less observed and appear more as an indifferent spectator. Oh reader, are you among the mass of those whose appearance and manner would lead one to suppose they did not wish to be recognized as having an interest in Jesus?

IS NOT THIS DENYING YOUR LORD?

Are you walking in your business and family so far from Him who died for you, that it would be necessary to ask whether you are a child of God, in order to find out whether He has any hold upon your heart? what is this but denying your Lord?

A second maid saw Peter; God would not let him pass unseen; she said to those around, "This is one of them," but Peter "denied it again. And a little after, they that stood by said again to Peter, Surely thou art one of them, for thou art a Galilean, and thy speech agreeth thereto." This was annoying, Peter lost all self-control; "he began to curse and to swear, saying, I know not this Man of whom ye speak. And the second time the cock crew." It was enough this time; "the Lord turned, and looked upon Peter" (Luke 22 : 61). What, at such an hour, could the Master think of him? That look broke the spell; self bowed before Jesus, the word of his Lord was recalled, he "went out and wept bitterly." From that hour Peter knew himself as never before. But oh, the love of Jesus, that all through His last most painful days He was not only providing for the salvation of a world, but also occupied in caring for individuals, self ignored! O Lord, teach us to follow Thee! Live out Thyself in us! Amen.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Irish National Conference which Assembled on October 17th, adopted Mr. Parnell's scheme of organization. There was more dissension among the leaders than had been anticipated. Mr. Egan, the Treasurer of the Land League, who has been accused of improper use of the funds, sent in a letter of resignation accompanied by a statement of the financial position. The report shows that a total of $1,224,100 has passed through his hands. Of this sum there was disbursed—in relieving distress in 1879 and 1880, $250,000; in the defence at the State trials, over $75,000, and by expenditures through the general Land League and Ladies' League, $740,000, leaving a balance of nearly $160,000. Mr. Egan requested that two members of the Executive be deputed to examine his accounts. Mr. Davitt proposed and Mr. Justin McCarthy seconded a warm vote of thanks to and of continued confidence in, Mr. Egan, which was passed.

Mr. Parnell in Advocating his Scheme Declared that until the people of Ireland attained the right to make their own laws those laws would never be in accordance with their wishes. No solution of the land question could be final that did not secure to farmers the right of becoming owners of their holdings by purchase. He estimated that a fair amendment of the Healy clause would result in an average of twenty per cent further reduction in the judicial decrees fixing rent. He said the Irish party required eighty-five to ninety members in Parliament, but they could not hope for this until the franchise was placed on the basis of household suffrage. The principal opposition to Mr. Parnell's proposals arose out of the prominent position assigned by them to the Irish Members of Parliament, to whom they gave the power to appoint a third of the managers of the new Irish National League. Mr. Davitt moved as an amendment to the proposed constitution of the Central Council of the new League, that the Council consist of thirty-two members, one for each county, the Parliamentary party to have no nominations, but its members to be eligible. Mr. T. P. O'Connor said this amendment amounted to a vote of want of confidence in the Parliamentary party. He accused Mr. Davitt of trying to injure Mr. Parnell's prestige, and reiterated the charge despite Mr. Davitt's repeated denials. Mr. Davitt became greatly excited and said a gentleman would not have made such an accusation. To prove it groundless he withdrew his amendment. It was finally decided that the Council should consist of forty-eight members—thirty-two for the counties and sixteen for the Parliamentary party. The Conference unanimously adopted an amendment to the programme in favor of the payment of the members of the Irish party in the House of Commons.

The Trial of Arabi Pacha was Postponed to allow of the prisoner being defended by an English lawyer. The correspondent of the London Times at Cairo says very little documentary evidence has been adduced in the examinations of the rebel prisoners beyond a file of Arabi Bey's official journal published in Cairo during the campaign. Arabi has admitted nothing. He has not imitated his colleagues in seeking to throw the blame on others. A Reuter despatch states that, according to an agreement arrived at between Messrs. Broadley and Napier, Arabi's counsel, and the Government lawyer in regard to the course of procedure, the English counsel will have access to Arabi and the right of recalling witnesses for the prosecution for cross-examination, of calling witnesses for the defence, and of examining the evidence given during the preliminary investigation. The counsel expect that the Egyptian Government will appoint several additional members on the court-martial, who will be able to speak English and will generally take steps to raise the proceedings to the dignity of a great state trial. The Egyptian Government resents the appointment of the English lawyer, and the Khédive made a formal offer to the British Consul of Arabi's person, foregoing all right to try him, and handing him over to the English to do as they pleased with him. This proposition the Government energetically declined, and insisted that the trial should proceed with the English counsel, and that the Egyptian Government should assume all responsibility for it. The London correspondent of the New York Sun says the consequences in Egypt of this state of affairs are very detrimental. The people believe Arabi to be under the protection of the Sultan. They deride the Government for its timidity, and assert that it dare not touch a hair on Arabi's head, for never before in the history of Egypt was a moment's hesitation shown in dealing with so notorious a rebel as Arabi. That his life was spared for a day was due to the sympathy of a handful of Englishmen in London, whose humanitarian and personal convictions, stoutly asserted, sufficed to arouse public opinion and gain public sympathy for Arabi.

General Sir Garnet Wolseley has Quitted Egypt, and several regiments of the British army have also returned. The evacuation of the country is now stated to depend on the arrangements being made by Baker Pacha, the officer to whom the Khédive has intrusted the supreme military command. When General Baker is prepared to guarantee order in the country, the British troops will be withdrawn. The task will be full of difficulty for the fellaheen who served under Arabi have had enough of military service and in engaging foreign troops, General Baker is apprehensive of an outbreak of jealousy similar to that which recently raged against the Circassian officers.

The German Elections have Resulted in an indecisive composition of the chambers. In all the great towns where Catholics do not predominate the elections have resulted in favor of the liberals, who gain thirty votes in the Diet from the conservatives. In several new districts in the vicinity of Berlin and Potsdam the conservatives have been victorious. No one party will have a majority in the new Chamber. In order to obtain a majority it would be necessary for the government to enter into an alliance with the clericals and conservatives.

Fires Supposed to be of Incendiary Origin have broken out near the Russian capital. A telegram from St. Petersburg dated October 20th, says: "A thick fog, smelling of burning turf, has covered the whole of St. Petersburg since yesterday. A vast circle of incendiary fires, extending from Finland to the Baltic, is said to surround the capital and to include within its circumference Gatchina, where the emperor now is. The fires are in the woods, under which are the turf pits, and they may last for a long time. They are attributed to the nihilists."

The Complicated Nature of the Irish Land Law has led to the suicide of a landowner, who vainly tried to understand its details. The landowner, whose name was Magillicuddy, was a magistrate and owned a large estate. He was found dead in his bed having shot himself with a revolver. At the inquest it was stated that the old gentleman had been for some time in a state of great mental excitement regarding the details of the Arrears act, which he stated he was quite unable to understand. He had been going about with a long list of tenants who had given him notice of their intention to apply to the court, wringing his hands in a state of intense agitation. There is a numerous tenantry on the estate, and Mr. Magillicuddy, who was advanced in years, was completely unhelped by the work he had to face.

The Indian Contingent of the Salvation Army was still in prison at latest reports. One of the three persons who were arrested during the recent street demonstration has been fined 50 rupees ($20), and his two lieutenants each 25 rupees ($10). They all declined to pay the fines, and in consequence were sent to jail. The magistrate, in delivering judgment, said there was evidence on record that since the arrival of the Salvationists there had been "a stir in the Mohammedan community." The conditions of society in England and in India were quite different, he added. In England the people professed one religion, and efforts like those of the Salvationists to reclaim the fallen would meet with universal sympathy; but "when they came to India to convert people from one faith to another they must avoid noisy and peculiar demonstrations, as these were sure to excite angry feelings and passions and to provoke counter demonstrations." He further told them that if they desired to preach Christianity they would be allowed to do so with perfect freedom, "provided they selected some unobjectionable place; but they could not be allowed to parade the streets in such a manner as would be calculated to excite the religious feelings of other sects, and so bring the people of different creeds into collision."

Messrs. Moody and Sankey's Services at Plymouth, England, have resulted in a similar widespread awakening to that which attended their Scotch services. Two large halls were secured for them, one of which had a seating capacity of three thousand, and the other of four thousand.

A Most Remarkable Scene was Witnessed on September 26th, when Mr. Moody having spoken of the evil results of putting off deciding for Christ, begged those who wished to become Christians to stand up. One by one people stood in all parts of the hall, and, as they rose, the rest of the congregation prayed for them. Within ten minutes, after continuous appeals to the courage of the converted, Mr. Moody counted 180 persons, amid the sounds of praying, and crying, as Mr. Moody appealed for the prayers of all. It was stated that in no place in Great Britain had this appeal been so numerous responded to, and the resort to the inquiry rooms subsequently was unprecedented. The evangelists have made engagements which will occupy them uninterruptedly until the end of April, 1883.

The McAll Mission in Paris is Making Good progress, though the death of Mr. McAll's coadjutor Mr. Dodds is severely felt. Through the untiring efforts of Mr. McAll, about 1600 Parisian children have been gathered into Sabbath-schools. Under the care of their teachers they recently took a steam-boat trip to St. Cloud, where the day was spent in games, singing hymns, speeches, and the usual enjoyments of a Sunday-school picnic.

The Commencement of a Much Needed Re-form movement in China is reported by an American missionary. He states that several hundred women in Amoy, China, have pledged themselves that they will not bind their children's feet, and that they will marry their sons only to women whose feet are unbound.

The French Roman Catholics in Jerusalem have recently been humiliated in a contest with Russian philanthropists. There was a piece of land near the Roman Catholic convent which belonged to the Turks, and which both the French and Russian residents desired to purchase—the French for addition to the convent domain, the Russians for the erection of a hospital. The Porte's decision in favor of the Russians was based on the humane character of the institution which they desired to erect.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BINDER.

NUMEROUS applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case, in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding, at the end of the year. To meet this demand a stock of such covers has been prepared and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address, on the receipt of one dollar. Applications should be made to THE MANAGER, 63 Bible House, New York.

JOHN WILLIAMS, whose name stands prominent among the list of modern Christian martyrs, was born at Tottenham, near London, on June 29th, 1796. His parents were the descendants of a God-fearing ancestry; and so close was the intimacy between his maternal grandfather, James Maidmeet, Esq., and the Rev. W. Romaine that for many years that devoted minister of the Gospel paid a weekly visit to his friend's house in St. Paul's Churchyard, London, for the purpose of conducting a religious service with his family.

At these meetings Miss Maidmeet, who afterward married Mr. Williams, the father of the missionary, was generally present; but she gave at this period no evidences of that sincere devotedness to Christ for which she subsequently became distinguished. On the other hand, her aversion to everything of a religious character, although suppressed, was decided; and often, in after years, she confessed with sorrow that, had it been permitted, when Mr. Romaine paid his accustomed visits to her father's house, she would have gladly escaped from the uncongenial element by which, at these seasons, she was surrounded. But after her marriage, she was led by the Holy Spirit to give herself to Christ, and from the hour of her conversion may be dated the commencement of that course of consistent piety the influence of which was so great upon every one whom she met, but most of all upon her famous son.

EDUCATION AND HOME LIFE.

Of the education of Mr. Williams but little is known. He attended a seminary at Lower Edmonton, where he learned the rudiments of education. His station in life it was intended should be commercial, and the instruction he received was considered amply sufficient to qualify him for it. His mind, however, was always active, and he excelled all his schoolfellows at Edmonton.

By his family he was considered what, in familiar phrase, would be called "a handy lad," and as his disposition was most affectionate and genial, he was the cherished friend of his sisters, whose small commissions he was ever ready to execute, and whose comfort and pleasure he was most anxious to promote. "John can do it," or "John will do it," were words which were constantly on their lips during their youthful home life. In few families, it is said, could there have been found a larger number of the elements of domestic bliss, and there grew up between the members of this united household a warm regard, which they continued to cherish for each other in after life.

A PIOUS MOTHER'S INFLUENCE.

The religious education of John Williams was conducted wholly by his mother, his father, unhappily, being at that time in an unconverted state. But she was well prepared, both by nature and grace, for the arduous undertaking. Her maternal tenderness, affectionate firmness, and cheerful piety, secured for her a complete ascendancy over her children, who ever regarded her with mingled love and reverence. Every morning and evening she led them to her chamber for prayer and reading the Word of God; and there, with a simplicity and freedom to which in after years her illustrious son was accustomed to refer with grateful pleasure, she gave expression to her motherly solicitude for the salvation of her family; and thus impressions were made upon their susceptible minds which subsequent scenes and occupations were unable to obliterate. Little thought she, when her children were clustering around her knees, and hanging upon her lips, that she was then the Divinely chosen instrument for moulding the character of the future Apostle of Polynesia, and that she was performing a service for the results of which distant tribes and future generations would revere her name.

On March 27th, 1810, John Williams was apprenticed to an ironmonger of the name of Enoch Tonkin, in London, who was well known and highly esteemed for his Christian character. The providence of God may be clearly seen in this decision, for not only was the lad introduced into a business peculiarly adapted to his talents, and which became eminently useful to himself and others in after years, but it also formed an important link in the chain of causes which issued in his conversion to Christ. That momentous change in John Williams's life occurred on a night when the wife of his employer had herself conducted him from the tavern to the Tabernacle, which had been erected for the ministry of the Rev. G. Whitefield, and was then the scene of the earnest labors of the Rev. Matthew Wilks.

Speaking of this period in after life, Mr. Williams himself said: "I was regardless of the Sabbath; a lover of pleasure more than a lover of God; I often scoffed at the name of Christ and His religion, and totally neglected those things which afford solid consolation." But this unhappy condition did not continue; an impressive discourse by the Rev. Timothy East, of Birmingham, who was on a visit to London, awakened him to a sense of his sin and folly. To this important incident in his history, Mr. Williams thus alluded, in a sermon delivered by himself in the same church many years afterward:

HIS CONVERSION.

"It is now twenty-four years ago since, as a stripling youth, a kind friend invited me to come into this place of worship. I have all the circumstances of that important era in my history vividly impressed upon my mind; and I have in my eye at this instant the particular spot on which I took my seat. I have also a distinct impression of the powerful sermon that was preached that evening by the excellent Mr. East; and God was pleased, in His gracious providence, to influence my mind at that time so powerfully that I forsook all my worldly companions, and from that hour my blind eyes were opened, and I beheld wondrous things out of God's law." Having joined the Church in September, 1814, he remained until his departure for the South Seas one of its most consistent members and exemplary and devoted workers.

BECOMES A MISSIONARY TO POLYNESIA.

In a steady and useful course of unostentatious labor John Williams had been engaged for about twelve months, when wider scenes of spiritual destitution than those immediately beneath his eye began to interest his thoughts, and to awaken the desires which subsequently determined the character of his future life. The desire to carry the Gospel to the heathen was implanted in his heart and encouraged by his pastor, the Rev. Matthew Wilks, the minister of the Tabernacle, and he at length offered himself to the London Missionary Society; and being solemnly set apart to the South Sea Mission, he and his wife—for he had married about a month previously—sailed for Sydney on November 17th, 1816. Mr. Williams, therefore, had not reached his twenty-first year when he entered upon the duties of a missionary's life.

After a prosperous voyage across the Atlantic, the ship in which he sailed entered the harbor of Rio whence he proceeded to Sydney, and thence to New Zealand, and on November 17th, 1817, exactly a year after his departure from England, landed on the lovely island of Tahiti. He thus speaks of his impressions on attending divine service, conducted by natives, in the chapel, a few days after his arrival: "Here my eyes beheld seven or eight hundred people, who, not five years ago, were worshipping idols, and wallowing in the most dreadful wickedness, now praying to and praising our Lord and God. Surely, thought I, the work is done, there is no need of us. Though there are hundreds in these islands who do not know our Lord and Saviour, they are as eager to learn as the miser is to get money. I hope and pray that they will obtain, with an increase of knowledge, a change of heart."

ASSISTS IN BUILDING A SHIP.

Mr. Williams soon found ample employment. At Eimeo he was called on to assist in building a ship. Prior to the arrival of the "Active," in which the missionary and his wife had sailed, the missionaries already located in the neighborhood, anxious to possess the means of communication with the surrounding islands, and to serve the native monarch, Pomare, who proposed to open a trade with New South Wales, had made an attempt to build a small vessel; but the difficulty of the undertaking, and apprehensions that a remunerative commerce with the colony could not be carried on, had induced them to abandon their work; and it is probable that their labor would have been lost had not their energetic young brethren proposed to complete it. Of those with whom the purpose originated Mr. Williams was most active.

A CATASTROPHE.

"A day or two after our arrival," he writes, "we held a meeting respecting the vessel, and resolved to finish her forthwith. We set to work immediately, every man to his post; my department was the ironwork; the others did the wood; and in eight or ten days she was ready to be launched. A great concourse of natives was gathered to see this extraordinary spectacle. Pomare was requested to name the vessel as she went off. To effect this we passed ropes across the stern, which were pulled by from two to three hundred natives on either side. No sooner was the signal given than the men at the ropes began to pull most furiously, and at the same moment Pomare, who stood on the left hand side of the vessel, threw a bottle of wine against her bow; this so startled those who held the ropes on the side of the ship where the king stood, that they lost their hold, and as those on the opposite side continued to pull, she gave a lurch and fell upon her side. The natives immediately raised the lamentation, Aue te pahié (O the poor ship!) and were much discouraged."

A SUCCESSFUL LAUNCH.

"Pomare had always maintained that she could never be launched, but must be broken in pieces when we should attempt it; and now she went away, exclaiming that her words had come true. But not discouraged, we set to work again, and by the afternoon had raised her upon the stocks, and prepared everything for a second attempt on the Monday, as it was Saturday when she fell. Monday arrived. We drove in the wedges, placed a cable round her stern, stationed the natives as before, and had the satisfaction of seeing her go off beautifully, amid the shouts of the people."

FIRST MISSIONARY SERMON.

Mr. Williams, while thus engaged in any kind of labor likely to do good, was at the same time anxiously preparing for carrying out the great work of preaching the Gospel of Christ, to which he had devoted himself. On visiting the principal islands of the Society Group, he found much to encourage him, although there existed many evils yet to be subdued, and many savage habits to be overcome. On September 4th, 1818, he preached his first sermon at Huahine, in the native language. This progress was unprecedented, and such as to call forth strong expressions of surprise from the elder brethren, some of whom, on hearing him preach, affirmed that he had done as much in ten months as might have reasonably occupied three years.

Thus enabled to open his commission, he preached thrice each week at Raiatea, the central island of the group, and was rejoiced to find that the people easily understood him. In a letter to his mother, written shortly after his settlement in the island, he thus refers to his own ministry: "You pray, my dearly-beloved mother, that your boy may be enabled to preach the unsearchable riches of Christ to the perishing heathen. Your prayer is heard, and answered. I am now actively engaged in preaching Christ. O! that I may have grace to preach Him, and Him alone; to be faithful unto death. I have made great progress in the language, for which I desire to be very grateful, and to ascribe the praise to Him who is both mouth and wisdom. Be of good courage, mother, and remember that, although you have given up me, it is to Him who gave Himself for you."

CANNIBALISM IN NEW ZEALAND.

The missionary's heart was all aglow with apostolic fervor, and the growing passion of his life was that he might propagate the Gospel, where its enchanting music had never been heard, and its inspiring and regenerating tidings had never been uttered. Thus animated, he visited New Zealand, again and again, which at this early period in the history of Christian enterprise was one of "the dark places of the earth," and a habitation full of revolting cruelty. One day, in 1822, when he went ashore, he saw fixed upon a stake the head of a once powerful chief, named Henakee, with whose party another chief named Shungee had gone to war. Mr. Williams learned that as soon as Henakee had fallen, Shungee and another chief called King George ran up to him, severed his head from his body, and with revengeful glee caught and drank his blood.

But not satiated with his death and his blood, these dreadful human monsters cut him in pieces, roasted his flesh, and devoured it as a most delicious meal. The canoes subsequently returned from the war with warriors' heads fixed at the prow and stern, as trophies of conquest and as spoils of victory. Some of them were sold to Christians in exchange for muskets and powder to enable them the more effectually to execute their deeds of blood. No wonder that in presence of such repulsive spectacles as these, the missionary exclaimed, "Oh! that the Lord would send more heralds of salvation to benighted New Zealand."

PERILOUS AFFRAY ON BOARD SHIP.

During this same year—1822—Mr. Williams and his coadjutors realized a most merciful and striking interposition of Providence on their behalf. Having arrived at the North Cape of New Zealand, Captain Henry, fearing he would not be able to obtain sufficient supplies at the Bay of Islands, as so many whalers had recently been there, stood in for the shore. The natives, in great numbers, soon crowded the deck; but, although they were very troublesome, no danger was apprehended, until Captain Henry and Mrs. Williams wanted to go below, when they were opposed by a chief, who had seated himself in the hatchway. A Tahitian on board pushed the chief out of the way; immediately he sprang up, turned white with rage, drew a knife, and threatened to stab the Tahitian, who ran behind the companion of the vessel, and, having found a sword, made a stand. There they stood, keeping each other at bay, the New Zealander defiantly and repeatedly saying, "Kill me! kill me!" They were eventually separated without bloodshed. The panel of our frontispiece entitled "Unwelcome Visitors" depicts this scene.

ATTEMPT TO CAPTURE THE VESSEL.

Toward evening the same day the ship was becalmed. It was only a few miles from shore, and a great number of natives came on board. These, under pretence of bringing hogs and potatoes, had sent their canoes away, and in a few hours several of them, each well manned with twenty or thirty natives, were seen returning, and rapidly making for the ship. The captain and his friends thought that appearances were decidedly suspicious, as there were no women or children in the canoes. Orders were therefore given to bring all the muskets on deck, the two guns were loaded, and, with great difficulty, the natives were turned out of the ship.

The canoes which, meanwhile, were approaching with great celerity, were hailed by the captain, who threatened to fire on them if they came any nearer. At this they lay to, and held a consultation, the result of which, as proved by their subsequent actions, was to capture the vessel if they could, for they all kept for a considerable time within about a hundred yards of the vessel. The suspense was terrible, and during the prevailing anxiety, when Mr. Williams was expecting every moment to be attacked, he retired to his berth, and cried unto God, the ever "present help in time of trouble." When he returned from his berth to the cabin, Captain Henry informed him, to his great joy, that a breeze was springing up. And so it proved; for in less than half an hour the anxious fears of God's servants were turned into songs of deliverance. This thrilling incident is depicted in our front page, and entitled "An Expected Attack."

ESCAPE FROM DROWNING.

Being on a tour of visitation among the islands, Mr. Williams spent about a month at Tahiti, and enjoyed much spiritual communion with the missionary brethren at the various stations. At this time he met with an accident which might have cut short his career, for, standing one evening on board their little ship, a sudden lurch precipitated him in an unguarded moment into the sea (as shown in our front picture). But he was happily rescued, and in acknowledgment of this new instance of the vigilant care of his heavenly Father, he dedicated himself anew to the solemn work of his ministry among the heathen.

HOME REVISITED.

After a long residence among those lovely islands, which constituted the scene of his Christian exertions, and on which he had been instrumental in conferring incalculable benefit, Mr. Williams returned to England in 1834. His principal object in visiting his native country was to awaken public interest in the cause he had espoused, and procure the means of carrying out his enterprise with additional vigor. The success which attended this effort was most cheering. Mr. Williams held meetings in the principal cities and towns of Great Britain, in which he communicated information of thrilling interest. Ample funds were soon collected, a ship was purchased, and freighted with everything likely to minister to the comfort of the voyagers and the success of their future efforts, and on April 11th, 1838, Mr. Williams, on board "The Camden," once more took his departure from the Thames for Polynesia.

On his arrival at the scene of his labors, five months afterward, he met with a most cordial reception from all the people in every island he visited, and once more engaged in the same untiring course of exertion, leaving nothing undone that might contribute in advancing the civilization of the natives, or promoting their knowledge of Christ and divine things. But the successes which this enterprising missionary of the cross had already obtained encouraged him to make new efforts to extend the Gospel to other islands still involved in heathen darkness. The New Hebrides especially, a group far to the west of the Society Islands, engaged his attention, and he found it impossible to rest until he had made an attempt to convey thither, in spite of dangers so colossal that men of inferior heroism, and less self-forgetfulness, would have feared to face them, the unspeakable blessings already communicated to the natives of the Society Islands. In this attempt Mr. Williams lost his life.

THE TRAGIC SCENE OF HIS DEATH, as shown on our front page, was the island of Erromanga, one of the New Hebrides. On November 20th, 1839, the missionary and some of his friends landed, and endeavored to win the confidence of the natives, who seemed extremely wild and shy, and made them several presents of cloth. But the real intentions of the savages soon became apparent, for as Mr. Williams and two of his brethren were quietly walking along the beach, contemplating with gratitude and hope the new field of their future service for Christ, they were suddenly alarmed by unequivocal demonstrations of hostility. They immediately started to run, with the object of gaining their boat and pulling off from the shore. Mr. Williams got as far as the water, but, the beach being stoney and steep, he fell backward, and a pursuing native, grinning at him with an indescribable look of ferocity, struck him with a heavy club, and with hideous yells repeated the murderous blow. A minute afterward, another native came up and struck him, and almost immediately another approached and hurled at him several poisoned arrows.

The Rev. Mr. Cunningham, who was with the martyr on that occasion, and happily escaped, says: "I saw a whole handful of arrows stuck into his body. Though every exertion was tried to get up the boat to his assistance, and though only about eighty yards distant, before we got half way toward him our friend was dead, and about a dozen savages were dragging his body on the beach, beating it in the most furious manner. A crowd of boys surrounded the body as it lay in the ripple of the beach, and beat it with stones till the waves dashed red on the shore with the blood of their victim. The natives afterward carried away the body."

HOW THE NEWS WAS RECEIVED.

On March 24th "The Camden" reached Samoa, where the wife and family of the slain missionary were then residing, surrounded by converted heathen who had been led to Christ through his instrumentality. It was at the dead hour of night that Mrs. Williams was awakened by the messenger who bore the heavy tidings; but who could depict that scene or describe her sorrow? Great as was her fortitude—and it has been rarely surpassed—the terrible stroke for a season prostrated her powers of thought and utterance. Hers was anguish too deep for tears. But grief was not confined to this solitary home of mourning. Had the death-scene in Egypt been that night repeated in Samoa there could scarcely have been lamentations more bitter, or cries more piercing, than those which the intelligence awakened.

In a short time every sleeping native had been aroused, and through the morning twilight they were seen grouped together in solemn and sorrowful communication, while on every hand were heard the sounds of deep distress. Early on the following morning the report brought to the spot chiefs, teachers, and multitudes of natives, who gathered round the house of their departed friend uttering the pathetic wail, "Aue Williamu! aue tama!" "Alas, Williams! alas, our father!" All were anxious to see Mrs. Williams, and to administer consolation, but this for many hours she was unable to bear.

THE GRIEF OF A POWERFUL CHIEF.

At length, toward evening, she yielded to the importunity of a powerful chief named Malietoa, who had hastened from his own settlement, and allowed him to be admitted. As soon as he entered the room, he burst forth into the most passionate expressions of distress, weeping, beating his breast, and crying, "Alas, Williamu, Williamu, our father, our father! He has turned his face from us! We shall never see him more! He that brought us the word of salvation is gone! Oh! cruel heathen! they knew not what they did! How great a man they have destroyed!"

He then turned to the weeping widow, and kneeling by her side, he gently took her hand, and weeping, said in the softest and most soothing tones, "Oh! my mother do not grieve so much; do not kill yourself with grieving. You, too, will die with sorrow, and be taken away from us, and then, oh! what shall we do? Do love, and pity, and compassionate us!" And the deep and unfeigned sorrow of the chief was shared throughout the whole group of islands where the noble-hearted missionary had labored, proving how greatly he had been beloved, and how highly the natives of Polynesia estimated the benefits he had been instrumental in conferring upon them.

THE SHIP "JOHN WILLIAMS."

Nor was the emotion caused by the martyrdom of the missionary less deep in Christian lands. He was mourned with genuine sorrow, and wherever the story of his death was told, his devotion and self-sacrifice were the subject of praise to Him who had inspired them. Years afterward when the Sunday-school children contributed their pennies to build a missionary ship, and when that ship was constructed and her entire cost of construction and equipment was defrayed by the children, it was unanimously resolved that the missionary ship should be named for him. Thus though John Williams the missionary had died on the field of his labor, the John Williams the missionary ship, as she sailed around the world freighted with Bibles and carrying missionaries and their families to heathen lands kept alive his memory and made his name a joy in the dark places of the earth.

THOMAS GUARD.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, October 29, 1882.

"How are the mighty fallen in the midst of the battle!"—I SAMUEL I: 25.

Who was Thomas Guard?—A Grand Specimen of Christian Power—A Contribution from Methodism—Not Sectarian—The Contribution of Foreign Nationality—What Europe Sends us—A Preacher of the Gospel—Why People do not Go to Church—What Eloquence is—A Man of Large Sympathies—The Mysteries of Providence—The Terrific Torture of the Good—The Death of the Useful Man—His Death Occultation not Destruction—The Unfinished Work Resumed—A Dying Man's Vision of Three Letters.

AN outburst of grief and eulogium from David because of the death of his dearly-beloved friend Jonathan at the battle of Gilboa, but as appropriate an exclamation for all those who heard that two weeks ago, at six minutes of one o'clock, on Sabbath morning, the Rev. Thomas Guard, pastor of the Mount Vernon Methodist Episcopal Church of Baltimore breathed his last. Mighty in eloquence. Mighty in sympathy. Mighty in influence. Mighty for God. Mighty for the Church. Mighty for the world's betterment. "How are the mighty fallen in the midst of the battle."

The providence comes to me with the more solemnity because he sent me a salutation of love, warmer and more generous than I ever received from any Christian minister—a salutation which reached me a week after his death, coming with the proposition that we exchange pulpits, he to preach here and I to go there. Oh, how glad I would have been to have had him confront this assemblage, and on this platform unfurl the crimson banner of the cross.

WHO WAS THIS THOMAS GUARD?

I remark in the first place, he was a grand specimen of what the religion of Jesus Christ can do for a man. Whether in Ireland or in South Africa, or in America, on the Atlantic coast or on the Pacific coast or in the cities between, he was ever busy trying to make the people good and happy. I challenge you amid all the ranks of those who have despised Christianity during all the ages, to show me a soul so selfish, so self-sacrificing, and I will give you from now until we meet at the bar of God in the day of eternal judgment to fetch up your first specimen. It is only the grace of God that can make a character like that.

Who was he? He was

A CONTRIBUTION FROM METHODISM to Christianity. He was in that apostleship of which John Wesley was the chief, and Alfred Cookman the modern exponent. I warrant you that when this man of God two weeks ago went up to the gate of Heaven there was at that shining gate a group of the chieftains of that heroic sect to greet him. How it makes one feel for the helmet and the sword to give reverential salute as I call the names of Asbury, and Emory, and Coke, and Watson, and Fletcher, and Whitefield, and Bishops Janes and Scott.

But no fence of sectarianism could wall in Thomas Guard any more than you could fence in the fragrance of a grove of magnolias in full bloom. He was with us in the attempt to annihilate bitter sectarianism, a work so nearly done that while in all our denominations there are narrow-souled bigots running around with rail and post and shovel, trying to rebuild the unbrotherly separation, the distinctions will soon all vanish in the overwhelming answer to Christ's prayer, "Father, that they all may be one." Who was he? He was the CONTRIBUTION OF FOREIGN NATIONALITY to America. Born in Galway, Ireland, in 1831. Died in Maryland, United States, 1882. Take away from the history of the American forum, the American laboratory and the American pulpit, all foreign talent and you have obliterated more than half of it. Scotland grows great metaphysicians, England grows great philosophers, Germany grows great dreamers, Italy grows great painters, Sweden and Norway grow great singers, and Ireland grows great orators.

Thomas Guard came from the land of Edmund Burke and Robert Emmet and Daniel O'Connell, and he showed it. The fire of eloquence was in his eye, in his hand, in his foot and quivered in his whole body. With every tone, with every attitude, with every gesture, he defied all the rules of rhetoric as laid down in the books. He made his own laws. Unlike all others, he was like himself. Electric, thunderbolted. Irish eloquence sanctified. When America has received for the last half century such a large donation of great souls from Ireland, she can well afford to return her sympathy. Bread when there is famine, and world resounding protest when there is political oppression.

Who was he? He was

natural and untrammelled by the way other people did their work. His church was thronged. A building holding 1500 or 2000 people, and thronged. He did not use what is called the pulpit tone. He spoke out of a sympathetic heart to the hearts of the people. In all denominations there is discussion about the decadence of church going. I will tell you why people do not go to church. They cannot stand the humdrum of ministers resolved to preach like all their predecessors and like everybody else. The fact is that some of the theological seminaries in this day take all the fire out of a man and send him into the pulpit cowed down. They tell him how many heads he must have to his discourse, and how long the introduction must be, and what kind of an application must be fastened on at the end, and how he must plant his foot, and how he must throw out his hand, and there are thousands of Presbyterian and Methodist and Baptist and Congregational churches to-day dying by inches through intolerable humdrum. Thomas Guard threw body, mind and soul against these frigid conventionalities of the church, and they cracked and gave way under his holy impetuosity.

Eloquence is not attitude, it is not gesture, it is not voice; it is being possessed with some important thought and making others feel as you do. I wish that the young men of our theological seminaries could have heard Thomas Guard preach. The trouble is that in many theological seminaries young men are taught how to preach by professors who themselves never could preach. You can no more get people to come to church, doing things now as they did a century ago, than you can get them to discard the limited express train to Washington and go with the stage coach. The old Gospel, the same Gospel from century to century, but having its adaptation to each age. What a farce is being enacted in many of the cities. A church holding a thousand people with two hundred and fifty folks in it, scattered around in great lonesomeness, and going there from year to year because it has been decreed from all eternity that they should go, and they somehow cannot help it.

Who was he? He was

A MAN OF LARGE SYMPATHIES.

The earth could not fill him; he took in Heaven as well. All time, all eternity, all heights, all depths, all lengths, all breadths. Thorough manliness. No whining out of the Gospel. No whimpering about the world as going to destruction when it is going to redemption. No patience with men inside or outside the ministry built on a small scale, five feet by three, trying to pull others down, hoping out of the debris to build themselves up. Hating cant with as much emphasis as Thomas Carlyle hated it, but for an opposite reason; not as the tiger hates the calf, but as music hates discord and as sunshine hates darkness. He was full of the gospel of good cheer, the gospel of geniality, the gospel of practical help, the gospel of spring morning, the gospel of carnation rose and pond lily. I think that to him the blooming orchard was a burning censer swinging before the throne. I think that to him the sky was a gallery and the clouds were pictures done in water colors. Great soul, gentle soul, sympathetic soul, suffering soul, triumphant soul, transcendent soul.

I do not know through which one of the twelve gates in Heaven he entered when he ascended two weeks ago; but if there be one gate with larger pearl than another, and with hinges of more ponderous gold than another, and with arch more triumphal than another, and with waiting chariot of swifter wheel and snowier coursers than another, I think that was the gate at which Thomas Guard entered.

While I consider this providence which affects all the Christian church, I am struck first with and then with the alleviations. Mystery the first: Why should so good a man be called so terrifically to suffer? There came all those years of domestic anxiety because of his wife's invalidism, moving from Ireland to South Africa, for the same cause moving from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific coast, for the same cause moving from San Francisco to Oakland. The honeymoon lasted from the time when at twenty-seven years of his age he took her hand at Dublin, on down until when four or five years ago he put her away for the resurrection. Ah, that husbandly affection is of but poor fibre which lasts only while the eye sparkles and the cheek has in it the flush of the sunrise. He held that hand as tenderly and as lovingly after it was wasted and sick, as when it was round and well and strong. The ardor of affection increasing all the way from Dublin to Oakland.

Then came those four or five years when at any moment he was liable to paroxysm of physical suffering; postponing the surgeon's knife until he could postpone it no longer; with nervous horror approaching the crisis until he had no strength to meet it; passing out of life with physical agonies which anodyne and hypodermic appliances only partially assuaged. Suffering, suffering. Tell me why. I cannot tell you. I adjourn the mystery to the day when Ridley shall have explained to him the fiery stake, and Hugh M'Kail shall have explained to him the scaffold, and Margaret the martyr Scotch girl shall have explained to her the wave with which she was drowned, and James A. Garfield shall have explained to him the bullet, and that suffering woman up the dark alley shall have explained to her the cancer, and the rainbow of God's bright and beautiful explanation shall be hung on all the departed showers of earthly grief.

Mystery the second:

WHY SHOULD HE BE TAKEN

at fifty-one years of age, and at the very height of his power and influence? Why not wait until he was worn out with old age? Why, after the batteries had been loaded for a new campaign and were about to be unlimbered, must a gunner drop? Why should he be taken before this Austerlitz, this Sedan, this Waterloo between Infidelity and Christianity is undisputedly settled in behalf of Him who is the rider on the white horse? Why should this fearless and mounted captain of the Lord's host be slain while the feet of many weak Christians are by terror being shaken out of the stirrups? Why should this man die when to rally the carnage of the Christian church we want more plumed warriors at the front? It is the last part of my text that sounds like the roll of a funeral drum. "How are the mighty fallen in the midst of the battle?"

It is as though Blucher had been slain while coming up at nightfall with reinforcements. It is as though Garnet Wolseley had fallen half-way between Alexandria and Tel-el-Kebir. How demoralizing to have the riderless horse of a chieftain careering and snorting across the battle plain. Why was it when Thomas Guard had gathered up so much knowledge, so much experience, he should be taken away just as his best work was about to be done? Tell me. I cannot tell you. I adjourn the mystery to that day when we shall find out why Henry Kirk White expired at twenty-one years of age, just as he was giving intimation to the Christian church that he had in him the song power of Isaac Watts and Charles Wesley, writing with his boyish hand:

"When marshaled on the nightly plain,
The glittering hosts bestud the sky;
One star alone of all the train
Can fix the sinner's wandering eye.
Hark, hark to God, the chorus breaks,
From every host, from every gem,
But one alone, the Saviour speaks,
It is the Star of Bethlehem."

I postpone this mystery of Thomas Guard's death to the day when we shall find out why John Sommerfeld, the flaming evangel, expired at twenty-seven years of age just as his grandest work seemed opening before him, and why John McClintock died before he had completed hisyclopedia of biblical, theological and ecclesiastical literature, and until the day when we shall know why last year at fifty-seven years of age, William Morley Punshon closed his lips forever while on his shoulder rested the interests of the English Missionary Society, and there were yet so many words of fire waiting for him to speak. Yea, until that day when we shall find why Beethoven was struck with complete deafness so that he could not hear the loudest organ crash rendering his own music, and that day when we shall find out why so many authors never finished their manuscripts, and why so many artists dropped their pencils just as they were making the outline of a great masterpiece, and why so many poets stopped midway the hymn, and why so many bright days halted at noon.

Oh, yes, it was with Thomas Guard twelve o'clock meridian. The clock of his life struck one at Galway, struck nine at South Africa, struck ten at San Francisco, struck eleven at Oakland, struck twelve at Baltimore. High noon and the sun eclipsed. But that last word, thank God, passes is out from the shadows of mystery into the glorious alleviation of this providence.

ECLIPSED, NOT EXTINGUISHED; something rolled between us and him, doing no damage to him. When Jupiter hides one of his satellites it is occultation. No one has any idea that the satellite is destroyed. When the earth casts its shadow on the moon, it is lunar eclipse, but no one has any idea that the queen of night is enthroned. When Mercury partially hides the face of the sun, we call it a transit, but we have no idea that any damage is done. When the moon hides the sun, it is solar eclipse; but no one has any idea that the King of Day is dead. I pronounce this departure of Thomas Guard to be occultation, transit, eclipse.

When the sun was eclipsed in 1842 and in 1868 and 1869, all the astronomers gathered in the observatories and all the telescopes were drawn Heavenward, and now as this effulgent nature is eclipsed, we do well to come up in the watchtowers of the church and into the observatory of Mount Zion and stand like the men of Galilee gazing into Heaven. If you have any idea that Thomas Guard lies lacerated in Green Mount Cemetery, I have no share in your wretched agnosticism. Alas! for that sepulchre which has a knob on the outside the door to let us in, but no latch on the inside the door to let us out.

This man of God has only

MOVED ON AND MOVED UP.

He passed out of a room where the air was heavy with opiates into an atmosphere exhilarant, and from a body painstruck into conditions rubicund with health immortal. He has become one of the athletes of heaven—deathless as God is deathless, never to know pain or sickness or suffering or sorrow except as a vivid reminiscence. His mission is widened out. He has come to higher appointment, not to this church or to that church, or his denomination or that denomination, or this city or that city, or this world or that world. He has the universe to range in. What velocities! What circuits! What momentum! What orbits in which the stars shall be as silvery as before the occultation, and the sun shall be as radiant as before the eclipse.

You could not understand fully Thomas Guard here, you cannot understand Thomas Guard there. More difference than between an eagle in an iron cage and an eagle pitching from Chimborazo toward the sun. His work on earth is not done, it is not half done, it is not a fourth done, it is not a thousandth part done. He resumes it now under better auspices. How do I know? "Are they not all ministering spirits sent forth to minister to them that shall be heirs of salvation?" The lines of telegraphy and of rail track connect no two earthly cities so well as earth is connected with Heaven.

Did Thomas Guard, after he was established in this land, go to South Africa to get his family and bring them to this better country? and shall he not now come back some time to that earthly home and at the right time take his loved ones to the still better country? But he shall not come alone. The twain shall come, they who were side by side for so many years, bending over the same cradle, weeping over the same grave, now coming side by side, wing and wing to hover over those children when they sleep, and to escort them Heavenward when they die. Father and mother coming to help. Father and mother coming down to comfort. Father and mother coming down to defend.

The air this autumnal day not so darkened with the flocks of birds flying southward seeking a summer clime, not so full as the air is full of ministering spirits.

ANGELS ARE HOVERING around. Flocks of immortals sweeping this way and that. Earth no more an orphaned world, but a suburb of Heaven. Blessed is that earthly home where Christian parents preside, but more mightily defended is that home which a glorified ancestry canopy with their benediction. Elisha saw the mountains full of horses and chariots of supernatural aid, and so they are yet. Which way are they driving? The horses head this way. How the chariots rumble down the sky steeples. Sent forth to minister. Is yonder a soul in great ex-cruciation of pain, and shall Thomas Guard refuse the ministry when he knows about suffering? Is yonder a soul awfully bereft? Surely Thomas Guard cannot refuse his ministry for he knows what it is to be bereft? Shall we have revivals of religion in our churches and Thomas Guard not join in the hallelujah? Shall there come in which all the good are one side, and all the bad on the other side. Earth and hell and Heaven drawn out in battle array and the gallant spirit just ascended not mingle in the fight? not draw his sword? not lift his battle shout? Passing on to fatigueless service.

Perhaps he will preach the Gospel to some other world that needs a Saviour. Perhaps he will carry quick dispatch from the throne of God to some empire of which the strongest telescope has yet made no revelation. Perhaps he will take a special part in the chorals before the throne. Perhaps he will help compose some new doxology for the blessed. Perhaps he will tell, while all the galleries of light listen, of that grace which strengthened him through all the earthly struggle, the closing words of his recital drowned out by the outburst of minstrelsy that can halt no longer, the surges dashing to the tops of the throne, while the archangel rising beats time with his sceptre.

When a good man was dying, he said he saw written on the sky and they were all alike. The letter "V." Some one said to this man dying what he thought the letter "V" was for. He said, "I think it stands for victory." So over all this scene there is written congratulation for the departed, comfort for the bereft and encouragement for us all. Three "V's." Victory! Victory! Victory! Three "H's." Heaven! Heaven! Heaven!

On a catafalque of flowers, Thomas Guard lay under architectural grandeurs hung with symbols of sadness, the air throbbing with the "Dead March in Saul," and beautiful, cultured and queenly Baltimore breaking her richest box of alabaster and pouring it on those weary feet as they halted in the journey, and the American Church North, South, East, West, sobbing out its sympathies over that great loving heart silenced forever. But this day I open on all sides doors of consolation, doors of hope, doors of resurrection, doors of reunion for his bereft sons and daughters, Reginald, and William and Percy and Porter and James and Charlotte and Jessie, and for the Mount Vernon Church that for two terms stood with him on the mount of transfiguration, and for the denomination which still vibrates with his magnetic utterances, and for the church universal which now sits watching this wonderful sunset.

Until we meet again, farewell, my dear brother. Thou wast very pleasant to me, Thy salutation came so late I could not return it. So, to-day, I throw thee this kiss of warmest brotherly affection. Honored in life, triumphant in death, blessed in eternity. I could not be present to put even one flower on thy casket, but to-day, I sprinkle over thy new-made grave this handful of heather from the Scotch highlands, in the hymn which the people in that land of Andrew Melville and John Knox are apt to sing on their way to the grave of some one greatly beloved:

"Neighbor, accept our parting song,
The road is short, the rest is long;
The Lord brought here, the Lord takes hence,
This is no house of permanence.

"On bread of mirth and bread of tears
The pilgrim fed these checkered years:
Now landlord world, shut to the door,
Thy guest is gone forever more.

"Gone to the land of sweet repose,
His comrades bless him as he goes;
Of toil and toil the day was full
A good sleep now, the night is cool.

"Yea, village bells, ring softly, ring,
And in the blessed Sabbath bring;
Which from this weary work-day tryst Awaits God's folk through Jesus Christ."

An Engineer's Heroism has Unhappily Cost him his life. On October 22d, he was detailed to run a train on which were over six hundred passengers over the Pennsylvania Road, from New York to Newark. The engine was fitted with a new apparatus which was designed to economize fuel but which was not apparently properly understood by the engineer. The train was going at a rate of forty miles an hour, when it approached the signal station on the Hackensack meadows, and the engineer whose name was Sieg saw a red disk displayed. He endeavored to stop the engine, when suddenly the cab was filled with steam, flame, and live fuel. He tried to shut the furnace door, but could not. All aflame, he fled over the tender to the foremost car, shouted to the conductor, and then dashed back into the blazing cab. The engine was stopped, and when the steam and smoke cleared away, Sieg was seen in the water tank on the tender. He had let himself down the manhole in order to extinguish the flames of his blazing clothes. The flesh hung in shreds from his hands, and his body was awfully burned. He was taken to St. Francis Hospital, Jersey City, where he lingered two days before death ended his sufferings. Not many men would have had the courage to return to the blazing cab even to save the lives of the passengers. It is such instances as these that help us to realize the sacrifice of the Saviour for the salvation of the human race (Phil. 2:8).

A Bible was Bartered for a Boy in Sierra

Leone not long ago.—Rev. Mr. Schapira relates that he was paying a visit to a village in which he found a Mahomedan priest, who, while endeavoring to turn the people to Islam, purchased a slave. He bought the boy, whose feet, for fear of his running away, he had put in the stocks. Not long previously, thirty copies of the Bible translated into Arabic by Dr. Van Dyck, and printed at the press in Beirut, had been sent to Western Africa. Mr. Schapira had one with him. The sight of this book of which the priest had heard so much but had never seen, excited his ardent desire. What would he not give to possess it? He offered the missionary any price, if he could but obtain one. Mr. Schapira listened to the earnest request, and finally made answer: "So you would give anything for a copy of the Arabic Bible? Well, you shall have it; it is yours. Now give me that boy!" "Oh, oh, oh! But, but, but!" exclaimed the Moslem. This was a turn of affairs which he did not expect, and he was now as anxious to recede from his rash offer as he had been to make it. But the missionary held him to his agreement, asking if he intended to be put to shame by breaking his word? At length the Moslem priest took the Bible, and gave up the boy, whom Mr. Schapira forthwith dispatched down to the coast, to be put into the missionary school at Sierra Leone.

ALEXANDRIA'S DEVASTATION FORETOLD.

A SOCIETY journal of the fashionable world utters the following comments on the prophetic aspect of the Egyptian war: "The rapid decadence of the Ottoman Empire and the mysterious undercurrent and belief among all Mohammedans that the crisis of their religion has arisen, and that a religious war ('Jehad') will forthwith take place, which shall either fully re-establish the Mohammedan power, as in its palmy days, or end in its utter destruction, is of great interest. The prophet Nahum graphically describes Alexandria as situated among the rivers with the waters round about, and the sea as a 'rampart' (Nahum iii. 8): 'Art thou better than populous No Amon, that was situate among the rivers; that had the waters round about it, whose rampart was the sea, and her wall was from the sea? Ethiopia and Egypt were her strength.'

This is exactly what Alexandria is surrounded by, the rivers of the Delta and the lakes, with the sea in front. In the margin of the Bibles of the sixteenth century No Amon is corrected 'Alexandria.' In the older Jewish Spanish Bible the text is Alexandria. In the Vulgate (Jerome's) the words are 'faciam judicia in Alexandria.' The Jewish Targum of Jonathan Ben Uzziel distinctly calls it Alexandria.

"After the battle of Issus, Alexander was so elated that he declared himself to be the son of Jupiter Amon, and marching south to Egypt, he laid siege to Gaza on the way. His army being detained by the protracted resistance of that city, he made his celebrated journey to Jerusalem, where the high priest in his robes, and the priests and elders, came forth to meet him, showed him the prophecies of Daniel concerning himself, and declared he was commissioned by Jehovah. Greatly exalted by this further evidence of his Divine mission, he came to the ruins of the city of Jupiter Amon and ordered it to be rebuilt (B.C. 332).

Passing on, he went several days' journey into the Libyan desert, to the celebrated oasis of the Temple of Jupiter Amon, and there he was, with much ceremony, declared by the priests of the Temple to be the son of Jupiter Amon. He returned with great triumph, ordering his new city to be called, not merely the city of Amon, but of Alexander, the son of Amon. The devastation of the city of Alexander, son of Amon, at the present day is therefore a singular incident. Now in the fulness of time the long foretold, and nearly finished, destruction of the Mohammedan power in Europe, Asia, and Africa is nearly accomplished, and the great river Euphrates of the prophet very nearly dried up. It is a strange fact that we are looking at the fulfilment of prophecy before our very eyes, while the thinly-veiled determination of Russia to try to seize the Holy Land, and profit by the dismemberment of Turkey, points with no faltering finger to 'the things that must shortly come to pass.'

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Cyclone Stopped by Prayer.—At St. Andrew's Hall, Glasgow, on September 17th, Mr. Varley said: "When I was on the voyage out to Australia some time ago, our ship got into the tail-end of a cyclone. From the beginning of the voyage we had a prayer-meeting every day, and all the passengers were pleased to be present. In the hour of our greatest peril, when Captain Black said to me, 'We have done all that man can do to save the ship; she must just take her chance now'—he and his officers were ready to agree at once to my suggestion, 'There is one thing we can do, Captain; you have no objection to going with me into your cabin and have a little prayer along with your officers?' 'No, sir,' he answered, 'I shall be glad.' When we met in that small cabin, and shut the door, I am not ashamed to say, in the face of all the 'natural laws' worshippers, that I asked our Father to cause the storm to abate. Before I had finished speaking neither the captain, nor his officers, nor myself, could hear my voice.

Why? Because a heavy shower of large hail-stones came rattling down and the noise of them falling upon the deck drowned my voice. The cyclone was actually smothered by them; the wind fell calm, and the hail beat upon the water so strongly that the waves became as smooth as though covered with oil. God answered our prayer through His natural laws. These laws are His servants, and not He their slave, as some preach."

A Young Scotch Sailor's Testimony.—Miss Annie McPherson said: "At one of our meetings in Ratcliffe Highway, in the East of London, we were singing, 'I need Thee every hour, most gracious Lord.' When we had finished the hymn, a young, fine-looking Scotch sailor stood up and said, 'Ye sing, I need Thee every hour, but I need Him every meenute.' Surely this is the confession which all are prepared to make, who know anything of the preciousness of Christ who has redeemed and keeps them."

A Man in a Rage.—At a Gospel Temperance meeting in Cowcaddens, Mr. Shorrey said: "I heard to-day of a man who went home in a great rage from our meeting the other night, and kept walking about his room until the morning, crying out, 'What made me go to that temperance meeting? I can't get rest.' The Holy Spirit of God had seized upon him at the meeting, and had shown him his sin and peril, but, notwithstanding, he went away in a rage and mightily and obstinately strove against the loving power of God. Subsequently, he came to himself, and gratefully submitted to the generous dictates of the Holy Spirit, and found forgiveness, cleansing, and gladness through faith in Christ."

A Man and a Brother.—Mr. Shorrey also said: "The Christian brother who spoke to me in Mr. Moody's after-meeting, in New York, when I was a miserable drunkard, did it so kindly and lovingly that hope revived in my miserable heart. I sat there with bloated face, ragged clothes, and dishevelled hair, but he treated me as though I were indeed his brother. He put his arm round my neck, and said, 'I am so glad to see you, brother; there is hope for you. I was once like you, a drunkard, and the Lord mercifully saved me.' 'Well,' I said, 'you don't look like a drunkard, but if the Lord saved you he can save me.' And that very night, when I asked Christ, the Friend of Sinners, to save me, He took me as I was, and cleansed me in His blood, and next morning I had no desire for the usual drink, but was running over with gladness, because of Christ's love to me."

Lying at the Priest's Feet all Day.—At the young converts' meeting on September 18th, the Rev. James Scott said: "I once got a lesson from a Roman Catholic woman whom I often called upon. She always told me that she prayed that I might become a Catholic. Once we were speaking about assurance of salvation, and I asked her, 'Are you sure that you will get to Heaven when you die?' 'Oh, no,' she replied, 'I am not; you see I have so much to do with my children and husband that I have not time to spend upon religion.' 'What would you do if you had not these to attend to?' I asked. 'I would lie at the feet of the priest all day,' she solemnly answered. 'That is just what I try to do now,' I said. 'But my high priest is Jesus Christ.' If we who profess to be followers of Christ, were only half as fervent as that woman, whose priest is a mere man, we should move the world to His feet."

A Drunken Gambler Saved.—Mr. Shorrey said: "I know a widow in Brooklyn who had a son, a very capable lad. He was his mother's sole support. For a time he led a life of quietness and sobriety, until the demon drink filled his soul, then what a weary life that poor woman lived. Her darling son, the pride of her heart, was becoming noted as a drunkard and gambler. No respectable person would speak to him. One night he strolled into Mozart Hall, an old lager-beer garden, but now a place where the Gospel is preached. At the second meeting a worker spoke to him, but the poor man seemed as though his spirit was dead, and had no power to throw off the chain which bound him, yet he desired to do it.

An active Christian lady determined to win this man, and, thank God, she succeeded in bringing him to the feet of Christ. He went home to his mother and told her what great things the Lord had done for him. Now, in every spare moment he speaks forth the love of God. He has started a meeting in the worst place of the city—Red hope is its name—and on Saturday nights he holds a special meeting, and he tells me that the Lord is blessing him very abundantly."

Held Up to be Looked At.—The Rev. James Scott said: "On one occasion when Major Whittle was preaching in Chicago, there was a drunkard in the meeting. He was not at all impressed during the service, but at the end the Major spoke to him, and said, 'My friend, I will hold you up before Christ.' These words arrested the inebriate's attention, and he began to think 'What! hold me up before the Son of God, in all my filth and impurity? No, no, that must not be. I will wash and cleanse myself.' Then he asked the momentous question, which Heaven is delighted to hear, 'What must I do?' With joy Major Whittle pointed out the path to the fountain of the Redeemer's blood. This man did not take Major Whittle's words in a metaphorical sense but as though he were to be held up before a personal Christ, with the result that he was led to see his sinfulness, and to feel his need of that Saviour whom he had previously contemned. May we have grace to show to all, that Christ is a personal Saviour to us."

Happy Maggie and Barbara.—At this Meeting a gentleman who had just returned from a visit to Aberdeen said: "When I was in Aberdeen I called upon two Christian women for the purpose of being cheered by witnessing their faith. They are poor in purse, but rich in faith. I reached the lowly place where they lived, and knocked at the door. A cheery voice responded 'Come in.' I stepped in, and saw a comfortable little room; it was so bright and cheerful that my surprise was great, as I knew that Margaret had been confined to bed for thirty-nine years, and was very poor. 'Maggie,' I said, 'you seem to be very happy.' 'Yes,' she answered, 'I am very happy; and why not? The Lord is always with me, and provides for me, and keeps me free from care.' I then went to the other room, where Barbara was, and saw her lying on her bed, suffering from spinal disease. She also was quiet and cheerful, although she knew that never again would she have the pleasure of moving about in this world. For five years she has been lying a helpless poor woman, yet the Lord never left her, nor suffered her to want."

See Where You Stand.—Mr. W. R. Bradlaugh said at a meeting recently held in Patnick: "Some time ago a railway was laid under a row of tall houses. As there was constant traffic going on, the whistling of the engines disturbed the residents a good deal; they therefore sent up a petition to the company, asking if the nuisance could not be abated. The company said they would see what could be done in the matter, and accordingly sent an official, who was to note down each time the driver whistled when it was unnecessary. Close by the bank was a line of rusty rails used in the past for shunting. The young man stood there, knowing he would be safe. For awhile all the whistles were in obedience to signals; there was nothing to note, when suddenly an extra long and loud one sounded out. He looked at the signals. All were safety. 'Well, that's extra,' and he noted it down. One still louder followed. The signals showed safety, and No. 2 was noted down, when a louder and more terrific one came. Scarce knowing why he did so, he glanced at the spot where he stood. Where was that? Between the very rails over which the train was to pass. With great presence of mind he stepped back to the rusty rails. And the train flew over the spot he had left. Intent on doing his duty, he knew not that unconsciously he had moved on to the bright rails over which trains were passing every few minutes. This reminds us that the very voice of warning which sinners hate, and think an interference, is the voice that can speak of life when they are standing heedless and self-satisfied on the very brink of death and hell. Every whistle the young man noted down as useless was to warn him of his danger."

PALESTINE AND THE JEWS.

Their Persecution by Russia, etc.

By Rev. Joseph Wild, D.D., of Toronto.

Palestine, its Glories and Advantages—An Emigration Fever—The Means God may Adopt to Restore the Jews to their Own Land—The Suggestions of the Crusades—The Objective Point of all Aggrandizement—England's Position in Forthcoming European Wars—Continental Hatred of the Jews—Its Cause—How the Jew Himself Regards the Question—The Custom at the Close of the Feast of the Passover—How will the Jews Repossess Palestine?—The Past Persecutions of God's Ancient People: Are They to Have no Recompense?—Jewish History, a Proof of the Existence of Providence—Rest at Last.

A STRIKING passage in reference to the Jews occurs in Isaiah 10: 23: "For the Lord of hosts shall make a consumption even determined in the midst of all the land." This prediction may well occupy our attention at a time when the Eastern Question and the renewed persecution of God's ancient people are the prominent topics of the day.

By the phrase, "in the midst of all the land," we understand all the world in general. At the appointed time, which will be, I presume, in a few years, a fine fever with respect to the return of certain people to Palestine will possess all men—a fever that will spread itself out in all parts of the world. It is determined upon already in the counsel of the Divine mind. A perfect mania will possess the nations, and the general topic of conversations, in a very few years from to-day, will be

PALESTINE, ITS GLORIES AND ITS ADVANTAGES.

This emigration fever will rage most violently among the Jews; then it will take hold of other races and nations; for the prophet Isaiah assures us that God will gather others to Him beside the literal seed of Judah and of Israel. The exertions of the Church, the forces of the nations, are hastening on the preparatory conditions of this great consumption. Very soon Jerusalem will become pre-eminent. Salem will stand once more, lifting her head from the dust, and, standing with majesty among the nations of the earth, she will again be the glory of all lands. Many men are ready to ask how this consumption will be brought about; and because they are not now interested in any great degree they rather doubt the matter. Neither their doubts, nor anything, any difficulties that they can see in their mind just now, will stand in the way of Him who reigns in the heavens, who will, in His own good time, bring His own purposes to pass.

THE RESULT GOD WILL BRING ABOUT.

It is often very difficult beforehand to say by what means God is going to produce certain things, what means He will adopt to bring about certain events. The great point for us all to settle is, is this thing to take place? The signs of the times seem, I think, in some degree, to forecast this great event. Think of the beautiful imagery of the Saviour, "Ye see the fig-tree putting forth its leaves, and ye know that summer is nigh." So, also, when certain things are fulfilled, do we know that other things must come to pass. The signs of the times indicate very clearly that the period of this consumption is not very far distant. The method and enthusiasm attending upon such a work we may form an idea of by looking in our own times, and, in times past, at similar movements. Twenty years ago no man could have predicted the enthusiasm that rages through Canada touching Manitoba. There was not a man who had prescience enough to see that that part of the Dominion would take possession of homes, of hearts, of minds, of interest, from one end of the Dominion to the other. The land was thought to be barren, the climate uncongenial, and no one would suppose that he could leave the fair fields and lakes of the province of Ontario and go to that far-off land. But we see how soon a rage is created, how soon a consumption can be started. Now this is an evidence of what can be done if men can only get up an excitement or fever upon any point. You crowd out reason, and men become subject to the law of impulse, and follow out the line of that interest. Another example we may take from

THE FAMOUS CRUSADES.

No one living in the tenth century could for an instant have forecast the terrible enthusiasm that prevailed among the people and nations of the earth in the eleventh, twelfth, and part of the thirteenth century. You would not suppose it possible to get up a fever among people that would cover 250 years. Yet there was a fever got up among the nations, a tide of enthusiasm which levelled the distinctions between king and subject, prince and beggar, rich and poor, old and young, learned and ignorant, good and bad. Of every nation and race men came, generation after generation, to fight the Mussulman, reclaim Palestine, and restore Jerusalem. A fever covering 250 years! Eight times was this crusade force kindled, and kindled successfully. Nor was there a man of any station or calling but yielded to the passing impulse, and gave his hand and countenance to the effort. Now, when we think of all that, it is easy to conceive how another spirit, or of taking Palestine for another purpose, might easily come into force. And who started these great crusades?

PETER THE HERMIT,

a man who had retired from the world, a man who had little concern with its temporal or commercial interests. But he went in his rags, and leaning upon his crutch, crying through the cities, "Jerusalem must be redeemed! Jerusalem must be redeemed!" setting fire to the people, until it took hold of the very boys and girls in the streets. And an army of boys, from ten to fifteen years old, numbering not less than 30,000, was formed, and set out to Palestine, to perish by the way; and every highway was strewn with the dead bodies of these enthusiasts.

Now, this has taken place in this world, and, as I have said, it covered a space of 250 years, and took hold of all the nations of that time. Louis IX., aided by Edward I., worked hard in these crusades. Nations and races joined together in one tremendous mass, and the records of their sacrifices, marches, battles, and sufferings seem to us beyond credence. Now, remembering that these are historical facts, can we not easily take in the great consumption, determined upon in the midst of all the lands, at which the Jews will return to their native land? At least we can see how inspiring a subject Palestine is, and what enthusiasm it can raise. There is no part of the earth that Russia, France, Germany, Italy, Spain, or England would give more to possess than Palestine. It is the objective

POINT OF ALL AGGRANDIZEMENT.

It is the effort of Russia to reach Palestine. She may go round about as she chooses, but her design, her aim, is Jerusalem. England's manœuvring, England's strategy, at every other part of the Empire, is to surround Palestine. Germany is looking to Palestine; France is exceedingly jealous of Palestine; and Bonaparte's prediction will be true, as he said, "Whoever can take Jerusalem, and keep it, will finally rule the world." And there is no doubt in my mind but that it is the key. As it is the key to the centre of the earth, so it will be the key to universal conquest.

Between the crusades and the coming consumption there is, however, I think, one remarkable difference. The crusade, of course, was an enthusiasm that was started and maintained by war. The coming consumption, however strange it may appear, is to be void of war. It is to be a consumption of God's appointment. The other was begun by man, and carried on by man. This consumption will be without war, without strife, and it will be chiefly taken up by the English nation. And now, is it not strange that the English nation will not take part in the next great continental wars that are speedily coming on? Of course, people say,

DANGEROUS GROUND!

No more dangerous than it has been at other times. The other nations will go to war, and before long they will struggle with each other. England will come again, as she came in after the last war, to decide peace for them. She will ask a price for that peace. What did she ask the last time? Cyprus, and a protectorate over Turkey in Asia, which includes Palestine. She is already the protector of Palestine. When these nations, like worried dogs, shall be torn and bleeding, weak, weary, and exhausted, and come together to settle their grievances, England, strong, having been preserved from the war, will again step in and dictate the terms of peace, and she will ask Palestine as the price, as her spoil, and it will be given her. So this consumption is to come to pass, and the Jews be collected from the four wings of the heavens and returned once more to their Promised Land.

THE NEXT EUROPEAN WAR

will create a great and bitter prejudice against the Jews. It will be made still greater by the simple fact that they now have the sinews of war in their hands. There is not a nation in Europe that can go to war, except England, unless the Jews say "Yea." In that respect the Jew is the sovereign dictator of every nation in Europe, except England, and they can forbid war, because they have the sinews of war in their hands. They have four fifths of the capital of the whole of Europe, and you cannot get men to kill each other, without hate, unless you pay them a good price for it.

Thus, because they are the traders in Russia, because they are sharp enough to get the better of their German friends in money matters, the Russians and Germans hate the Jews. And when they see they are entirely mortgaged to them—body, soul, throne, and country to the Jewish race—they will be willing at once to concede to the Jew the rights of individuality, of sovereignty, or independent national existence. They will be glad to let the Jew go out to his own land, into Palestine. The very debts that they will incur will make them more ready and willing to let them go; but at the same time they will hate the Jews more and more. And so we can see the events at the present time are very much on that line. A shrewd observer cannot fail to be acquainted with what is transpiring. You say, "How they are punishing them!"

WHAT A TERRIBLE PUNISHMENT!

We have no idea in Canada or America that one hundred thousand people should be smitten unto death in the most violent, outrageous, atrocious, and devilish manner that it is possible for men to invent—murdering men, tearing little children limb from limb, ravishing women, burning houses, scourging the people, pursuing them, and driving them off, like a herd of Texan cattle, at the point of the bayonet, firing their homes, and turning them adrift without aught to cover them—and that taking place, too, in the nineteenth century, while you and I are here; and we get these reports from a country where all news is suppressed, so that on proper authority the thing is ten times worse than we ever hear. One might ask why this is so, why there is such a prejudice against the Jewish brethren? It is necessary in view of the desired end. The Jew will stay among the nations as long as he can make money and get rich. When all set their faces against him, and legislate him out of personal rights, the Jew will be ready to turn his face to the ancient land of his fathers. It is an unfortunate necessity that these things should occur to make him long for a land of his own to be at rest; and it is as necessary for us to take his part in sympathy.

THE JEW CANNOT GO IN HIS OWN NAME.

You see the Saxons are beginning to be the protectors of the Jews. Sympathy is rising like a tide in the Saxon heart. In England and in the United States meetings are being called, and you will see that the British Ministry will be hoisted from its place of power, unless they take hold with a stronger hand against Russia. Then there will require to be another power, less sympathetic with Russia, that will be content to pay for the protection of the Jews, and England will become their protector.

You may ask, Do the Jews take any knowledge of this? The Jews throughout the world are getting keenly alive to this question; their papers are now discussing it, and a great change is taking place in the Jewish mind on these points.

(To be concluded next week.)

OFFICE, 63 BIBLE HOUSE, NEW YORK.
ENTERED AT THE POST-OFFICE AT NEW YORK, N. Y., AS SECOND-CLASS MATTER.

THE aim of this journal is to make known the way of salvation, and to keep alive the expectation of our Lord's return to the earth.

in every part of the United States and Canada.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The thanks of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are due to a large number of subscribers who have written to the office, expressing their high regard for the journal, and stating their intention to introduce it to their friends, with the view of obtaining new subscribers for the coming year. Their efforts would have a better chance of success if commenced now, than at the end of next month, when people will have made their arrangements for 1883. In recognition of this fact a concession in price will be made. They may offer THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, postage paid, from this time to the end of 1883 for $1.50—that is, fourteen months for one year's subscription. This concession is made in order to aid the friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and to encourage them to proceed at once with their kindly project. It is hoped that every subscriber will use his influence, however small it may be, to send at least one new subscription, in addition to his own, for 1883.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Proclamation Appointing the national Thanksgiving for Thursday, November 30th, thus summarized the blessings which we as a people have received from the hands of God: "The blessings demanding our gratitude are numerous and varied. For the peace and amity which subsist between this republic and all the nations of the world; for the freedom from internal discord and violence; for the increasing friendship between the different sections of the land; for the liberty, justice, and constitutional government; for the devotion of the people to our free institutions, and their cheerful obedience to mild laws; for the constantly increasing strength of the republic while extending its privileges to fellow-men who come to us; for the improved means of internal communication, and the increased facilities of intercourse with other nations; for the general prevailing health of the year; for the prosperity of all our industries, the liberal return for the mechanic's toil, affording a market for the abundant harvests of the husbandman; for the preservation of the national faith and credit; for wise and generous provision to effect the intellectual and moral education of our youth; for the influence upon the conscience of a restraining and transforming religion; and for the joys of home; for these, and for many other blessings, we should give thanks. Wherefore, I do recommend that the day above designated be observed throughout the country as a day of national thanksgiving and prayer, and that the people, ceasing from their daily labors and meeting in accordance with their several forms of worship, draw near to the throne of Almighty God, offering to Him praise and gratitude for the manifold goodness which He has vouchsafed to us, and praying that His blessings and His mercies may continue. And I do further recommend that the day thus appointed be made a special occasion for deeds of kindness and charity to the suffering and the needy, so that all who dwell within the land may rejoice and be glad in this season of national thanksgiving."

A Comparison of the Appropriations Made by Congress in its last session with the appropriations of four former years has been made by the New York Times with the following result: Fiscal year 1880, third session of the Forty-fifth Congress, and first session of the Forty-sixth Congress, $162,404,647; fiscal year 1881, second session of the Forty-sixth Congress, $155,830,841; fiscal year 1882, third session of the Forty-sixth Congress, $179,578,999; fiscal year 1883, first session of the Forty-seventh Congress, which came to an end in August last, $251,428,117. Among the specific appropriations included in the total for 1883, which exceed those for 1882, are the appropriation for pensions, $116,000,000, an increase of nearly $48,000,000 over that for 1882, and the appropriation for rivers and harbors, which exceeds that for 1882 by nearly $7,500,000. An increase is to be noted in all the items for 1883 except those for forts and fortifications and for the Post Office Department. The average amount of the annual appropriations for the ten fiscal years preceding the fiscal year 1883, in coin value, was $142,662,109. This computation shows more plainly the exceptional size of the total for 1883, which is $251,428,117.

Prohibition is Becoming a Live Issue in California as in other States. A Californian temperance worker, writing to the Witness, thus describes the progress of the movement: "Both of the old parties have ignored the temperance people in their platforms. The Democratic party has declared 'its unqualified enmity against all sumptuary legislation,' and it promises if victorious at the next election to repeal the Sunday law and all other temperance laws now existing. The Republican party in their platform say not a word against the liquor traffic, but they declare that the party is in favor of Sunday as a 'day of rest and recreation.' Which, I suppose, means to allow all kinds of amusements, including the beer gardens and selling of all kinds of intoxicating liquors. Most of the temperance and Christian people in this State are dissatisfied with the old parties; therefore, a State Prohibition Convention has just been held in San Francisco, and it has given us a prohibition ticket filled with good men, for whom we can vote with a clear conscience."

The Vexed Problem of the Civilization of the Indians is as yet by no means satisfactorily settled in the opinion of the Washington politicians, but the Christian public will be thankful to learn the facts recently published in the report of the mission to the Indians. It is stated that the mission in the Indian Territory has now grown until there is a roll of 5000 members, made up from Cherokees, Choctaws, Creeks, Chickasaws, and Seminoles. There are about thirty ordained ministers in connection with this mission, most of whom are Indians. Beside these there are about 120 local preachers.

The Bi-Centennial Commemoration of the landing of William Penn took place in several cities of Pennsylvania last week. The Society of Friends held a meeting on October 22d, at Chester, where a letter and poem from the Quaker poet, John G. Whittier, were read. Mr. Whittier wrote: "It is well that friends should commemorate the landing of the founder of Pennsylvania, and the great apostle of their faith, on the pleasant shores of Chester two hundred years ago. The event, is a subject worthy of the poet's pen or the painter's pencil." In allusion to Lord Macaulay's condemnation of Penn, Mr. Whittier said: "In spite of the endeavor of a historian more regardless of the display of his rhetoric and sarcasm than of historical accuracy and justice, the memory of William Penn is secure in its grand outlines and unsullied purity. He stands, and will forever stand, with the sages, statesmen and philanthropists, of whom the world of their day was not worthy. He lived and thought centuries in advance of his contemporaries; and, slowly but surely, the generations since have been approaching the moral and political standard which he set up on the shores of the Delaware." The celebration at Chester was continued on the following day, and included a representation of the landing of William Penn from an old yawl boat on the exact spot where Penn landed 200 years ago. The festivities at Philadelphia recalled the scenes of the Centennial year, and attracted to the city, which was gayly decorated, over 150,000 visitors.

The Charges of Bribery in the Star Route cases are to be investigated in the courts. Attorney-General Brewster stated to a Philadelphia reporter that much had been done in probing the matter to the bottom. A great deal of testimony had been taken, he said, and much more yet had to be taken. He said that within a few days one or more of those persons in the Department of Justice who had been used as spies by the defendants, and who appear to be deeply complicated in the attempt to corrupt jurors in behalf of the defendants would be arrested, and that he had ordered this upon the evidence now before him. Mr. Dickson, the foreman of the jury, has been arrested.

The Christian Convention in the Sittings of which at Chicago, Mr. Charles Spurgeon, the son of Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, and many other evangelists both American and European took part, held two days' sessions at St. Louis, Mo., on October 23d and 24th. A telegram from that city says: "The meetings were largely attended and excited a strong interest in religious work. Just before the close a proposition put to the audience by Major Whittle to begin a series of revival meetings was carried unanimously, and arrangements will at once be made to hold them."

Another Six Days' Walking Match was held in New York last week. The telegraph bulletin boards exhibited in different parts of the city recording the hourly progress made were surrounded every day by groups of men and boys making notes, indicating that betting on the result was going on. It is gratifying to note that although the contestants were champions, the public interest in the match was far slighter than in previous contests. The attendance was much smaller, and the profits of the match were materially reduced. No public betting was allowed. It may be hoped that the men who get up these pitiful spectacles will be discouraged by the results of the match, and refrain from any repetition of the contests.

Red Ribbon Societies Composed Exclusively of ladies have been organized in Kansas in aid of the temperance movement. Every member has voluntarily pledged herself among other things, not to marry any man who is not an abstainer from intoxicating liquor. Such societies might be established in other States with advantage.

The Yellow Fever Epidemic at Pensacola, Fla., still rages with severity. The total number of cases to the end of last week was 2200, and the number of deaths 172. A telegram from the suffering city says: "The cool wave, which has lasted several days, is passing off without giving the coveted frost. The demand for relief increases as the sickness is prolonged."

Seven New Presbyterian Churches are to be erected in the burnt district of Michigan during the present year. Tenders have already been invited by the synodical committee. The new churches are to be frame buildings and to vary in cost from eight hundred to three thousand dollars.

A Novel Duel with Horse-Whips is Reported from North Carolina. Two young farmers residing near Greensboro, N. C., who had quarrelled about a lady each desired to marry, met on October 24th, to fight a duel. In order to evade the law against deadly weapons they agreed to fight with horse-whips. Both men were required by the agreement to wear only thin articles of clothing, and as they used heavy whips and fought with great ferocity, both men suffered terribly. The combat lasted three hours when both men were completely exhausted, their feet being the only parts of their bodies not gashed by the whips. Whether either of the men has advanced his prospects of winning the lady by his brutality is not stated; but if she is wise she will discard both on the ground of their inhumanity. She and all ladies about whom the duels so sadly frequent are fought, may appropriately use the prayer of the Psalmist (Psa. 140 : 4).

One Hundred and Fifty Dollars for the Title to a place in Heaven was offered and rejected a few days ago in Troy, N. Y. A Jewish immigrant named Udovitch was charged with aggravated assault before the judge, and when the case was stated a strange revelation took place. It appeared that Udovitch believing that a man named Cohen had by his good works established a claim to heavenly happiness after death, went to him and offered him $150 for his claim. Cohen rejected his offer, when Udovitch became violent, and committed the assault complained of. It was stated that this strange notion of the privilege of purchasing a place in Heaven is held by many of the most uneducated classes of the Jews, and that it originated in a misunderstanding of a sentence in the Talmud. It is sad to think that ignorance so dense as that of this Jew should be found in these days, but it may be feared that there are many people not so ignorant as he, who are victims of the same mistake in other forms. Strict morality, penances, large and charitable gifts are only too generally supposed to ensure an eternity of happiness (Acts 4 : 12).

A Party Imprisoned in a Cemetery had a narrow escape of spending a whole night there recently. It appears that there is a rule at the Evergreen Cemetery, New Haven, Conn., that the gates shall be closed and locked at sundown. Just before the time for closing, the watchman strikes a gong giving notice to the visitors to leave the ground. There were many visitors there on one day last week, in consequence of the pleasant weather. The watchman rang the gong as usual, and then gave all who might be remaining in the grounds fifteen minutes grace. Not seeing any one approaching at the expiration of that time he locked the gates. But there were left inside eleven ladies and gentlemen who became involuntary prisoners. They complained loudly and at length aroused the superintendent who released them from their unpleasant predicament by knocking a board from the fence and letting them out like so many impounded sheep. A cemetery is certainly an undesirable place in which to spend the night, and this party might well congratulate themselves that their disregard of the watchman's warning did not involve them in that unpleasantness. We may also hope for them that the warning of Christ's watchmen, may have aroused them to the urgency of quitting the city of the spiritually dead ere the door is shut (Eph. 5 : 14).

A Young Medical Student in Michigan has recently abandoned the profession just as he had completed his preparatory studies. He graduated last spring from the Medical Department of Michigan University. A local journal says that during his student life he visited the sick assiduously as an observer and assistant, was engaged in hundreds of surgical cases, and everywhere demonstrated his remarkable adaptability for the profession. A few weeks ago, on entering the rooms of the physician under whom he had studied, he unexpectedly announced his determination never to practice and to quit the profession immediately. Thy physician gave utterance to an exclamation of remonstrance at frivolous jokes, but the young man was quite serious. He said: "Yes, sir, I mean it. I have travelled with you several years and seen more woe than I ever dreamed existed in this world. Now, the simple fact is I shall never do it again. The thought of spending the remainder of my life surrounded by the wretched miseries of the sick-room and being forever haunted by the piteous sights an active physician must encounter is too horrible to be thought of with anything like indifference or equanimity. I'll not do it, and there's an end of the whole matter." The young man carried out his resolve and obtained work in a manufactory where he is still employed. It is not difficult to understand how a sensitive nature must shrink from a mode of life that brings it in constant contact with sorrow and suffering, but it is a good thing that there are some natures which find compensation even there, in the relief their skill enables them to afford. Our pure and holy Saviour's association with sinful men and women is an example which encourages the Christian to carry the news of salvation into heathen lands, to prisons and hospitals, and other places where his spirit is pained by the sights and scenes he must witness (Matt. 25 : 44).

A Moving Mountain in Nevada is Described in the Reno (Nev.) Gazette. The mountain, or sand dune as it is called, is located in the eastern part of Churchill County, and is said to be moving slowly eastward. In the whole mass which is 400 feet in height, and contains millions of tons of sand, it is impossible to find a particle much larger than a pin head. The sand of which it is composed is as clean as any sea beach sand. The mountain is so solid as to give it a musical sound when trodden upon, and oftentimes a bird lighting on it, or a large lizard running across the bottom, will start a large quantity of the sand to sliding, which makes a noise resembling the vibration of telegraph wires with a hard wind blowing. A peculiar feature of the dune is that it is not stationary, but rolls slowly eastward, the wind gathering it up on the west end, and carrying it along the ridge until it is again deposited at the eastern end. Mr. Monroe, the well-known surveyor, having heard of the movement of this mammoth sand heap, a number of years ago took careful bearings on it while sectionizing government lands in that vicinity. He recently visited the place, and found that the dune had moved nearly a mile. This phenomenon is of course regarded as extraordinary, for we have been accustomed to use the mountain as a symbol of eternal stability, but it may remind us of a time which will certainly come, when every mountain will be removed out of its place (Rev. 6 : 14). It is also a remarkable natural illustration of a spiritual promise (Isa. 41 : 15, 16).

A Romantic Case has been Brought into the Superior Court of Norwich, Conn. It is a claim for a large sum of money which has been deposited in a Norwich bank at interest awaiting a claimant. It seems that a Connecticut man named Brown who was well connected, joined the army just before the Mexican War. During the war he fell in love with a Mexican girl, and when peace was settled he resolved to learn Spanish, marry his love, and settle down in Mexico. He did so, but afterward removed to Laredo, Texas, where he lived until 1866, when he was murdered by brigands. He did not like to acknowledge his marriage so he did not communicate with his Connecticut friends, and they supposed him to have been killed in the war. His widow and children knew no language but Spanish, and knew nothing of Brown's antecedents. But several years after his death, finding a quantity of English letters among his effects, the eldest son set to work to learn English, and as soon as he was able, wrote to his father's family in Connecticut, whose address he found among the letters. His communication was received, and he was informed that his father's share of an estate left to the family was invested, and might be had on his establishing his identity. This he is now engaged in doing. Had the young man not taken the trouble to learn English in order to read his father's papers, he would have missed his inheritance. A greater inheritance that that, however, which might be had by every man, will be missed by many because they neither read nor understand their Heavenly Father's word nor care to hear of Him (Job. 21 : 14, 15).

THE GREAT CROSSBEARER AND HIS FOLLOWERS.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And when they had mocked Him, they took off the purple from Him, and put His own clothes on Him, and led Him out to crucify Him."—Mark 15 : 20.

"And He bearing His cross went forth."—John 19 : 17.

"And they compel one Simon a Cyrenian, who passed by, coming out of the country, the father of Alexander and Rufus, to bear His cross."—Mark 15 : 21.

WHEN our Lord had been condemned to die, the execution of His sentence was hurried. The Jews were in great haste to shed His blood: so intense was the enmity of the chief priests and Pharisees that every moment of delay was wearisome to them. Besides, it was the day of the Passover, and they wished to have this matter finished before they went with hypocritical piety to celebrate the festival of Israel's deliverance. We do not wonder at their eagerness, for they could not bear themselves while He lived, since His very presence reproved them for their falsehood and hypocrisy. But at Pilate we do wonder, and herein he is much to be blamed.

In all civilized countries there is usually an interval between the sentencing of the prisoner and the time of his putting to death. As the capital sentence is irreversible, it is well to have a little space in which possible evidence may be forthcoming, which may prevent the fatal stroke. In some countries we have thought that there has been a cruelly long delay between the sentence and the execution, but with the Romans it was usual to allow the reasonable respite of ten days.

Now, I do not say that it was incumbent upon Pilate according to Roman law to have allowed ten days to a Jew, who had not the rights of Roman citizenship; but I do say that he might have pleaded the custom of his country, and so have secured a delay, and afterward he might have released his prisoner. It was within his reach to have done so, and he was culpable, as he was all along, in thus yielding to the clamor for an immediate execution for no other reason than this, that he was "willing to content the people." When once we begin to make the wishes of other men our law we know not to what extremity of criminality we may be led; and so the Saviour's hasty execution is due to Pilate's vacillating spirit, and to the insatiable blood-thirstiness of the scribes and Pharisees.

Being given over to death, our Saviour was led away; and I suppose the painters are right when they put a rope about His neck or His loins; for the idea of being led in an open street would seem to imply some sort of bond: "He was led as a sheep to the slaughter." Alas, that

THE EMANCIPATOR OF OUR RACE should be led forth as a captive to die!

The direction in which He is led is outside the city. He must not die in Jerusalem, though multitudes of prophets had perished there. Though the temple was the central place of sacrifice, yet must not the Son of God be offered there, for He was an offering of another kind, and must not lie upon their altars. Outside the city, because by the Jews He was treated as a flagrant offender who must be executed at the Tyburn of the city, in the appointed place of doom known as Calvary or Golgotha.

He was led outside of the city because from that time no acceptable sacrifice could be offered there. Still more forcible is the fact that our Lord must die outside the city because He was to be consumed as a sin-offering. There were several sorts of offerings under the law: the sweet-savor offerings were presented upon the altar, and were accepted of God, but sin-offerings were burned without the camp or gate, because God can have no fellowship with sin. Once let sin be imputed to the sacrifice and it becomes abhorrent to God, and must not be presented in the tabernacle or the temple, but burned outside the circle wherein His people have their habitations.

In that sorrowful march of the crossbearing Saviour my soul with sorrow sees herself represented as deserving thus to be made to depart unto death; and yet joy mingles with this emotion, for the glorious Sin-bearer hath thus taken away our sin, and we return from our exile: His substitution is infinitely effectual. Well may those live for whom Jesus died. Well may those return in whose place the Son of God was banished. There is entrance into the holy city now, there is entrance into the temple now, there is access unto God Himself now, because the Lord hath put away our sin through Him who was led to be crucified outside the city gate.

Once more, He suffered outside the gate that we might go forth unto Him without the camp, bearing His reproach. He dies in sacred separation from the false and corrupt corporation which vaunted itself to be the chosen of God. He protested against all evil, and for this He died, so far as His murderers were concerned. Even so must His followers take up their cross and follow Him whithersoever He goeth, even though it be to be despised and rejected of men.

I. Let us draw near to our Lord for a while, and carefully observe each instructive detail. Our imagination pictures the Blessed One standing outside the gate of Herod's palace in the custody of a band of soldiers with a centurion at their head, and we begin at once to observe

HIS DRESS.

That may seem a small matter, but it is not without instruction. How is He dressed? Our text tells us that when they had mocked Him they took off the purple from Him and put His own clothes on Him; but we are not told that they took off the crown of thorns, and hence it has been currently believed that He continued to wear it to the cross and on the cross. Is not this highly probable? Surely if the thorny crown had been withdrawn this would have been the place to have said, "They took off the purple from Him and removed the crown of thorns;" but it is not so written, and therefore we may believe that remained upon Him. Pilate wrote upon His accusation "the King of the Jews," and it was not unfitting that He should continue to wear a crown. Jesus died a crowned monarch, King of the curse. The Lord God in justice said to rebel man, "Cursed is the ground for thy sake; thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee;" and lo, the Man by whom we are redeemed is crowned with that product of the earth which came of the curse.

"O sacred head surrounded
By crown of piercing thorn;
O bleeding head, so wounded,
Reviled and put to scorn."

But the chief point to be noted is that Jesus wore

HIS OWN CLOTHES,

the usual garments which He was accustomed to wear, and this no doubt for identification, that all who looked on might know that it was the same person who had preached in their streets and had healed their sick. He wore His own clothes also for another reason, namely, that there might be a fulfilment of prophecy. It may not strike you at first, but you will soon see it. Our Lord must not go to die in the purple: He must march to the cross in that vestment which was without seam and woven from the top throughout, or else the Word could not have been fulfilled, "They parted my garments among them, and upon my vesture did they cast lots." Other raiment could readily have been rent and divided, but this garment could not have been so rent without destroying it, and therefore the soldiers cast lots for it.

Little did they who put it on Him dream that they were thus accessory to the fulfilment of a prophecy. Does it not strike you as strange that the Pharisees, who were so full of hatred to Christ, did not carefully draw back from the fulfilment of so many types and prophecies? Their rabbis and teachers knew the prophecy of Zechariah, that the Messiah should be sold for thirty pieces of silver: why did it not occur to them to make their bribe to Judas twenty-nine or thirty-one silver pieces?

To me there occurs one other thought touching His wearing His own garments. I do not know if I can express it, but it seems to me to indicate that our Lord's passion was a true and natural part of His life; He died as He lived. His death was not a new departure, but the completion of a life of self-sacrifice, and so He had no need to put on a fresh garb. Look! He goes to die in His ordinary every-day garments! Does not it almost seem as if people put on their Sunday clothes because they regard religion as something quite distinct from their common life? It is ill for a man when he cannot lead his fellows in prayer till he has gone to the wardrobe. Time was when vestments meant something; but ever since our great High-priest went up to His one sacrifice wearing His common clothes, all types are fulfilled and laid aside. Now, we pray not officially, or we should need the robe; but we pray personally, and our own clothes suit us well. Jesus continued the unity of His life as He approached its close, and did not even in appearance change His way; He lived to die a sacrifice; this was the climax of His life, the apex of the towering pyramid of His perfect obedience. No mark is set, no line is drawn between His passion and all the rest of His life; nor should there be a screen between our life and death.

Somehow, I dread a death which is meant to be pictorial and exhibitional. I am not an admirer of Addison's death, as some are, who praise him because he sent for a young lord, and cried, "Come, see how a Christian can die!" I like better Bengel's wish when he desired to die just as a person would slip out from company because some one beckoned him outside. Such a person modestly thinking his presence or absence to be of small account in a great world, quietly withdraws, and friends only observe that he is gone. Death should be part of the usual curriculum, the close of the day's work, the entrance into harbor which ends the voyage.

II. Brethren, I beg you for a few minutes to look at

HIS COMPANY.

Who were they that were with our Lord when He came to die? First and nearest to Him were the rough Roman soldiers, strong, muscular, unfeeling men, ready to shed blood at any moment. In them human affection was kept down by stern discipline, they were the iron instruments of an empire of iron. They would do what they were bidden, and feeling and sympathy were not allowed to interfere. I do but bid you look at these guards to remind you that from beneath their eagle our Saviour won a trophy; for their centurion at our Lord's death uttered the confession, "Certainly this was the Son of God." This was a blessed confession of faith, and I delight to think of our Lord as thus becoming the conqueror of His conquerors by taking one out of them to be His disciple and witness, as we would fain believe he was. Surely after openly making the clear confession which the evangelist has recorded we may number him with believers.

Next to these guards were two malefactors, led out with Him to execution. That was intended to increase His scorn. He must not be separated from the basest of men, but He must be led forth between two thieves, having previously had a murderer preferred to Him. They seem to have been very hardened scoundrels, for they reviled Him. I mention them because our Lord won a trophy by the conversion of one of them, who dying said, "We suffer justly, but this man hath done nothing amiss," and then prayed, "Lord, remember me when Thou comest into Thy kingdom." This dying thief has brought more glory to Christ than hundreds of us, for in every place wherever this gospel has been preached this has been told as a memorial of him, and as a comfort to the guiltiest to look to Jesus.

Beyond the prisoners were the scribes and Pharisees, and high priests. I could not picture their faces, but surely they must have been about the worst lot of human physiognomies that were ever seen, as with a fiendish delight they stared at Jesus. He had called them "hypocrites;" He had spoken of them as "making clean the outside of the cup and platter," while their inner part was very wickedness, and now they are showing their venom, and silencing His reproofs.

Around these there is a great rabble, and if you look into the mob you see with surprise that they are the same crowd who a week ago shouted, "Hosanna! Hosanna!" They have changed their note and cry, "Crucify Him: crucify Him;" for a few pence they were bribed to do so; they were an ignorant, fickle mob. When such do hiss at you for doing right, forgive them. When they point the finger of scorn at you for being a Christian, regard them not. It little boots what they may say or do: they yelled at Him who was their best Benefactor and ours. The Lord Christ endured the popular scorn as He had once received the popular acclamation. He lived above it all, for He knew that men of low degree are vanity. "Vanity of vanities;" all that cometh of vain man is vanity.

Ay, but there was a little change for the better in the company: there was just a streak of light in that cloud, for kindly women were in the throng. These were not all His disciples, perhaps few of them were such, for otherwise He would not have bidden them weep over a woe which His disciples escaped; but they were who could not look upon Him without tears: it is said by Luke that they bewailed and lamented Him. They knew how innocent He was, and how kind He had been. Perhaps some of them had received favors at His hands, and therefore they wept sore that He should die. It was well done of them.

In all the Evangelists there is no instance of a woman that had any hand in the death of Christ. As far as they are connected with the matter they are guiltless, they rather oppose His death than promote it. Woman was last at the cross and first at the sepulchre, and therefore we can never say a word about her being the first in the transgression. Oh, kindly eyes that gave the Lord of love the tribute of their pity! Blessed be ye of compassionate heaven!

III. But now, come closer to the Saviour: break through the company, and hear my third talk with you while you look a little on HIS BURDEN.

May the good Spirit teach me how to depict my Lord. We are told by John that our Saviour "went forth bearing His cross." We might have supposed, so far as the other three evangelists are concerned, that Simon the Cyrenian had carried the cross all the way, but John fills up the blank space in their accounts. Our Lord carried His own cross at the commencement of the sorrowful pilgrimage to Calvary.

Note its weight. Usually only one beam of the cross was carried: it may have been so now. It does not look so, however; for the expression, "bearing his cross," would naturally mean the whole of it. It is highly probable that, although that load could easily be borne by the rough, coarse criminals who ordinarily suffered, yet not so readily by the tender and more exquisite frame of our divine Lord. It is difficult to find any other reason why they should have laid the cross on Simon, unless it be true, as tradition says, that He fainted beneath the burden. I care nothing for tradition, nor even for conjecture; but still there must have been a reason, and as we cannot believe that these people had any real mercy for Christ, we think they must have acted upon the cruel wish that He might not die on the road, but might at least live to be nailed to the tree. "The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel." This I leave.

The spiritual meaning of it, of course, was that Christ in perfect obedience was then carrying the load of our disobedience. The cross, which was the curse, for "Cursed is every one that hangeth on a tree," is borne on those blessed shoulders which were submissive to the will of God in all things. Our Lord's crossbearing is the representation of His bearing all our sin, and therefore in it we rejoice.

It also has a prophetic meaning: that cross which He carried through Jerusalem shall go through Jerusalem again. It is His great weapon with which He conquers and wins the world: it is His sceptre with which He shall rule, governing the hearts of His people by no more forceful means than by the love manifested on His cross. "The government shall be upon His shoulder;" that which He bore on His shoulder shall win obedience, and they that take His yoke upon them shall find rest unto their souls.

IV. I wish I had an hour during which I might speak upon the last head, which bristles with points of interest; but I must give its lessons to you rather in rough remarks than in studied observations.

The last thing to consider is

HIS CROSSBEARER.

We are not told why the Roman soldiers laid the cross on Simon. We have made a conjecture; but we leave it as a conjecture, although a highly probable one. If it be true, it lets us see how truly human our Master was. He had been all night in the garden, sweating as it were great drops of blood in His anguish: He had been before the Sanhedrim, He had been before Pilate, then before Herod, then before Pilate again; He had endured scourging; He had been mocked by the soldiery; and it would have been a great wonder if the human frame had not shown some sign of exhaustion.

Holy Scripture, by its example, teaches us great reticence about the sufferings of Jesus. Some of the mediæval writers and certain good people who write devotional books are too apt to dilate upon every supposed grief of our Master, so as to harrow up your feelings; but it is the part of wisdom to imitate the ancient painter who, when he depicted Agamemnon as sacrificing his daughter, veiled the father's face. It is indelicate and almost indecent to write as some have done who would seem to be better acquainted with anatomy than awed by divinity. Much that Jesus endured must forever remain veiled to us; whether He fainted once or twice or thrice, or did not faint at all, we are not informed; and therefore we leave the idea in the obscurity of probability, and reverently worship Him who was tender in body and soul, and suffered even as we do. Oh, love surpassing knowledge which could make Him suffer so!

There was a great singularity in the providence which brought Simon upon the scene just when he appeared. The right man came forward at the right moment. Observe that Simon was pressed into this duty. The word used signifies that the person is impressed into the royal service. Simon was a pressed man, and probably not a disciple of Christ at the time when he was loaded with the cross. How often has a burden of sorrow been the means of bringing men to the faith of Jesus! He was coming in from the country about some business or other, and him they compelled to bear the cross, impressing him into the service which else he would have shunned, for "he passed by," and would have gone on if he could. Roman soldiers were not accustomed to make many bones about what they chose to do. It was sufficient for them that he came under their notice, and carry the cross he must.

His name was Simon: and where was that other Simon? What a silent, but strong rebuke this would be to him! Simon Peter, Simon son of Jonas, where wast thou? Another Simon has taken thy place. Sometimes the Lord's servants are backward where they are expected to be forward, and He finds other servitors for the time. If this has ever happened to us it ought gently to rebuke us as long as we live. Brothers and sisters, keep your places, and let not another Simon occupy your room. It is of Judas that it is said, "his bishopric shall another take;" but a true disciple will retain his office. Remember that word of our Lord, "Hold that fast which thou hast, that no man take thy crown." Simon Peter lost a crown here, and another head wore it.

Simon was a Cyrenian—an African—I wonder if he was a black man. In the Acts of the Apostles, at the thirteenth chapter, we find mention of a Simeon that was called Niger, or black. We do not know whether he was the same man or no, but anyhow he was an African, for Cyrene lies just to the west of Egypt, on the southern coast of the Mediterranean. Surely the African has had his full share of crossbearing for many an age. Oh that the pangs of his sorrow may bring forth a birth of joy! Blessed be he, whether African or Englishman, or who he may, that has

THE HONOR OF BEARING THE CROSS after Christ.

We are told he was the father of Alexander and Rufus. Which, my brethren, is the greater honor to a man, to have a good father, or to be the father of good sons? Under the Old Testament rule we usually read of a man that he is the son of such an one, but here we come to another style, and find it to a man's honor that he is the father of certain well-known brethren—"the father of Alexander and Rufus." Surely, Mark knew these two sons, or he would not have cared to mention them; they must have been familiar to the Church, or he would not have thus described their father. It was their father who carried the cross.

It is exceedingly likely that this Rufus was he of whom Paul speaks in the last chapter of his epistle to the Romans, for Mark was with Paul, and by this means knew Simon and Rufus. Paul writes, "Salute Rufus chosen in the Lord, and his mother and mine." His mother was such a motherly person that she had been a mother to Paul as well as to Rufus. Surely, if she was a mother to Paul, she was another disciple of Jesus, and it would look as if this man, his wife, and his two sons all became converts to our Lord after he had carried His cross. It is certainly not the most unlikely circumstance that has been accepted by us on the ground of probability. Oh, what a blessing to a man to be known by his sons! Pray, dear Christian friends, you that have an Alexander and a Rufus, that it may be an honor to you to be known as their father.

"Him they compelled to bear His cross"—perhaps the heavier end of it, if it was really bound to Christ, as they say; or as I judge, the whole of it. It matters little how it was; but Simon is the representative of the Church which follows Christ bearing His cross. Here we may recall the language of Paul: "I fill up that which is behind," may I paraphrase it?—I take the hinder end—"of the sufferings of Christ for His body's sake, that is the Church." Every one that will live godly in Christ Jesus must suffer persecution. Jesus said, "Whosoever doth not bear his cross and come after Me, cannot be My disciple." Here is a representative, then, of all the godly—this Simon bearing Christ's cross.

Mark, it was not a cross of his own making, like those of monks and nuns who put themselves to pains of their own inventing. It was Christ's cross; and he carried it not before Christ, as some do who talk of their poverty as though it would get them to heaven, instead of resting on Christ's cross. He carried it after Christ in its right place. This is the order—Christ in front bearing all our sin, and we behind enduring shame and reproach for Him, and counting it greater riches than all the treasures of Egypt.

The next is advice to any of you that have been compelled to suffer as Christians though you are not Christians. I wonder whether there is anybody here who is only a press-man and yet has to bear the cross. A workingman became a teetotaler: he did not mean to be a Christian, but when he went to work his mates tempted him to drink, and as he would not join them they attacked him as a Christian, and said, "You are one of those canting hypocrites, those Wesleyans, those Presbyterians, or those Spurgeonites!" This is not true of you: but thus you see the cross is forced on you: had you not better take it up and bear it joyfully?

They have pressed you into this service: take it as an index of the will of providence, and say, "I will not be a press-man only;

I WILL BE A VOLUNTEER, and I will cheerfully carry Christ's cross."

I know a man who merely comes to this place of worship because he is somewhat interested in the preaching, though he has no idea of being a converted man; yet in the street where he lives nobody ever goes to a place of worship, and therefore they set him down as a pious man, and some have even ridiculed him for it. Friend, you are in for it because you attend here, and you put me in for it too, for if you do anything wrong they are sure to lay all the blame on me. They say—"That is one of Spurgeon's people." You are not: I do not own you as yet; but the outsiders have pushed you into the responsibilities of a religious profession, and you had better go in for its privileges. They have laid the cross upon you, do not throw it off. Come on, and bring that dear motherly wife with you, and Alexander and Rufus too. The Church will be glad to take you all in, and then as a volunteer you shall bear Christ's cross. It is, however, a remarkable thing that some should first of all be forced into it and then become willing followers.

Last of all, if you and I are crossbearers, here is a sweet thought. Are we carrying a cross which presses us heavily just now? You know you are to be like your Master, and if so there will be some one found to help you bear your cross. They found Simon to bear the cross of Jesus, and there is a Simon somewhere to help you. Only cry to the Lord about it, and He will find you a friend. If Simon is not forthcoming I will tell you what to do.

IMITATE SIMON.

If Simon was what I think he was, he became a converted man, and before long found himself in trouble through it, and he at once went to the Lord in prayer, and said, "Lord Jesus, I am resting in Thee alone. Thou didst give me the honor to carry Thy cross once, now, I beseech Thee, carry mine!" This is what I want you to do with your crosses at this time. You that have to endure hardness for Christ, and are glad to do it, ask Him to bear your burden for you. He has borne your sins, and if you will but commit your troubles to Him, joy and peace through believing shall stream into your souls by His Holy Spirit. God bless you, for Christ's sake.

An Attack on the Fashionable Styles of Dress was made by Dr. Alfred Carpenter, a prominent English physiologist, at the recent session of the British Sanitary Congress. He urged the abandonment of "the chimney-pot hat," as detrimental to health, but directed his remarks chiefly to the injurious custom ladies have adopted of wearing high-heeled shoes with pointed toes. He said it would be far better for children to be brought up without wearing any kind of boot at all than to have the muscles wasted, the bones distorted, and the joints perverted in their action in the way in which it was the custom now to do among the low, rich and poor. It certainly argued a low taste and a very weak intellect when such things as these were worn by the lady who aspired to be considered as a "queen of society" and who wished to make a sensation among her fellows. High heels and pointed toes must interfere with exercise, must make the wearers suffer from want of muscular exertion and, therefore, must lay the foundation for all those diseases which spring from dyspepsia and its allies. It was this tendency to place ligatures on the other parts of the body as well as the foot which so often rendered human nature ridiculous and produced suffering of the most serious kind.

The Mahommedan Sacred Camel and Procession Setting out for Mecca.

THE SACRED CAMEL.

THE scene depicted in the picture on this page, is that of the setting out of "the sacred camel," and the procession carrying gifts to Mecca, the birth-place of Mahommed. This procession is an annual affair, and devout Mahommedans from all Islam join it on its way to its destination. The route is a long and dreary one, crossing the great desert of Arabia and following the path taken by the Israelites under Moses, covers over a thousand miles before it reaches Mecca. Many of the pilgrims die of exhaustion and fatigue by the way, and their possessions are added to the hoard of wealth in transportation to Mecca. It is estimated that not less than 150,000 pilgrims appear at Mecca every year, and on the day of the Great Feast or Courban Bairam offer their gifts.

The strange sight of these processions has often been described by travellers. It brings all the peculiar features of this strange religion prominently before the observer, and the continual cry ascending from some part of the procession, "There is but one God, and Mahommed is His prophet," arouses mingled feelings of wonder and pity for the devotees. It is calculated that more than one hundred and fifty millions of the human race are followers of Mahommed, and that of that number over forty millions are subjects of Queen Victoria. Their tenets, while resembling those of other religions, are in some respects different from all. The belief in a personal God separates Mahommedanism from Buddhism; abhorrence of idolatry from Hinduism; recognition of the Messiah from Judaism; and the worship of Mahommed from Christianity.

Mahommed, the founder of the religion which bears his name, was born 570 years after Christ at Mecca, in Arabia. He was of lowly birth and never received an education. His early years were passed as a shepherd-boy, but while a young man he entered the service of a wealthy widow, who employed him in her business as a merchant, and finding him possessed of eminent business sagacity, she promoted him to the management of her affairs and finally married him.

Mahommed's commercial transactions brought him in contact with Jews, Hindoos, Buddhists and people who professed to be Christians, but whose doctrines and practices were debased and corrupt, and Mahommed earnestly studied all these creeds. He was afflicted with a hysterical ailment (some say with epileptic fits), and was subject to hallucinations which, as he gave his thoughts more and more to religious subjects, eventually took a religious form. He was accustomed when the fits were upon him to retire to a lonely, rugged spot where there was a cave in which he spent whole days and nights in fasting and meditation.

During one of these seasons he professed to have seen, and probably imagined he did see, an angel who instructed him in divine things and commissioned him to declare to the world

A NEW MESSAGE FROM GOD, which should be the perfect development of the revelation which had been progressively given to Abraham and the patriarchs, to Moses and the prophets, and to Christ and the apostles. Mahommed professed to have had several conferences with the angel, and he subsequently related to his followers the substance of these interviews, which was committed by them to writing, and now forms the Koran, the sacred book of the Mahommedans. It consists of one hundred and fourteen chapters and is evidently the product of a human brain saturated with the teachings of Hinduism, Buddhism, Judaism, and a corrupt Christianity, and abnormally inflamed by fanatical ambition.

Mahommed preached his new revelation but with little success at first, for at the end of five years he had made only forty converts. Then persecution came upon him and he fled for his life with one solitary companion to Medina, where dwelt two tribes who hated the inhabitants of Mecca, and who received Mahommed with open arms and adopted his new religion. That was in the year 622, and the epoch is known as

"THE HEGIRA OF THE PROPHET."

The remaining ten years of Mahommed's life (he died in 632), were spent in war. He organized an army of 10,000 men with which he attacked Mecca, conquered it, destroyed the idolatrous temples, and erected a mosque. He commenced his work as a peaceful teacher of virtue, sobriety, and righteousness, but before he died he fell away from his high ideal, and became sensual, vicious and cruel, and he left instructions to his followers to continue the course of conquest and bloodshed, which they only too faithfully obeyed. The sensualism of Mahommedanism appeals to the strong passions of human nature, and renders the conversion of its professors to Christianity a work far more difficult than that of pagans or heathens.

THE NEARING DOOM OF MOHAMMEDANISM.

THE REV. JOSEPH HAMMOND, LL.B., Vicar of St. Austell, England, preaching on September 24th, on the Anglo-Egyptian war said:

"This Egyptian Pasha, this colonel of artillery, Arabi Pasha, has not been the author of this war. No; in some sense it is God's judgment. Its causes lie deep below the surface, but one word explains them all, and that word is Islam. It is a religious war. It is the product of Mohammedanism, of that system which has been the curse of Europe for the last four hundred years, and of Asia for a much longer period. The crimes of the Ottomans against high heaven, the unspeakable tyrannies and enormities of which they have been guilty, their lies, their impurities, have long called for vengeance, and the hour of vengeance is come. We have tried to prop up the tottering throne of the Sultan; we have been his champions against the rest of Europe, but in vain. His vicious and profligate system is against God, and God is against him. His end is drawing near, and this war is a nail in his coffin.

"Can any one who knows what the Turks have been, who has read a single page of their history, who knows what they are at the present day, steeped in impurity and deceit—can any one fail to see the retribution of Heaven overtaking them? Yes, as we see the colossal despotism breaking up, as year by year at Plevna, in Thessaly, in Cyprus, in Egypt, in Tunis—we see the gradual disintegration of that Empire which has reduced some of the very fairest provinces of Europe to a desert, which has saturated them with blood, and has been a standing menace to civilization and order we are reminded that

'Tho' the mills of God grind slowly,
Yet they grind exceeding small.'

We are reminded of that voice which cried to Robespierre, as he stood under the guillotine to which he had himself consigned so many victims, 'Ay, Robespierre, there is a God.' It has been the boast of the Turk that wherever the hoofs of Omar's-horse have trod, no blade of grass was ever after known to grow. But God will not have His fair world made a desolation forever and this war is part of His protest against impurity and wrong.

(Mr. Hammond might also have added that this war is helping to "dry up the mystic Euphrates."—Rev. 16: 12—which is immediately to precede the Second Advent of Christ; and it is also a manifestation of the "Evil Spirit from the mouth of the False Prophet of Mohammedanism gathering the nations to the war of the great day of God Almighty."—Rev. 16: 14).

A WIDOW'S ADVOCATE REPULSED.

THE illustration on this page relates to an incident described at a temperance meeting not long ago by a man whose father was an actor in it, and was responsible for its tragical termination. The scene depicted occurred in the business office of Mr. John Lloyd, who was the owner of a large number of small tenement houses and cottages. He was in the main a just and even a merciful owner, and there were many instances on record of his forbearance and patience toward occupiers whom misfortune deprived of the power to pay their rents. These instances were, however, in contrast with other cases in which he had been severe, and in which rather than suffer the loss of a few dollars he had sold every article of furniture the debtor possessed. There was no way of accounting known to his friends for the difference of his conduct toward one or the other of his debtors. But his wife and children could have explained it, if they had not been restrained by their affection for him.

Mr. Lloyd was a good-hearted man, kind and generous to all "when he was himself." But he was liable to fall under the seductions of his appetite for liquor, and would at times, sometimes separated by long intervals, drink deeply for two or three days during which time he acted like a maniac. When the fit of intoxication was passing off, and for a week afterward, he was gloomy, morose and churlish, ready to quarrel with any one and to carry his quarrel to extremities. During those times woe to any one about him who was remiss in his duty, or to any debtor who asked for a favor, or in fact to all who came in contact with him. It was, unhappily, in one of these moods that Mr. Lloyd received a visit from Mr. Senior, a kind-hearted man, who had interested himself in the welfare of a poor widow, who was one of Mr.

"She can Pay, and She Shall!"

Lloyd's tenants, and called upon that gentleman to plead on her behalf.

Owing in part to sickness, and in part to family afflictions, she was unable to lay by the rent, which hitherto had always been forthcoming at the right time. There was not a more honest or provident woman in the district than Mary Smith, and she was deeply grieved to be obliged to offer an explanation and a promise instead of the full amount due. Having heard the statement which Mr. Senior made on her behalf, Mr. Lloyd became furiously excited. The appeal to his generosity seemed to madden him. His nerves were quivering under the unnatural excitement produced by his large potations of rum, and his head was splitting with neuralgic torture. He rose from his seat with the look of a maniac in his eyes, and moving around the table until he stood opposite his visitor, he exclaimed with a look betraying his strong passion, and bringing down his fist with a crash on the table: "Mr. Senior, you are always ready to plead the cause of any dishonest man or woman who has a smooth tongue and a plausible excuse. I will hear no more. That woman owes the rent. She can pay it, and she shall pay it. Such messages as you have brought to-day shall not impose upon me. I know the world too well for that. I swear I will have my money if I have to sell the bed from under her to get it."

Mr. Senior perceived that further argument or appeal would be thrown away on the infuriated man, and knowing well that it was utterly impossible for the widow to meet the demand, resolved that he would obtain aid for her from some generous neighbor who might be induced to advance the money necessary to meet Mr. Lloyd's demand either as a gift or a loan. He accordingly without waiting to hear the close of Mr. Lloyd's oburgation left the office to go in search of the money.

All might have gone well, therefore, so far as Mrs. Smith was concerned, if it had not been for the headstrong fury of her foolish landlord. Going down to her cottage before Mr. Senior had had time to carry out his intentions, he so terrified the widow by his bullying and threats that Mrs. Smith, who was already a great sufferer from heart disease became strongly agitated. After he left her she was taken ill, and, in the course of the next night, died, as every one believed, from the effects of the shock which the conduct of her landlord had given her.

And yet Mr. Lloyd, as we have said, was not naturally a hard-hearted man. When perfectly sober no one could desire a kinder neighbor, a better employer, or a more reasonable landlord. It was only when liquor maddened or muddled his brain that he became the terror of his family, and a curse to the neighborhood. When told of the death of the widow, and reminded of the previous visit of Mr. Senior on her behalf, his distress and self-reproach were severe. He loathed and cursed himself, his weakness and his vice, but even in his misery and remorse his thoughts turned to rum as the friend who could help him to forget his trouble, and on the same evening he was again intoxicated. Every effort to reclaim him ended in failure, and it was not long before his sad career was closed by an attack of inflammation, which resulted from hard drinking. He left a wife and three little boys to battle with the world without the protection of a husband and a father.

It was by one of the boys, now grown to a vigorous manhood, that the above incident was related in public as a warning to those who might be falling under the power of the intoxicating cup. The one relieving feature of the story is that Mr. Lloyd's widow, learning wisdom from her sad experience, trained her boys in the habits of temperance and godliness, and the one who related the incident has devoted his life to the advocacy of total abstinence, and has been the means of rescuing many a degraded man from his vicious appetites, and leading him to the Saviour.

ONLY A TRAMP.

A Serial Story by Grace Stebbing.

A Token of Gratitude.

IT was a little after eight o'clock one brilliant moonlight night toward the end of October, and Betty Sharplin was thinking about going to bed. Indeed, she would have gone to bed some minutes ago, only that the day happened to be Thursday, and she had not yet received the weekly gifts from the mayor of Southford.

The butter and bacon, and tea and eggs, were generally brought to her some time in the morning or afternoon; but it had happened, now and again, that Mr. Barnes had come over with the basket himself, after his dinner, catching her just as she had made up her mind that, at any rate, the day had come at last when he had forgotten her, or been obliged to put her on one side for some superior duty. This October night her faith in her friend had been thus tried, when firm, quick steps on the road without, and then a firm, sharp tap on her door, made her heart beat more quickly with reviving pleasure, and calling out "Come in," she rose at the same time, and hobbled forward to give a welcome to the late visitor.

But the heartiness of the welcome suffered considerable diminution when the old dame saw a stranger enter, instead of the expected well-known guest. However, he had a parcel in his hand, and he asked if she were Mrs. Sharplin; so she concluded naturally enough that he was a duly-accredited messenger from the mayor, and repeated her invitation to him to enter her tidy little room. Its smallness became particularly apparent with its new occupant, who had to stoop to get in at the doorway, and when he was in almost touched the ceiling with his head, and could very nearly have touched the walls on either side of him with his outstretched hands.

There was a curious little pause after he had come in, both seeming to expect the other to begin the conversation. Meantime they gazed at each other with every appearance of a kind desire to improve their acquaintance. At last old Betty said gently, in a questioning tone, "You have come from the mayor, helike, Sir?"

"Well, yes, I guess I have in a sort of a way," was the half-laughing answer. "Although I cannot say that I have so much as even seen him to-day."

"Dear, dear!" ejaculated the old woman in surprise. "And yet he's sent you to me, only to think o' that now."

"But you must not think of that," said the visitor, laughing again good-humoredly, "because it is not true. The mayor has had nothing whatever to do with sending me; I have come of my own accord. Do you mean to say that you have never expected me to come one day and thank you for your goodness to me?"

"To come—to thank me—my goodness!" echoed old Betty in wondering bewilderment. "Deed then, Sir, I misdoubt me as ye've been making some mistake. It's little goodness as ever I've shown to any one; my means have aye been small, and I doubt I've not done by the tenth part as much as I might, even with what blessings have been granted me. If I may make so bold as say it, I think ye'll have come to the wrong cottage."

"And I think that I have done nothing of the sort," was the earnest reply. "Although you forget, or think so lightly of your kind deeds, as not to remember those to whom you show them, it is different with those who receive them. If you have no recollection of a certain miserable, starving tramp, to whom you gave tea and food one Sunday afternoon, between two and three months ago, in Silverdale Church porch, that same tramp has still got the whole affair clearly enough in his mind, I can tell you. And he has come over from Southford to-night expressly to let you know as much."

The old woman stared at the speaker from head to foot, and then, lifting up her hands and eyes, relieved herself of some of the overweight of astonishment with her usual ejaculation—"Deary me, deary, deary me!"

"Only to think," she added at last, and drawing a long breath, "only to think as you an' yon poor worn-out laddie are one and the same body. I never could ha' thought it; but 'deed, then, I'm fain to say as ye are greatly changed."

"Well, yes, I guess so, outwardly," said the man gravely. "Both my body and my clothes were worn out then, and thanks to regular work and regular pay, I'm not quite such a blot on this beautiful country as I was, to look at. I wish it was as easy to change the shabby, mean dinginess of the inner man as it is of the outer."

There was a shade of sorrowful bitterness in his voice that touched his companion's most earnest sympathies. A minute before she had been feeling unconsciously somewhat overpowered by the contrast between his vigor, and health, and strength of youth, and her own shrivelled, feeble old age. But that feeling was all lost now in pity. She had brought the cup of tea and the half of her own little dinner to the nourishment of the starving body; she was just as tenderly, unobtrusively ready to offer aid from her stores of faith and love to a hungry, thirsting soul.

"Bear ye one another's burdens, and so fulfil the law of Christ," were to her no mere words to be heard and neglected, to be obeyed or disregarded as might suit the inclination or convenience of the moment. As her visitor expressed his disconsolate longing she came nearer to him, and said gently:

"Deed then, it seems to me as it's a deal easier to get the inner change than the outer one. A body has to do it all one's self, so to say, to earn good clothes and nourishing food; but to get the new heart one has nought to do but to cry—'O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us.'"

A slight smile came upon her hearer's face as the old woman ceased speaking, and as her guest had no answer ready but a half-uttered sigh of envy for her fulness of loving trust, there was a short silence again in the room.

"Won't ye sit down an' rest ye a bit?" said Mrs. Sharplin at last, recalled to the memory of the duties of hospitality, and the question reminded her visitor of his errand.

"Sit down," he exclaimed, "why, no indeed; I ought to have been away again five minutes ago. I have a good long tramp back to Southford, you know, and I have to be up early. I must be saying good-by at once; I only came to bring these over, and to beg you to accept them."

And as he spoke he swung his hand round, and for the first time brought his parcel to the fore, not the Barnes's family market-basket, but a package done up in brown paper.

"You won't hurt me by refusing them, will you?" asked the man anxiously, as the old woman drew back in momentary surprise from the hidden gift held toward her. Thus adjured, she came forward again, and taking the parcel in her hands, she opened it with trembling fingers, thereupon dropping half the contents, and holding the other half up with her uplifted hands, as she once more ejaculated, with glistening eyes:

"Deary-me, de-eary, deary-me! Did ever anyone! If they ain't the very things as I've been longing for. Don't I tell ye as He's the God of the widow and the desolate?"

Her companion uttered a sound something between a laugh and a choke as he made an effort to answer her. But after a moment he managed to get out the words, "Then my counsellor was right as to what I had better get for you."

"Right! I should think he was indeed," said old Betty with glad gratitude, still continuing the examination of the thick felt arctics, with their lining of scarlet lamb's wool. "But who could ye have asked?" she added, after a pause; and who could ha' been clever enough to just hit upon the very exact one thing as I most wanted?"

The giver of the boots laughed outright this time with genuine satisfaction at the success of his present, as he replied in a tone of amusement:

"Well, you have only got to think of the cleverest person, leaving out the vicar, anywhere about this neighborhood, and then you'll have guessed my instructor, and you'll have guessed the name of the very queerest little old man that ever I or any one else, I should imagine, ever saw in their lives."

Betty Sharplin looked at him with a smile. "If you hadn't said 'old man,' I should ha' thought, maybe, ye were speakin' o' little Bobby Balston."

"And it is even so; you have it," said the tramp, laughing again; "at least, that is what he tells me he is called, except when 'mother' calls him her 'odd little Bonny.' Well, we struck up a friendship in the fields one day, and since then I have several times, on Saturdays and Sundays, managed to get over to some of his favorite haunts to have a chat with him. Last Saturday I consulted with him as to what I could get to show my gratitude a little bit to you, and after a minute's thought he said, 'Hot boots, because mother had said you felt the cold draught cruel, under your door, to your feet last winter.' And so the best representation of hot boots I could find in Southford I have got for you, and it is odd little—"

He interrupted himself suddenly, and coming up to the old woman he took her hand in his, and muttered, in a voice so low that it was but just audible:

"And it is one of the lambs of the Lamb of God whom you must thank for them, and not me."

Then he bent and kissed the old withered hand reverently, as though it were a queen's, dropped it, turned, and was gone.

While Granny Sharplin sat with her new boots in her lap, and murmuring, as a thanksgiving rather than as a prayer, "That it may please thee to provide for the widows, and all that are desolate," the tramp pursued his lonely way along the moonlit roads back to Southford, meditating with a longing, hungering heart over the petition the old woman had so meekly, tenderly offered to him for his aid and comfort:

"O Lamb of God, that takest away the sins of the world, have mercy upon us."

He was so absorbed in his own thoughts that he scarcely even noticed a dog-cart which passed him rapidly just as he got out of Silverdale, and a quarter of an hour later he was still trudging along in the same state of abstraction when it came up with him again. The occupant of the dog-cart was going along more quietly now, or the possibility is that he would have run over the dreamy pedestrian, whose unguided feet had now strayed right into the middle of the roadway. As it was, the driver certainly did not expect to find the person he was looking for right in front of him like that, and while turning his eyes from side to side as he drove along, he very nearly ran down the object of his search. The swerving of the intelligent animal was the first notice its owner had of any one in his path; and the horse's hot breath on his cheek was the first signal to the tramp that he had not hit upon quite the most prudent track for a night walk. A second and more peremptory warning very quickly followed:

"Hullo, you there! are you tired of having all your legs and limbs about you?" shouted a pair of stentorian lungs in an imperative tone. "If you are, just say so, and I'll get down and have a round with you; but it's mean to risk laying the blame of the affair on the poor animal."

"Or on any one else, for one's own carelessness," was the apologetic answer, as the tramp hastily stepped to one side, and waited as for the dog-cart to pass on before he continued his own route; but instead of driving on the owner of the carriage made a more determined stay than before, and said coolly, "Well, as you don't seem anxious for a wrestling match, you may as well get up beside me, if you are Wynn as I suppose. For we are both bound, in that case, for the same place."

"Not quite," was the grave answer. "And I would rather walk, thank you, sir."

"And I would rather you drove," said the mayor of Southford decidedly. "Good old Granny Sharplin told me that you had been paying her a visit, and I have regularly cheated her out of half her expected chat with me, on purpose to catch you up before you could have turned off the high road, and got lost in some ditch or other in hunting for a short cut. Come, jump up, there's a good fellow. I really wish to have a talk with you, and every day just now brings so much of its own business that it is as well to do two things at once when one can."

The young man, finding that compliance with his employer's invitation would evidently be more acceptable at the moment than persistence in his modest refusal, made no further resistance, and the next minute the good horse was carrying the two companions—the manufacturer and one of his "hands"—onward to their destinations, the one to his home in one of a row of neat little buildings called "Southford Cottages," in the "Post-Office Guide," but popularly known as "Barnes's Lot;" the other to his well-earned home in the handsome mansion entitled Southford Hall.

But after some five minutes or more had passed, and the only sounds that broke the silence of the night-hushed road were the rolling of the wheels and the tramp of the horse's feet, Charles Wynn began to have a suspicion that the only talk which the mayor wished to have with him was the one which had begun, and ended, in insisting on saving him the long return walk to the town. The silence continuing, the suspicions gradually faded away, and the young man's mind was beginning to lapse back into its former state of dreamy abstractedness, from which the horse's breath on his cheek had aroused him. However, he had scarcely thus recovered his old train of thought when he was a second time called upon to put it by for another season.

"Can you write?" was the abrupt question with which Mr. Barnes suddenly resumed his conversation. Before his surprised companion could answer the unexpected query, he asked a second, still more abruptly than the first—"Can you drive?"

"Yes," said the young man, rather doubtful himself as to which of the two questions he intended to reply with that particular "Yes." However, his doubtfulness on the matter was an affair of no consequence to the mayor, who applied it to the latter of his two queries, and immediately continued, "Ay, to be sure, of course you can. I remember my daughter told me so. A regular Jehu, in fact. So just be good enough to change places with me. My eyes are not quite so strong as they were, and if I get interested in what I'm going to talk to you about, or you plague me with contradictions, there's no saying positively that I mayn't drive into the hedge, or up against a set of palings; and you'll get the chief blame of any mischief from Mrs. Barnes and my daughter, I'll be bound."

JESUS BEFORE PILATE.

S. S. Lesson for November 12. Mark 15: 1-15. Golden Text, Isaiah 53: 3. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Temporal and Spiritual Powers in Anti-Christian Alliance—A Diseased Woman Healed in Answer to Prayer—The Scribes Fear Defilement—Pilate's Political Question—The Prisoner's Silence Excites Surprise—Herod's Disappointed Curiosity—Pilate's Wife's Warning—The Stain on Pilate's Hands—Behold the Man—Pilate's Fears of Denunciation.

THE attempts of the ecclesiastical council of Jerusalem to condemn Jesus lasted the whole night; "And straightway in the morning the chief priests held a consultation with the elders and scribes and the whole council, and bound Jesus (they need not have been afraid of His escaping them), and carried Him away, and delivered Him to Pilate." The temporal and spiritual powers combined against Jesus. It is even so now. The governments of so-called Christian countries and some of the clergy, look on quietly enough while prostitution, drunkenness, the use of tobacco and opiates, and the fearfully increasing love of pleasure are sapping the spiritual, moral, and physical health of the people; but when men and women arise, who are bold enough to stand out fearlessly, and condemn these evils in the name of Jesus, we find the greater part of "the powers that be" have misgivings as to "whereunto this will grow," and they pronounce it dangerous. It would be all right if education had done it, man would have had the glory; but men who know not God, count it sheer fanaticism to believe that Jesus has real active power, and that He exerts it among us at the present day.

When a woman at Luton in England, who was some years ago suffering excruciating pain from a diseased breast, was in answer to the prayer of an American Christian, the doctor who was attending her seeing she was healed, became very angry and refused to believe that no remedy had been used, and that the power which healed her was only the name of Jesus. O why should man be at such unreasonable enmity with God?

The priests and elders, full of jealousy, bitter envy and enmity in their unclean hearts, would not enter into the judgment-hall "lest they should be defiled!!!" They had not learned practically that God desires "truth in the inward parts" (Ps. 51: 6). On account of their scrupulousness, Pilate the judge was obliged to reverse the usual order of judge and witnesses, he "went out unto them, and said, What accusation bring ye against this Man?" This seemed to vex them, and they retaliated that if He were not a malefactor they would not have delivered Him unto them. Pilate was unwilling to take upon himself the judgment of such a Man, whose character and whose influence was so well known: "for he knew that the chief priests had delivered him for envy," so he said, "Take ye Him, and judge Him according to your law" (John 18: 28-32). But this could not be, for He had Himself foretold that the chief priests and scribes should condemn Him to death, and should deliver Him to the Gentiles (Mark 10: 33).

Pilate's first question to Jesus had been the Jews had represented Him as opposing the existing government by His pretensions to the Jewish throne (Luke 23: 2). Pilate said unto Him, "Art thou the King of the Jews?" Jesus answered him, "Sayest thou this thing of thyself, or did others tell it thee of Me?" "Am I a Jew?" replied Pilate, "Thine own nation and the chief priests have delivered thee unto me; what hast Thou done?" And Jesus told him of a kingdom "not of this world." Pilate knew nothing of things divine, but it is evident how unwilling he was to take part in the condemnation of Jesus, and when in answer to his question, "Art Thou a King then?" he answered, "Thou sayest that I am a king," and He went on to declare, that He came into the world to bear witness unto the truth and said, "Everyone that is of the truth heareth My voice." Pilate himself then became an inquirer, and said "What is truth?" (John 18: 33-38). But, alas, he did not wait for the answer; perhaps if he had, he would not have borne the eternal shame of having pronounced sentence against Jesus and caused Him to be put to death.

A POLITICAL QUESTION;

Then "the chief priests accused Him of many things, but He answered nothing." This surprised Pilate; he had been accustomed to hear those who were accused vehement in their attempts to prove themselves in the right, and this Man, against whom he could see no just shadow of a charge, had not a word to say in His own defence. Nothing so strikes unspiritual men as enduring grief, suffering wrongfully, this is to them an impossibility. "Then said Pilate to the chief priests, and to the people, 'I find no fault in this Man.'" But this incensed them more; and "they were the more fierce, saying, He stirreth up the people, teaching throughout all Jewry, beginning from Galilee to this place." Now Pilate thought there was a loophole of escape, he would cast the responsibility upon another, and hearing that He belonged to Herod's jurisdiction, he sent Him to Herod.

HEROD'S CURIOSITY WAS EXCITED,

he had long desired to see Jesus, and "hoped to have seen some miracle done by Him; so he questioned Him in many words, but received no answer, and his own wishes were not gratified; therefore he and his men of war made sport of their prisoner, little knowing who it was that they set at nought and mocked and arrayed in a gorgeous robe" (Luke 23: 4-11). And He came back on the governor's hands.

Pilate must give sentence, he could not shirk the responsibility which devolved upon him. Knowing and acknowledging that Jesus was innocent, he must either brave the displeasure of the Jews and Herod, or he must sin against his own integrity as judge, against his own soul, and crush the spark of conscience which was alight within him. He sought

ANOTHER EXPEDIENT.

"Now at that feast he released unto them one prisoner, whomsoever they desired. And there was one named Barabbas, which lay bound with them that had made insurrection with him, who had committed murder in the insurrection." Probably he thought that at any rate they would not receive the dangerous Barabbas back among them. So he put to them the alternative, "Whom will ye that I release unto you? Barabbas or Jesus which is called Christ?" (Matthew 27: 17). The chief priests and elders seized the opportunity to work upon the feelings of the multitude that they should ask Barabbas.

Meanwhile Pilate's wife sent unto him, saying, "Have thou nothing to do with that just Man, for I have suffered many things this day in a dream because of Him." Poor vacillating Pilate, afraid to do the right thing, because he would not forfeit his popularity, seeing the right clearly as the jealous Jews could not, urged to it by his wife, by his own conscience, and yet for selfish motives, unwilling to do it. The chief priests had succeeded in gaining over the people, Barabbas was chosen, and Pilate in his dilemma asked,

"WHAT SHALL I DO THEN WITH JESUS, which is called Christ?" O, the cowardice of a man who knows the right and hesitates to do it. Was it becoming in the judge to take counsel of the court as to his sentence? He had pronounced Jesus innocent, and the law demanded that the innocent should be acquitted. "They all say unto him, Let Him be crucified." Well might he ask, "Why, what evil hath He done?" They only cried, "Let Him be crucified."

The mob was becoming excited, order must be maintained at all costs; and yet, how satisfy his own conscience? He called for water, and "washed his hands before the multitude, saying, I am innocent of the blood of this just person: see ye to it" (Matthew 27: 12-24).

WAS HE INNOCENT,

does the Christian Church say so? Is it not repeated in thousands of congregations continually, "He suffered under Pontius Pilate?" "Then Pilate took Jesus and scourged Him, and the soldiers plaited a crown of thorns, and put it on His head, and they put on Him a purple robe, and said, Hail King of the Jews! and they smote Him with their hands." Pilate was uneasy, he could not be at rest, he reiterated his persuasion of the innocence of the condemned and said, "Behold, I bring Him forth to you, that ye may know that I find no fault in Him" (John 19: 1-4). O how vain are words when they run counter to action, O how weak is the man whose deeds belie his words.

"Then came Jesus forth, wearing the crown of thorns, and the purple robe. And Pilate saith unto them, Behold the Man." What did he mean? Did he see in that Man what he never saw in any other? Our faith can say indeed, Behold the Man, the only Man in whom all men are included, in whom all sin is atoned for, in whom God is reconciled to all men, and in whom all men may be, if they will be, reconciled to God. The Man in whom sin and all its consequences have been dealt with, on whom the filthy garments have been changed (Zechariah 3: 3-5). O to lose all other men, and ourselves above all, from our horizon, so as to see none but in relation to Him!

The chief priests and officers continued their demand, "Crucify Him, crucify Him!" Pilate once more sought to escape the responsibility, "Take ye Him and crucify Him, he said, for I find no fault in Him." The Jews answered him, "We have a law, and by our law He ought to die, because He made Himself the Son of God." "When Pilate therefore heard that saying, he was the more afraid; and went again into the judgment-hall, and saith unto Jesus, Whence art Thou? But Jesus gave him no answer." Poor man, tossed to and fro, uncertain how to act! O how terribly true it is, that when conscience is tampered with, it becomes more and more difficult to act. And the silence of Jesus did not help him out of his difficulty: he said unto Him, "Speakest Thou not unto me? Knowest Thou not that I have power to crucify Thee, and have power to release Thee?" "Jesus answered, Thou couldest have no power at all against Me, except it were given thee from above; therefore he that delivered Me unto thee hath the greater sin. And from thenceforth Pilate sought to release Him." But he had gone too far; there was no going back now without forfeiting all his worldly position.

"The Jews cried out, saying, If thou let this Man go, thou art not Cæsar's friend; whosoever maketh himself a king speaketh against Cæsar" (John 19: 12). This was enough. The Jews and Satan gained the day; and Pilate committed the fearful sin of giving sentence against the Man whom he had pronounced innocent. Dear readers, do you ever trifle thus with your own conscience? Do you consider your own interests, and weigh them against that which you know to be the right course? Are you more afraid to trust God and to sacrifice your earthly interests, than to trust the devil who would drive you to evil? O may God increase our courage for the right, that we may decide aright that question which each of us must answer, "What shall I do then with Jesus, which is called Christ?"

The British Parliament Reassembled on Tuesday, October 24th. An autumn session is a very unusual event, but the time of the House of Commons during the last session was so fully occupied by Irish affairs that other urgent business was neglected, hence the extra session. The primary business before the House of Commons is the question of its own procedure. An attempt is being made by Mr. Gladstone and his colleagues to defeat the obstructive tactics of a minority of the members who, by taking advantage of the rules of the House are now able to waste the time of Parliament by a series of motions for adjournment and pressing them to a division. The scheme known as "the closure," introduced by the Cabinet gives the majority of the House the power to check these tactics by a rising vote. It is opposed by the Conservatives who being in a minority in the present House of Commons object to endowing their opponents with summary power to curtail debate. It is expected that the Irish party will also oppose the scheme unless their neutrality has been purchased by the promise of further concessions.

Votes of Thanks to the Commanders, Officers, and men, of the British army in Egypt were passed in both Houses of Parliament on October 26th. That in the House of Commons was moved by Mr. Gladstone, who in an eloquent speech eulogized all engaged in the war. He said the Indian contingent was most worthy of the brotherhood into which they had entered. He also announced that it would be the duty of the government to propose suitable annuities for Admiral Seymour and General Wolseley, who, he said, had accepted peerages. He spoke for an hour and concluded with a peroration on the confidence the country might repose in its military forces. Sir Stafford Northcote, the leader of the Conservatives, seconded the vote of thanks, but reserved his opinion in regard to the effect of the conquest of Egypt. The vote was opposed by Sir Wilfred Lawson, Mr. Richard and other members of the Peace Society but was passed by a vote of 357 to 17.

An Attempt to Assassinate the King of Serbia was made in the cathedral at Belgrade on October 23d. A woman fired twice at him, but both balls missed her aim. After the attempt, Queen Natalie, the wife of the King, who was with him in the cathedral, fainted and was carried in an unconscious condition to the palace. The King accompanied her thither, and then returned to the church unattended and remained until the end of the service. The crowd attempted to lynch the assassin, who is the widow of a man executed for rioting some time ago. It is supposed that she was incited to commit the crime by a secret society.

The Incendiary Fires Observed in the Neighborhood of St. Petersburg proceeded from the Gromoff lumber yard, the largest in Europe, situated on the banks of the Neva. Three other fires had just previously broken out in distant parts of the capital, which delayed several of the firemen. The fire was first observed in a stable, next to a warehouse where hay was stored and also close to another containing twenty casks of petroleum. The wind localized the conflagration, which might have enveloped the whole neighborhood. There were in the woodyard 3,000,000 planks and 200,000 beams belonging to the Russian Government. The yard covers a superficial space of more than a million square yards. The value of the contents is estimated at $4,000,000, of which more than one half is destroyed. The fire is believed to be an incendiary one, and is attributed to the Nihilists. The outbreak of seven other fires simultaneously confirms this opinion.

A Panic has been Produced in Lyons and other French cities by the discovery of an extensive organization formed to bring about a revolution. The event which led to the discovery was an outrage committed in Lyons on October 23d. About two o'clock in the morning of that day, there was an alarming explosion in a restaurant attached to a theatre. Two reports were heard under one of the tables. There were 200 people in the restaurant, who rushed hurriedly into the street. A third and more formidable explosion then occurred, which shattered tables and mirrors and other articles, and seriously injured three persons. Several arrests were made and documents were found proving the existence of a powerful conspiracy. They show that it is composed of a small number of staunch supporters in all the towns and manufacturing villages of France. The members are mostly young men, who distribute revolutionary papers. Each group has a distinctive name. The headquarters are at Geneva. A private telegram from Lyons represents the state of the city as very alarming. The promptest action on the part of the military authorities is advocated in order to prevent a revolutionary rising. Business is suspended and more troops have been telegraphed for. There has rarely been so much anxiety expressed in regard to the future as now. It is believed that the whole of Europe is honeycombed with secret societies working for anarchy.

The Irish Members of Parliament have Held a conference to form plans for future work. It was decided to press for amendments to the Arrears of Rent bill. The amendment agreed upon is for the extension of the time in which a settlement can be made with a landlord in respect to the rent for 1881. It was also decided to endeavor to secure the creation of an occupying ownership or peasant proprietary by an amendment of the purchase clauses of the Land act of 1881, so as to secure the advance by the State of the whole of the purchase money and the extension of the period of repayment over sixty-three years. The transfer by compulsory purchase to county boards of land not cultivated by the owners and not in the occupation of tenants for resale or re-letting to laborers and small farmers in plots or grazing commonages. The protection from the imposition of rent on improvements made by the tenant or his predecessors in title.

The False Prophet's Movement is Producing serious anxiety in Egypt. The Egyptian correspondent of the New York Herald has sent the following telegram to that journal: Most alarming news has been received from Khartoum. The False Prophet, at the head of the whole able-bodied population of the Soudan, reinforced by some cannibal tribes of Central Africa, has defeated Abd-el-Kader and Giegler, the Egyptian Governors, in seven sanguinary pitched battles. The Egyptian loss in killed and wounded was 8000, with their stand of arms, including 5000 Remingtons. The remnant of the Egyptian army took refuge in Khartoum and is now besieged there. All the provinces south of that city are lost to Egypt. News of the capture of Khartoum is daily expected. The False Prophet permits the pouring of boiling tallow into the eyes and ears of his captives and otherwise fiendishly tortures them. His man-eaters in some cases actually devour their prisoners for refusing to recognize him as the true prophet and Khalif. Dr. Schweinfurth assures me that there is a movement for the real revival of Islam, comprising Afghanistan and Morocco, and the Doctor is confident that the movement will embrace Khartoum. The False Prophet's adherents increase like wildfire, and the prophet himself is said to be marching toward Cairo. An account of this so-called prophet was given in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of September 28th.

The Serious Illness of Mr. George Muller the founder of the Orphanage, at Bristol, England, is again exciting the apprehensions, of his family and friends. He is so weak, and his sufferings are so severe that it is feared his work on earth is done. He is now seventy-seven years of age, having been born at Kroppenstaedt, Prussia, on September 27th, 1805. Mr. Muller's recent visits to this country have won for him many personal friends, who though well acquainted with his work of faith, were not until recently intimate with the great Christian philanthropist. Many prayers are being offered that God will support and comfort him in his hour of weakness.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Labored During their visit to Paris, with unabated vigor, and much interest was aroused in the metropolis of French frivolity, fashion, and dissipation. Some of the meetings were held in the American Chapel, Rue de Berri, others in the Avenue de la Grande Armée. Among those who rendered assistance to the distinguished evangelists, were M. de Presensé, a Senator and a Protestant pastor, Dr. Hitchcock, and the Rev. J. A. Spurgeon, who was staying in Paris on his wedding tour. Referring to the services, a Parisian correspondent says: "Many who expected a sensational revivalist uproar were surprised, not to say disappointed, by the sobriety and decency with which the service was conducted."

The Bethshan Faith Healing Home in London conducted by the Rev. W. E. Boardman and Mrs. M. Baxter has been removed to a more commodious building at 10 Drayton Park, North London. The new house which has been purchased for $20,000 was opened on October 11th. Dr. Boardman said on the occasion that the past experience of the managers had taught them two or three things. One was that it was not wise to have this house, or any other house, opened with the idea that it is an hospital, where people could remain for a long time. They felt it incumbent upon them to shorten the time, and to look for immediate healing. That was the Lord's way he was sure. It so happened that the Lord had ordered their opening day to come on his seventy-second birthday; and he never felt more elastic, more full of brightness, and never able to do more brain work or muscular work. Several American Christians are at present inmates of the home.

"The Lion Sermon" was Duly Preached in London on October 16th in accordance with the directions given more than two centuries ago by the then Lord-Mayor of London, who left a bequest to pay the preacher of it. It was founded in commemoration of a thrilling incident in the life of the founder. It is recorded that Sir John Gayer, who afterward held the office of Lord-Mayor, on a certain October 16th, was travelling in Arabia. Becoming detached from the caravan, a lion approached him. Sir John was unarmed, and thinking his last hour was come, he fell upon his knees in prayer, upon which the lion looked at him, but after a few seconds walked off. Sir John then vowed to perpetuate the commemoration of his miraculous deliverance, and the funds he left for this purpose have enabled his wish to be carried out faithfully by means of the above service, which always takes place on October 16th.

A Prayer-Meeting Before the Battle of Tel-el-Kebir was held by some Christian soldiers in the British Army.—Private James Moodie, who has just returned from Egypt to England, with a bayonet wound, gives the following narrative: "From the beginning of the movement from camp to Tel-el-Kebir, all the way along the march I was talking to the lads about the salvation of their souls, and I trust many heard for eternity. Just before the battle we halted at Gunpit Hill, and I and my Salvation comrades were having a prayer-meeting. When we got word to march, I still urged my comrades, with all earnestness of soul, to get ready to meet God, and one, for whom we repeatedly prayed at Aldershot, who as we advanced, was taking the name of the Lord in vain, fell under almost the first shot that was fired, shot through the heart. We got the word to advance on to the trenches, and I, leaping into the trench, came upon the top of the bayonet of one of our men. I thought my time was come; but Jesus was very near to me, and cheered me all the way."

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE question has often been argued, whether it is possible to make the best of both worlds, and in spite of all that has been said upon the subject it has never been satisfactorily answered. Can a man mixing in the world, engaged in business, surrounded by temptations and dealing with men of the world, competing with unscrupulous men, realize a fortune and enjoy all that is regarded as the best of this world and yet so live as to glorify his Saviour? That is the question. Worldly professors answer it in the negative. Christians who have failed in business answer it also in the negative. But a few conspicuous examples of wealthy Christian merchants seem to imply that an affirmative answer might be given with some degree of confidence. In their case the prayer of the Saviour offered shortly before He was led out to die for His people (John 17 : 15) appears to have been fully answered. Among such examples there are none more brilliant than that of the eminent man whose portrait appears on the frontispiece of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD this week—Samuel Budgett the Christian merchant.

Mr. Samuel Budgett, was born at Wrington, Somersetshire, England, on July 27th, 1794, and died in April, 1851, in the fifty-seventh year of his age. The first glimpses we have of his character reveal to us two things, first, an extreme sensitiveness and a painful timidity; and, second, a habit of quick observation and a readiness to draw from what he saw a lesson applicable to the emergencies of the future. The latter was one of the great elements of the power he acquired as a commercial man.

RECOVERY OF A HORSE THROUGH A DREAM.

One of his very earliest recollections is associated with a remarkable dream of his father's. He thus related it in after years: "After having lost a black mare for some weeks, supposing it to have been stolen, my father had given up all search; and when he awoke one morning, he said to mother, 'Betsy, I have dreamed that I found the mare at Kingston Seamore, grazing on the moors; and the dream is so distinct, I'll go and see.' He soon obtained a horse, and rode off. My mother having told us of it we were in full expectation, toward evening, of my father's return; and a little before dusk, as we were all looking out, big with expectation and hope, the gate flew open, and in rode my father on the horse with which he left home in the morning, and leading the black mare in his right hand. The delight and glee which we felt on his arrival, at his success, left an impression which will never be effaced."

BOYISH PERILS AND ESCAPES.

What child has not his dangers and his deliverances? And the youthful Samuel was no exception to the rule. Besides a terrible accident in a tanpit, where he was hardly rescued from drowning, he had a misadventure which left a mark upon his countenance to the end of his life. He himself narrates the story thus:

"We then lived in a large house at Nailsea, having large entrance gates on the left hand of a long yard opposite the house door. On the right hand was a cherry orchard, on the left, was a flight of steps leading to the kitchen garden, at the bottom of which was a bathing-pond; and on one occasion, when this was emptied, a large quantity of mud had collected at the bottom, which was drawn away by a cart with three horses. As the cart was moving on, when loaded, from the pond, I, being between five and six years of age, ran before the wheels, and falling on my back, the broad wheels passed over my right thigh, across my body, over the left shoulder, grazing my chin, and has left a mark to this day. My father took me up for dead; but on being bled I recovered consciousness, and was soon better."

EARLY PREDILECTIONS FOR TRADING.

In the year 1803, the family removed to Coleford, where the father opened a small general store. The same benevolent Providence which sends among mankind some qualified by special genius to advance their knowledge and happiness, also sends some qualified by special genius to advance their commercial development. Such a man was Samuel Budgett. He was born a merchant, just as other men have been born poets, painters, or mathematicians. Just as other boys naturally betook themselves to rhyming, sketching, or making mechanical models, so young Budgett naturally betook himself to making bargains. That was evidently his destined sphere of activity in the busy world, and he entered upon it early.

THE FIRST BARGAIN.

It was at the age of ten, and at Coleford, that he began to exhibit his mercantile predilections, and to lay the foundation of his habits and his fortune. His own account of his first essay in merchandise and his first possession of money, is as follows: "The first money I ever recollect possessing was gained in this way. I went to Mr. Milks, of Kilmersdon, to school, a distance of three miles. One day, on my way, I picked up a horseshoe, and sold it to a blacksmith for a penny. That was the first coin I ever possessed and I have never since been without money except when I gave it all away."

When, doing little chores for neighbors and in other ways gaining money he had added to the original penny he invested a part of it in a purchase that would yield no return but poetry and devotion—the two things which one would least expect to find dwelling in the same heart with such a marvellous love of traffic. As one sees the little merchant counting over his profits, the thought suggested is, what a lover of money he will be. But he is subsequently seen making haste to exchange his cash for "Wesley's Hymns," not that he may sell the volume and make more gain, but that he may read, and learn, and sing. It is clearly evident that there is something more in that young heart than an inordinate appetite for gold.

SPECULATES IN A DONKEY.

When Samuel was about twelve years old, he saw a man walking along with an old donkey and a young one. He asked the price of the young one. The man named the figure. The lad tried to see if he would take less, but finding he would not, got a cord, put it round the young donkey's neck, paid the money, took it home, and kept it a few days, then sold it to a Mrs. Ellis for double its cost; but she said she had no money, but would pay in the course of the week. He objected to leave it without security. But here a difficulty arose, as she had no security to offer, but an article of clothing, which had just cost double the price she had agreed to pay for the animal. "Oh," said young Budgett, "there is nothing like that, because it is easily carried." So, on receiving it, he carried it all through the village in his hand, and said, "Mother, here's something for you to keep. I have sold the donkey; Mrs. Ellis will call and pay five shillings; be sure and not let her have it without the money. The donkey, however, died, and Mrs. Ellis wished to have her security returned without the money; but in vain, as Samuel believed the death was occasioned by want of proper treatment, and, "By that transaction," he says, "I learned that 'A bird in the hand is worth two in the bush.'" (The panel of our frontispiece in the left-hand corner of the upper portion represents this transaction.)

APPRENTICED TO HIS BROTHER.

By the time Samuel had reached his fourteenth year, he was an experienced merchant in practice and in sagacity; and his savings were worth $150, the fruit of his boyish barter. At this time he was apprenticed to his elder brother at Kingswood. One would expect that he would march forth to his apprenticeship exulting in his wealth, and full of visions as to the golden days to come. Already, his penny had multiplied seven thousand two hundred times. What might not his present capital become, if used with equal ability? Such would be the calculations, such the emotions, one would naturally look for in such a boy, as he turned his steps to face the world. But how does his own simple record of what then happened falsify such anticipations—"By the time I left Coleford for Kingswood, when I was between fourteen and fifteen years of age, I had saved £30, which I presented to my parents. They intended returning the amount, but could not."

HIS MOTHER'S PRAYER.

Mrs. Budgett was an eminently pious woman, and her influence on the character of her son was powerful and beneficent. One day, when Samuel was about nine years of age, he was passing his mother's door, and heard her engaged in earnest prayer for her family, and for himself by name. He thought, "My mother is more earnest that I should be saved than I am for my own salvation." In that hour he decided to serve God, and the impression then made was never obliterated. His religious feelings thus began at the door of his mother's chamber.

TWO POWERFUL AMBITIONS.

Samuel's early piety was lighted up by two kindred ambitions. It is related of the great Warren Hastings, whose name figures so conspicuously in the modern history of India, that when he was seven years old he lay, one bright day in June, on the banks of a rivulet that ran through the domains which his ancestors had owned, and resolved on recovering that lost inheritance; and he "would be Hastings of Daylesford." Samuel Budgett, in similar circumstances, foined his own more modest scheme. He had no ancestral domain to win back. He thought not of personal power and station. But he resolved to place his family in competence, and cherished the idea also of becoming an instrument in the hands of God of bringing the dark heathen to Christ.

Each course to which Samuel's heart impelled him had its own distinctive charm. Each charm was hallowed by its own peculiar sacredness. Filial love consecrated the one; love to souls, the other. It was a struggle which the heart of many a young Christian knows. How deeply it engaged the heart of this earnest lad, let his own recital tell. He says: "I was in a great strait between two courses of life; as to whether I had better direct my attention to obtaining a qualification for going out as a missionary, or to preparing for business. On the one hand, I had a great desire to be useful in a spiritual point of view; on the other, I felt sensibly the strong claims which my family had on my efforts in a pecuniary way."

HIS CALLING IN LIFE DECIDED.

"One day, as I was riding along on my father's horse, so deeply was I engaged in this absorbing question that I fell into a reverie. I entirely lost sight of where I was going, nor do I know how long I continued in that state. All I remember is, that when I awoke from the reverie, I found the bridle loose from my hand on the horse's neck, and he standing under a large tree in a lane, eating grass; and it appeared to me that I had been for a considerable time surrounded by a large concourse of people, whom I had been entreating with feelings of the deepest interest to flee from the wrath to come, and to accept of present salvation through faith in Christ. One thing is certain, I had been weeping a great deal, as the saddle and the horse's shoulders were wet with my tears; and I rode home with feelings of conscious dignity and peace, such as I cannot describe, and I almost thought of devoting myself to the work of the ministry. But from a fancied consciousness of my want of capacity, and my want of education or the means of obtaining it, I felt a fear of mentioning my impressions to any person. I thought I must plod on as I could, and get my bread and help my family."

DISCHARGED FOR "WANT OF ABILITY."

The brother to whom Samuel Budgett was apprenticed, was fifteen years his senior, was owner of a house and a business, and to the lad appeared immensely his own superior—far above him and nidable. The house at Kingswood, occupied Mr. H. H. Budgett was very humble, yet it was the most considerable in the place, "the great p on the cassy" (causeway). All around were rude and humble cots of the collier population. The immediate neighborhood were nests of or- ized robbers, who preyed with terrible effect on surrounding country. Samuel was very small his age, and though his life was one unceasing nd of labor, he failed to give satisfaction to his ther, and when only half through his appren- ship, in June, 1812, he was discharged for rant of ability."

OBTAINS A SITUATION IN BRISTOL.

To his sensitive heart this was a terrible blow. Month was allowed him to look for a situation. He heard of a Mr. B—, in Bristol, who had a ancy, and with considerable trepidation Samuel ured his shop. He felt as if his size, his looks, dress, everything was against him. Timidly, eagerly, he addressed himself to Mr. B—. "I fear you are not strong enough for my situa- n," he said. "Oh, do try me, sir, I am sure I t do," pleaded the candidate. "Will you write ir address?" was the next inquiry. The lad s not quite certain what the word "address" ght mean, so he replied, "I can write an in- ce, sir." "Very well," said the shopkeeper; write 86lbs. of bacon, at 9d. per lb." He ote, but the reckoning was wrong. He tried a ond time, but again failed. His heart sank thin him.

Then in came a young man seeking for the situ- on, taller, better-dressed, and in every way far ore eligible in appearance than he. At him he oked with despair; against such a rival he could ve no hope. Mrs. B— was by, and observing e excitement of the poor boy, said a word in his or. "But he is not strong enough; you could ver carry those heavy cheeses," pointing to e high up on the shelves. "Do let me try, I am sure I can do it," replied the anxious d. In a second he was up to the cheeses, and umphantly displayed his strength. His candi- ture was successful, and a month afterward he tered upon the duties of his new situation.

RETURNS TO HIS BROTHER.

His employer soon discovered his assistant's ue, and his employer's wife treated him with e greatest kindness. When Samuel had spent out six months with them, his brother became isirous to recall him to his service. To this Mr. — strongly objected, alleging that as his oter had dismissed him he could not possibly ave any claim. He was very warm upon the oint, and offered Samuel an advancing salary, if he ould only stay. But his brother told him that it as his duty to complete the period for which he ad undertaken to serve without salary. This de- cided him. He gave up his salary in Bristol and turned to Kingswood, to complete the three years, ad more, of the apprenticeship which remained.

WELCOME SABBATHS.

During this time his Sundays were welcome ays. The first dawn of improvement on Kings- ood had come with Whitefield and Wesley. heir heaven-inspired words had been blessed of od to the fashioning anew of many an evil life, nd many a wretched home was lighted up with e charities and joys of the religion of Christ. Whitefield had built a tabernacle; Wesley had ounded a school. Adjoining the school was a hapel; and there it was the custom of Samueludgett, in his apprentice days, to worship God n the day of rest, with a mind eager for every eam of intellectual light, with a heart hungry for very crumb of intellectual food.

To him, a sermon was indeed a repast, a ban- uet, a festival, and often, after service, he would ut his fingers in his ears, to exclude every sound hat might drive away one thought from his mem- ory, and, hurrying from the chapel, would not stop till he had reached an old quarry that lay be- hind their house, and here, seating himself upon some pieces of "slag," he would lay up for future recollection, every important point of the dis- course. He became an active Sunday-school teacher, and an indefatigable tract distributor, and even in the years of his prosperity he never abandoned labor in those honorable spheres of Chris- tian activity, until he was called to higher service in the skies.

PARTNERSHIP WITH HIS BROTHER.

He was about twenty-two years of age when his apprenticeship expired. He then made an engage- ment with his brother for three years, at a pro- gressive salary. At the end of this period he had saved out of his salary a sum worth $500, but his brother had embarked in a speculation which had gone wrong, and was in financial jeopardy. Samuel at once desired him, in the kindest possi- ble manner, to accept his small store, and thus, once again, after having laid up the foundation of a fortune, he, at the call of a family affection, gave it all away. A short time afterward he was rewarded for his industry and kindness by his brother taking him into partnership.

METHODS ADOPTED TO INCREASE TRADE.

As the business grew, the views of the younger brother began to stretch beyond their actual sphere. He seemed already to desecrate in the dis- tance the possibility of a great wholesale establish- ment, but he would not attempt what he could not accomplish. His splendid success was achieved not by brilliant strokes and venturesome specula- tions, but step by step with prudence, combined with unflinching perseverance and constant prayer. He commenced to supply his customers at their homes in the surrounding villages, and so secured their permanent custom. A little later he com- menced to supply the smaller shops in the locality. In process of time success invited bolder efforts, and presently the two brothers were engaged in an extensive wholesale trade, and eventually built up one of the most successful commercial houses in the West of England.

A CASK OF PEPPER-DUST DOOMED.

In Mr. Budgett's early days, pepper was under a heavy tax; and in the trade universal tradition said that out of the trade everybody expected pepper to be adulterated. But as Samuel went forward in life his ideas on trade morality grew clearer. In most stores there stood a cask labelled "P. D.," containing something known as pepper dust, wherewith it was usual to adulterate the pepper before sending it forth to the public. In the Bud- gett's shop, however, the presence of this "P. D." gave much discomfort. On thinking over the matter Samuel felt that no blessing could be upon the place while it was there. He instantly decreed, therefore, that it should perish. It was night; but back he went to the shop, took the hypocriti- cal cask, carried it forth to a neighboring quarry, then staved it, and scattered "P. D." among the clods and slag and stones, and the cheat was scat- tered to the night winds. (The picture to the right of the frontispiece portrait depicts this episode.)

REMOVAL FROM KINGSWOOD TO BRISTOL.

After the brothers had been in partnership for about twenty years, the elder retired, leaving the business to the sole direction of Samuel. He had not been long at the head of the establishment, when nearly the whole of the premises was de- stroyed by fire, but this instead of a disaster, proved eventually to be a great boon. It trans- ferred the now tremendous business from Kings- wood Hill to Bristol. From this time the progress was amazingly rapid, and the deepening flow of prosperity rose higher year by year.

Mr. Budgett had no greater delight than to be surrounded by a host of busy men; he would cir- culate among them; would animate them, and heartily encourage the worker. "Why, sir, I do believe as he would get, ay, just twice as much work out o' a man in a week as another master," one of his men has been heard to say. Sometimes a lazy fellow would be set all astir by the words—

"REMEMBER THE GOTHIC DOOR!"

And when Friday night came, a practical comment would be furnished on that enigmatical, text. In a certain part of the wall surrounding the grounds was a door, called the gothic door, by which the men left the premises at night. On a Friday evening Mr. Budgett would stand by this door, holding a little basket filled with packages in paper. As the men passed, a package was slipped into the hand of each, containing a present varying in amount, according to the estimate the quick eye of the employer had made during the week of the diligence with which each had served him. In this way he gave away every week from $80 to $100. (On the left-hand side of the lower portion of our frontispiece this scene is shown.)

EARNST CHRISTIAN LIFE.

From the time when the sound of his mother's prayer awakened within him a desire to serve Christ, he remained loyal to his early resolution. His business engagements were made fragrant by his unchallenged consistency and upright life. Never a day passed away without a service being held upon his business premises to invoke God's guid- ance and blessing; while his works of philanthropy and unostentatious charity in the neighborhood in- creased in number as years rolled on. He longed for the welfare of men generally, but most ardently did he desire for them the refined and inspiring en- joyments which spring from a life of faith in Christ.

One day, Mr. Budgett was returning from Truro, and while waiting at Hayle for the Bristol steamer, his eye was attracted by a house in which he de- tected signs of a numerous and suspicious com- pany. On inquiry he found it was the dwelling of an unhappy man who once had seemed to "run well," but had sorely fallen, and that a party of the most depraved characters were meeting for danc- ing, dissipation, and debauch. He at once made for the house, and obtained reluctant permission to go upstairs. As he ascended abundant tokens of wrath and bitter maledictions were uttered, and on his appearing,

A CANDLESTICK WAS FLUNG AT HIS HEAD.

The man whose party it was, urgently begged him to come back, and himself shrank away; but no, in the name of Christ he would warn these poor dissolute revellers. In he went, therefore, begged them not to be disturbed, just to go on as if he were not there, said they were trying to enjoy themselves, and that was what he always wished to do; and so spoke familiarly and kindly, till he gained their attention. Then he began to reason with them "on righteousness, temperance, and judgment to come."

Gradually their scoffing airs were superseded by an aspect of undisguised solemnity, some were in tears, the fiddle ceased to play, and before he left he had led that wild company to bow before the great God in prayer, while tears, and sobs, and signs of shame clearly manifested that the heart within was melted. They could not resume their revels, and the dance was ended, at least for that night. (The right-hand section of the lower por- tion of the front picture, illustrates this incident.)

HIS PEACEFUL DEATH.

His death was a scene of chastened blessedness and peace. Toward the latter end of 1850, it be- came evident that his change was near, but he was full of thankful joy. During the next few months dropsy continued to make headway, and in April, 1851, it wrought its fatal consummation. The last evening of his life (April 28th), he cheer- fully exclaimed, "I know I am going the way of all flesh; but bless God I'm ready. I trust in the merits of my precious Redeemer." Then alluding to the near prospect of his dissolution, he said, "I care not when, or where, or how; glory be to God!" During the night he appeared rather rest- less; but most of his waking moments were em- ployed in talking with God, and in repeating por- tions of Scripture and favorite hymns. The last he distinctly repeated was—

"With glorious clouds encompass'd round,
Whom angels dimly see,
Will the Unsearchable be found,
Or God appear to me?"

The next morning he had a long and happy in- terview with his medical attendant. Suddenly, Mr. Budgett exclaimed, "O dear!" and it was at once plain to all that a change had taken place. The bell ringing violently, immediately all the members of the family who were at home assem- bled in his room, and found him supported in bed, his heart throbbing violently. The blood rushed to his head, his face changed to purple, his eyes were half open, but he was apparently unconscious. They watched—his eyes gently closed, and with- out a struggle or a sound, his spirit winged its way to that haven he had so long desired to reach.

CORN-HUSKING TIME.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, November 5, 1882.

"As a shock of corn cometh in his season."—JOB 5:26.

Two Billion Bushels of Corn Standing—The Farmers' Frolic—The Corn of the Bible—Death Wrongly Named—Death Like Husking-Time—A Time of Frost—Rough Work for the Corn—Comfort for Chronic Sufferers—Only Paying in Instalments—The Nubbins of Humanity—A Time of Reunion—Heaven a Great Sociable—No Clique, nor Arrogance, nor Jealousy—All may Get there—No Monopolies there—Equality of Feeling—Go in and Dine—The Swedish Prima-Donna and the Robber—Jewels in Peril.

GOING at the rate of forty miles the hour last Wednesday, I caught this sermon. If you have recently been in the fields of Pennsylvania, or New Jersey, or New York, or New England, or in any of the country districts, you know that the corn is all cut. The sharp knife struck through the stalks and left them all along the fields until a man came with a bundle of straw and twisted a few of these wisps of straw into a band, and then gathering up as much of the corn as he could compass with his arms, he bound it with this wisp of straw, and then stood it in the field in what is called a shock.

It is estimated that there are now at least two billion bushels of corn either standing in the shock, or, having been already husked. In the latter part of this month or next month, the farmers will gather, one day on one farm, and then another day on another farm, and they will put on their rough husking apron, and they will take the husking peg, which is a piece of iron with a leathern loop fastened to the hand, and with it unsheath the corn from the husk and toss it into the golden heap. Then the wagons will come along and take it to the corn crib.

How vividly to all those of us who were born in the country comes the remembrance of husking time. We waited for it as for a gala day of the year. It was called

A FROLIC.

The trees having for the most part shed their foliage, the farmers waded through the fallen leaves and came through the keen morning air to the gleeful company. The frosts which had silvered everything during the night, began to melt off of the top of the corn shocks. While the farmers were waiting for others, they stood blowing their breath through their fingers, or threshing their arms around their body to keep up warmth of circulation.

Roaring mirth greeted the late farmer as he crawled over the fence. Joke and repartee and rustic salutation abounded. All ready, now! The men take hold the shock of corn and hurl it prostrate, while the moles and mice which have secreted themselves there for warmth, attempt escape. The withe of straw is unwound from the corn shock and the stalks heavy with the wealth of grain are rolled into two bundles between which the husker sits down. The husking peg is thrust in until it strikes the corn, and then the fingers rip off the sheathing of the ear, and there is a crack as the root of the corn is snapped off from the husk, and the grain disimprisoned is hurled up into the sunlight.

The air is so tonic, the work is so very exhilarating, the company is so blithe, that some laugh, and some shout, and some sing, and some banter, and some tease a neighbor for a romantic ride along the edge of the woods in an eventide, in a carriage that holds but two, and some prophesy as to the number of bushels to the field, and others go into competition as to which shall rifle the most corn shocks before sundown.

After a while, the dinner horn sounds from the farmhouse, and the table is surrounded by a group of jolly and hungry men. From all the pantries and the cellars and the perches of fowl on the place the richest dainties come, and there is carnival and neighborhood reunion, and a scene which fills our memory, part with smiles but more with tears, as we remember that the farm belongs now to other owners, and other hands gather in the fields, and many of those who mingled in that merry husking scene have themselves been reaped "like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season."

There is a difference of opinion as to whether the Orientals knew anything about the corn as it stands in our fields; but recent discoveries have found out that the Hebrew knew all about Indian maize, for there have been grains of the corn picked up out of ancient crypts and exhumed from hiding places where they were put down many centuries ago, and they have been planted in our time and have come up just such Indian maize as we raise in New York and Ohio; so I am right when I say that my text may refer to a shock of corn just as you and I bound it, just as you and I threw it, just as you and I husked it. There may come some practical and useful and comforting lessons to all our souls, while we think of

"like a shock of corn coming in in his season."

It is high time that the King of Terrors were thrown out of the Christian vocabulary. A vast multitude of people talk of death as though it were the disaster of disasters instead of being to a good man the blessing of blessings. It is moving out of a cold vestibule into a warm temple. It is migrating into groves of redolence and perpetual fruitage. It is a change from bleak March to roseate June. It is a change of manacles for garlands. It is the transmuting of the iron handcuffs of earthly incarceration into the diamonded wristlets of a bridal party; or to use the suggestion of my text, it is only husking time. It is the tearing off of the rough sheath of the body that the bright and the beautiful soul may go free. Coming in "like a shock of corn cometh in in his season." Christ broke up a funeral procession at the gate of Nain by making a resurrection day for a young man and his mother. And I would that I could break up your sadnesses and halt the long funeral procession of the world's grief by some cheering and cheerful view of the last transition.

We all know that husking time was

A TIME OF FROST.

Frost on the fence. Frost on the stubble. Frost on the ground. Frost on the bare branches of the trees. Frost in the air. Frost on the hands of the huskers. You remember we used to hide between the corn-stacks so as to keep off the wind, but still you remember how shivering was the body and how painful was the cheek, and how benumbed were the hands. But after a while the sun was high up and all the frosts went out of the air, and hilarities awakened the echoes and joy from one corn-shock went up, "Aha, aha!" and was answered by joy from another corn-shock, "Aha, aha!"

So we all realize that the death of our friends is the nipping of many expectations, the freezing, the chilling, the frosting of many of our hopes. It is far from being a south wind. It comes out of the frigid north, and when they go away from us we stand benumbed in body and benumbed in mind and benumbed in soul. We stand among our dead neighbors, our dead families, and we say, "Will we ever get over it?" Yes, we will get over it amid the shoutings of Heavenly reunion, and we will look back to all these distresses of bereavement only as the temporary distresses of husking time. "Weeping may endure for a night, but joy cometh in the morning." "Light, and but for a moment," said the apostle as he clapped his hands, "light, and but for a moment." The chill of the frosts followed by the gladness that cometh in "like a shock of corn cometh in in his season."

Of course, the husking time made with the ear of corn. The husking peg had to be thrust in and the hard thumb of the husker had to come down on the swathing of the ear, and then there was a pull and there was a ruthless tearing and then a complete snapping off before the corn was free, and if the husk could have spoken it would have said, "Why do you lacerate me? Why do you wrench me?" Ah! my friends, that is the way God has arranged that the ear and the husk shall part, and that is the way He has arranged that the body and the soul shall separate.

You can afford to have your physical distress when you know that they are only forwarders of your soul's liberation. Every rheumatic pain is plunge of the husking peg. Every new twinge is only a twist by the husker. The gold in you that must come out. Some way the shackle must be broken. Some way the ship be launched for Heavenly voyage. You must the Heavenly husbandman husk off the mo from the immortality.

There ought to be great consolation in this to all who have since the Lord is gradually and more mildly taking away from you that which hinders your soul's liberation, doing gradually for you what for many in robust health perhaps He will do in one blow at the last. At the close of every illness the close of every paroxysm you ought to say, "Thank God, that is all past now; thank God, I will never have to suffer that again; thank God, I am so much nearer the hour of liberation." You will never suffer the same pain twice. You have a new pain in an old place, but never the same pain twice.

The pain does its work and then it dies. So many plunges of the crowbar to free the cornerstone from the building. Just so many strokes of the chisel to complete the statue. Just so many pangs to separate the soul from the body. You who have chronic ailments and disorders, are paying in instalments that which some of us have to pay in one payment when we pay the debt of nature. Thank God, therefore, ye who have chronic disorders that you have so much suffering at the last. Thank God, that you have so much less to feel in the way of pain at the hands of the Heavenly husbandman when the shock of corn cometh in in his season."

Perhaps now this may be an answer to a question which I asked last Sabbath morning, but not answer? Why is it that so many really good people have so dreadfully to suffer? You find a good man with enough pains and aches and distresses, you would think, to discipline a whole colony, while you will find a man who is perfectly useless going about with easy digestion and strong nerves and shining health, and his exit from this world is comparatively painless. How do you explain that? Well, I noticed in the husking that the husking peg was thrust into the corn, then there must be a stout pull before the swathe was taken off of the ear and the full, round, luscious, luxuriant corn was developed; while on the other hand there was corn that hardly needed worth husking. We threw that into a place by itself and we called it

Some of it was mildewed, and some of it mice nibbled, and some of it was great profit and no fulfilment. All cobs and no corn. Nubbins! After the good corn had been driven out the barn we came around with the corn basket and we picked up these nubbins. They were worth saving, but not worth much. So all around there are people who amount to nothing. They develop into no kind of usefulness. They are nibbled on one side by the world, and nibbled on the other side by the devil, and mildewed all over. Great promise and no fulfilment. All cobs and no corn. Nubbins!

They are worth saving. I suppose many of them will get to Heaven, but they are not worth being mentioned in the same day with those who went through great tribulation into the kingdom of our God. Who would not rather have the pain of this life, the misfortunes of this life—wounded, and lacerated, and wrenched, and husked and at last go amid the very best grain of the granary, than to pronounce not worth husking at all? Nubbins! In other words, I want to say to you people who have distress of body, and distress in business and distress of all sorts, the Lord has not any grudge against you. It is not derogatory, it is complimentary. "Whom the Lord loveth He chasteneth," and it is proof positive that there is something valuable in you, or the Lord would not have husked you.

remember also, that in the time of husking as

A NEIGHBORHOOD REUNION.

A great fireplace in the winter, the fires around the glorified back logs on an old-fashioned hearth, of which the modern stoves and stoves are only the degenerate descendants, the place used to gather and spend the evening, and could be much sociality; but it was not any the joy of the husking time, for then all neighbors came, and they came in the very best and they came from beyond the meadow, they came from beyond the brook, and they came from regions two and three miles around. Spirit reigned supreme, and there were great makings, and there was carnival, and there was recital of the brightest experiences in all times, and there was a neighborhood reunion memory of which makes all the nerves of my temple with emotion as the strings of a harp. The fingers of the player have swept the husking time was the time of neighborhood reunion, and so Heaven will be just that. There come up! They slept in the old village yard. There they come up! They re-appeared amid the fountains and the sculpture and the terraces of a city cemetery. There they come! They went down when the ship foundered upon Hatteras. They come up from all from Potter's Field and out of the solid mass of Westminster Abbey. They come up! Come up! All the hindrances to their betterment husked off. All their physical ailments husked off. All their spiritual despondencies husked off. All their hindrances to usefulness husked off. The grain, the golden grain, the husked grain, visible and conspicuous. The husk of them on earth were such disagreeable husks as you could hardly stand it in their presence. Now in Heaven they are so radiant you know them. The fact is, all their imperfections have been husked off. They did not mean to be disagreeable. They meant well, but they told you how sick you looked, they told you how many hard things they had about you, and they told you how often they stood up for you in some battles until you almost thought that they had been slain in some of them. Good, pious, consecrated, well-meaning disagreeables.

Now, in Heaven all their offensiveness has been husked off. Each one is as happy as he can be. Every one he meets as happy as he can be. In one great neighborhood reunion. All angels and queens, all songsters, all millionaires, all quietters. God, the Father, with His children all around Him. No "good-by" in all the world. No grave cut in all the hills. River of crystal rolling over bed of pearl, under arch of chrysolite, into seas of glass mingled with fire. At the gate of the granary and see the grain in; out of the frosts into the sunshine, out of the darkness into the light, out of the tearing and the ripping and the twisting and the wrenching and the lacerating and the husking time of the husking into the wide open door of the King's room. "like as a shock of corn cometh in in his season." Heaven joy like the joy of the husking time. No one feeling so big he declines to speak to some one that is not so large. Archangel willing to list to the smallest cherub. No bolting of the door of an heavenly mansion to keep out the citizen of a smaller mansion. No clique in one corner whispering about a clique in another corner. Not taking none of the airs of a giant killer. Not making no one halt until he passes, because he made the sun and moon halt. Paul making no assumptions over the most ordinary brother of righteousness. Naman, captain of the host, no more honored than the captive who told him where he could get a good doctor. O! my soul, humblest man a king. The poorest woman a queen. The meanest house a palace. The shortest lifetime eternity. And what is more strange about it all, is, we may all get there. "Not I," says some one standing back under the galleries. Yes, you. "Not I," says some one who has not been in church in fifteen years before. Yes, you. "Not I," says some one who has been for fifty years filling up his life with all kinds of wickedness. Yes, you.

WHAT A COUNTRY!

There are monopolies on earth, in monopolistic railroads, and monopolistic telegraph companies, and monopolistic grain dealers, but in religion. All who want to be saved may be saved, "without money and without price." Salvation by the Lord Jesus Christ for all the people. Of course, use common sense in this matter. You cannot expect to get to Charleston by taking ship for Portland, and you cannot get to Heaven by going in an opposite direction. Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved. Through that one gate of pardon and peace all the race may go in.

"But," says some one, "do you really think I would be at home in that supernal society if I should reach it?" I think you would. I know you would. I remember that in the husking time there was great among the neighbors. There at one corn-shock a farmer would be at work who owned two hundred acres of ground. The man whom he was talking with at the next corn-shock owned but thirty acres of ground, and perhaps all that covered by a mortgage. That evening, at the close of the husking day, one man drove home a roan span so frisky, so full of life they got their feet over the traces. The other man walked home. Great difference in education, great difference in worldly means; but I noticed at the husking time they all seemed to enjoy each other's society. They did not ask any man how much property he owned or what his education had been. They all seemed to be happy together in those good times.

And so it will be in Heaven. Our Father will gather His children around Him, and the neighbors will come in, and the past will be rehearsed. And some one will tell of victory and we will all celebrate it. And some one will tell of great struggle and we will all praise the grace that fetched him out of it. And some one will say, "Here is my old father that I put away with heartbreak, just look at him, he is as young as any of us!" And some one will say, "Here is my darling child that I buried in Greenwood and all the after years of my life were shadowed with desolation—just look at her! She doesn't seem as if she had been sick a minute." Great sociality. Great neighborhood kindness.

GO IN AND DINE.

What though John Milton sit down on one side and John Howard sit down on the other side. No embarrassment. What though Charlotte Elizabeth sit down on one side and Hannah More sit down on the other side? No embarrassment. A monarch yourself, why be embarrassed among monarchs? A songster yourself, why be embarrassed amid glorified songsters? Go in and dine.

All the shocks of corn coming in in their season. Oh yes, in their season. Not one of you having died too soon, or having died too late, or having died at haphazard. Planted at just the right time. Ploughed at just the right time. Cut down at just the right time. Husked at just the right time. Garnered at just the right time. Coming in in your season.

Oh, I wish that the two billion bushels of corn now in the fields or on the way to the seaboard might be a type of the grand yield of honor and glory and immortality, when all the shocks come in.

I do not know how you are constituted, but I am so constituted that there is nothing that so awakens reminiscences in me as the odors of a cornfield when I cross it at this time of year after the corn has been cut and it stands in shocks. And so I have thought it might be practically useful for us to-day to cross the cornfield, and I have thought perhaps, there might be some reminiscence roused in our soul that might be salutary and might be saving. In Sweden while her house in the city was being repaired, took a house in the country for temporary residence, and she brought out her great array of jewels to show a friend who wished to see them. One night after displaying these jewels, and leaving them on the table, and all her friends had gone, and the servants had gone—one summer night—she sat thinking and looking into a mirror just in front of her chair, when she saw in that mirror the face of a robber looking in at the window behind her and gazing at those jewels. She was in great fright, but sat still, and hardly knowing why she did so she began to sing an old nursery song, her fears making the pathos of the song more telling.

Suddenly she noticed while looking at the mirror that the robber's face had gone from the window, and it did not come back. A few days after the prima donna received a letter from the robber saying: "I heard that the jewels were to be out that night and I came to take them at whatever hazard; but when I heard you sing that nursery song with which my mother so often sang me to sleep, I could not stand it and I fled, and I have resolved upon a new and an honest life."

O! my friends, there are

richer than those which lay upon that table that night. They are the jewels of the immortal soul. Would God that some song rolling up out of the deserted nursery of your childhood, or some song rolling up out of the cornfields, the song of the huskers twenty or forty years ago, might turn all our feet out of the paths of sin into the paths of righteousness. Would God that those memories wafted in on odor or song might start us this moment with swift feet toward that blessed place where so many of our loved ones have already preceded us, "as a shock of corn cometh in in his season."

An Adventure on the Mountains of Nevada terminated on October 24th, when two men arrived at their homes in Virginia City. Their experience, as related by them to the reporter of a local journal, was thrilling and it was confirmed by the evidences of suffering on their persons. One of the men was an assayer, and he, with a companion, set out for Mount Gibbs, where he had undertaken to inspect a mining property for some Eastern capitalists. When they got up to Mount Gibbs a furious snow-storm set in. The guide lost his way, and for two nights and two days and a half the two men struggled in the snow, which was two feet deep on the level, and in many places had so drifted that it reached almost breast high. The place was full of precipices, and the nights being very dark they were afraid to proceed, yet having no blankets they could not lie down to sleep. The first night they stopped where there was some wood, but the next darkness came upon them in a barren place just as they were making desperate exertions to reach a point ahead, where they thought they saw a small grove. They then decided to split to pieces their snow-shoes, make torches of them, and push on. The pitchy wood of their snow-shoes made excellent torches, but the distance to the flat in the cañon, where lay the supposed grove, was much greater than they had anticipated; and they reached it just as their last torch was burning, only to find that they had mistaken a black patch of sage brush for a grove. However, the sage brush would burn, and they spent the night and kept themselves awake by pulling it to make-up the fire. When morning dawned they discovered their whereabouts and succeeded after a hard day's toil through the deep snow in reaching a ranch where they were cared for by the occupants before it became quite dark. During the latter part of the journey one of the men became delirious from fatigue and want of food, and his companion had to use force to compel him to continue the journey. How like such a narrative is to the experience aged Christians sometimes relate. Lost on the mountains of unbelief, surrounded with difficulty; in their way precipices and pitfalls, and in the distance mirages mistaken for resting places (Job 14:1-3).

PALESTINE AND THE JEWS.

Their Persecution by Russia, etc.

By Rev. Joseph Wild, D.D., of Toronto.

THE London Standard, of a recent date, remarks, "It is interesting to notice the way in which the Jews, scattered throughout the world, are beginning to turn their eyes toward their own land. Palestine is not altogether a place to please a capitalist, but yet even such keen financiers as the Jews are busy buying it up. The Jewish Chronicle reckons now some 18,000 Jewish brethren in Jerusalem alone. It is said they are not a desirable population to maintain, yet £60,000 is sent over from England to help these people maintain themselves.

THE OCCUPATION OF PALESTINE

by a people who have retained an indestructibility as a race, while they have learned a complete cosmopolitan character during these eighteen centuries—a nation at once European in education and Asiatic in origin—would be by no means a bad arrangement. It might not be impolitic on the part of the European Powers to assist in placing so influential a people in so important a position, and would solve what, before many years, will be the vexed question among the nations—namely, the territory of Syria." Now, you might ask one of the Jewish brotherhood in Toronto here, and probably he would not know as much about it as I do, because he is not as much interested in the prophecies as I am. He is interested in doing business; he knows his own line of thought remarkably well, but he does not know the line of thought that runs in this direction. A man's eye is keen in the direction his interest lies.

A commercial man looks at events as they will affect commerce; an intellectual man as they will affect education; a missionary as they will affect religion and the Church; and a Jew simply as they will affect him as one of a race, and commercially. He and I have the same privilege; but he is, like others, so thoroughly wedded and welded into a certain line of interpretation of prophecy that he cannot get out of it. Still, I have the privilege. As a blind man who has had certain events described to him as they happened is said to be the best witness, so a person outside of these circles is a better judge than those included within them. Just as the Jews are better judges of us than we are of ourselves, at a thousand points.

Some time ago the Hebrew Observer had an article, which asked: "Is there no other destiny for Palestine but to remain a desert? Syria will soon be the entrepot between the East and the West and the old trade will revive. Old cities will revive, and new ones will be built; the old time will come back, and the steam-car will run in the track of the caravan. Syria will be a place of trade; but the people who are pre-eminently the traders of the world, will they be there when the coming change takes place? The country wants capital and population. The Jew can give it both. Has not England a special interest in permitting their restoration? It would be a blow to England if either of her great rivals got hold of Syria. Her mighty empire, which reaches from Canada in the West to Calcutta and Australia in the Southeast, would be cut in two. England does not want any new territories, but she must see that they do not get into the hands of rival Powers. She must preserve Syria to the Syrians. Do not the dictates of policy exhort her to this course?"

"The Jews exist, the spirit is there, but the external form, the crowning bond of union, is still wanting. A nation must have a country; the old land and the old people! We see strange things nowadays. May not this be one of the notable sights and resurrections of the present day?" I have made you these quotations so that you can see that I have the clearest heads, the best brain and thought of the Jewish world on my side. We can all see how necessary it is that the Jew should be willing to return, and that we should be willing to let them go. We should learn a lesson from God's providence of old in the land of Egypt, when even those Egyptians who were unwilling to let His people go took off their rings, and stripped off their ear-rings and jewelry, and brought their money out from their hiding-places, and gave to them, and said, "Begone!" and actually did all they could to help them on their way. And the time will come when, laying our hand on the Jew leaving Toronto, we shall say, "God bless you, my friend!"

I AM GLAD YOU ARE GOING TO PALESTINE." That is what the Egyptians said. They were glad they were going to found a separate nation themselves. The ransomed of the Lord will return to Zion, with songs of rejoicing and gladness of heart. Do you know what the Jews do now at the close of the Feast of the Passover, and have done for the last 1800 years? At the close of that solemn day's services they take each other by the hand and say, "Good-by; we meet at Jerusalem next year." They did so here in Toronto last year, and will do so again next year. They will as surely meet in Jerusalem some year as they have carried out the idea. They say, "Good-by; we meet in Jerusalem next year;" and they will say it until they do. Ah, brethren of Judah, some of your children, I believe, will live to realize this long-expected blessing. The outlines of history are fast filling-in, and you will ere long be placed in your own land, with the accumulated experience of centuries to guide you to duty and labor. Your wanderings will soon cease, and in your own land your children will acknowledge the Saviour which you and your fathers have not seen as yet, to accept Him. You ask

HOW WILL ALL THIS BE BROUGHT ABOUT? It will be brought about, as was the great deliverance in the land of Egypt; it will be brought about by God's own purpose. "For thus saith the Lord, It shall come to pass that they shall say no more, The Lord God which brought us up out of the land of Egypt, but, The Lord God liveth which brought us from all countries whithersoever He had scattered us, and placed us in our own land"—that is, they will forget about the deliverance from Egypt, and say, "The Lord God which brought us from all countries," etc. And the latter will be as true as the first; and when will it be? God has determined this great consummation, and it must take place. When you think that we are in the nineteenth century, one could hardly imagine that Russia would be permitted to act like it has, and alienate herself from the rest of the earth; and yet in past time we did the same by this people, and we shall have to pay to get them back in their land. We have murdered them and robbed them. Why, even some of the jewels that our Queen wears in her crown were stolen from these Jews, and never a cent paid for them. There is not a nation to-day that is not revelling in such wealth and ungodly gain, except the United States. Of course, ourselves being part of England, we must take part of the blame.

THE PAST PERSECUTIONS OF THE JEWS.

When Christianity became the dominant power in Rome, then the Jew began to suffer; and from that moment to this, in the presence of that Gospel which speaks peace and good-will to men, he has been nothing but a butt and a reproach, an object of reviling and a subject of persecution. God forgive the Christianity of the past! In olden times Jews were put to death if they by any means, even by accident, endangered the life of a Christian. If a Jew was passing along a street, and a Christian should happen to stumble and hurt himself, the Jew was burned, because the Christian stumbled. The Jews were forbidden, by a council of four hundred and fifty bishops, to pray for a good harvest, for it was held that if the Jew prayed for a good harvest there would be sure to be a bad one. God bless those bishops who had no more sense than that!

Then again, if you take the saints, St. Ambrose, for instance; he sends forth the cry, "Burn the Jews! burn the Jews!" Then St. Augustine, whom we follow so kindly, he says that the Jews should not be received into society, or recognized upon the streets. The Bishop of Alexandria persecuted them to the death. The Emperor Justinian, in the sixth century, in his wonderful code of laws, which are the basis of our laws, actually deprived the Jews of citizenship and personal rights.

Rome, when it gained its power, was not tolerant. Pope after Pope, bishop after bishop, launched their anathemas against the Jews. "We were forbidden to receive even the necessaries of life. It was under penalty of the Inquisition a Roman Catholic supplied bread to a Jew, even dying of hunger. I am glad I do not belong to any Church that lived a long time ago. I would rather start a new one. I would have no connection with a Church that has come up from past, wading through blood, and fire, and darkness. Then you come to our Henry III., who MORTGAGED THE WHOLE OF THE JEWRY to his brother, the Earl of Cornwall, to money, when he had expended his own in procarousing, and was hard up—and he the head of the Church, too! Then his successor, Edward, drove them all out of the country, and deprived a man who had bought them in mortgage of his property. He passed a law that all who should remain after All Saints' Day, in 1290, should be hanged, if found in any part of the land. And you can go on through all the nations, Germany, France—both guilty—and Spain, which is the guilty of all the nations. Think of the 800 homeless Jews that were driven out, and no number, at that time, open a door to receive them and they perished miserably by the way. Is it to be no compensation for all this?

ARE THE JEWS TO HAVE NO REWARD? Are they to be always outcasts, wandering over the earth? And yet all their sufferings may be traced to this—they prayed the prayer, "His be upon us and upon our children." Oh, they had a clasp on their mouths when they asked that for their children! But it has been to them, has it not? If you, free-thinker, if a man that disbelieves the Bible, if you want a proof of an answered prayer, the bloody lines, tracks down the centuries tell you that one prayer, at least, in God's Word has been truly answered. Has not it? And your fathers helped to answer it.

There are two things that a man cannot put together. A man cannot believe in the existence of a Jew, and at the same time deny the existence of a Providence. I will test any man in Toronto that. There is not a man—free-thinker, hater, thinker, close-thinker, good-thinker, or bad-thinker—but who, if he believes there is a Jew in existence, must also admit the existence of Providence. He must either do that, or reject the Jew in order to destroy Providence. The Jew is such an anomaly, such an exception. You cannot talk about a Jew as you would about a Frenchman, a Russian, a German, a Spaniard, or a Saxon. Will you tell me why a people who were from six to nine million thirteen centuries ago, are just that number to-day? Will you demonstrate to me, by any common or ordinary method of reasoning, how a people could remain in statu quo for 1800 years? Other people ever did so. This people could not upon their native earth, but could not purchase a foot of it. Now, you can give no reason for these things, except the one I have given. What God said? That they should be wanderers, without national life, without government or king, that He should return them to their own land. This has been true for 1800 years anyway. Do you not see that what He has been telling you about them is true? And He has said there is to be a great consummation in the land that is true also. There is to be a great consummation, in the providence of God, and they are to be gathered together. They will be persecuted, until they say in their sorrow,

"LET US GO INTO OUR OWN LAND."

We shall be glad to see them go, my brethren, to that land which is theirs of right. We will argue as we will, and get up meetings to discuss the question of Jewish persecution, but I am myself under the impression that the time is now near for the call to go forth, as the cry is said to have run like an electric shock through the French when Bonaparte gave out his first proclamation, "Frenchmen, come home!" And so God will cause those wandering ones to come home, that they will hear the call, and return in peace to the ancient land, as we all wish they soon may, if being brethren in Christ, we cannot wish any one, whether Jew or Gentile, aught but the freedom that we ourselves enjoy, and a happy rest when life is done. God bless them and care for them! Amen!

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Drunkard's Shame.—At the Gospel Temperance meeting, on September 21st, Mr. Shorrey, of New York, said: "A man came into this place last night who at one time stood high in this community. His brother even now lives in a good social position, but was obliged to turn this man, who is not yet middle-aged, out of doors owing to his intemperate habits. He was full of the shame which the drunkard always feels when sober, and said, 'Can't you come outside? I am ashamed to be seen here.' I could sympathize with him, knowing only too well, the sensations of his mind and body at that moment, having passed through them myself. I took him into the vestry and there we talked together of his disease and its cure. I believe that we may safely hope that he will follow Jesus."

A Divinity Student's Triumph.—The Rev. Mr. McDougall also said: "While we were in Campbeltown, a Divinity student, who had become a confirmed drunkard, came into one of our meetings, and God gave him power to become one of His sons through faith in Christ. Many times had he tried to reform himself but always with the same result—failure, till at last he gave up in despair; but on going to Christ for aid to overcome his enemy, he received it. Such a sense of the love and tenderness of God came into his soul that the desire for drink was forgotten in the new feeling of a heavenly Father's care over him. Only one night afterward while the tear of repentance was still on his cheek, he fell dead upon the quay. Can you say that the same thing will not happen to you? Are you ready for it?"

Whiskey-Selling Elders.—The Rev. Mr. McDougall said: "When I was at Campbeltown, taking part in the evangelistic services there, an old man said to me—'We hae a braw lot o' kirks here, sir; but th' folk dinna seem tae be a bit th' better o' them a'. I see nae differ in them sine there wis only aye or twa kirks in a' the toon.' 'What d'ye think is the reason of that, my friend?' I asked. 'Od, mon, ye livnae far to seek a rison. Dinna ye see that maist a' th' elders an' deacons are whusky-sellers, or whusky-makers? The vera bailie wha'll try a man wha has been drunk on the Saturday night is a distiller; an' fat's mair, gif he dinna pay th' fine its sixty days, an' if the man promises to pay th' fine rather than gang tae prison, an' he disnae dae it, this same bailie 'ill sell th' last stick in th' hoose for't.' The tender mercies of the wicked are cruel."

No Wine on the Table.—Mr. Jack said, at the same meeting: "I heard a Bible reading once which showed the danger of God's people falling into the power of strong drink. A gentleman holding a good position in society also heard it, and being a Christian, he went home very much troubled about the drink question. He told his lady, 'I have just been to a Bible reading on the subject of our drinking habits, and do not see my way to continue them.' 'Let us unite together and stop them,' she promptly replied. They were going to have a dinner party in a few days, and as he had changed his views, my friend felt that he was bound in honor to tell his invited guests of the fact that there would be no wine on his table. Though they laughed at him, they all came, and the dinner was an unqualified success. Since that time my friend has been the means of inducing four other families to follow his example."

An Engineer's Night of Horror.—At a recent testimony meeting in Cowcaddens, an engineer said: "On the night of Saturday and the morning of the first Sunday in December last, I was awakened to a sense of my awful condition as a sinner. It was a night of horror to me. My sins cried out against me, for I had sinned against light, and suffered so much that even my wife, although she was not a Christian, said, 'You must go somewhere to-day, and see if you can't get a little ease,' for she thought I was going mad. I determined, in the midst of my agony, that I would find the Lord that day, so I went to hear Mr. Moody, in St. Andrew's Hall. There I found rest and light after darkness. I led a wild life, at sea and in strange lands, for nine years previously. In the forenoon of that first Sunday in December, 1881, I went home to my house and told my wife—'Maggie, I have served the devil very faithfully for the last nine years, but from this day he and I dissolve partnership. I will serve Jesus as faithfully as I have done the devil.' Bless and praise His holy name, He has kept me since then, and He will keep me in the future."

Wanted on the Platform.—Mr. Shorrey said in Cowcaddens, on September 22d: "A few days after my conversion to Christ, Mr. Moody sent word to me to come to the platform. Rather surprised, I went into his little room and asked him what he wanted with me on the platform. 'I want you to tell what the Lord has done for you.' 'But how am I to say it?' I asked. 'Any way you like,' answered Mr. Moody; 'just tell the story in your own way, no matter how.' I was poor, badly dressed, my face covered with the leprosy of the drunkard, but I went and began to speak. I do not know exactly what I said, but after I stopped many hands were held out to me, and the friendly 'God bless you, my brother,' was uttered with the mouth, while the eyes of many spoke in eloquent language through a mist of tears. And those of you who are saved through faith in the atoning blood of Christ, are wanted on 'the platform of an honest confession and unflinching testimony.'"

A Decided Advantage.—Mr. Shorrey, Continuing, said: "The best means of showing you the difference of serving the devil and serving God is to point out the amount of confidence which men will put in a Christian and the little or no faith which they will put in an unconverted man. Six months after I was converted I called upon Mr. Jessup, one of our principal bankers, to ask a subscription in aid of a man who was in want. He met me very cordially and asked, 'What can I do for you, to-day Mr. Shorrey?' 'We want some money to help a poor man who is in want, and in great trouble.' 'Have you inquired into the case?'

'Yes, sir, I have.' 'How much do you want?' 'So much, naming a certain sum. 'Here it is; if you want more, come back for it. Good morning.' A few months previously if I had attempted to put my foot inside the door the porter would have ejected me. I think that no further comment is needed to prove that the followers of Christ have always the advantage over those who reject Him."

A Rumseller's Son's Testimony.—A Rumseller's son said: "Very few in this district have heard my testimony, and many will wonder why I, of all men, should testify, as they know that never have I been a drunkard, nor ever even tasted whiskey. When I was a boy it was the rule in my father's house that every one in the house should serve customers, so that they might not be hindered nor delayed. It was considered right that the person serving the liquor should taste it in the presence of the company. This habit was introduced centuries ago, when our forefathers were at war with each other, and no man felt safe to eat or drink in a strange house until his entertainer partook of the food or drink first. It now was simply considered a hospitable act to taste the drink and show good-fellowship. My father's place was what is called a well-conducted, respectable house, but the scenes which I saw there, the misery and the crime which flowed from it, struck my mind and heart even when I was an infant. At the age of ten years I joined a Band of Hope, and I determined not to touch the whiskey nor ale when serving customers. So that when my father from that time said I was to help at the bar, I told him it was impossible for me to carry out the usual custom. 'Touch the outside of the glass and it will do just as well, but you must please the customers.' For a short time I did this, until I saw it right not to serve in nor to live upon the traffic, which was the means of pulling down even the strongest, and apparently, the best men of the district. Twenty years I have been a follower of Jesus, and in the midst of great temptations I have never yet fallen into this trap of the devil. It was not my own strength or goodness which kept me, but the grace of God."

GREAT REVIVAL IN SWEDEN.

A GLORIOUS ingathering of souls is reported from Sweden—north, south, east and west, everywhere, sinners have been brought to the Lord. The central part of Sweden seems, however, to have received the greater blessing. The cities of Eskilstuna and Orebro have been shaken to their very foundations. Large numbers of people have already made a profession of their faith in Christ, and still the work goes on.

In Stockholm the work has progressed since the middle of January last. Meetings have been held every night in the week, and have continued up to a very late hour. After preaching, prayer-meetings were held, followed by conversations with the inquiring.

The Rev. K. O. Broady, of the American Baptist Mission at Stockholm, says: "Over two hundred and sixty have been baptized. We expect still more. Among the saved ones are infidels and backsliders, parents and children, masters and servants, old people and young people. The ages of the greater part range between eighteen and twenty-eight years. The proportion of the sexes seems to be about equal. So far as we are able to judge, the work seems to be genuine and of God. Over one hundred children in our Sunday-school profess to have found Christ."

"I have seven children at home, and I have reason to believe that at least five of them have experienced a change of heart. The eldest two of them, a son and a daughter, are now members of the Church. The Salem Chapel at the south began holding extra meetings soon after we had begun. As a result, over one hundred have been baptized, and more are coming."

"Last year no less than about five hundred members left our churches to become citizens of the United States, and members of churches in America. And we feel warranted in saying that the number who this year will leave our communion for the United States will be no less. What makes our loss so much the more felt, is, that almost without exception, those who thus leave us are among the very best of our membership—energetic, enterprising young men, women, and artisans, and well-to-do farmers, in the prime of life."

Rev. T. Truvé writing from Gottenborg says: "I exchanged places with Pastor Backman, in Orebro, for two weeks. There there is the most wonderful work of the Lord going on. It commenced three weeks before the revival here. It will be impossible for me to describe it. I preached twice during the first Sunday. Hundreds went away without finding any place where they could stand within the chapel. In the evening we had a meeting for inquirers. Hundreds of such stayed. We spoke to them, and prayed; and many went home rejoicing. In this way we continued every evening, except Tuesdays, when believers related their experience, and were admitted to become members of the Church."

"Every forenoon I received persons in my room who wished to be baptized. And I had enough to do to talk to such. Sixty related their experience to the church during the days I was there. Of these I baptized twenty-nine; the rest were baptized by Pastor Backman. We continued the meetings every evening till ten o'clock; and then we were obliged to turn down the gas, and by that means drive the people away. Some became awakened to a sense of their sin in the theatre, others at balls, or in their houses, and then came to hear the Word of God and were converted. Some had come more than thirty miles away, and went home saved. Many came as mockers of religion, and went home praising God."

"The work is extending all over that part of the country, and sinners fall before the Word of God as the grass before the mower. We have never seen anything like it."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The thanks of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are due to a large number of subscribers who have written to the office, expressing their high regard for the journal, and stating their intention to introduce it to their friends, with the view of obtaining new subscribers for the coming year. Their efforts would have a better chance of success if commenced now, than at the end of next month, when people will have made their arrangements for 1883. In recognition of this fact a concession in price will be made. They may offer THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, postage paid, from this time to the end of 1883 for $1.50—that is, fourteen months for one year's subscription. This concession is made in order to aid the friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and to encourage them to proceed at once with their kindly project. It is hoped that every subscriber will use his influence, however small it may be, to send at least one new subscription, in addition to his own, for 1883.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Result of the New York State Election cannot be announced in this issue of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD although it was held on Tuesday, November 7th. Since the circulation of the journal has increased to its present vast proportions, it has been necessary in order that the whole edition should be mailed on Wednesday to have it on the press on Tuesday; consequently no intelligence later than that of Monday afternoon can be inserted. The general opinion of politicians, even in Republican quarters as to the election at the date of writing, is that the Democratic ticket will be elected by a plurality of at least twenty thousand. This result, as has been already pointed out in these columns, will be due not to Judge Folger's personal unpopularity, but to a determination on the part of leading Republicans such as Mr. George William Curtis, Mr. Henry Ward Beecher, and Dr. Cuyler to resist federal interference in State affairs and to express in the most emphatic way they are able, their abhorrence of the practices such as the forged telegram, adopted by the local leaders at Saratoga.

An Emphatic Expression of Opinion on the subject of Civil Service Reform has been made by Senator Windom of Minnesota, Secretary of the Treasury in the Garfield Administration. The Senator, in a speech delivered last week at Minneapolis announced himself as a Civil Service Reformer of the strictest sort. He said that any man who has had charge of a department cannot fail to be a Civil Service Reformer when he remembers the myriad applications for petty positions, which that unfortunate head was unable to fill. His plan would be to fill vacancies in the departments by competitive examinations in the different States, and if any applicant appeared in person before any department his name should be stricken from the list.

The Prohibition Amendment in Iowa has been declared technically defective in the district court at Davenport. Judge Walter T. Hayes decided that the amendment has not been legally made a part of the State Constitution, chiefly on the ground that the Journals of the Legislature do not contain the act in full on their pages, and do not contain the yeas and nays taken upon the same, and that according to the Journals the act, as passed by the Senate of the Eighteenth General Assembly, was in its terms prohibitory of the sale or manufacturing of liquor, not only as a beverage, but also, 'to be used,' and hence prohibited it and its use for any and all purposes, even sacramental, medicinal, etc.; but as it passed the House of the Eighteenth General Assembly it was in terms merely prohibitory of liquor as a beverage. In these respects, therefore, the requirements of the Constitution providing for the manner of its amendment have been disregarded. The Journals do not contain the proper entries and the same act has not passed both houses of the Legislature.

The Destruction of the Park Theatre in New York by fire on October 30th, is one of those calamities which appear blessings in the light of the terrible results which must have happened under other circumstances. The famous English actress, Mrs. Langtry, was to have appeared there at eight o'clock on that evening. It was evident that the house would have been crowded in every part, for immense sums had been paid for the privilege of selecting seats, and of course tickets without premiums would have been freely sold. Before six o'clock, however, the theatre was in ruins. Had the fire occurred three hours later many lives would inevitably have been sacrificed. As it was, two of the employés were burned to death. On November 1st another theatre—the Alhambra was burned to the ground. Happily that place was closed at the time owing to the death of one of the proprietors, and no lives were lost. The Alhambra was the building which under its old designation of the Buckingham, Dr. Talmage visited to obtain material for his famous course of sermons, "Night Scenes in New York." It is a remarkable evidence of the wiffulness of the dissipated classes that the proprietors of the theatre stated to the reporters, who interviewed them after the fire, that Dr. Talmage's scathing denunciation of the place increased their profits. Numbers of young people went there afterward in spite of Dr. Talmage's warning to see it for themselves.

A Distressing Calamity Occurred in New York on October 31st at the house of a prominent physician. Mrs. Margaret Seguin, a lady only thirty-two years of age, the wife of Dr. Edward C. Seguin, killed her three children, and then committed suicide. She took the children to a room on the top floor of her house, locked the door, blindfolded the children—two boys and one girl—and tied their hands behind their backs, and then shot them. The oldest child was less than six years of age. Mrs. Seguin had been despondent and melancholy for some time, but it was not suspected that she would become insane.

The Ninth Annual Convention of the Woman's National Christian Temperance Union assembled at the First Christian Church, Louisville, Ky., on October 25th, under the presidency of Miss Frances Willard. The business of the convention occupied three days. Among the resolutions adopted were the following: "We rejoice in the advance made along the line of the constitutional prohibition in the past year. We hail the successes in Kansas and Iowa, and the activity in other States for securing prohibition by this method, as harbingers of the swiftly coming time when, with a majority of the states fixed upon the foundation of a constitutional law prohibiting the liquor traffic, they shall be able to engraft this principle upon the National Constitution. We rejoice in the day that gives recognition to our prohibition principles by political partisans, and we will endeavor to influence the men in all communities to commit themselves to that party, by whatever name it is called, that shall give to them the best embodiment of the prohibition principle, and will most surely protect our homes." A novel feature of the proceedings of October 27th, was the presentation of flowers by the newsboys and boot-blacks of Louisville to the ladies of the convention. One of their number made a speech, and another offered a prayer. The convention then went into an election of officers for the ensuing year. The vote for Miss Frances E. Willard for President was unanimous. Mrs. Caroline B. Buell, Corresponding Secretary; and Miss Esther Pugh, Treasurer, were re-elected.

The Church Temperance Society, of which Mr. Robert Graham is the indefatigable secretary held its first annual Convention in New York last week. Among the prominent persons present were Bishops Doane, of Northern New York; Dudley, of Kentucky, and Elliott, of Western Texas; the Rev. Dr. Howard Crosby; the Rev. E. Osborne, of Boston; the Rev. Mr. Matchery, of St. Clement's Church, of Philadelphia, and the Rev. Walter Miller, of Baltimore. The Secretary, Mr. Robert Graham, read the first annual report of the Executive Committee. The report referred to the formation of the society in 1881, and recommended the formation of parochial societies, and the raising of a fund of $10,000 a year for five years to prosecute the work of the society. It was resolved to raise the fund of $10,000 a year and to appoint a committee and an honorary Secretary for each diocese in the United States. The Rev. Dr. W. R. Huntington read a paper on prohibitory and licensing law in the United States. He took the ground that the State could not control the individual appetite. Moral suasion, he thought, would be much more effective than prohibitory legislation. The Rev. Dr. Howard Crosby described the difficulties he and others had had to contend with in prosecuting the violators of the State liquor law. One great difficulty in the way of enforcing the law, he said, was the fact that the local legislators are chiefly liquor-sellers themselves. There had not been a time for years when a majority of the Board of Aldermen had not been liquor-sellers.

The Railway Young Men's Christian Association of Kansas City, Mo., has issued its second annual report, which is of a most gratifying character. The association has included in its work, beside religious meetings and agencies, reading, amusement and bath rooms, lectures, social entertainments, and educational classes. All these agencies have tended to the benefit of members, and have attracted to the rooms large numbers of young men who might otherwise have sought entertainment in the theatre and other vicious resorts. The committee on Christian work reports that during the year 170 religious meetings of various kinds have been held, with an aggregate attendance of 9110. Two cottage meetings were held each week during the greater part of the fall, winter, and spring, and were productive of much good, especially in the building up and developing of Christian young men for more active and aggressive service. The Sunday afternoon Gospel Meetings have been well attended and considerable interest manifested. The greatest results apparent are shown in personal visitation and conversation, both in health and sickness; a number having given evidence of the new birth and a firm confidence in the only Saviour. Efforts are now being made to establish a library, and Mr. George T. Coxhead, the energetic secretary, would be glad to receive donations of books toward that object.

A Man Found in a Bear Trap in one of the Maine forests appears to have died a terrible death. A Boston (Mass.) newspaper says that some weeks ago a Frenchman left that neighborhood for the woods at the head of Moosehead Lake, in Maine. Nothing was heard of him until last week, when a skeleton, which there is reason to believe is that of the missing man, was discovered with both hands caught in a bear trap. He had evidently in some way, while forcing his way through the thickets, got his hands caught in the jaws of the trap, and being unable to remove them, and no assistance being near, died from starvation. It is distressing to think of the agonies the poor victim must have suffered in the trap, prepared not for him but for the bears, and it is probable that no man is more sorry about the untoward circumstance than the man who set the trap. The sad accident reminds us of the fate of those who reject the Saviour, and who fall into punishment prepared for the devil and his angels; but they, unlike the poor Frenchman, justly suffer, because they neglected warnings and entreaties (Matt. 25 : 41).

Dogs Disturbed two Services in Southern churches recently. A Georgia newspaper says: At the Methodist church last Sunday night a pointer dog came in and curled himself up for a nap near the pulpit. The minister was very earnest in his sermon, and came down with a loud exhortation upon the Bible before him. Up jumped the dog and struck a gallop to make his escape, which he did very noisily and to the great amusement of the undevout part of the congregation. At the Presbyterian church Monday night a ferocious bull specimen of the canine species attended, and when an attempt was made to run him out he curled himself up at his mistress's feet and refused to move. After a while, when the preacher raised his voice in his discourse, the dog rushed out at him, making the church resound with his barks. Probably these dogs appeared in church through the carelessness or indiscretion of their owners, but we are warned against other dogs in the churches whom Satan sends there, and who are infinitely more to be dreaded (Isaiah 6 : 10, 11).

A Strange Scene in a Bar-Room in Phila-delphia startled the visitors one evening recently. A man who had been leaning against the wall suddenly fell writhing on the floor; another as soon as he reached the bar screamed that he was paralyzed; and a third who stood at his side, before he had time to drink his liquor, dropped on his knees with a shriek of rage and pain. One of the persons present in the midst of the general bewilderment suggested that the phenomena were caused by electricity, and an investigation showed that he was right. A steel screw from which depended an electric light had been driven through the lath and plaster so far that it came in contact with an iron girder, and the men whose involuntary antics had caused astonishment, had completed the circuit in their own persons by touching a metal post or the railing of the bar, making the connection with the girder. The men so strangely affected by the unseen agency might have wisely recognized in their novel experience a type of another connection. Young men of good moral character, who live to become debauched criminals, looking back over their past lives often discover that it was at the liquor bar that the connection was made that bridged over the chasm between the two extremes of their life (Prov. 23 : 29, 30).

A Criminal Somnambulist in a Jail in Ten-nessee has furnished presumptive evidence against himself. He is confined in the Davidson County jail on a charge of murder. Noises in his cell on several occasions in the dead of night attracted the attention of the warders, who on going to the ventilator in the door found that he was walking in his sleep. They watched him then and at subsequent times, and say that he always goes through the same performance. He crosses the cell to a corner where a broom is kept and grasps it as if it were a gun and creeps with a cat-like tread toward a chair on which his clothing and hat are placed. The manœuvre consumes considerable time, the "sleeper" apparently acting as if he was engaged in picking his way through brush. Having arrived near the chair he deliberately raises the broom to his shoulder. After taking a long aim he goes through the same motion that one would in firing a gun. He then approaches the chair, picks up the bundle of clothing, and carries it to the remote corner of the cell. He then goes down on all fours and goes through the motion of digging with his hands. Then he places the clothing in it and carefully covers it up, stamping the floor of the cell as if he was pressing down uneven ground. The work concluded, the sleep-walker conceals the broom under his bed, as if hiding a gun. He then washes his hands, examines his clothes carefully, as if to see if there was any blood upon them, and resorts again to his couch to sleep until morning. Every one who has witnessed the scene is impressed with the belief that the prisoner is performing in a dream a crime he actually committed. If so, it is an impressive evidence of the activity of an accusing conscience even in sleep. What may not be the misery from that cause alone of lost souls. Their eyes opened to the enormity of sin and yet unable to forget for a moment the smallest detail of sins done in the flesh (Mark 9 : 48).

A Missing Citizen of New York whose Dis-appearance caused serious anxiety among his friends, has sent an amusing explanation of his absence from the city. He cables from Antwerp, where he arrived on November 2d, that on October 21st, the day on which he was missed, he went down to the slip of the Red Star Line, to see a friend off by the steamer Nederland. He went on board the vessel, met his friend, and concluded to accompany him down the bay, expecting to come off by the pilot boat. While he was talking in the saloon the pilot boat sailed without him and he was carried off to Europe. He had no luggage with him, and had made no preparations whatever for a voyage. He states that he is in good health and is coming back by the next steamer. So far, except for the anxious fears of his friends, no harm has resulted from the adventure. It has happened, however, in only too many cases that serious moral and spiritual calamities have resulted from conduct of which this citizen's adventure is a type. There is no more prolific cause of the ruin of young people than that of accompanying acquaintances to places they might not otherwise have visited, and instead of returning, as they intended, being carried away on a current they cannot resist, to spiritual and eternal catastrophe, a voyage for which they, like the New Yorker, had made no preparation (Deut. 13 : 6-8).

A Daughter Lost for Twenty Years is Re-ported to have been found in Ohio two weeks ago. The Cleveland Leader states that a gentleman from New York has visited Akron, O., and has there satisfied himself that a lady living in that city is his own daughter, whom he lost in 1862. He joined the army when the war broke out, and during his absence with his regiment, his little girl, then about six years of age, strayed away and was lost. On his return from the war he commenced a search for her but without result until he obtained the clue that led him to Akron. Partly from herself and partly from the friends who had charge of her until her marriage, her father learned her history. She was on her way to school on the morning she was lost, and seeing a regiment of soldiers marching down Broadway she followed them a short distance, and when she attempted to retrace her steps she was unable to do so. She was found crying in the streets by a kind man who took care of her and tried to find her friends. Failing in the effort, he sent her to the Children's Home, whence she was sent to a gentleman at Medina, O., who adopted her. The meeting between father and daughter was a very touching one, for the father had searched every one of the principal cities for her and had spent a large sum of money and much of his time for twenty years in the search. The daughter, too, was glad to meet her father, though she had made no attempt to find him during all those long years he had been searching for her. So it is with the sinner; if the Good Shepherd did not seek His lost sheep they would never come to Him of their own accord (Matt. 18 : 12-14).

"FEED MY LAMBS:" A SABBATH-SCHOOL SERMON.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"So when they had dined, Jesus saith to Simon Peter, Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou Me more than these? He saith unto Him, Yea, Lord; Thou knowest that I love Thee. He saith unto him, Feed My lambs."—John 21 : 15.

A Change of Scene and Subject—An Advanced Stage of Work—Responsibility for the Redeemed Flock—Work Within the Fold—I. The Sphere—My Lambs—Little in Grace—Young in Grace—Young in Years—Profitable Work—II. The Man to Do This—Peter a Leading Man—Warm-hearted—Experienced—Greatly Indebted—III. The Preparation—First Fed—Divine Companionship—Self-Examination—Love Indispensable—IV. The Work—Fiddles and Tambourines Useless—The Work Unostentatious—Careful—Continuous—Laborious—The Shepherd Spirit—V. The Motive—The Master's Self—Out of Love—Heavenly Recreation.

READ the whole chapter, and observe the change of scene. First, they are on the lake fishing, casting their nets at Christ's command, and dragging to land a multitude of great fishes. They have all come on shore, and when they have breakfasted, their faces are not turned to the sea, but to the pastures on the hillside. These are clothed with flocks, and the Master says no more about fishermen and fish, but speaks of shepherds and sheep. Herein lieth the servants of the Lord Jesus are first fishermen and then shepherds. The first work of Christ's servants is comprised in that commission, "Go, ye into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature;" or, parabolically, "Launch out into the deep and let down your nets for a draught." They begin their heavenly vocation as fishers, even as Jesus said to them at the first, "Follow Me, and I will make you fishers of men." Their earliest work is to preach the gospel, which is like the letting down of a great seine net, inclosing life of all kinds. They are not to make a selection of characters so as to preach only to likely persons. In gospel fishery we let down the big net and thus encompass many of all sorts. In the act of preaching the gospel, all is fish that comes to net; the sorting of the good from the bad is to be done another day.

After this is done, and while it is being done, another art is to be practised. Fishing is not all, as many seem to think. It is a great part of our service, and would God it were more attended to; but after it has been attended to shepherding comes in, and is a work of equal weight. Our Lord Jesus Christ would have His servants attend to this second task with all their hearts. If souls are converted they have been brought up from the depths of sin, and the scene changes: we see a flock, "the Church of God which He hath purchased with His own blood." This flock needs as much care as any other, yea, it needs to be tended with the utmost labor and watchfulness. He will call us to account if we neglect this charge, for He will require His flock at our hands, saying, "Where is the flock that was given thee, thy beautiful flock?"

We must never so evangelize the outside mass as to forget to fold and feed those within. We are to disciple all nations, and then to teach them all things whatsoever Christ has commanded us. Not every man that can haul in a net is ready at once to tend a flock; we need much grace, for the Lord Jesus Christ spent years in most industriously educating the Twelve, training the Seventy, and getting ready a band of followers who were not only saved, but educated, so as to teach others also. We must not be indifferent to this matter. The quiet work of building up believers must be steadily pursued even though those who sound a trumpet before them may despise such ministries.

I shall speak this morning upon the feeding of the sheep and lambs, and this I shall do in order that I may help our beloved Sabbath-school teachers. This is their day, and if I do not seem to speak directly or exclusively to them, I hope I shall nevertheless say much to stimulate and direct them in their invaluable labors. I bespeak for them your most earnest prayers and loving sympathies, and of many I would beg a more practical co-operation with them.

WORK WITHIN THE FOLD,

Concerning this shepherdizing for Christ let us first note the sphere—"My lambs": secondly, the man for it—one like Simon son of Jonas; thirdly, his preparation for it: fourthly, the work itself: and fifthly, the motive under which the feeding is to be carried out. Briefly on each point. Oh for help from the Spirit of God!

I. First, think of

THE SPHERE.

Although in the other instances, Jesus says, "Feed My sheep," yet in this first instance He says, "Feed My lambs." To whom does He refer? I think, first, to such as are little in grace. They have but a grain of mustard seed of faith as yet: their love is not a flame, but a spark: the leaven of grace within them has begun to work, but all the measures of meal are not yet leavened. The spiritual life in these is like a candle newly lit, apparently in danger of being suddenly blown out, and therefore needing great care. Weakness is an idea in the word "lambs;" and so in the Church of God all such as are weak—and, alas, how many there are—all such as are doubting, all such as are slenderly instructed, all such as are easily bewildered in doctrine, cast down in spirit, and apt to be staggered—all such, I say, are to be watched over with special care, and therefore Jesus mentions them particularly and separately and in the first place.

We ought to know that if we be strong, our strength lieth not in ourselves; for our own strength is perfect weakness; and therefore we should deal graciously and tenderly with the weak of the flock. I think this is the reason why the weak were committed to Simon Peter in this particular case; because he had been very weak himself: he had denied his Master through his fears, and thus he was taught to have compassion on other trembling ones. He who is himself compassed with infirmities knows the heart of the weaklings: he can enter with sympathy into their doubts and their distresses, for he has felt the same. I say therefore, this morning, in the name of the Lord Jesus, to all of you who love Him, "Look well to the weak ones of the Church."

But I cannot think, as some expositors do, that weakness is the main idea in the word "lambs;" for the notion of a lamb is not confined to the thought of weakness, since full-grown sheep may be weak and lambs may be vigorous; but the most prominent thought is that of youth. The lambs are the young of the flock. So, then, we ought to look specially and carefully after those who are young in grace. They may be old in years, and yet they may be mere babes in grace as to the length of their spiritual life, and therefore they need to be under a good shepherd. As soon as a person is converted and added to the Church he should become the object of the care and kindness of his fellow members. He has but newly come among us, and has no familiar friends among the saints, therefore let us all be friendly to him.

Peter himself that morning must have felt like a newly enlisted soldier, for he had in a sense ended his public Christian life by denying his Lord, and he had begun it again when he "went out and wept bitterly." He was now making a new confession of his faith before his Lord and his brethren, and, therefore, because he was thus made to he is commissioned to act as a guardian to them. Young converts are too timid to ask our help, and so our Lord introduces them to us, and with an emphatic word of command He says, "Feed My lambs." This shall be our reward, "Inasmuch as ye have done it unto one of the least of these ye have done it unto Me."

But surely we must include in this those who have been converted while young in years. We thank God exceedingly that we have among us and round about us many dear children that already know Christ. We have never as a Church thought that a certain number of years must have passed over a child before it can confess its faith in Christ and be received into the Church. It is sometimes said that we teach adult baptism. We do nothing of the sort. We practise believer's baptism, and baptize all who confess faith in the Lord Jesus Christ, whether they are children or adults. Our inquiry as to fitness does not refer to age, but to faith.

Oh, how much there is of brightness and trustfulness about children when converted to God which is not seen in elder converts! Our Lord Jesus evidently felt deep sympathy with children, and he is but little like Christ who looks upon them as a trouble in the world, and treats them as if they must needs be either little deceivers or foolish simpletons. To you who teach in our schools is given this joyous privilege of finding out where these young disciples are who are truly the lambs of Christ's flock, and to you He saith, "Feed My lambs;" that is, instruct such as are truly gracious but young in years.

It is very remarkable that the word used here for "feed My lambs" is very different from the word employed in the precept, "feed My sheep." I will not trouble you with Greek words, but the second "feed" means exercise the office of a shepherd, rule, regulate, lead, manage them, do all that a shepherd has to do toward a flock; but this first feed does not include all that: it means distinctly feed, and it directs teachers to a duty which they may, perhaps, neglect, namely, that of instructing children in the faith. The lambs do not so much need keeping in order as we do who know so much, and yet know so little: who think we are so far advanced that we judge one another and contend and emulate. Christian children mainly need to be taught the doctrine, precept, and life of the gospel: they require to have divine truth put before them clearly and forcibly.

A child has not only to live as you and I have, but also to grow; hence he has

DOUBLE NEED OF FOOD.

When fathers say of their boys, "What appetites they have!" they should remember that we also should have great appetites if we had not only to keep the machinery going, but to enlarge it at the same time. Children in grace have to grow, rising to greater capacity in knowing, being, doing, and feeling, and to greater power from God; therefore above all things they must be fed. They must be well fed or instructed, because they are in danger of having their cravings perversely satisfied with error. Youth is susceptible to evil doctrine. Whether we teach young Christians truth or not, the devil will be sure to teach them error. They will hear of it somehow, even if they are watched by the most careful guardians. The only way to keep chaff out of the child's little measure is to fill it brimful with good wheat.

We ought especially to feed the young because this work is so profitable. Do what we may with persons converted late in life, we can never make much of them. We are very glad of them for their own sakes; but at seventy what remains even if they live another ten years? Train up a child, and he may have fifty years of holy service before him. We are glad to welcome those who come into the vineyard at the eleventh hour, but they have hardly taken their pruning-hook and their spade before the sun goes down, and their short day's work is ended. The time spent in training the late convert is greater than the space reserved for his actual service: but you take a child-convert and teach him well, and as early piety often becomes eminent piety, and that eminent piety may have a stretch of years before it in which God may be glorified and others may be blessed, such work is profitable in a high degree.

You see the sphere which is presented to your zealous activity. Will you not occupy it? Many of you are already engaged in it; see to it that ye fulfil your high calling, and to the utmost feed the lambs.

II. Secondly, let us speak of

who is to do this? I look upon my text as addressed, not to Peter only, but to those who are like Peter. What if I say it is addressed to us all? As servants and lovers of Jesus, He says to us, "Feed My lambs." Who should do it? Christ selected Simon Peter as a leading man. He was one of the chief of the apostles, if we may use such a word. He was one of the triumvirate that led the van—Peter, and James, and John. But though a leading man, he was to feed the lambs, for no man may think himself too great to care for the young. The best of the Church are none too good for this work.

And, dear friends, do not think because you have other service to do that therefore you should take no interest in this form of holy work, but kindly, according to your opportunities, stand ready to help the little ones, and to cheer those whose chief calling it is to attend to them. To us all this message comes: "Feed My lambs." To the minister, and to all who have any knowledge of the things of God, the commission is given. See to it that you look after the children that are in Christ Jesus. Peter was a leader among believers, yet he must feed the lambs.

But he was especially a warm-hearted experienced man. He had known his own weakness; he had felt the pangs of conscience; he had sinned much and had been much forgiven, and now he was brought in tender humility to confess the love and loveliness of Jesus. We want experienced men and women to talk to converted children, and to tell them what the Lord has done for them, and what have been their dangers, their sins, their sorrows, and their comforts. The young are glad to hear the story of those who have been farther on the road than they have. I may say of experienced saints—their lips keep knowledge. Experience lovingly narrated is suitable food for young believers, instruction such as the Lord is likely to bless to their nourishing in grace.

Simon Peter was now a greatly indebted man. He owed much to Jesus Christ, according to that rule of the kingdom—he loveth much to whom much hath been forgiven. Oh you that have never entered upon this service for Christ, and yet might do it well, I beseech you consider your obligation to Jesus. O you who owe so much to Christ, will you not feed His lambs? Ought you not to be forward to offer yourselves? Will you refuse Him? Come forward at once and say, "I have left this work to younger hands, but I will do so no longer. I have experience and I trust I yet retain a warm heart within my bosom; I will go and join these workers, who are steadily feeding the lambs in the name of the Lord. So far as to the man who is called to feed the lambs.

III. Thirdly, when the Lord calls a man to a work, He gives him necessary for it. How was Peter prepared for feeding Christ's lambs? First, by being fed himself. The Lord gave him a breakfast before giving him a commission. You cannot feed lambs or sheep either unless you are fed yourself. It is quite right for you to be teaching a great part of the Lord's day; but I think a teacher is very unwise who does not come to hear the gospel preached and get a meal for his own soul. First be fed, and then feed.

But especially Peter was prepared for feeding the lambs by being with his Master. He would never forget that morning, and all the incidents of it. It was Christ's voice that he heard; it was Christ's look that pierced him to the heart: he breathed the air which surrounded the risen Lord, and this fellowship with Jesus perfumed Peter's heart and tuned Peter's speech, that he might afterward go forth and feed the lambs. I commend to you the study of instructive books, but above all I commend the study of Christ. Let Him be your library. Get near to Jesus. An hour's communion with Jesus is the best preparation for teaching either the young or the old.

Peter was also prepared in a more painful way than that, namely, by self-examination. The question came to him thrice over, "Simon, son of Jonas, lovest thou Me? Lovest thou Me? Lovest thou Me?" Often the vessel wants scouring with self-examination before the Lord can fitly use it to convey the living water to thirsting ones. It never hurts a true-hearted man to search his own spirit and to be searched and tried by his Lord. It is the hypocrite who is afraid of the truth which tests his profession: trying discourses, and trying meditations, he dreads; but the genuine man wants to know for certain that he really does love Christ, and therefore he looks within him and questions and cross-questions himself.

Mainly, dear friends, that examination should be exercised concerning our love; for the best preparation for teaching Christ's lambs is love—love to Jesus and to them. These lambs of the flock live in the love of Christ: shall they not live in ours? He calls them His lambs, and so they are; shall we not love them for His sake? You and I will be out of gear with the vast machinery of divine love unless our souls are full of affectionate zeal for the good of the beloved ones. Love is the grandest preparation for the ministry, whether exercised in the congregation or in the class. Love, and then feed. If thou lovest, feed. If thou dost not love, then wait till the Lord hath quickened thee, and lay not thy unhallowed hand to this sacred service.

Thus I have described the sphere, the man, and his preparation.

IV. Let us now consider

THE WORK:

"Feed My lambs." I have given you the gist of this subject already. With the weak of the flock, with the new converts in the flock, with the young children in the flock, our principal business is to feed. Every sermon, every lesson, should be a feeding sermon and a feeding lesson. It is of little use to stand and thump the Bible and call out, "Believe, believe, believe!" when nobody knows what is to be believed. I see no use in fiddles and tambourines; neither lambs nor sheep can be fed upon brass bands. There must be doctrine, solid, sound, gospel doctrine to constitute real feeding. When you have a joint on the table, then ring the dinner-bell; but the bell feeds nobody if no provender is served up. Getting children to meet in the morning and the afternoon is a waste of their steps and yours, if you do not set before them soul-saving, soul-sustaining truth. Feed the lambs; you need not pipe to them, nor put garlands round their necks; but do feed them.

This feeding is humble, lowly, unostentatious work. Do you know the name of a shepherd? I have known the names of one or two who follow that calling, but I never heard anybody speak of them as great men; their names are not in the papers, nor do we hear of them as a trade with a grievance, claiming to be noticed by the legislature. Shepherds are generally quiet, unobtrusive people. When you look at the shepherd, you would not see any difference between him and the ploughman, or the carter. He plods on uncomplainingly through the winter, and in the early spring he has no rest night or day because the lambs are needing him; this he does year after year, and yet he will never be made a Knight of the Garter, nor even be exalted to the peerage, albeit he may have done far more useful work than those who are floats into rank upon their own beer-barrels. So in the case of many a faithful teacher of young children; you hear but little about him, yet he is doing grand work for which future ages will call him blessed. His Master knows all about him, and we shall hear of him in that day; perhaps not till then.

Feeding the lambs is careful work too; for lambs cannot be fed on anything you please, especially Christ's lambs. You can soon half poison young believers with bad teaching. Christ's lambs are all too apt to eat herbs which are deleterious; it needs that we be cautious where we lead them. If men are to take heed what they hear, how much more should we take heed what we teach? It is careful work the feeding of each lamb separately, and the teaching of each child by itself the truth which it is best able to receive.

Moreover, this is continuous work. "Feed My lambs," is not for a season, but for all time. Lambs could not live if the shepherd only fed them once a week. I reckon they would die between Sunday and Sunday; therefore good teachers of the young look after them all the days of the week as they have opportunity, and they are careful about their souls with prayer and holy example when they are not teaching them by word of mouth. The shepherdly of lambs is daily, hourly work. It is so with those who feed Christ's lambs; they rest not till God saves and sanctifies their dear ones.

It is laborious work too: at least he who does not labor at it will have a terrible account to render. Do you think a minister's life is an easy one? I tell you that he who makes it so will find it hard enough when he comes to die. Nothing so exhausts a man who is called to it as the care of souls; so it is in measure with all who teach—they cannot do good without spending themselves. You must study the lesson; you must bring forth something fresh to your class; you must instruct and impress. I have no doubt you are often driven very hard for matter, and wonder how you will get through the next Lord's day. I know you are sore pressed at times if you are worth your salt. You dare not rush to your class unprepared, to offer to the Lord that which costs you nothing. There must be labor if the food is to be wisely placed before the lambs, so that they can receive it.

THE TRUE SHEPHERD SPIRIT

is an amalgam of many graces. He is hot with zeal, but he is not fiery with passion; he is gentle, and yet he rules his class; he is loving, but he does not wink at sin; he has power over the lambs, but he is not domineering or sharp; he has cheerfulness, but not levity; freedom, but not license; solemnity, but not gloom. The Shepherd spirit is a rare and priceless gift. A successful pastor or a successful teacher in a school will be found to have special characteristics, which distinguish him from his fellows. This, then, is the work: "Feed My lambs."

V. Lastly, let us consider

THE MOTIVE.

Our Lord Jesus heard Peter's assurance of love, and then he said, "Feed My lambs." The motive for feeding the lambs was to be his Master's self, and not his own self. Had Peter been the first Pope of Rome, and had he been like his successors, which indeed he never was, surely it would have been fitting for the Lord to have said to him, "Feed your sheep. I commit them to you, O Peter, Vicar of Christ on earth." No, no, no. Peter is to feed them, but they are not his, they are still Christ's. The work that you have to do for Jesus, brethren and sisters, is in no sense for yourselves. Your classes are not your children, but Christ's. This is not my Church but Christ's.

Yet while this is a self-denying occupation, it is honorable, too, and we may attend to it feeling that it is one of the noblest forms of service. Jesus says, "My lambs: My sheep." Think of them, and wonder that Jesus should commit them to us. Poor Peter! Surely when that breakfast began he felt awkward. I put myself into his place, and I know I should hardly have liked to look across the table to Jesus, as I remembered that I denied Him with oaths and curses. Our Lord desired to set Peter quite at his ease by leading him to speak upon his love which had been so seriously placed in question. Like a good doctor He puts in the lancet where the anxiety was festering: He inquires, "Lovest thou Me?"

It was not because Jesus did not know Peter's love; but in order that Peter might know of a surety, and make a new confession, saying, "Yea, Lord; Thou knowest that I love Thee." The Lord is about to hold a tender controversy with the erring one for a few minutes, that there might never be a controversy between Him and Peter any more. When Peter said, "Yea, Lord; Thou knowest that I love Thee," you half thought that the Lord would answer, "Ah, Peter, and I love you;" but He did not say so, and yet He did say so. Perhaps Peter did not see His meaning; but we can see it, for our minds are not confused as Peter's was on that memorable morning. Jesus did in effect say, "I love you so that I trust you with that which I purchased with My heart's blood. The dearest thing I have in all the world is my flock: see, Simon I have such confidence in you, I so wholly rely on your integrity as being a sincere lover of Me, that I make you a shepherd to My sheep. These are all I have on earth, I gave everything for them, even My life, and now Simon, son of Jonas, take care of them for Me." Oh it was "kindly spoken." It was the great heart of Christ saying, "Poor Peter, come right in and share My dearest cares."

I wonder when the prodigal son came back and the father received him, whether when market-day came he sent his younger son to market to sell the wheat and bring home the money. Most of you would have said, "I am glad the boy is come back; at the same time I shall send his elder brother to do the business, for he has always stuck by me." As for myself, Jesus took me in as

and it was not many weeks before He put me in trust with the gospel, that greatest of all treasures; this was a grand love-token. I know of none to excel it.

The master-motive of a good shepherd is love. We are to feed Christ's lambs out of love. First, as a proof of love. "If ye love Me, keep my commandments." If ye love Me, feed My lambs. If ye love Christ, show it, and show it by doing good to others, by laying yourself out to help others that Jesus may have joy of them. Next, as an inflowing of love. "Feed My lambs," for if you love Christ a little when you begin to do good, you will soon love Him more.

Besides being an inflowing of love, the feeding of lambs is an outflow of love. How often have we told our Lord that we loved Him when we were preaching, and I do not doubt you teachers feel more of the pleasure of love to Jesus when you are busy with your classes than when you are by yourselves at home. A person may go home and sit down and groan out—

"'Tis a point I long to know, Oft it causes anxious thought," and wipe his forehead and rub his eyes, and get into the dumps without end; but if he will rise up and work for Jesus, the point he longs to know will soon be settled, for love will pour out of his heart till he can no longer question whether it is there.

So let us abide in this blessed service for Christ that it may be the delight of love, the very ocean in which love shall swim, the sunlight in which it shall bask. The recreation of a loving soul is work for Jesus Christ; and among the highest and most delicious forms of this heavenly recreation is the feeding of young Christians; endeavoring to build them up in knowledge and understanding, that they may become strong in the Lord. The Lord bless you, dear fellow-laborers in the Sabbath-school, from this time forth and for evermore.

A Snake Charmer Lost his Life a Short Time ago, at Puddoopookur, near Calcutta, India, through over-confidence in himself and his remedy. A large cobra was discovered in a shop by some natives, who were about to take measures for destroying it, when a man named Ghose, well known as a professional snake charmer, asked them not to do so, and volunteered to tame and subdue it. He seized its head with one hand and its tail with the other, after the fashion of his fraternity, and was in the act of putting it into an earthen "chally," when the snake suddenly turned and bit him on the left thumb. The man persistently refused to be taken to the hospital, or to be treated surgically, saying that he could cure himself by the use of a remedy known as mantras. This he repeated, but his efforts proved unavailing, and he finally expired about an hour and a half after he received the bite. The majority of people in this country would take care to let a cobra alone if they saw one, but thousands trifle with sinful indulgences which are more dangerous to the soul than a cobra's poison is to the body. They rely on their own power of self-control or self-emancipation, until their souls are saturated with the fatal poison (2 Peter 2:9, 10).

Rev. T. J. Bass.

Mrs. Evered Poole.

Major Evered Poole.

REV. T. J. BASS.

THE Rev. T. J. Bass, whose portrait appears on this page, will be remembered by those who attended the sixth general Conference of the Evangelical Alliance in New York. He was one of the delegates from Europe to that conference, and was associated in that honor with Lord Alfred Churchill and Drs. Stoughton, Smith and Rigg and others. Mr. Bass has thrown himself into the work of the Blue Ribbon Gospel Temperance movement with vigor. At Stockport, England, where Mr. Bass is at present located, the movement has made immense progress, and that mainly through his exertions.

Mr. Bass is a native of Ireland, having been born at Carrickfergus, in 1854. His father is a Wesleyan minister, and he early resolved in the strength of the Lord to devote his life to the same work. For two years he was a student in the Theological department of the Methodist College, Belfast, and afterward an undergraduate of Dublin University, his tutor being the Rev. T. K. Abbott, M.A.

For seven years he has been a minister of the Methodist New Connection, and has been appointed to some of the leading circuits in that denomination. He is at present associated in Stockport, with the Rev. W. J. Townend, the author of "The Great Schoolmen of the Middle Ages," who has also taken a leading position in the Blue Ribbon movement, and as chairman of the committee of the Gospel Temperance Union, has proved not only a wise counsellor, but a faithful friend and devoted helper.

When Mr. R. T. Booth, the American advocate of the Blue Ribbon movement, went to Stockport, he received no more cordial welcome from any one than from the young Methodist minister, Mr. T. J. Bass. During his first visit about 15,000 persons took the Ribbon out of a population of 59,000. The work has since then been carried on by a zealous committee of which Mr. Bass was chosen secretary, who, after the number had reached 20,000, ceased to count the Ribbons, and kept a record only of the new pledges. The London Gospel Temperance Herald, of which Rev. M. Baxter is editor, says of the Stockport committee: "They are to be congratulated on the magnificent scale and efficiency of their arrangements, and on the diligence with which they are following up their great victories. The name of Stockport is inscribed on the banners of the Blue Ribbon Army."

At the outset of the movement the attention of Mr. Bass was directed to a large weaving-shed, the property of the London and North-Western Railway Company, and the enterprising secretary urged the committee to secure and transform the great shed into a mission hall. Through the kindness of the directors it was accomplished, and a gigantic hall, made brilliant with the electric light, was crowded night after night with audiences numbering from 5000 to 6000 persons. The work which devolved on Mr. Bass and his co-secretary, Mr. A. Gibson, in arranging for the conduct of such meetings and for the comfort of such multitudes, was most laborious. The committee, in appreciation of the devotion and energy of the secretaries, presented them with illuminated addresses; and when Mr. Bass felt it incumbent upon him, in view of the claims of his own church, to resign the onerous office of secretary he was elected a vice-president, which office he now holds.

MAJOR EVERED POOLE.

AMONG the most active workers in the cause of Gospel temperance is Major Evered Poole, whose portrait appears on this page and who formerly held the office of major in the British Army. He was one of the leaders in the great series of meetings which closed on October 3d, in connection with the Blue Ribbon Mission in the north of London, at which 10,000 pledges were taken, and 15,000 persons assumed the blue ribbon.

Major Poole may be said to have been born in the army, for he first saw the light during a march of a regiment of cavalry in India, which his mother accompanied in a dhoolie, a species of litter carried on the shoulders of four men. She was the devoted wife of an officer in the regiment, and when the regiment was ordered forward her love for her husband prompted her in spite of the delicate state of her health to accompany him rather than be separated.

The boy as he grew up resolved to follow his father's profession, and joined the army when he was only sixteen years of age. The year 1858 saw him engaged with his battalion in helping to suppress the Indian Mutiny. Subsequently, in connection with the 1st Battalion, Major Poole had some service in the Mediterranean and in Canada. But the year 1860 is, perhaps, the most interesting one in his career, for in that year, as he writes, "A new light dawned on me, and I was materially aided and helped forward in my

as a soldier of Christ by the army Scripture-reader at Winchester," the evenings spent with whom will never be forgotten by the Major, they being "among the happiest in my life." Since this time the Major has been enabled by God's grace to do much good work in the army by means of Bible-classes, hospital visiting, etc., and his labors in these directions, between the years 1868 and 1874, and while serving on the staff at Aldershot, he looks back to with great pleasure and satisfaction. On leaving the army at the close of 1878, Major Poole was asked to take up the work of Association Secretary to the Army Scripture Readers' Society, a request with which he cheerfully complied; and it is evident, from the signal manner in which the Almighty has blessed his labors, that Major Poole fills a most useful sphere, and one in which he is specially fitted to help on the spread of the cause and Kingdom of God.

MRS. EVERED POOLE.

THE wife of Major Poole, whose portrait accompanies that of her husband, is his earnest and indefatigable helper in the cause of religion and Gospel temperance, and in the recent meetings did valuable service which was attended with remarkable success.

Mrs. Poole is better known to the Christian public by her maiden name—Eva Travers—a name identified with some of the most successful leaflets which have been issued in promotion of Gospel Temperance. Mrs. Poole, who was born at Zante, an island off the coast of Greece, was converted to God at the age of eighteen. For the past eight years she has wholly devoted herself to the Lord's service, employing voice and pen almost constantly in the promotion of temperance, virtue, and piety. She has spoken for many good causes, and particularly has she taken a deep interest in the Army Scripture Readers' Society work, in connection with which she has undertaken the charge of a juvenile association, numbering 1000 children, who are in personal correspondence with herself.

THE CHILDREN'S SPECIAL SERVICE MISSION, with which she has also identified herself, is another movement to which she gives a good deal of her time and attention; and lately great success has attended her warm advocacy of the Gospel Temperance movement.

RALPH MARTIN'S DREAM.

"WIDOW MARTIN has a hard time of it," was an expression which was often on the lips of the honest folk of Melville, a pretty secluded village, about ten miles from an eastern seaport. And the general estimate was an accurate one. Her load was heavy—so heavy, that unless the "everlasting arms" of her Heavenly Father had been underneath her, she would have been crushed by it. But, in her experience, as in that of all God's trusting children, the presence of God was realized the most when most needed, and in every trial He was with her and helped her.

She had been "Widow" Martin for now near twenty years. It seemed even to her a long time, though the well-remembered night when the neighbors brought to her the stunning news that her husband was dead, was as fresh in her recollection as if it had been yesterday. That night would never be forgotten, though so much that was painful had happened since. He had been a sailor, and when he died suddenly at sea he left her with three sons, totally unprovided for. When her boys grew up they adopted their father's calling, but they, like him, encountered the perils of the sea and two of them met with a watery grave. It would have been better for Widow Martin, perhaps, if the third son had shared his brothers' fate, for his reckless, wicked life caused the godly widow bitter tears and many a heartache. He was her youngest son, and she loved him, as the only one left of all that once happy circle. He was "the only son of his mother and she was a widow." She prayed day and night for his conversion, but he had arrived at man's estate, her hair was white as snow and her prayers were unanswered. For thirteen years she had not seen him.

Ralph had not forgotten his mother during those thirteen years. Every voyage he determined that this time for certain he would go and see the old lady. But when he set foot on shore the old temptations came upon him and after a period of drunken revelry he sneaked on board his ship penniless and miserable. But in those nights at sea when the storm howled around the ship and he knew that any moment he might go down with the vessel or be swept by a wave from her deck, he thought of his mother and wondered if she was praying for him.

The turning point of his life came at last and it came in a dream, as if God had heard the widow's prayer and had spoken to her son as He spoke once to Saul of Tarsus. The Sea-sprite was off the Azores, when a terrific storm arose. Such a storm the oldest sailor on board had never seen. The wind howled and roared while the sea, lashed into ungovernable fury, swept the deck again and again, and then seemed to hiss out its rage and disappointment at not having engulfed them in the caverns, where so many sleep awaiting the trumpet-blast of the resurrection morning.

After six and thirty hours had passed, the tempest sobbed itself to sleep. Utterly weary after his unremitting labor, Ralph crept into his bunk and almost instantly fell soundly asleep. He dreamed a dream. It was a storm at sea, but somehow, it appeared to him as though the waves were liquid fire, and the heavens above one lurid sheet of blinding, scorching flame. Ships, like that in which he himself was sailing, glided past with strange frequency, and he observed that they glowed with heat like molten metal newly liberated from the furnace. Shrieks of despair came from the throats of the mariners, who seemed to have no power to guide their ships which were carried onward in spite of them.

Among the men on board one of the ships, and just as the strange tempest was at its height, he saw a face which was quite familiar to him. Gazing upon it most intently, he presently recognized the features as his own. This unmistakable phantom of himself was engaged in hauling ropes from which, at every movement, there were emitted myriads of angry-looking sparks, and the masts were standing like towers of solid flame. As he looked, and while his very blood seemed to curdle in his veins, through terror, a tall figure strode majestically toward the man at the wheel, and spoke in tones of authority a few sentences of instruction. The last words he uttered were distinctly audible; they were these: "This ship is under my orders. You have served Satan a long time and now you are going to see him in hell."

At this moment there was a crash as if Heaven itself had fallen to earth, and the flames above, around, beneath, were mingled in undistinguishable confusion. The ship had altogether disappeared, and Ralph became most painfully aware of his own individuality. He seemed to be in the very midst of all this awful scene of terror alone. There was nothing solid under his feet, and he was sinking deeper and deeper into the seething mass, which scalded and blistered and burned him, until he thought he could bear no more. And yet the certainty was borne in upon his mind that this experience must continue forever without any intermission or end. The thought was insufferable; he uttered a mighty shout of fear and pain, and at once there came to his aid a Being of surpassing brightness and beauty, and by His side was his own mother, with a look of supplicating entreaty upon her face, and the language of prayer upon her lips. "Oh, dear Lord Jesus, save my boy," was all he heard, and immediately awoke.

He was trembling from head to foot in an agony of apprehension; the perspiration stood upon his brow, and his veins were distended with the strain of his weird and dreadful dream. His first utterance on awaking was, "Thank God there is a chance yet. I'll go to my mother." He had resolved to do that many a time before, but this time he kept his word. No sooner was he released from duty after the ship's arrival than leaving the port with its allurements, he bent his steps toward his native village and for the first time in thirteen years he entered the little gateway before his mother's cottage, and peeped through the old-fashioned diamond-shaped panes of the window from which streamed a radiance that seemed to give him welcome. "But," and for the first time the thought struck him, "what if mother should not be alive!" His newly-awakened fear, however, was soon dispelled, for there, sitting at the table, was the old lady, reading from a large volume lying before her. She rose from her seat, and was just about to kneel in prayer, when Ralph knocked gently at the door, and an instant later stood in the presence of his mother.

Who can describe that meeting? The lost was found, the dead restored to life. It was like the miracle at Nain, and the son was given back to the widowed mother. When a few weeks afterward

Ralph once more rejoined his ship, he was a new man. He had been born again. The widow's prayers were answered, and she trusted her son to the care of Him who is able to keep him from falling.

ONLY A TRAMP. A Serial Story by Grace Stebbing.

The Mayor's Offer.

THE mayor rose from his seat in the buggy and changed places with his companion, and then once more asked, "Can you write? I don't mean just your name; but can you write a fair letter, and keep accounts, and that sort of thing? Don't be ashamed to say so, if you can't, or if you've forgotten during your wanderings. I can't, except after a fashion of my own; but perhaps you can?"

"Well," was the slow answer, "I began life in my uncle's office as a clerk, and I guess I earned best part of my living over ledgers the last two years in America; but that sort of employment did not suit me so well as my present daily labor."

At that last remark Mr. Barnes faced round upon him sharply. Decidedly at that moment it was a good thing that he had not got the reins in his hands. His mettlesome horse would not well have stood the jerk its head would have got.

"What are you talking about!" exclaimed the mayor impatiently. "What did not suit you so well as being the handle of a machine? I shall begin to think you nothing better than a machine yourself if you don't take care."

"I wish that I were anything half as sure to do my duty," was the low-spoken, bitter reply.

"But, at any rate," in a louder and more everyday tone, "I can perhaps have resolution enough to stick to being a handle, although I have too little strength of character to keep to anything more worthy."

"Umph!" ejaculated the mayor coolly. "So that's the opinion of your own character that you've come to, is it? Very well, it doesn't much signify, for you'll have me to keep you in your place now, whether you will or no; and I warn you beforehand, I'm a regular Tartar at doing that. Your uncle was nothing to me. He tried to make you into a first-rate clerk and failed; from this minute I take you for my first-rate clerk, and I succeed, and shall succeed, in keeping you too."

However, that last boast appeared for an instant doubtful; for whether from a momentary faintness such as all the troubles and privations of his past life had not produced, or whether from the resentful start accorded by the horse to a spasmodic clutch of the reins, Charles Wynn swerved over, and would have fallen on his head from the dog-cart if Mr. Barnes had not so very quickly caught his arm and held him firmly, while he said, with an affectation of sternness:

"Hullo, my good fellow, have a care! Firefly won't stand that sort of thing; you were as nearly out as possible. A good driver never hurts a horse's mouth."

"I am very sorry," muttered the ex-tramp sheepishly, and with a secret hope that his companion put his late danger all down to Firefly's indignation. Whether he did so in fact or not may be doubtful; but he said nothing more on the subject and recurred to the interrupted topic with the apparently off-hand remark:

"Your hours, will be pleasanter for you now. Instead of being at the works at six, I shall not expect you in the office until eight o'clock."

"To-morrow?" gasped Wynn.

"Ay, to be sure. Why not to-morrow? That's how I've got on so, I believe, by never putting off anything that I once made up my mind it was a good thing to do. To-morrow may be all very well; but I work, and think, and decide today. Poor Jem Blake has begged himself back to the machine-handle place you are to vacate, and I don't think you would consider it a very good act on your part to deprive him of two days' wage; and for myself, I should be very sorry to deprive myself of the next two days of your help in my office. My affairs there have got into pretty much of a muddle."

"And do you mean that you are going to trust me to do so?" asked Charles Wynn, with a wide-eyed stare of amazement.

"Why not?"

"Why not?" he echoed almost irritably. "Why, there is every reason why not. Even my power to be of service to you, you might much more justly doubt than believe in; but that part of the question I will put by. You have heard from me that I am a clergyman's son, and I may possibly have given some proof that I possess a certain amount of education—"

"I asked you if you did, you know?" interrupted the mayor calmly.

The young man shrugged his shoulders impatiently. In his youth he would have knocked down any one who had doubted his word; now he felt almost wrathful with any one who professed to believe it. But he continued, with something of a sharp remonstrance:

"Well, to put that on one side, how can you be willing to trust me on such short acquaintance in a place of such responsibility? You know nothing of me, but that I appeared here a wretched, ragged, starving, nameless, characterless, homeless, friendless, outcast tramp."

"Anything more?" said the mayor, with a calmness in strong contrast to his companion's heat.

"Yes, one thing more," came the quick reply in a lower and more dreary tone. "You should believe, as I do, that God never lets any fellow down so low but through a fellow's own fault."

"Just so," was the equally low and solemn assent. "And there is more joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth than over ninety and nine just persons that need no repentance."

A long silence followed that quotation. The two men were rapt in their own thoughts, and Firefly paced along the moonlit honeysuckle-scented roads at a rate of speed more suited to its high-bred inclinations that warm night, than to the present-day axiom, that "time is money."

At last Mr. Barnes broke this second silence with his usual abruptness, and his companion started, and gathered up the slackened reins, as his name was uttered quickly, "Wynn!"

"Yes, sir."

"Umph! you are awake, are you? I thought maybe you and Firefly had both gone to sleep. Well, I only wanted to say that a few minutes since you accused me—"

"Sir!"

"Yes," very decidedly, "accused me of taking into my office a man without a character, of putting into a position of considerable responsibility one of whom I can declare nothing but that he made his first appearance in my neighborhood two short months ago in a most dismal, disreputable condition. I have been thinking over the matter, and I have come to the conclusion to set you right on this point; for I would rather stand well in your estimation than meanly, I confess. It will be better for both of us."

"I do not think meanly of you," said the tramp earnestly; "you know that I do not. I could not; no one does. Only too generous-hearted," came the smothered amendment.

"There you go again," growled the manufacturer, "only too generous fiddlesticks! To show blind confidence in business matters is to show one's self a fool, and you know it. But ignorant as I am, I've a little more wisdom than that comes to. And, to prove it, you may as well hear at once that I know a good deal more about my new clerk than you think for. You must remember that my business relations here, there, and everywhere, give me especial opportunities for proving the truth of any statements I hear. It is thus that I have learned, with quite sufficient certainty to satisfy me, that your statements as to your own life and identity are true up to the time of your leaving England eleven years ago, and it is thus that I have verified your account of the shipwreck eight months ago, which reduced you to such absolute poverty. By the by, I have some hopes of gaining you some small compensation. I am having a try at it."

"There! don't interrupt; we are nearly home, and I want to finish what I have to say. I want to tell you this, that what I have learned of your conduct during the past six or seven weeks has given me better hope for you, more confidence in you, than anything I have discovered as to the truth you have told of your own history. Old Granny Sharplin's fine boots to-night have given the nail the final tap on the head, but it was first stood up in its place ready to be hit home," with a grim little chuckle, "when I heard you declare your readiness to go to prison so that a dangerous rascal might be sent there too. Then I met that queer little Bob Balston out on his lonely rambles a week or so ago, and I took him up and gave him a long drive, and I heard a good many strange things from him, and pieces of news about his 'best, dearest new friend, whom he loved next-most to faver and muvver.'"

"Good-night, sir, I'll get down here," said a muffled voice quickly; "this turning is a good one for Southford Cottages."

"And the next is better," rejoined Mr. Barnes; "so unless you want me to have my neck broken, you will just please to keep the reins; for I don't intend to take them; at least, not until I am ready, and that won't be until I have said all I wish to say; and you need not be ashamed of a man like me, old enough to be your father, hearing of the clever, fair way in which you have taught little Bobby. An evil tree cannot bring forth good fruit, and if your heart were really bad you could not speak as you have done to a child."

"But there is even more than that. I told you a while ago that Jem Blake had begged himself back into the factory. He came straight to me, he told me someone had so advised him, and a little questioning brought out a tale that you know even better than I do. You are angry with me for doing something to help you up to your proper place in the world; perhaps you will be still more fierce with me when I tell you that it was as much for your sake, after what I heard, as for his own, that I granted Blake's request. I only hope that you won't find that you have saddled yourself with more than you can manage. He'll be a handful, I'm afraid."

"Ah! And do you not fear that I also may be a bad handful for you?" sighed the young man. "It is easy to love God when one feels one's self overwhelmed with undeserved mercies; it is easy to tell a child of a Father's care, of a Saviour's tenderness; it comes naturally to one to try to drag a fellow-creature out of a pit of dingy degradation; but—"

The mayor laid his hand on his companion's, and stayed Firefly's steps and its driver's tongue at the same time.

"There is no 'but' in the case, Wynn," he said gravely. "No one can speak as you have done lately but by the grace of the Holy Spirit, and those to whom God gives His Holy Spirit. He will also give His strength, beating down Satan under their feet, helping them in the hour of temptation, and delivering them in all their troubles and adversities for His name's sake and His own honor. He is faithful who has promised; and now you may at last get rid of those reins, and leave me. Good-night. I shall hope to meet you again in my office to-morrow morning as soon as I think the post has come in; and don't let Jem Blake bother you. I'll find him another landlord if you'll let me in a day or two."

And then he stretched out his hand, and grasped that of the new clerk with a warm, firm clasp that spoke more than even his words had done, for the estimation in which he had already learned to hold him.

Jem Blake was already asleep when his self-constituted landlord entered his cottage, and having ascertained this welcome fact, Charles Wynn softly closed the door between the two rooms, lighted his lamp, and seated by the table he opened the small Prayer-book, which had already become so close a friend to him. Something there was of deep humility in the worn, weary heart that found it easier and more comforting to put by his own wavering thoughts, and pray in the words of those who must many and many a time also have felt weak and weary, before they so learned to know their own helplessness, and the unutterable love of God. "I beseech thee, dear Lord, so indeed to endue me with the grace of thy Holy Spirit, that I may amend my life according to thy holy word."

And praying those words over and over again with hungering, eager earnestness, we must leave him for awhile, and take the opportunity to explain how he comes to have taken a penniless lodger into his quiet home.

The evening before that on which the Mayor of Southford, and the man who had wandered into Silverdale a starving tramp, two months ago, paid their visits to old Betty Sharplin, a young man, between nineteen and twenty, was sitting under a hedge, a very dusty one, just outside the town of Southford. A second man strolling thoughtfully along the road would have paid no heed to him, but that, when he was about to pass, the youth suddenly raised a scowling face toward a building a few yards off, and shook his fist toward it passionately. The pedestrian stood still.

"Ah!" he said aloud in agreement, "you are quite right, friend. Those wretched beer-houses deserve to have the fists of a good lot of us shaken at them, enticing us in to our ruin."

The young man turned his eyes from the object of his wrath to the new-comer. "Umph," he growled, "it's none for 'ticing me in, it's fur keepin a feller out, as I'm keen to pull it down about their curmudgeonly ears. It's done for a feller once, got me turned out of work, an' now that one wants a drop to keep the spirit in a man, one gets the cold shoulder, and never a day's credit."

"And a good thing too," was the downright answer from the elder of the two young men, who now joined the other in his seat under the dusty hedge. "And a very good thing, too," he repeated. "It's the spirit of a cur, not the spirit of a man, that a fellow sucks up out of a pint pot. I guess your father did not get the spirit to work for a home over your head by drinking."

The grumbler stared. "My father's dead. What in the world did ever you know about him?"

"Nothing positively," said the other, laughing, "for I don't suppose that I ever saw him, and I am not a magician either. But you are well-grown, and have a look as though you had been well-fed and cared for when you were a boy."

"Ay, and that's what I was too," said the young man, an air of gratified pride taking the place of the scowl. "I've often heard mother say that no better-dressed, better-fed children than us were to be found in our village while father lived; but he died when I was fourteen, and since that I've had to fend for myself."

"And you have done it very fairly well too, I guess," was the encouraging answer, by which the ice of sullen reserve was so far further broken that Jem Blake changed his position on the bank so as to face his stranger companion.

JESUS MOCKED AND CRUCIFIED.

S. S. Lesson for November 19. Mark 15 : 16-26 Golden Texts, John 12 : 32 ; Ps. 22 : 16. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Three Terrible Sinners—Their Degrees of Guilt—Sinning for the Sake of Peace—Jesus Delivered to His Enemies—The Scourging and Mocking—The Thorny Crown—No King but Cæsar—The Crossbearer—The Sympathizing Women—A Lesson of Self-Forgetfulness—A Type of Christian Dissension—The God-ward Side of the Question—Jesus Lifted Up.

JUDAS, Peter, Pilate had each, though in very different degrees, sinned against Jesus and against their own souls. Peter had repented unto life, Judas had repented, but it was only in the way of remorse and despair; no hope, no restoration followed. Pilate had sinned with his eyes open, against the strongest convictions of his conscience; and it was very evident that his desire to release Jesus had proceeded more from personal fear than from a strong determination to do right; and having chosen the way of sin, he must abide eternally by the consequences.

God gave His Son to die, He laid on Him the iniquity of us all, Jesus laid down His life of Himself, and nevertheless, Pilate is responsible for His death, of his own free will he became the human instrument by whom the death of Jesus was brought about. O how grievous is the history! "Pilate, willing to content the people, released Barabbas unto them, and delivered Jesus, when he had scourged Him to be crucified!"

"WILLING TO CONTENT THE PEOPLE!"

How many a converted mother willing to content the children, has granted consent to that which was contrary to her judgment, and which in the end proved the destruction of those children! How many a converted wife, willing to content her husband, has gone farther and farther into the world, the world's dress, the world's dinner-party, the card-table, the wine, the ball; anything for peace, anything to prevent a disturbance! And yet, had she quietly but firmly, committing the consequences to God, told her husband how these things were not what she could enter into for God, and though she would not force him to see with her, that he must let her follow the light which God gave her, it is probable, that, even should there be a storm at first, yet she would soon win her way; and very possibly the husband would be glad. In many such cases we have known it to be so.

How often a husband, willing to content his wife, who has not learned to live within her income, allows her to run up debts, although he knows that it is contrary to the will of God, and he is conscious that when eating the food which is not paid for, he is really robbing the man to whom he owes the money, for that food is by right as much the butcher's, the baker's and the grocer's as if he had stolen it from their counter; he took it in exchange for money which money he is not paying, and therefore the purchase is not really his. Thus all which he touches and uses is a source of continual discomfort to him. Why does he not take the matter into his own hands, and agree to do without everything possible, without meat, without butter, without sugar, without new clothes till the debts are paid? O this being "willing to content the people" instead of willing to content God, this sacrificing of Jesus to the people, it is going on everywhere, and doing damage to God's cause.

And Jesus, what of Him? After Pilate had granted to the people their desire by releasing the man who went about doing harm, "he delivered Jesus (who went about doing good) when he had scourged Him, to be crucified." No guile had been found in His mouth, no cause of death was found in Him, no charge could be substantiated against Him, and yet He must be scourged like a common criminal, and die. "Christ also had once suffered for sins the just for the unjust" (1 Pet. 3 : 18). Insult was added to injury, there must be "called together the whole band" of soldiers that they might join in mocking Him. And He knew it beforehand! He had foretold, "it is written of the Son of man, that He must suffer many things, and be set at naught" (Mark 9 : 12). They "shall deliver Him to the Gentiles; and they shall mock Him, and shall scourge Him, and shall kill Him" (Mark 10 : 33, 34). He knew it all, and yet

DID NOT DRAW BACK.

"I gave My back to the smiters, and My cheeks to them which plucked off the hair: I hid not My face from shame and spitting" (Isa. 50 : 6). "And they clothed Him with purple, and plaited a crown of thorns, and put it about His head," little knowing the significance of what they did, little dreaming how really He was then bearing the curse which first took the form of thorns and thistles, and wearing it upon His head as a royal diadem, making suffering His glory. And we sinners too, who have been thorns and briars in God's creation, bearing no fruit by nature unto God, "nigh unto cursing; whose end is to be burned" (Heb 6 : 8), does He not take us as His diadem? shall we not be His eternal glory?

And they "began to salute Him, Hail, King of the Jews! And they smote Him on the head with a reed, and did spit upon Him, and bowing their knees worshipped Him." O how completely the devil must have got possession of them! What was there in Jesus to call forth these insults? Had they been asked, the only answer could have been, "To please the chief priests," there was absolutely no other reason unless it be that the natural mind of man is so akin to the mind of Satan, that it only seeks an excuse to let loose a natural tendency to cruelty. That which makes men hunt a poor stag or a poor hare to death, is the same spirit which makes soldiers brutal on the battlefield, which makes the drunkard unnatural and cruel to wife and children. "The dark places of the earth are full of the habitations of cruelty," "out of the heart of man proceed . . . murder." And all this was now turned against the unresisting Jesus, the face which had never once been tainted with so much as a shadow of sin was spit upon, and He who ought to have been worshipped with all their hearts was worshipped in mockery! The Jews had disowned Him as King, although He was the lineal descendant of David and the real heir to David's throne, and they who prided themselves on their Jewish nationality had said nevertheless in their bitter enmity against Jesus, "We have

NO KING BUT CÆSAR

(John 19 : 15). O how truly can the worldling, the man without God say, "I have no king but Cæsar," I recognize no claim but that of the world, I know not God."

When the brutal soldiers had mocked Jesus, "they took off the purple from Him and put His own clothes on Him, and led Him away to crucify Him." "And as they led Him away, they laid hold upon one Simon, a Cyrenian, coming out of the country, and on him they laid the cross, that he might bear it after Jesus." (Luke 23 : 26). Was it that the physical strength of our beloved Lord failed Him at this point, or that His enemies feared He would not have enough left to endure the agonies of crucifixion, and so with satanic malignity, they would seek means to prolong the suffering of our Lord to the utmost? We know not.

THE SYMPATHIZING WOMEN.

It was just now, when all hope seemed to be lost, that some of His followers summoned up courage, "there followed Him a great company of people, and of women, which also bewailed and lamented Him." No doubt the eleven were among them, and the women who had ministered to Him of their substance, none of whom had been bold enough to risk unpopularity, and to stand on His defence as witnesses for Him before either the chief priests, Herod, or Pilate. They could bemoan Him when it cost them nothing, but they had not been willing to represent His cause when all the disciples forsook Him and fled. Few have really the martyr spirit, although many like Peter think they have.

THE REAL MARTYR IGNORES SELF

and knows none but Jesus, considers none but Him, Jesus was conscious of their presence and "turning unto them said, Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for Me, but weep for yourselves, and for your children." And then He foretold the terrible things which should take place at the destruction of Jerusalem (Luke 23 : 26-31). O how lovely! He was not occupied with the sin of the Jews against Himself, but with its consequences to themselves, what a lesson of self-forgetfulness does He teach us!

"And they bring Him to the place Golgotha, which is, being interpreted, The place of a skull." There with the whitening bones of malefactors around, the Sinbearer must be put to death, but they who brought Him thither little knew how life should spring out of that one death. He said, "The bread that I will give is My flesh, which I will give for the life of the world" (John 6 : 51). "And they gave Him to drink wine mingled with myrrh: but He received it not." He would accept no palliation, He would drink the cup of the wrath of God to the very dregs.

"And when they had crucified Him, they parted His garments, casting lots upon them, what every man should take." There is something unspeakably revolting to a heart which is sensible of His love, in this parting of His garments, and yet how apt a type it is of the dissensions and strifes and divisions among Christians! The Psalmist said, "They parted My garments among them." Himself was of no account but to the spoil-loving soldiers. Alas to many believers, the spoil of Christian reputation, of pre-eminence, of worldly glory, of emolument is really more an object than the Person of the Lord Jesus.

"And it was the third hour (the time of the morning sacrifice), and they crucified Him." "For dogs have compassed Me: the assembly of the wicked have inclosed Me: they pierced My hands and My feet." Our golden text thus describes the work of ungodly men in this infamous transaction. But there is another side

THE GOD-WARD SIDE OF THE QUESTION,

"I, if I be lifted up will draw all men unto Me." Where education and home training can effect nothing, where civilization utterly fails, the Saviour lifted up prevails, and the hard, unwilling, senseless hearts, the proud, stubborn indomitable wills are drawn unto Him. O that we learned the lesson better to lift up Jesus or to draw men to see Him lifted up! Not faith or experience lifted up, not gifts or graces, not men or churches, but Himself. O to bring men in real contact with Jesus, to get away all which is between! This is the great necessity, the Lord teach us how to do it. But in order that it may be so, we need to learn more effectually to lift Him up in our own hearts, and to know the power of attraction in Him which draws us away from ourselves and all else to Himself as our All-sufficiency, at all times, and in all circumstances. O Lord teach us to know nothing out of Thee, to see Thee lifted up, Thee above all circumstances, Thee the Remedy for every evil, Thee enough at all times that drawn ever closer to Thee, we may make Thee really known to others. Amen.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The Difficulty Between the United States and Great Britain over the Fortune Bay affair came up for discussion in the British House of Commons on October 30th, when Sir Charles Dilke, Under Foreign Secretary, stated that a correspondence had been proceeding with the United States Government in regard to the Newfoundland fisheries, but no arrangement had as yet been arrived at. The last despatch was dated in July. The Newfoundland government has not yet paid the compensation. The compensation referred to is the money due by the colonial government to the imperial government for the latter's disbursements to the United States as damages for the Fortune Bay dispute.

The Disturbances in France appear to have been checked by the energetic policy of the government. Troops were ordered to occupy the railway and all strategic points in Lyons. The soldiers were strictly forbidden to hold communication with civilians. The forts dominating the city were prepared at the word of command to lay any portion of the city in ashes. If further explosions occurred the city was threatened with martial law. Late on Sunday evening the police discovered and seized forty kilogrammes of dynamite. A telegram to the New York press says: "The French Government having addressed a complaint, couched in strong terms, to the Swiss Federal Council against the proceedings of anarchists at Geneva, an investigation into the matter has been ordered by the Swiss Government. Revolutionary manifestos have been posted in Paris and Marseilles printed on red paper. Two hundred of them were posted near the Louvre, the Palace of the Luxembourg and the Jardin des Plantes. They express the deepest hate for the bourgeoisie and declare war to the death against them. Explosive materials have been discovered in the coal depot and telegraph office at St. Pourcain."

The Condition of Ireland has Already Come up for discussion in the autumn session of the British Parliament. Mr. Parnell said he believed that the administration of the Land act would never give satisfaction to tenants. He hoped that the necessity for a discussion was proved, and that an opportunity would be given for it at the present session. It was stated that the government is taking active steps to give effect to the emigration clauses of the Arrears of Rent act by publishing regulations under which impoverished unions can borrow money to supplement government grants. Emigrants to North America will be landed at New York, Boston, Quebec or Halifax. A male and female agent will be appointed at each of those ports to keep the authorities advised as to the prospects for the employment of emigrants.

Mr. Parnell as a Landowner has a Different policy than he follows as a Land League leader. On October 31st, at the Wicklow Sessions an ejectment writ was granted at the suit of Mr. Parnell against three tenants named Ebbs, Kavanagh and Brennan for non-payment of rent. The farms they occupy are on the Avondale estate of Mr. Parnell, and they owe four years' rent amounting to $895. A decree for the amount was granted.

The Reorganization of Egyptian Affairs has not advanced during the week. An effort on the part of France to renew the joint control has been made by M. Brédif, the late Comptroller, who has sent a letter to Cherif Pacha, president of the Egyptian Council, asking to be informed why, as the European control has not been abolished by a decree of the Khédive, he has not been invited to attend the meetings of the Council of Ministers. The letter of M. Brédif is regarded in diplomatic circles as a manifestation of the intention of France to bring the question of the European control to an immediate issue, without awaiting a general settlement of Egyptian affairs as the British propose. The disclosures made at the trial of Arabi Pacha of the treachery and duplicity of the Khédive of Egypt and the Sultan of Turkey, have astonished the British Government and caused intense indignation. Both rulers will be watched with suspicion in future. The British Government have sent to Egypt Lord Dufferin the most astute diplomatist in the service who will, it is expected, express to the Khédive in very explicit terms the wishes of the government, which he will be expected to obey in return for the assistance afforded him.

The Trial of Arabi Pacha has Arrived at the stage at which his counsel will commence their arguments on his behalf. The Prosecuting Committee has finished examining witnesses for the prosecution. Borell Bey, the Public Prosecutor, has expressed the opinion that the evidence proves the complicity of Arabi Pacha in the pillage and burning of Alexandria. Mr. Broadley has recovered the papers belonging to Abdelal Pacha. A captain of cavalry declared before the Prosecuting Committee that after the bombardment of Alexandria he overheard a conversation between Arabi Pacha and his chief engineer and military adviser, Mahmoud Fehmy, in which they both agreed there was nothing left to do but to set the town on fire. It is rumored in Cairo that the British contemplate abruptly closing the trial and banishing all the prisoners to Cyprus.

The Mahommedan Outlook is Still Stormy.—The whole Mahommedan world is at present greatly excited because it is about to enter on a new century of its existence. A new prophet is looked for in November, whose career is to eclipse that of the greatest of his predecessors. Arabi was thought at one time to be the expected one; now it is the highest ambition of the Sultan to be acknowledged as such. His hopes, however, have been shaken, first by a present from the Sheikh of Mecca consisting of a sword and a couple of pigeons, which is considered very ominous, but most of all by the appearance of the comet, which has sadly disturbed the astrologers.

The Reports of British Cruelty to Wounded Egyptians have been modified by Herr Janzon, the correspondent who first circulated them. He says in a letter to the Cologne Gazette: "In mentioning the charges in my own report, I add by way of explanation that the soldiers were still more or less under the excitement of the struggle that had just ended, and that in earlier fights it had happened that wounded Egyptians had shot at the English when their backs were turned—a fact of which they were perhaps thinking at the moment referred to. This was the explanation of the matter given to me also by English officers. I likewise added that during the rest of the day on the 13th, particularly on the march with the vanguard, which I had joined, I observed no cruelty of any description. The fugitives were generously permitted to fly, in some cases even without laying down their arms."

The Victories of the False Prophet in Africa have aroused British apprehension, and an expedition has been despatched to examine the actual state of the Egyptian southern frontier. It is now announced that the whole country below Khartoum is in the hands of the free negro who is styled the False Prophet. He has an army of 150,000 of the wildest fanatics, all horsemen, who are afraid of nothing, and he is reducing town after town. Dr. Schweinfurth writes, under date of Cairo, October 23d, that all the provinces of Egypt lying south and west of Khartoum are in the hands of fanatical insurgents, and that Khartoum is only hanging on by a thread. The army has been cut down by constant disastrous combats with the False Prophet, and is reduced to half its original size. The mass of the population believe in the ever victorious False Prophet.

The Mahommedan Tradition of the False Prophet is thus described in a communication sent to the New York Herald: "The Imam Mahdi is to come, according to Mahommedan belief, accompanied with great signs and wonders, and he will appear shortly before the Judgment Day. He comes on a white horse, and at the head of an army all mounted on white horses. In this there is a manifest trace of Scripture ideas, which the Mahommedans have followed and where the Hebrew Messianic notions may be traced. It bears at the same time a strong resemblance to the Kalki Avatar of the Hindus, which is to make its appearance on a white horse, and when the white horse stamps its foot the Kali, or black age, is to end and the Crita, or golden age, will begin again.

At present he is a long way from Cairo. Khartoum, of which he is said to be absolute master is about 900 miles in a direct line from Cairo, and perhaps 1000 miles following the winding of the Nile. The town is the principal place in that region, and is situated among palm trees on the western bank of the Bahr-el-Azrek, or the Blue Nile. This is close to the junction of that branch with the Bahr-el-Aviad, or the White Nile. It is this position at the union of the two main branches of the Egyptian river which gives Khartoum its strategic importance, and made it long the headquarters of the slave trade in Upper Egypt."

The Members of the Salvation Army, who were arrested some time ago in India and imprisoned on refusing to pay a fine or give security for their abstaining from preaching in the streets, have been released. A telegram from Bombay, dated October 31st, states that on that day they were all released with an admonition.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey During their second week in Paris continued their work with unabated energy and increasing interest and success. Their closing meetings were held on Sunday, October 22d, amid a scene of profound and grateful enthusiasm. During the whole of the mission, the pastors of Paris, French, English, and American Methodist, Independent, and Baptist attended at the meetings and willingly co-operated and there were representatives also of the Reformed and Lutheran Churches. The large church of Pasteur Bersier, in the Avenue de la Grand Armée, has been invariably crowded every evening, and the preaching of the Gospel attended by great blessing. A correspondent says: "We believe that the hearts of many Christians have been stirred within them. Some of the habitual attendants at our services have declared their (hitherto secret) discipleship; there have been others that have listened long to the Gospel and moved who have decided for Christ; there have been many more neglectors of God's day and God's house who have been led to hear the words of life from His servant's lips. And we are hopeful looking for still more manifest and numerous proofs that the Holy Ghost is owning and empowering the message and the messengers." Mr. Moody conducted several services in the Oratoire for the benefit of the French, Pasteur Theodor Monod interpreting for him. Yesterday, October 24th, the distinguished evangelists commenced their long-anticipated campaign at Bristol, where they intended to remain until November 3d.

Welcome News of a Decided Improvement in the health of Mr. George Müller, the founder of the Bristol Orphanages has been received from Mr. James Wright, Mr. Müller's assistant, who writes to THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, saying that through the Lord's kindness, Mr. Müller rapidly recovered, and may now be considered well. He deems it most prudent not to undertake the intended American journey; but, instead of this, he will labor on the Continent of Europe. He proposes shortly to move on to Pesth, in Hungary."

The Settlement of the Greek Boundary Question has been effected by the command of the Sultan to surrender to Greece the whole of the territory claimed by that Power. That arrangement was made by the Berlin Conference but had not been executed by Turkey.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 6 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers of prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE legend of Atlantis with which Plato familiarized us and which has recently been brought prominently before the world in a work designed to prove that the legend was founded on fact, is not likely to be satisfactorily proved in our day. The effort now being made is to show that the vast tract of elevated land discovered by the deep-sea soundings of the Challenger, under the waters of the Atlantic near the Azores, is the identical continent described by Plato. The theory is broached—and there are many facts discovered which lend plausibility to it—that the continent over which now roll the billows of the Atlantic was once elevated above the level of the sea, like Europe and America, but that it was submerged by a convulsion of nature. It is urged that that convulsion is known to Biblical readers as the Deluge, and that on that continent existed the veritable Garden of Eden. How far this may be truth or surmise scientists cannot tell us, but many eminent men have already accepted it as a very probable theory.

However that may be, and whether a stepping-stone ever did exist between the shores of Europe and those of America, it is very certain that no knowledge existed of this great continent in the fifteenth century. As Washington Irving has well said the discovery of America is due to "a mariner who first had the judgment to divine, and the intrepidity to brave the mysteries of this perilous deep; and who by his hardy genius, his inflexible constancy, and his heroic courage, brought the ends of the earth into communication with each other."

Christopher Columbus was born at Genoa in the year 1435 or 1437. Washington Irving, who had ample opportunities while at Madrid of settling the vexed question, gives the authorities which led him to believe it was in 1435. He is said to have been of noble descent, but the fact is not proved, and it is certain that at the time of his birth the family was neither wealthy nor distinguished. Of his education and early training we know but little. After acquiring some knowledge of the Latin tongue, he was instructed at the University of Pavia, in geometry, cosmography, astronomy, and the art of drawing. His passion for geographical knowledge and his love of adventure soon developed, while his irresistible inclination for the sea as a profession resulted in placing him before the mast. His name, which in the Spanish Archives is given as Colon, was an abbreviation of Colonus the ancient Roman name of the family, but the discoverer himself did not adopt that style until late in life, and his early letters were all signed Columbus.

HIS EARLY VOYAGES.

At the age of fourteen he began his career on that element which conducted him to so much renown. His early voyages were to the ports in the Mediterranean which his countrymen then frequented. This being a sphere too narrow for his active mind, he made an excursion to the northern seas and visited the coasts of Iceland, to which the English and other nations had begun to resort for purposes of fishing. As navigation in every direction was now become enterprising, he proceeded beyond that island, and advanced several degrees within the polar circle. Having satisfied his curiosity by a voyage which tended more to enlarge his knowledge of maritime affairs than to improve his fortune, he entered into the service of a famous sea captain named Colombo.

CRUISES AGAINST MAHOMMEDANS.

This man commanded a small squadron fitted out at his own expense, and by cruising, sometimes against the Mahomedans, sometimes against the Venetians, the rivals of his country in trade, had acquired both wealth and reputation. With him Columbus continued for several years, no less distinguished for his courage than for his experience as a sailor. At length, in an obstinate engagement off the coast of Portugal with some Venetian ships returning richly laden from the Low Countries, the vessel on board which he served took fire, together with one of the enemy's ships to which it was fast grappled. In this alarming extremity his intrepidity and presence of mind did not forsake him.

HE THREW HIMSELF INTO THE SEA, laid hold of a floating oar, and by the support which it furnished, and his dexterity in swimming, he reached the shore, though about six miles distant, and saved a life destined by God in His providence, for great undertakings. This incident, Irving considers doubtful, believing it to be attributed rather to Fernando Colombo, but other historians connect it with the discoverer. (To the left of the portrait a view of this scene is depicted.)

He at once made his way to Lisbon, where many of his countrymen were then settled, and so highly did they estimate his merit and talents, that they warmly solicited him to remain in that kingdom, where, they assured him, his naval skill and experience could not fail to make him conspicuous. Irving thus describes from material collected at Madrid, his

at this date. "Tall, well-formed, muscular, and of an elevated and dignified demeanor. His visage was long and neither full nor meagre; his complexion fair; his nose aquiline; his eyes light gray and apt to enkindle; his whole countenance had an air of authority."

To every adventurer, animated either by curiosity to visit new countries, or, with ambition to distinguish himself, the Portuguese service was at that time extremely inviting. Columbus listened with a favorable ear to the advice of his friends, and having gained the esteem of the orphan daughter of Perestrelo, an Italian navigator, whom he married, fixed his residence in Lisbon.

THE "PILLARS OF HERCULES."

The idea of land beyond the world of waters was in Columbus's day a matter of rather common speculation. Pulci, the Florentine poet, who wrote about the period of Columbus's infancy, after alluding to the vulgar belief that the Pillars of Hercules (the names of two lofty mountains, one situated on the most southern headland of Spain, and the other on the opposite coast of Africa), were the boundaries of the world, thus speaks:

"Know that this theory is false; his bark
The daring mariner shall urge far o'er
The western wave;
The dustiest sea-boat soon shall wing her way;
Men shall descry another hemisphere."

It had also been rumored that the inhabitants of Madeira, and other Western Isles, saw at certain times, and in very clear weather, land appearing in their western horizon, and always in the same direction; that the people located on the islands west of Africa, had picked up every now and then, some pieces of beautifully-carved wood; while others, in navigating these seas, had taken up canes of an extraordinary size, trunks of some trees which had been torn up by the roots, and plants such as had not been seen in the Old World; to which may be added, that human bodies had been cast by the waves on the shores of Flores, differing essentially in feature and complexion from both the African and European type. These traditions were floating about on the stream of Time when Columbus was a little boy, and as years rolled away, became in him an idea and an inspiration.

PREPARATION FOR THE WORK.

Columbus and his bride took up their abode with the widow of Perestrelo, and the future discoverer studied the nature and extent of the Portuguese discoveries, and soon his mind was on fire. But it was a long time before he was permitted to realize the fulfilment of the dream of the discovery of the Western land, which had taken possession of him.

The first step toward this was to secure the patronage of some of the considerable Powers in Europe, capable of undertaking such an enterprise. A sentiment of patriotism constrained him to lay his schemes before the Senate of Genoa, and make his own country the first tender of his service. But Columbus had resided for so many years "in foreign parts," that his countrymen were unacquainted with his abilities and character; and, though a maritime people, were so little accustomed to distant voyages, that they could form no just idea of the principles on which he founded his hopes of success. They inconsiderately rejected his proposal as the baseless vision of a chimerical projector, and so lost forever the opportunity of restoring their Commonwealth to its ancient splendor by the acquisition of new territory in America.

PROPOSALS TO EUROPEAN SOVEREIGNS.

In vain, also, did he lay his plans before the Court of Portugal; and when he sent his brother Bartholomew to negotiate with Henry VII. of England—the wisest and the richest prince in Europe—the scheme was once again denounced and peremptorily declined. Columbus had yet one hope left. Ferdinand and Isabella then governed the united Kingdoms of Aragon and Castile; and he resolved to go in person and lay his plans at their feet, and prefer his petition for their patronage and support.

In Andalusia, there is a small seaport, called Palos, not far from which, just above the town, there stood, and there stands now, the Franciscan convent of La Rabida. At the gate of this convent one mellow autumn evening in the year 1486, Columbus, now fifty years old, arrives on foot—a foreigner and a sailor—with a little boy whom he is holding by the hand. He is a noble-looking man, with lofty bearing and daring spirit. His gray hairs bespeak not so much old age, as years of care and toil. His countenance is somewhat depressed, yet remarkable; and fixing his almost liquid eyes on the child, he asks for him, hungry and footsore, a little bread and water.

DISCUSSION IN THE CONVENT.

While the boy is eating and resting, the Prior of the Convent approaches, and enters into conversation with the father. The man has but one idea, and he has not much to say on anything beside. The poet had sung in words emphatic and this gray-headed man, this plainly-dressed and rough speaking mariner, believes that with Heaven's help and guidance, he is the man to find that other world:

"Men shall descry another hemisphere."

"Here am I; for what end, God knows, not I;
Westward still points the inexorable soul;
Here am I, with no friend but the sad sea,
The beating heart of this great enterprise,
Which without me, would stiffen in swift death."

He talks to the Prior of land beyond the sea, and the Prior thinks there are lofty conceptions within the mind of this humble wayfarer. He invites him to be his guest and becomes more deeply interested in his story. He sends for a friend, a physician in Palos, and a man of pre-eminent mathematical knowledge, to spend the evening with his guest. At supper-time the Prior and the physician are alike astounded as the man proceeds with his reasonings and his pleadings, as to the existence of a Continent beyond the seas. The stranger is no other than Christopher Columbus, on his way to Ferdinand and Isabella with his plan elaborately and exhaustively prepared for a voyage of discovery.

FERDINAND AND ISABELLA.

The good Prior offered his guest an introduction at Court, and promised to take care of his little boy till he returns from his interview with royalty. The Queen's Confessor and Adviser, Ferdinand de Talavera, showed himself hostile to the project; the Court resembled a military camp, and the attention of the sovereigns and their courtiers was wholly devoted to the affairs of war. Columbus was cast down, but not destroyed. After months of weary waiting, the Grand Cardinal of Spain took up his cause, and procured him an audience of the sovereigns.

VERDICT OF A LEARNED COUNCIL.

A council of learned men was summoned to judge is scheme. He brought under their notice his project, and his reasons for entertaining it. This council went on meeting and deliberating for four years, and then pronounced the scheme to be visionary and vain, anti-Scriptural and impracticable. Columbus was taunted, ridiculed, insulted, and even the children in the streets pointed at him with signs significant.

ROYAL ASSENT TO HIS SCHEME.

Columbus left the Court of Castile, and sought for patronage elsewhere. He tried some of the Spanish grandees, and received letters favorable from the monarchs of England and France. In Portugal he had already tried Genoa, and, perhaps, Venice. But all in vain. Then he resorted to La Rabida, to call for his son. He related his failure and his sorrow to his old friend, Prior, who was moved with his story even to tears, and undertook to go in person to the Queen to urge the suit of Columbus. The royal lady commanded Columbus to appear again before her. He arrived at the Court to find the Sovereigns engaged in the siege of Granada. Its fall was accomplished, and when the blast of war had died away, Columbus had an audience with the Sovereigns, whose assent and promise of assistance he at length obtained. For eighteen long years he never lost sight of his cherished scheme, in poverty and neglect, in the midst of bitter ridicule and hopeless appeals, and the moment for its realization has now arrived.

THE CUPIDITY OF THE COURT.

But Columbus had now to do battle with the avarice of his royal patrons. Such was the height of the fulness of his faith in his object, that he would treat only on such terms as became the dignity and the grandeur of his enterprise. That egotistic spirit of his felt that there was something due to him—as much, perhaps, as to the crowned heads with whom he was now negotiating. He therefore demanded, in the event of success, that he should be high admiral and viceroy of all the islands and islands that he might discover, and that these offices should descend to his heirs forever. He also made stipulations of a monetary character, to all of which strong objections were taken. Columbus was firm, and would abate nothing, and resolved once more to leave Spain for France; but Isabella became strongly moved in favor of the enterprise, and even offered to pledge her jewels to meet the expenses of the expedition. (The picture on the right hand side of the frontispiece portrait illustrates this episode.) The tardy consent of Ferdinand was secured; and as a further mark of royal favor, Columbus's son was appointed page to the heir-apparent, with a handsome allowance for his support.

SETS SAIL ON AUGUST 3, 1492.

Columbus proceeded at once to Palos with a bounding heart, and began to fit out his ships and train his crew. Though he prevailed upon three men named Pinzon, possessed of much wealth and considerable experience in navigation, to accompany him, the vast majority of the people viewed the project with perfect horror, which must lead in death to all engaged. At last the ships were manned, and the Discoverer stepped on board. The fleet consisted of only three vessels. The largest called the Santa Maria of no great burden, and the other two the Pinta and the Nina, entitled to no better names than that of caravels, or light vessels without decks, crazy, leaky, and in no wise seaworthy; the crew consisted of about ninety men—pressed men, most of them, and all of them most cordially hating the service; and on Friday, August 3d, 1492, a little before sunrise, the squadron set sail from Spain across the Atlantic to the West, in search of a Continent.

DISCONTENT AND MUTINY ON BOARD.

On September 9th, they lost sight of Ferrol, the last of the Canary Islands, and the last known point of land, when the sailors became very dejected, shedding many tears, and beating their breasts, as if to perish were inevitable. Presently a flight of birds awakened in them the hope that land was not far off. Columbus knew better, and he would not give in to the men's wishes to sail after it. Disappointed, and with embittered feeling, they took an attitude of opposition to him, and charged him with building up his own reputation on the sacrifice of their lives. But:

"A hand is stretched to him from out the dark,
Which grasping, without question he is led Where there is work that he must do for God."

and therefore his sole word to the helmsman was—"WEST!"

For more than two months they continued to sail to the West upon a voyage which many of the crew regarded as a fool's errand. Mutiny at length broke out among the sailors, and they concluded that it was best to dispose of Columbus by throwing him overboard, but none of these things moved him. He seemed scarcely ever to sleep, but when he did lie down, it was with prayer to God. His courage was the offspring of Faith, not of Fear.

Early one morning (it was October 12th, 1492) the welcome cry was heard from one of the little ships of and so indeed it proved to be, and only about ten leagues (thirty miles) off. All the vessels now lay to waiting for the dawn of day; and when daylight at length appeared, the land was found to be an island. The three companies went on shore, kissed the ground for joy, and kneeling on the sands, gave thanks to God for His great mercy in preserving them during their long voyage, through seas hitherto uncrossed, and for the discovery of a land hitherto unknown. Columbus then stood up, and going through the usual ceremonial, took formal possession of the island in the name and on behalf of his Sovereigns; planted upon the soil of the New World the symbol of the Cross, and the Standard of Castile, and gave to the land the name of San Salvador, and which is now ONE OF THE REPUBLICS OF CENTRAL AMERICA.

The inhabitants of the new-discovered land were savage, but peaceful and kind; and gathering around the Admiral and his crews, some with uplifted hands, and others in an attitude of prostration (as shown in the right hand panel of the lower portion of our frontispiece), looked upon them as visitants from some higher world.

While Columbus was cruising from island to island of the grand group now known as the Bahamas, his friend, the elder Pinzon, incited by the desire of gold, which he learned was to be had in the Island of Bohio, to which Columbus refused to go, took advantage of the superior sailing of his vessel, and deserted Columbus, whose ship was shortly afterward on its way to St. Thomas, wrecked upon a sandbank. Canoes came to his aid, and subsequently Columbus set out for Castile, in one of the two remaining ships, to acquaint his Sovereigns with the particulars of his momentous discoveries.

ENTHUSIASTIC RETURN

After a most stormy voyage, Columbus re-entered the Port of Palos, on March 15th, 1493, having been absent seven months and twelve days, and was received by the people with every possible demonstration of joy and exultation. The very air rang with the shout of acclamation. He went at once to the old church to render thanks to God for his great and manifold mercies, and afterward responded to a summons to appear at Court. As he approached Barcelona, all the Court—all the city—went out to meet him, and to conduct him into the presence of the two Sovereigns. As he narrated the incidents of his voyage, and the facts involved in his discoveries, Ferdinand and Isabella listened with rapt attention to his story. When he had finished, thanks were again rendered to God, the Te Deum was chanted amid circumstances of unusual pomp, and high honors were conferred upon the now happy Italian.

Yet there were men jealous enough to seek to detract from the Discoverer's great merits. At a banquet which was given him, a small-minded courtier asked him abruptly and rudely, if he thought that, had he failed in his enterprise, there were not men in Spain equal to the undertaking which he had accomplished? On the principle that a fool is to be answered according to his folly and then invited the company, individually, to make it stand on one end. All tried—all failed. He then put it into the hand of the offending courtier, and challenged him to do it. He tried, and like the rest, he failed. Columbus had no unfair advantage. He took the very egg which had been laid down by all the rest, gently struck one end of it against the table, and there it firmly stood. The thing once done—was easy of imitation; but the difficulty was to do it. This circumstance gave rise to the proverbial expression of "Columbus's egg."

Columbus made three more voyages to the land he had discovered. Cuba and Hispaniola, now known as San Domingo; the Leeward Islands, and Jamaica were found, but during his absence his enemies fabricated charges of such gravity that he resolved to plead his cause in person, and, after much difficulty succeeded in re-establishing his influence with his Sovereigns. His last voyage resulted in the discovery of Trinidad, as well as some portions of the South American coast, but his life was again embittered by the intrigues of his enemies.

DISGRACED AND INSULTED.

The consequences of their machinations were disastrous and irremediable. Isabella's mind was poisoned against her former favorite; his assured rights were annulled and his commission as viceroy revoked. Francesco de Bovadilla, who was sent out to San Domingo in his room, had the arrogance to send Columbus home in irons. But the act proved his own ruin; he was disgraced, while his victim was liberated and rewarded. Still, the former honors were not restored, which so wrought on the feelings of Columbus that he ever afterward preserved his fetters as a memento of injustice.

HIS LAST VOYAGE

began in May, 1502, and the first incident was a terrible hurricane, occurring soon after his arrival at San Domingo, in which a treasure fleet starting for home, and the departure of which he had vainly attempted to delay, was almost entirely lost. Then he was wrecked on the island of Jamaica, and only rescued after enduring the greatest misery by a fleet from Hispaniola. At last returning to Spain with one solitary vessel, he found on landing, in December, 1504, that Queen Isabella was dead, and from her surviving consort he could obtain no redress from the reiterated charges against him, sorcery being one of them, and had even to undergo the insult of being offered a pension in exchange for his former dignities.

So, broken down with disappointment and illness, Columbus breathed his last at Valladolid, on May 20th, 1506, at the age of seventy years, his death being distinguished by the same piety and calm faith which had marked his life. The King, actuated possibly by remorse, honored his body with solemn obsequies, and confirmed, though tardily, the rights of his family. His remains, originally deposited at San Domingo, were transported in 1795, to the Cathedral of Havana, in the island of Cuba, where they now repose.

To quote once more from Irving's noble book: "Well would it have been for Spain had those who followed in the track of Columbus possessed his sound policy and liberal views. The New World in such cases would have been settled by pacific colonists and civilized by enlightened legislators; instead of being overrun by desperate adventurers and desolated by avaricious conquerors."

Miss Whately's Mission in Egypt, of which an account has already appeared in these columns, is still continued in spite of the disorganized state of the country, though the public schools have had to be closed. How seriously such labors as those of Miss Whately are needed in Egypt is evident from the reply she recently gave to the question of how many public professions of Christianity had resulted from her labors. She said: "I cannot venture to say one," adding, "to women profession of Christianity in Egypt means death, and it is hard to find the martyr spirit. Only God can give it. Many in Egypt, I doubt not, would have courage to stand upon the scaffold, but they dread being secretly poisoned, or secretly tortured by their relatives if they professed to be Christians."

HOSPITALITY.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, Nov. 12, 1882.

The hotel of our time had no counterpart in any entertainment of olden time. The vast majority of travellers must be entertained at private abode. Here comes Elisha, a servant of the Lord, on a divine mission, and he must find shelter. A balcony overlooking the valley of Esdrelon is offered him, in a private house, and it is especially furnished for his occupancy—a chair to sit on, a table from which to eat, a candlestick by which to read, and a bed on which to slumber, the whole establishment belonging to a great and good woman.

Her husband, it seems, was a godly man, but he was entirely overshadowed by his wife's excellencies; just as now you sometimes find in a household the wife the centre of dignity and influence and power, not by any arrogance or presumption, but by superior intellect and force of moral nature wielding domestic affairs, and at the same time supervising all financial and business affairs. The wife's hand on the shuttle, on the banking house, on the worldly business. You see hundreds of men who are successful only because there is a reason at home why they are successful.

If a man marry a good, honest soul, he makes his fortune. If he marry a fool, the Lord help him! The wife may be in the firm, there may be only masculine voices down on Exchange, but there oftentimes comes from the home circle a potential and elevating influence.

This woman of my text was the superior of her husband. He, as far as I can understand, was what we often see in our day, a man of large fortune and only a modicum of brain, intensely quiet, sitting a long while in the same place without moving hand or foot—if you say "yes," responding "yes"—if you say "no," responding "no"—inane, eyes half shut, mouth wide open, maintaining his position in society only because he has a large patrimony. But his wife, my text says, was a great woman.

Her name has not come down to us. She belonged to that collection of people who need no name to distinguish them. What would title of duchess, or princess, or queen—what would escutcheon or gleaming diadem be to this woman of my text, who by her intelligence and her behavior challenges the admiration of all ages? Long after the brilliant women of the court of Louis XV. have been forgotten, and the brilliant women of the court of Spain have been forgotten, and the brilliant women who sat on the throne of Russia have been forgotten, some grandfather will put on his spectacles, and holding the book the other side the light, read to his grandchildren the story of this great woman of Shunem who was so kind and courteous and Christian to the good prophet Elisha. Yes, she was a great woman.

I. In the first place, she was GREAT IN HER HOSPITALITIES.

Uncivilized and barbarous nations honor this virtue. Jupiter had the surname of the Hospitable, and he was said especially to avenge the wrongs of strangers. Homer extolled it in his verse. The Arabs are punctilious on this subject, and among some of their tribes it is not until the ninth day of tarrying that the occupant has a right to ask his guest: "Who, and whence art thou"? If this virtue is so honored even among barbarians, how ought it to be honored among those of us who believe in the Bible, which commands us to use hospitality one toward another without grudging.

Of course, I do not mean under this cover to give any idea that I approve of that vagrant class who go around from place to place ranging their whole lifetime, perhaps under the auspices of some benevolent or philanthropic society, quartering themselves on Christian families, with a great pile of trunks in the hall and carpet bag portentous of tarrying. There is many a country parsonage that looks out week by week upon the ominous arrival of wagon with creaking wheel and lank horse and dilapidated driver, come under the auspices of some charitable institution to spend a few weeks and canvass the neighborhood. Let no such religious tramps take advantage of this beautiful virtue of Christian hospitality.

Not so much the sumptuousness of your diet and the regality of your abode will impress the friend or the stranger that steps across your threshold, as the warmth of your greeting, the informality of your reception, the reiteration by grasp and by look and by a thousand attentions, insignificant attentions, of your earnestness of welcome. There will be high appreciation of your welcome, though you have nothing but the brazen candlestick and the plain chair to offer Elisha when he comes to Shunem.

Most beautiful is this grace of hospitality when shown

IN THE HOUSE OF GOD.

I am thankful that I am pastor of a church where strangers are always welcome, and there is not a State of the Union in which I have not heard the affability of the ushers of this church complimented. But I have entered churches where there was no hospitality. A stranger would stand in the vestibule for a while and then make pilgrimage up the long aisle. No door opened to him until flushed and excited and embarrassed he started back again and coming to some half-filled pew, with apologetic air, entered it, while the occupants glared on him with a look which seemed to say: "Well, if I must, I must." Away with such accursed indecency from the house of God. Let every church that would maintain large Christian influence in community culture Sabbath by Sabbath this beautiful grace of Christian hospitality.

A WESTERN TRAPPER'S CABIN.

A good man travelling at the far west, in the wilderness, was overtaken by night and storm, and he put in at a cabin. He saw firearms along the beams of the cabin and he felt alarmed. He did not know but that he had fallen into a den of thieves. He sat there greatly perturbed. After a while the man of the house came home with a gun on his shoulder and set it down in a corner. The stranger was still more alarmed. After a while the man of the house whispered with his wife and the stranger thought his destruction was being planned. Then the man of the house came forward and said to the stranger: "Stranger, we are a rough and rude people out here and we work hard for a living. We make our living by hunting, and when we come to the nightfall we are tired and we are apt to go to bed early, and before retiring we are always in the habit of reading a chapter from the Word of God and making a prayer; if you don't like such things, if you will just step outside the door until we get through I'll be greatly obliged to you." Of course the stranger tarried in the room and the old hunter took hold of the horns of the altar and brought down the blessing of God upon his household and upon the stranger within their gates. Rude, but glorious Christian hospitality.

II. Again, this woman of my text was toward God's messenger. Elisha may have been a stranger in that household, but as she found out he had come on a divine mission, he was cordially welcomed. We have a great many books in our day about the hardships of ministers and the trials of Christian ministers. I wish somebody would write a book about the joys of the Christian minister, about the sympathies around about him, about the kindnesses, about genial considerations of him. Does sorrow come to our home and is there a shadow on the cross there are hundreds of hands to help, and in who weary not through the long night watch and hundreds of prayers going up that God will restore the sick. Is there a burning, brimstone cup of calamity placed on the pastor's table, there not many to help him drink of that cup who will not be comforted because he is stricken? Oh, for somebody to write a book about the wards of the Christian ministry—about his roundings of Christian sympathy.

This woman of the text was only a type of thousands of men and women who come down from mansion and from cot to do kindness to the Leper servants. I could tell you of something that might think

A ROMANCE.

A young man graduated from New Brunswick Theological Seminary was called to a village church. He had not the means to furnish parsonage. After three or four weeks of preaching, a committee of the officers of the church waited on him and told him he looked tired and thought he had better take a vacation of a few days. The young pastor took it as an intimation that his work was done or not acceptable, took the vacation and at the end of a few days came back, when an old elder said: "Here is key of the parsonage. We have been cleaning up, you had better go up and look at it."

So the young pastor took the key, went up the parsonage, opened the door, and lo! it was carpeted, and there was the hat-rack all ready, the canes and the umbrellas and the overcoats; on the left hand of the hall was the parlor sofa chaired, pictured. He passed on to the other side the hall, and there was the study, table in the centre of the floor with stationery upon it, bookshelves built, long range of new volumes far beyond reach of the means of the young pastor, many of these volumes.

The young pastor went upstairs, and all sleeping apartments furnished; came downstairs and entered the pantry, and there were the spices and the coffees, and the sugars, and the groceries for a six months. He went down into the cellar and there was the coal for all the coming winter. He went into the dining-hall and there was the table already set—the glass and the silver ware. He went into the kitchen, and there were all culinary implements and a great stove. The young pastor lifted one lid of the stove and he found fuel all ready for ignition. Putting back the cover of the stove, he saw on another part of it a lucifer match, and all that young man had to do in staying to keep house was to strike the match. "Y tell me that is apocryphal. Oh, no;

THAT WAS ME.

Oh, the kindnesses, Oh, the enlarged sympathies sometimes clustering around those who enter the Gospel ministry. I suppose the men of Shunem had to pay the bills, but it was the large-hearted Christian sympathies of the women of Shunem that looked after the Lord's messenger.

III. Again, this woman of the text was great

HER BEHAVIOR UNDER TROUBLE.

Her only son had died on her lap. A very bright light went out in that household. The sacred writer puts it very tersely when he says: "He sat on her knee until noon, and then he died." "Y the writer goes on to say that she exclaimed: 'It is well'! Great in prosperity this woman was great in trouble.

Where are the feet that have not been blistered on the hot sands of this great Sahara? Where are the shoulders that have not bent under the burden of grief? Where is the ship sailing on glassy sea that has not after a while been caught in a cyclone? Where is the garden of earth comfort, but trouble hath hitched up its fiery arpaunting team and gone through it with burning ploughshare of disaster? Under the pelting of ages of suffering the great heart of the world has burst with woe.

up of tears and blood rolling through all and all ages, bearing the wreck of families of communities and of empires—foaming, boiling with the agonies of six thousand. Etna and Cotapaxi and Vesuvius have described, but who has ever sketched the of suffering wretching up from its depths and the scoria and pouring them down the to whelm the nations? Oh, if I could r all the heartstrings, the broken heart-ings, into a harp I would play on it a dirge such is never sounded.

DOMESTIC DUTIES.

ry picture is a home picture, whether she is rtaining an Elisha, or whether she is giving ful attention to her sick boy, or whether she is aling for the restoration of her property—y picture in her case is a home picture. Those not disciples of this Shunemite woman, who, g out to attend to outside charities, neglect duty of home—the duty of wife, of mother, of ghter. No faithfulness in public benefaction ever atone for domestic negligence. here has been many a mother who by inde-able toil has reared a large family of children, pping them for the duties of life with good ners and large intelligence and Christian prin-les, starting them out, who has done more for world than many another woman whose name ounded through all the lands and through centuries.

remember when Kossuth was in this country e were some ladies who got reputation, honor-putation, by presenting him very gracefully bouquets of flowers on public occasions; but t was all that compared with the work of the a Hungarian mother who gave to truth and ization and the cause of universal libert— a suth? hen this prophet wanted to reward her for her tality by asking some preferment from the , what did she say? She declined it. She : "I dwell among my own people," as much as to say: "I am satisfied with my lot; all I want is my family and my friends around me. I dwell among my own people." Oh, what a rebuke to the strife for precedence in all ages.

COMPETITION IN DISPLAY.

How many there are who want to get great architecture, and homes furnished with all art, all painting, all statuary, who have not enough taste to distinguish between Gothic and Byzantine, and who could not tell a figure in plaster of Paris from Palmer's "White Captive," and would not know a boy's pencilling from Bierstadt's "Yosemite." Men who buy large libraries by the square foot, buying these libraries when they have hardly enough education to pick out the day of the month in the almanac! Oh, how many there are striving to have things as well as their neighbors, or better than their neighbors, and in the struggle vast fortunes are exhausted and business firms thrown into bankruptcy, and men of reputed honesty rush into astounding forgeries.

Of course, I say nothing against refinement or culture. Splendor of abode, sumptuousness of diet, lavishness in art, neatness in apparel—there is nothing against them in the Bible or out of the Bible. God does not want us to prefer mud hovel to English cottage, or untanned sheepskin to French broadcloth, or husks to pineapple, or the clumsiness of a boor to the manners of a gentleman.

God, who strung the beach with tinted shell, and the grass of the field with the dew of the night, and hath exquisitely tinged morning cloud and robin redbreast, wants us to keep our eye open to all beautiful sights, and our ear open to all beautiful cadences, and our heart open to all elevating sentiments. But what I want to impress upon you, my hearers, is that you ought not to inventory the luxuries of life among the indispensable, and you ought not to depreciate this woman of the text, who, when offered kingly preferment, responded, "I dwell among my own people."

V. Yea, this woman of the text was GREAT IN HER PIETY.

Just read the chapter after you go home. Faith in God, and she was not ashamed to talk about it before idolaters. Ah, woman will never appreciate what she owes to Christianity until she knows and sees the degradation of her sex under Paganism and Mahomedanism. Her very birth considered a misfortune. Sold like cattle on the shambles. Slave of all work, and at last, her body fuel for the funeral pyre of her husband. Above the shriek of the fire worshippers in India and above the rumbling of the juggernauts, I hear the million-voiced groan of wronged, insulted, broken-hearted, down-trodden woman. Her tears have fallen in the Nile and Tigris and the La Plata and on the steppes of Tartary. She has been dishonored in Turkish garden and Persian palace and Spanish Alhambra. Her little ones have been sacrificed in the Indies and the Ganges. There is not a groan, or a dungeon, or an island, or a mountain, or a river, or a lake, or a sea but could tell a story of the outrages heaped upon her.

But thanks to God, this glorious Christianity comes forth, and all the chains of this vassalage are snapped, and she rises up from ignominy to exalted sphere, and becomes the affectionate daughter, the gentle wife, the honored mother, the useful Christian. Oh, if Christianity has done so much for woman, surely woman will become its most ardent advocate and its sublimest exemplification.

Two Trains were Saved from Destruction in Missouri a few days ago by the intelligence and courage of a child. The St. Louis Republican thus describes the incident: "Yesterday morning as the Jefferson City passenger train on the Missouri Pacific Railroad was rushing at full speed through the cut on the road between Glendale and Webster stations, the engineer noticed a little girl standing on the track waving her apron wildly and making other gestures, signifying that the train should stop. The engineer was undecided for a moment, believing that the child was at play. He looked again and saw the little maid still holding her position, and still waving aloft the signal of distress. The engine was reversed and the steam brakes applied, the train coming to a halt almost in the middle of the curve. Looking down the road a piece, the train men were horrified to see the Washington express coming down upon it and the little one still on the track waving her apron. The engineer of the incoming train saw the child's signal, and the engine was stopped within 100 feet of the Jefferson City train. Both trains were on the same track." The child, who thus standing at the peril of her life between the two trains rushing on to their own destruction, and waving her signal, must have been a most impressive spectacle. She was a type of the attitude of the religion of Christ, which in the midst of the world's tumults and in the face of impending disaster gives the warning signal and points the way of escape (Phil. 2:15, 16).

A Christian was Saved From Self-murder not long ago by the minister of the church he attended. The pastor was called up at midnight to visit a young man reported to be in a very strange condition. He was a young man of exemplary character and a professing Christian, of the genuineness of whose conversion no one had occasion to doubt. Upon the minister's arrival, he found his friend in his room partly undressed and walking about in a wild and purposeless manner, exhibiting strong marks of mental suffering. Upon the mantelpiece was an open razor, and under his bed eight or ten feet of rope. He would not speak when spoken to; but as he turned aside, the minister, hearing the rustling of paper concealed in his bosom, ordered him in a very peremptory tone to produce it. As he handed it over it proved to be his will. He was on the eve of self-destruction. For several days he was obstinately bent upon concealing the true cause of his distress, yet in every other respect he would implicitly obey his pastor's directions. He finally made a clean breast of his trouble. He stated that a grossly sinful thought had been suddenly thrust into his mind which filled him with horror; and this was immediately followed by so vivid an impression that he had sinned away his day of grace, that he mistook it as a literal voice from heaven, announcing his final doom. It was with great difficulty that he was convinced that the whole thing was a temptation of the devil; but when convinced and properly instructed, he became a cheerful, and a diligent worker in the Master's vineyard.

A Heroic Advocate's Memorial Church has been erected in Glasgow, Scotland. The Rev. J. Wells, of Glasgow, thus describes the death scene of the noble fellow whose memory the church is built to perpetuate. "On the evening of the 21st of January, 1876, after a terrible double collision on the Great Northern Railway at Abbot's Ripton, near Huntingdon, he was found lying on the snow, in the darkness, under the boiler of the engine. He was extricated only after two weary hours' of digging, and then, covered with wounds, and with one of his limbs torn open from the knee to the foot, he had to endure the agonies attending his tardy removal through snowdrifts to the hospital at Huntingdon. Although completely conscious and suffering acutely, no complaint escaped him to distract the attention of those who were laboring to save his life. His bearing throughout was that of a brave man, ready for the worst, accepting without murmur the lot which awaited him. 'I never could have imagined,' wrote an eye-witness, 'so calm and peaceful a resignation to so sad a fate as his.' 'Thank you, for all you have done,' he said; 'tell my mother I die in Jesus.'" His attendants often overheard him praying so earnestly for others that he even forgot himself, and they noticed his concern lest he should withdraw attention from any of his fellow-sufferers, whose necessities might be greater than his own. To one who was striving to relieve him while he was crushed under the boiler, he said, 'We are all selfish at times like this—cannot you help the man near me?' During forty hours the sufferer lingered in the peace of God. When told that it was Sabbath, he opened his eyes and said, 'A day of rest,' and at noon entered into 'the rest that remaineth.'"

ONLY WATCHFUL CHRISTIANS TO BE TRANSLATED BEFORE THE THREE AND A HALF YEARS' TRIBULATION.

By Rev. R. R. Albin, of Dorchester, Eng.

As a child of God, am I watching for the coming of my Lord? Do you, dear one, believe in the personal coming of the Lord to call His saints that fell asleep in Him from the dead and to translate (those who are watching for His coming) the living ones to meet Him in the air, and so to be ever with the Lord?

Perhaps you, like many more, are only looking for Christ to come to judgment, which takes place at the end of the world, or are looking for the millennium previous to Christ's coming, which is quite unscriptural. God's Word distinctly states that Christ shall come with His saints, and reign on this earth for a thousand years. John, on the Isle of Patmos, speaks in Revelation, 20th chapter, "I saw an angel come down and bind Satan for a thousand years," and "I saw thrones, and they that sat upon them, and judgment was given unto them," "and they lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years." Again, we read in God's Word, "For the Lord Himself shall descend from heaven with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God, and the dead in Christ shall rise first; then we which are alive and remain shall be caught up together with them in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air, and so shall we be with the Lord. Wherefore comfort one another with these words" (1 Thessalonians 4 : 16-18).

Then, as a child of God, am I watching for my Lord's coming? Do I long for His appearing? for we read in God's Word only to those who are thus looking for Him shall He appear. "And unto them that look for Him shall He appear the second time without (not coming again as a sacrifice for sin) sin unto salvation" (Hebrews 9 : 28). Unto salvation of the body as well as the soul, for at the coming of the Lord the redeemed soul will have a redeemed body, even like unto His glorious body.

You say—Will He come personally, or only spiritually? What does the Word say? "This same Jesus, which is taken up from you into heaven, shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven" (Acts 1 : 11). We see here two angels from heaven are sent to announce this fact to the disciples.

Yes, He will come, and come in person, as the man Christ Jesus, to fetch His ransomed ones; and to fight for His ancient people, the Jews, the remnant left in Jerusalem, who will, as He comes in the air, receive Him as their long-looked-for Messiah, the veil of unbelief having been removed from their eyes. "And His feet shall stand in that day upon the Mount of Olives" (Zechariah 14 : 4). We see He was taken up to heaven, as He appeared to the disciples, in the form of a man, in His glorified body, and thus will He appear at His second coming to this earth.

I think we have seen from God's Word, without doubt, that Christ Jesus will come in person to fetch His redeemed ones—His church—to be united to Him in the heavens, and also standing with His feet on the Mount of Olives (see Zechariah 14), He will fight for His people—the Jews—that is, the remnant then in Jerusalem converted, having, on His coming in the heavens, received Him as their Messiah, the veil removed from their eyes, by the passing through the great tribulation, viz., "Jacob's trouble" of three and a half years, having purified them.

At the time of His coming Jerusalem is surrounded by the great armies of the Antichrist-Emperor of Cæsar's original Roman Empire, an allied confederacy of Ten Kingdoms, ruled by Ten Sovereigns, represented by the ten toes of the Prophetic image, and the ten horns of the wild beast, in Daniel 2 and 7. Christ, as the Great Captain of His people, shall fight for them, "and shall consume with the Spirit of His mouth, and shall destroy with the brightness of His coming" (See 2 Thessalonians 2 : 8). This battle that will be fought is called the battle of Armageddon, and is described in Revelation 19, Zechariah 14, Ezekiel 38. After this the millennial reign commences.

Will all living believers, on Christ's second coming into the aerial heavens, be caught up to heaven at the same time? I think Scripture declares not. The watchful servants, who are looking and longing for their Master's return, will evidently be translated first, at the same time as those who have fallen asleep in Jesus. The remainder, though believers, but not looking and watching, will remain behind to PASS THROUGH THE GREAT TRIBULATION, to be tried and purified, and just before the appearing of Christ, who will stand upon the Mount of Olives, they will be translated, and will, with the other saints, attend the Saviour in His judgment of Armageddon. They will be the second fruits, as they of the first translation are the first fruits of the harvest. See Matthew 25 : 1-13 ; Revelation 12 : 5 ; 14 : 1-4 ; 7 : 9.

Thus we see from the Word of God that Christ will come in person. First into the aerial heavens, to translate the living saints together with those who fell asleep in Jesus, to Himself, and with them will descend in judgment upon Antichrist and his armies around Jerusalem. He will then take upon Him His right, and reign King of Israel, and King over the whole earth, and His saints shall reign with Him.

When will this take place? Maybe very soon; evidently we are in the end of the last days. Prophecies are fulfilling fast. Let us take heed, lest that day should come and find us unprepared, "For the Son of Man cometh in an hour when ye think not," "Watch, therefore, for ye know not what hour your Lord doth come; but know this, that if the good man of the house had known in what watch the thief would come, he would have watched, and would not have suffered his house to be broken up; therefore, be ye also ready" (Matthew 24 : 42-44).

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Day Dream Dispelled.—The Rev. James Scott said, at a recent meeting in Glasgow: "I met a friend to-day who inquired, 'Have you heard that a legacy has been left you?' 'No,' I answered, 'I have not.' 'There has been, though,' he rejoined. Very naturally I was pleased, and began thinking, 'What shall I do with this money that is coming to me?' So I actually planned how it was to be laid out. When the letter came intimating the legacy, however, it turned out that the money was not for myself, but for the work in which God is using me. I was exceedingly glad to get the money for this purpose, but my own day dream, in which I had built a castle in the air, was falsified. My disappointment arose through conclusions built on an imperfect report. In a similar manner all who seek happiness in the world's pleasures, neglect to live as God tells them, and refuse or pay no heed to His gracious offers of pardon, must be aroused by the Holy Spirit from the delusive day dream to a proper realization of the awful reality. Leave off building 'castles in the air,' and build on Christ, the Rock of Ages, if you would be safe now and hereafter."

A Powerful Illustration.—Mr. Scott also said, "I preached in Wynds some years ago, and remarked during my sermon that, 'If I had intimated that I would bring a bagful of gold with me to-night for distribution among the very poor in this audience'—I was going to tell how the people would act, when a woman shrilly and excitedly called out, 'Ah, that would be grand!' thus emphasizing in an expected way the illustration I was using. How true it is that people are so inordinately greedy for the gold that perisheth, and utterly indifferent to the eternal salvation of Christ, which no gold can buy."

A Commercial Traveller's Story.—At the Gospel Temperance meeting on September 22d, a commercial traveller said: "I was well brought up by Christian parents and led a fair moral life until I was twenty-five years of age; then a restless feverish desire, which I thought was irresistible, came over me and I went forth into the world to be away from the restraints of home. You all know the usual routine of a man determined to drain to the last drop the cup of sinful pleasure, so that I need not enter into details which I not benefit you, but simply say that I received many warnings and calls, but rejected them. My father died and left a considerable sum of money and a good business to me. By this time I was a drunkard and felt that I had no hope, spent all the money and ruined the business which my father had made. When I left the place where I spent my time and money along with companions till two o'clock in the morning even although I was drunk, I felt overpowered by a sense of my sins, and cried out for help and help to the God whom I was defying. On the 16th of April last I heard Mr. Moody, and then resolved that I would no longer exalt myself, but come humbly as a penitent sinner and cast myself at the foot of the Cross. The Lord has saved me from a drunkard's hell, and from a drunkard's life. Nothing but the power of God could have done so, and nothing but the power of God can keep me."

Hell upon Earth.—Mr. James John said: "Last Thursday and Friday were the days in Paisley. On Friday afternoon, when the races were over, I took a walk through the town and never in all my life have my eyes looked upon a scene such as I saw then. Half the people whom I met were drunk. The sober, respectable people of the town had, as usual, left during the day, and in their place it seemed as though all gamblers, swearers, drunkards and black-legs of the country had come. Can nothing be done to put this state of matters right?"

A Pleasant Reflection.—At the same Meeting Mr. Smilie said: "To-day, at one o'clock, I called to look upon the remains of a man who had been, as a sheaf of corn, fully ripe. Half an hour previous to his death he was conscious, and to me: 'A deathbed's not the place for remembrance. What would I have done if I had not come reconciled to God, through Jesus Christ long ago. With this bodily pain upon me I do not have repented if I would.' Notwithstanding the torture of body, he passed away in peace, leaving not in his own blameless life, but in the doing grace of God, whose pardon he had received by the Holy Spirit to accept in time."

Another Trophy from Infidelity.—The Rev. Mr. Duncan said: "I think that our best victory to take all our infidel opponents to the Bible support of this I will relate an incident which took place in Dumbarton lately. We were trying to gather a crowd in the street, but were not successful in doing so. We found that the Young Men's Christian Association were holding an evangelistic meeting in the street, and they very handsomely handed over their meeting to us. One of our young men in the crowd, an infidel, sneered at us, but listened to the Word of God. As he did so the Holy Spirit fastened home the truth upon his heart, and he was led to Christ. The next day he was doing all in his power to help us."

A Business Man's Confession.—"I was speaking to a gentleman the other day who is very prosperous in business, and making money with extraordinary celerity. In the course of our conversation about the unsatisfactoriness of all earthly things, he said, 'I am positively tired of all this thinking about money, money; I am sick of the very sound of it!' Though this man had the command of the god of this world, Mammon, yet his soul revolted from the degrading enslavement to the pursuit of riches as though it alone were the living force, instead of the service of Christ, and glory of God."

In Peril from Indians.—At the same Meeting Mr. Shorrey said: "I remember an incident in the old days when the railway was not in existence across to California, and it was a journey fraught with danger to travellers, from stormy winds, and from white men who lived upon robbery, and scrupled not to murder whole carloads so that they might steal the money usually carried on the person of the traveller. One day as we were journeying, word came to our leaders that the Indians were on our path, a sharp look-out was kept during the daylight, and when darkness began to hide strict orders were given to put out the fire which had been lighted to cook our evening meal. The women and children were gathered together and the wagons placed in a circle round them. Our horses besides being hobbled as usual, were fastened to the wagons and food given to them there instead of being allowed to wander in search of themselves. The men were all armed and posted in different places on the watch, in such a way that one could sleep and another watch turn about. An old woman who always read a few verses at night felt quite distressed at the thought of not seeing to read as usual, and searched in the embers to see if there was even one cinder left burning, to her relief she found one and carefully shielding it, she opened her Bible and blew the little bit of charred wood into a flame. While it flickered for an instant she read aloud, 'The Angel of the Lord camps round about them that fear Him and delivers him.' The small company laid themselves down to sleep resting on this heaven-sent message, and were safely kept in quietness till next day—not only so, but they were not troubled during the rest of the journey."

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

AN OPIUM HABITUÉ.

MAGGIE MITCHELL, writing to Miss Carrie F. Judd, says: In response to your request that I should write out my experience with opium, I thought I would write it this afternoon. I commenced taking opium ten years ago last September, by the advice of my physician, to quiet pain, as I was so situated at the time, that I could not give up work. I took it to keep up my strength, and from fifteen drops twice a day, I increased it to three tablespoonfuls twice a day, for about six months. Then I stopped it all at once, and stopping so suddenly brought on paralysis. Then the doctor gave it to me for two years steadily. Then he gave it to me off and on for three years more; but the habit was growing so strong that he would not give it to me any longer, for he thought it would ruin me both soul and body; but I would get it without his knowledge. If I could not go out to buy it myself I would ask strangers to get it for me.

This winter the doctor had to leave the city for a few weeks, and he left me a powder for external use that had morphine in it, and my pain was so intense that I ate it. When the doctor found it out he took it away; and then the bitter struggle that I had! It seemed to me that I must kill myself. I walked the floor all night long; and one night, when it seemed that I could not stand it any longer, I got down on my knees, for the first time in ten years, and I just told the Lord that I would not get up until I had gained the victory. Bless the Lord, He granted my prayer, and now I will never take the vile stuff while I live, with God's help.

A NERVOUS SUFFERER.

Miss Carrie F. Judd publishes in her excellent paper, Triumphs of Faith, the following letter written by Mrs. T. L. Mansfield of Glasgow, Ky., on August 21st, 1882: "For several months before I was confined to my bed, my health was very poor. In September, 1875, I was taken down suddenly with spells of extreme nervous suffering. Physicians were called in, one and another, until 1880; ten or twelve different ones treated me. I was relieved temporarily in some respects. My case was complicated; few, I think, could be more diseased than I was. There was no ease nor comfort for me, only by taking morphine as directed by my physicians, for four or five years. For months and years I could neither sit, stand nor walk, for the pain.

"Several weeks before I was healed, I heard of 'Pink Cottage.' I was soon ready to go to that place, believing there was a blessing awaiting me. My husband thought it very foolish, but he went with me. I had not been at the Faith Cottage long, and heard the word and seen God's glorious works, before I came to myself and said, 'Where have I been all my life.' I then asked God to first heal my soul perfectly. Bless the Lord, I stepped out of darkness into light; oh, what a blessing it was!

"I then prayed for the healing of my poor afflicted body. Satan tried in many ways to make me doubt, but I felt Jesus too precious to disbelieve His word. I willingly gave up all medicine and earthly physicians. I even gave up the morphine which I thought I could not live without, and praise the Lord, I haven't wanted any of it. I claimed the promise in Jas. 5: 14, 15; was anointed July 4th, 1882, and was most wonderfully healed, soul and body. I had just been suffering so much pain, that I asked Jesus if it was His will for me to live and serve Him in my afflicted state; if so, I was more than willing, but if His will to heal me I was waiting His time not mine. Just then a thrill passed through my whole system. I asked the Lord if it was His healing power. I was lying down, and He bade me arise and go tell it. I arose, and again asked, that I might be sure. Again I was urged to rise and go tell it. I did so, and am still repeating the story o'er and o'er, giving God the glory forever."

BETHSHAN.

At the weekly meeting of the friends of the faith healing home in London at Bethshan, 10 Drayton Park, conducted by Rev. W. E. Boardman and Mrs. M. Baxter, wife of the editor of The Christian Herald, on October 18th the following testimonies were given:

Mrs. Baxter said: "While my husband and I were at Bristol recently, we were taken to visit two sisters, both of them being very ill; one suffering from consumption. The doctor had pronounced both the cases as hopeless. I said to them, 'Now, we will lay hold of the Almighty,' and we did, and these two women are now quite well, and have applied this very day to my husband, to employ them in the Lord's work. The person who wrote the letter for them, for neither of the young women could write, was one of the first of the cases healed in Bethshan, so there are three who, at first useless members of society, have been healed by God's strength, and each one of them, I think, has also received healing through the blood of Christ."

Mr. St. George then said, "On Monday night last, very late, a messenger came from Chalk Farm, asking Miss Murray to go and anoint the messenger's sister, who was very ill. Miss Murray, being engaged and very busy, I myself went with the messenger. On arriving at the house I found the afflicted one in bed exceedingly ill. She had all the symptoms of an acute attack of rheumatic fever, her pulse having almost ceased to beat, and her joints being slightly swollen, although she had only been attacked at mid-day. She said she had given her heart to the Lord, but was still in doubt as to whether He had taken it or not. Having been assured that God was more ready to receive than she was to give, I prayed with and anointed her. The following day, Miss Murray had a letter saying that the patient, who had been so near death's door, was quite well and able to get up."

Miss Williams said: "I have always been very delicate in health and my whole frame has been liable to acute suffering when a sudden appearance of inclement weather came on. I never felt more depressed than I did this morning. The words however, came to me, 'Wait on the Lord, be of good courage and He shall strengthen thy heart.' I took courage, and strength came, and I was able to walk through the foggy streets, without experiencing the slightest ill effects.

"There is another case, too, which I would like to mention. Mr. Graham, whose wife is here to-night, recently lost his reason—the result of a crushing blow in business. On the occasion of our last meeting here, we prayed for the poor man, and when Mrs. Graham went to visit him on Monday, she found him much better, although the doctor had given his case up as being decidedly hopeless."

Mr. Burns, city missionary, testified that for three years he had been a cripple, and, for four years or more, he had been afflicted with chronic rheumatism. He had been under about twenty different doctors, but he thanked God that he had been induced to go to Bethshan, where he found the blessing he required.

Another gentleman stated: "I had been suffering with rheumatic fever, but am now restored by means of prayer and anointing. I wrote to my friends in Ireland regarding the marvellous cures, and a friend suffering from rheumatism in his back, together with a female afflicted with cancer in the breast and leg, wrote back, soliciting prayers in their behalf. The former case is completely cured, while in the case of the woman, the cancer in the leg is nearly healed, that in the breast being completely so. You may thus see that even at a distance of over 400 miles our prayers can be answered."

MEETING THE RETURNING LORD.

By Rev. A. J. Gordon D.D., of Boston Mass.

I HAVE an observation to make upon the words "to meet the Lord in the air," (Thess. 4: 16-18). The word used in the original is apanteesis—not the verb, but a noun; and, literally, is "caught up into the air to the meeting of the Lord." The word apanteesis occurs in three other places in the New Testament, and invariably signifies a meeting for the purpose of receiving and welcoming the individual, and to escort him back. Thus it is in Matt. 25, where the ten virgins are first said to go forth and meet the bridegroom (verse 1), and then are surprised in their slumber by the cry, "Go ye out to meet Him" (verse 6). It occurs the third time in Acts 28: 15: "And from thence, when the brethren heard of us, they came to meet us (eis apanteesin eemin) as far as Appii Forum, and The Three Taverns; whom when Paul saw, he thanked God, and took courage. And when we came to Rome," etc. It is evident here that they met Paul, not to stay with him at The Three Taverns, but to continue with him by going back with him. And the whole context in Thessalonians seems to require that we explain it of the saints going out to welcome the Lord in the air; not to continue in the air with Him, but to accompany Him on His visit here, and therefore to return with Him. [Abdiel's Essay on the Advent and Kingdom of Christ, p. 70.]

This note gives, we believe, the true explanation of those seemingly contradictory statements which we have in the Epistle to the Thessalonians that Christ comes for His saints, and, again, that He comes "with His saints." In the text at the head of this article we have the Lord coming for His saints. In Thessalonians 3 we have Him coming with His saints, "to the end He may establish your hearts unblamable in holiness before God, like our Father at the coming of the Lord Jesus Christ with all His saints."

We view the matter like this: When the President of the United States visited Boston, a few years since, a company of gentlemen went forth just beyond the limits of the city, and met him, and escorted him into the town. The risen saints and the translated living believers will be caught up together to meet the Lord in the air at the sound of the trumpet. These will form a kind of body-guard, a glorious escort, to the advancing King, attending Him on His conquering way, as He comes to set up His kingdom. They are sharers with Him in the triumphs of His kingdom. He comes to take the throne of His father David. But He is not alone upon that throne. "Verily I say unto you, That ye which have followed Me, in the regeneration when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of His glory, ye also shall sit upon twelve thrones, judging the twelve tribes of Israel."

The Church, as the Bride, is a kind of queen consort to the King of kings. She is the subject of Christ, indeed, but, as sharer of His throne, she is His co-partner. He comes to judge the world, but His Church shares the honor with Him. "Do ye not know that the saints shall judge the world?" He will judge the angels. And to His brethren the word is, "Know ye not that ye shall judge the angels?" He will rule over the whole earth. And to His own He saith, "If we suffer with Him, we shall also reign with Him."

Caught up to meet the Lord, and to welcome Him to His blood-bought inheritance! Oh, what distinction, to be the imperial body-guard of the King of all the earth. This honor have all His saints.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The thanks of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are due to a large number of subscribers who have written to the office, expressing their high regard for the journal, and stating their intention to introduce it to their friends, with the view of obtaining new subscribers for the coming year. Their efforts would have a better chance of success if commenced now, than at the end of next month, when people will have made their arrangements for 1883. In recognition of this fact a concession in price will be made. They may offer THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, postage paid, from this time to the end of 1883 for $1.50—that is, fourteen months for one year's subscription. This concession is made in order to aid the friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and to encourage them to proceed at once with their kindly project. It is hoped that every subscriber will use his influence, however small it may be, to send at least one new subscription, in addition to his own, for 1883.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The News of the Democratic Victory in New York last week surprised the country, not because it was unexpected, but on account of the overwhelming numbers by which it was achieved. Never has the Governor of any State been elected by so immense a majority as that by which Mr. Grover Cleveland is elected Governor of New York. The latest return places the figure at 196,413. The significance of this result may be realized when it is remembered that only two years ago New York gave Garfield a majority of 21,033, and that Mr. Folger, now the defeated candidate, carried the State in the same election by a majority of 44,160. Besides this, the Democrats gained seven congressmen in the State including the Congressman-at-Large, and carried the entire Democratic ticket by large majorities. That this result is due to a change of political principles by the voters no one believes. It was evident from the first that thousands of Republican votes would be given to the Democratic candidates, not because the voters had become Democrats, but because they could not conscientiously support their party in the line of policy its bosses had adopted, and would prefer to see it defeated than victorious on its present lines. The fraud and forgery in the Saratoga Convention and the appointment of the notorious John F. Smyth to the Chairmanship of the State Committee were only specimens of the policy which alienated the most influential members of the party, and caused them either to vote the Democratic ticket or to abstain from voting at all. The organs of the Republican party in the State attribute the defeat to the influence of Mr. Blaine and the section of the party which acknowledges him as a leader, but the facts all tend to show that the result of the election is the work of the people and not of the leaders at all, and that the love of honor, justice, and righteousness is stronger in the hearts of the people than mere party allegiance.

The Democratic Tide of Victory Appears to have swept over almost the entire country. General B. F. Butler is now the Democratic Governor-elect of Massachusetts; in Pennsylvania the Cameron ticket was overwhelmingly defeated; Connecticut elected a Democratic governor, and in New Hampshire the Republican candidate barely escaped defeat. The most important feature of the elections is that the House of Representatives will now be Democratic by a majority of 71, there being 198 Democrats and 127 Republican Congressmen. Counted by states, too, the result is in the same direction, for the Democrats have a majority in twenty-two state delegations. Respecting the constitution of the new House a Washington correspondent has calculated that of the 325 men who have been elected in the Forty-eighth Congress, 178, or more than one-half, are not members of the Forty-seventh Congress. With very few exceptions they are new men. Two of them have served in the United States Senate, and half a dozen or so have been members of the House in previous Congresses. Of the 57 members of the House in the Forty-seventh Congress whom Speaker Keifer appointed to be chairmen of committees only 23 have been re-elected. Some of the 34 not re-elected were not renominated by their constituents, and the remainder were beaten at the polls—a fact which shows that the protest raised in the House against Mr. Keifer's selections had the sympathy and endorsement of the people. One prominent issue of the elections may give satisfaction to the Republican party; the notorious Robeson has been defeated in New Jersey. It will, even in defeat, be a consolation to reflect that the party is no longer led by such a man. It is not long since Mr. Robeson stated in the House that what he was he would continue to be, but his district has falsified his prediction so far as his Congressional seat is concerned.

The Vote in Utah which it was Anxiously expected would furnish evidence of the effects of the recent legislation is disappointing. A telegram from Salt Lake City says: "Returns received indicate about 6000 Gentile votes and 24,000 Mormon votes, a Gentile gain of 2000 on the vote of six years ago. The last time the Gentiles seriously contested a general election, four years ago, nothing was done. In the Cannon-Campbell contest, two years ago, the Gentiles were not generally registered. The Gentiles made a thorough canvass, but have apparently made no inroad on the solid Mormon vote."

At the Bowery Mission in New York interesting services were held on November 5th in celebration of the second anniversary of the institution. In the course of an address given by the pastor, Rev. A. G. Ruliffson, he said: "The past year has been one of prosperity and blessed fruits. Forty-eight thousand people have attended our meetings or visited the Home. In addition to the meetings which have been held every night in the year, there have been 200 Bible or preaching day-services. God only knows the actual results of these meetings. The people we reach come from all classes of society and from all countries. Men from the prisons, the gambling hells, and the gutter, have been reclaimed in this room. So many after conversion desired the benefit of a Christian home, that our committee decided to open a place of this character. Young men can here find a refuge from their old associates. We have robbed the gambling hells of their patrons and the saloons of their customers. We propose to keep on this work and do just as much robbing of this kind as we can." Many persons were present who had derived benefit from the mission. Some of them have been rescued from a life of crime and are now leading Christian lives. One of them said: "One-third of my life has been spent in prisons. I served a twelve years' term in the Massachusetts State Prison. A few months ago I wandered into this mission and found Christ." "I was a professional thief for forty-six years," said another. "My life was full of danger and trouble. I finished one term in prison only to commence another soon after. I was walking down the Bowery one night, when a man at the door of the mission asked me to come in. I entered and after that went many times. Now I am trusting in Christ for salvation."

The Meetings of the Christian Convention held at Cleveland and Indianapolis, like those at St. Louis and Chicago, were largely attended. In both cities the churches in which they were held could not contain the crowds who desired to participate in the meetings. In Cleveland fully 2500 remained to the after-meeting, giving evidence of the impression for good that had been produced. Of these a large proportion arose for prayer in response to the invitation given, and it is believed that many souls entered on a new life and will look back with joy and thanksgiving to the closing day of the convention. The singing of Mr. and Mrs. McGranahan, in connection with these services, was not only a most interesting and attractive element in the success of the convention, but was the means of fastening more deeply the impressions made by the speakers. Among the latter were Mr. Charles Spurgeon, Major Whittle and Rev. W. J. Erdman.

Mr. John B. Gough has been Compelled to abandon the lecturing tour on which he recently started. He has cancelled all his lecture engagements for the present, and returned to his home in Boylston, Mass., for rest. It is stated that early in his tour he contracted a severe cold and became seriously ill.

The Passion Play is again Announced for performance in New York. This time it is stated by the promoters that it will not be abandoned in deference to public opinion. In order, as far as possible, to disarm opposition it will not be performed in a theatre, but in a building specially fitted up for it, and the performers will not be professional actors but trained amateurs. The pastors and churches of the city should lose no time in protesting against this blasphemous profanation.

The Yellow Fever is Decreasing, is the Wel-come intelligence from Pensacola. On November 6th six new cases and one death were reported. The Board of Health received from the National Board of Health an additional appropriation of $2000 for the pay of nurses, in consideration of the extension of this burden upon its resources so far beyond the limits of any reasonable estimate in the beginning of the epidemic or for a long time subsequent. Seven new cases and one death were reported the following day, but since that until the end of last week the reports gave only seven new cases and two deaths. The total cases to November 12th were 2323 and the deaths 192.

An Important Temperance Meeting Com-posed of clergymen of various denominations, was held in Boston, Mass., on November 1st, in behalf of a proposed amendment to the Constitution against the manufacture and sale of intoxicating liquors. The meeting was called to order by the Rev. Dr. Dorchester, who gave a historical sketch of the temperance movement. The convention then organized, with the Rev. Dr. J. L. Withrow, of Boston, as President, and a large number of Vice-Presidents. Dr. Withrow delivered a brief address, in which he pointed out that all great reforms had come through the influence of the church. Speeches followed from several ministers advocating a constitutional amendment as the best way to attack the liquor traffic.

"Fool's Gold" is a Name Given to an Ore that only resembles the much-coveted metal. A day since a lady from the suburban district entered an office in Lewiston, Me., and asked to see one of the members of the firm. She drew forth a large lump of rock, and wanted to know if it contained gold. The stone glistened with brightness, and the woman said if it was gold her fortune is made, for she had a farm full of it. She was told it was fool's gold, or iron pyrites. Thereupon the spirits of the lady sank below zero, and where she saw millions a moment before, there was blank nothing. It is easy to understand the disappointment of the woman on finding that the glittering rock was worthless, but if it had really been gold she would probably have had a worse disappointment in after years on finding, as she assuredly could, that it could not bring her true happiness (sa. 49 : 6, 7).

The Palestine Colonization and Christian Missionary Association was last week incorporated in Boston, Mass. It is formed for the purpose of colonizing Palestine with industrious and energetic Christians, and by their prudence, labor, and perseverance restoring it to its former grandeur, so that it will not only be the centre of the world geographically, but also in art, science, and health. The members of the association claim that under proper management the soil can be restored to a very high state of cultivation, mineral resources developed, and mechanical industries established, thus producing vast commercial intercourse with other nations. It is the purpose of the association to run a line of packets between Boston and Palestine, and the management is now negotiating for the purchase of suitable vessels. This is another evidence of the approaching consummation of the fulfilment of prophecy. It shows that the attention of the Christian world is concentrating on Palestine (Isaiah 10 : 23).

A Novel Invention for Communicating Intelligence is described in a scientific journal. It is intended for distant communication in time of war, when other means of conveying intelligence to an intercepted body of troops are rendered impracticable by the enemy, or in time of peace when a shipwreck has occurred, or when a flood has isolated and endangered the lives of those living in towns situated in river basins. It is a small, captive, translucent balloon, containing an incandescent lamp to which electricity is conveyed by suitable means, and is elevated by hydrogen gas to any required height. By interrupting the current at certain intervals messages may be conveyed to the remote observers in the Morse or any other convenient alphabet. How valuable this invention may yet prove no one can predict, it may, however, be realized some day by a group of sorely-distressed people, in imminent peril of their lives, not knowing what to do, who looking upward in the night may see flashed out a message giving them direction or encouragement. So the Christian battling in the world looks up to heaven and receives new hope and courage from the words of his Father (Isa. 35 : 4).

A Bishop's Vision of his own Death was described on Sunday, November 5th, in the course of a sermon in Philadelphia by Bishop Bowman of St. Louis. He said : "On my return from Japan after holding service in my St. Louis church I returned home, where I was immediately taken sick with a lingering fever. At this point I seemed to fall into a kind of ecstasy, when I actually did not know whether I was alive or dead. I imagined that I was on board a most magnificent ship, and my young eighteen-months-old child, who had died twenty years ago, came to me and said that she had heard that I was coming, and had come to meet me. After some little conversation, which I do not recollect, she said : 'Do you not think that I have grown, papa?' She then rose in a form of glory which I have never before witnessed, and never more expect to see until I die, and then returned to her usual state, saying that she had come in that shape to see if I should know her. She then said that many friends had asked after me and were awaiting my coming, and that an old lady and gentleman had taken her up and kissed her, saying that her papa was their boy. I then asked her where her mamma was. 'Oh, she is off doing something for the Lord, but will be at the wharf to meet us on our arrival.' All this left an impression upon me by the magnificence of the surroundings. It seems to me that I have come back from the other world, and although it is peculiar for me to say that I was dead, it seems as if I was not in the body."

A Perplexed Christian Lady Received Guidance in a remarkable manner recently. A correspondent of a Chicago journal relates the incident in the course of a letter from Davenport, Iowa. He heard it from the lady herself, at whose house he was lately a guest. She said : "To the church of which I was a member quite a number of young converts had been added. It seemed necessary they should be banded together in order to form more intimate acquaintance and to be instructed. They seemed inclined to appoint me to do this. But I said : 'I feel my need of being taught rather than to teach others, of being led rather than leading.' But as they insisted that I should undertake it I went home to lay the matter before God in prayer. I laid my Bible on the table, went into my room, closed the door, and asked God to let me know what was His will. I asked God that when I opened my Bible the first verse on which my eyes rested should give me an unmistakable intimation of His will. After casting all upon God I went out, took up Bible, and opening it my eyes fell on the words : 'Arise, for this matter belongeth unto thee. We also will be with thee ; be of good courage and do it.'" (Ezra. 10 : 4.)

A Memento of Childish Sin and Folly was brought to light two weeks ago when an old house was pulled down. The owner of the house was superintending the demolition and saw as a part of a double wall was pulled down, a boy's wooden wagon containing an old horse pistol with a flask of powder and a bag of shot. The sight of the weapon recalled to his memory the events that led to its concealment fifty years before. When a boy he had saved his money and bought that pistol which when his father discovered he had forbidden him to keep. But the boy disobeyed his father and kept the pistol. In order to avoid discovery he had put it in his little wagon and finding there was a vacant space between the floor of his bedroom and the room underneath, he concealed it there. He would take it out when unobserved and play with it, and if disturbed would put it in the wagon under the flooring and give it a push to send it out of sight. On one occasion he pushed it too far and it fell over between the two walls and he was never able to recover it. Fifty years afterward, when he had sons of his own, it came to light to remind him of his own youthful misconduct. Young people too often forget that sins committed in their early days may, in years to come, rise to reproach them, and force them to cry with tears, Lord, remember not the sins of my youth (Psa. 25 : 7).

An Italian Boy was Suffocated in a Fruit Stand in New York last week. The boy whose name was Andrea Cerasca, was sharply reprovved for disobedience by his father at their home. Andrea was wilful, and did not immediately obey his father, and the latter threatened to whip him. Andrea ran out of the house. He was not pursued by his angry father, but fearing punishment if he returned, he went wandering around the city and did not go home all night. The father became alarmed and the next morning went to the fruit stand to which the boy usually attended during the day. He found the padlock of the door missing, but the door was fastened securely by a lock which could be opened and closed with a key on either side. He forced the door open and found the dead body of his son curled up among the boxes of fruit. He had crawled in for shelter, and to obtain warmth had lighted the charcoal stove used for roasting pea-nuts and then appeared to have fallen asleep and been suffocated. It was a fatal refuge to take from a father's wrath. Many a soul convinced of sin and fearing the judgment of God, instead of submitting to Him, and crying for pardon through Jesus, has fled for refuge to the scene of their daily vocation, and there has succeeded in silencing an accusing conscience and in falling into spiritual sleep (Matt. 13 : 22).

GOD'S NON-REMEMBRANCE OF SIN.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"I, even I, am he that blotteth out thy transgressions for mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins."—Isaiah 43 : 25.

"For I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more."—Jeremiah 31 : 34.

"For I will be merciful to their unrighteousness, and their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more."—Hebrews 8 : 12.

"And their sins and iniquities will I remember no more."—Hebrews 10 : 17.

Accumulated Testimony—The Men who do not Believe It—Sin Appearing Unpardonable—In the Light of the Law—Of Conscience—Satan's Sophistries—I. There is Forgiveness—Proved by the Spared Lives of Sinners—By the Ceremonial Law—By the Institutions of Religious Worship—Taught in the Lord's Prayer—Confirmed by Experience.—II. Forgiveness Tantamount to Forgetting—Not Stored up in God's Mind—Not Before Him in Court—Not Thought Over—Not Recalled—No Further Atonement Sought—The Fiction of Purgatory—God Will Never Upbraid the Pardonable—III. Forgiveness is to be Had—Jesus Having Borne the Sin—Through Mercy and Love—Way to Obtain It.

YOU see these texts are all alike in their declaration that the Lord will not remember His people's sins. I have taken four of them to make the basis of my sermon firm as adamant. It is written, "In the mouth of two or three witnesses every word shall be established." Here then, you have Isaiah and Jeremiah, two Old Testament saints affirming the same thing ; is not this enough ? Added to these you have the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews, who, in all probability, was Paul, and these three agree in one. Their united testimony is that Jehovah, the Lord God, will forgive the sins of His people, and do it in so complete a way that He will remember their iniquities no more.

Now, if I did not preach at all, but merely gave you these four texts to consider, I think the service ought to be full of comfort to all who know their guiltiness and are anxious to obtain mercy. That article in the creed is too little thought of—"I believe in the forgiveness of sin." Men flippantly declare that they believe it when they are not conscious of any great sin of their own ; but when his transgression is made apparent to a man, and his iniquity comes home to him, it is quite another matter.

When a man's sins are set before him in the light of God's countenance his first instinct is to fear that they are altogether unpardonable. If he does not state his unbelief in so many words, yet in the secret of his soul that takes hold upon him and darkens every window of hope. He looks to the law of God, and while he looks in that direction he will certainly conclude that there is no pardon, for the law knows nothing of forgiveness. What the law asserts the understanding also supports ; for within the awakened man there is the memory of his past offences, and on account of these his conscience passes judgment upon his soul, and condemns it even as the law doth. "God must punish wickedness," is the utterance of conscience ; "He were not the judge of all the earth if He did not do right ; and if He does right He must visit my transgressions with the threatened penalty." Thus, the thunder of Sinai is echoed by conscience.

Meanwhile the devil comes in with all the horrors of the infernal pit, and threatens speedy destruction. That same evil spirit who once pictured sin in glowing colors, and set before the sinner the pleasurable life of unrighteousness, now comes in and turns accuser, forestalls the final sentence, and hardens the man's heart by the assurance that there is no hope. Bunyan very aptly pictures Diabolus when he was attacking the town of Mansoul, as making Captain Past-hope unfurl the red colors which were carried by Mr. Despair, and he also speaks of the roaring of the tyrant's drum, which sounded forth terribly, especially by night, so that the men of Mansoul had always in their ears the sound of hell-fire ! hell-fire ! and all this to keep them from submitting to their gracious prince.

Thus, for once, the devil craftily co-operates with the law of God and with conscience; these would drive men to self-despair, but Satan would go further, and compel them to despair as touching the Lord Himself, so as to believe that pardon for transgression is quite impossible. The convinced sinner is able to believe that mercy may be shown to others; but as for himself, he signs his own death-warrant, and labors under the full persuasion that the acts of God's mercy can never extend to him. No stocks can hold a man so fast as his own guilty fears. The hangman's whip never tortured men so cruelly as doth an awakened conscience.

I. Our first theme is this—

THERE IS FORGIVENESS.

Our four texts all teach us that doctrine with great distinctness. Is not that a sublime assurance, "I, even I, am He that blotteth out thy transgressions for Mine own sake, and will not remember thy sins?" Does not Paul put it as from God's own mouth: "Their sins and iniquities will I remember no more." Remember how the Psalmist in the one hundred and thirtieth psalm makes this a special note of thanksgiving: "There is forgiveness with Thee that Thou mayest be feared." Let us adore the Lord because He delighteth in mercy.

For a minute or two let me try to prove—may it be to your satisfaction, O ye despairing ones—that there is forgiveness.

This appears, first, in the treatment of sinners by God, inasmuch as He spares their forfeited lives. When our first parents had transgressed they came at once under desert of penalty. The Lord visited the garden and convinced the offenders of their transgression; but instead of there and then pronouncing their doom, and casting them forever away from His presence, He talked to them of a certain seed of the woman that should bruise the serpent's head. How joyful is the fact that over all there was the sparing hand of God letting them live, and His cheering voice promising them ultimate deliverance. Would the Lord thus have spared them if He had not meant to show mercy?

The like is true of you and of me. If God had no pardons would He not long ago have cut us down as cumberers of the ground? But no; even yonder blasphemer was not smitten to death when he imprecated damnation upon himself; yon Sabbath-breaker was not cut down when he made the Lord's holy day to be an opportunity for wickedness; he that lied was not made a dreadful example of judgment like Ananias and Sapphira; he that stood out to oppose God was not swallowed up quick like Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. No, all these have been spared—and to what end, think you? Surely, the long-suffering of God is repentance, and repentance is mercy. God waiteth long because He willeth not the death of any but that they turn to Him and live.

In the second place why did God institute the ceremonial law if there were no ways of pardoning transgression? Why the bullocks and the lambs offered in sacrifice? Why the shedding of blood if God did not intend to blot out sin? Why the burnt offerings in which God accepted man's gift, if man could not be accepted? Assuredly He could not be accepted if regarded as guilty. Why the peace offering in which God feasted with the offerer, and the two united in feeding upon the one sacrifice? How could this be unless God intended to forgive and enter into fellowship with men? I confess I cannot understand the institution of priesthood and sacrifice unless mercy was intended thereby. Certainly, the evident design of the whole Mosaic economy was to reveal to man the existence of mercy in the heart of God, and the effectual operation of that mercy in washing away sin.

If you will think of it you will see that there must be pardons in the hand of God, or why the institution of religious worship among us to this day? Why are we allowed to pray in secret if we cannot be forgiven? Why are we bidden to use psalms and hymns and spiritual songs? God cannot accept the praises of unforgiven men; worshippers must be clean ere they can draw near to His altar with their incense; if, then, I am taught to sing and give thanks to God it must be because "His mercy endureth forever." Does God expect the condemned to praise Him? Will He shut us up in the prison-house for certain death and yet expect us to chant hallelujahs to His praise? It cannot be so. The very ordaining of prayer and praise indicates a design of mercy to the sons of men.

Why, dear friends, are there two special ordinances of God's house if in that house there is no remission of sin? Why the baptism of believers? It signifies our death in Christ to sin. But how so if we cannot be dead to sin? It signifieth typically the washing away of sin. But to what end, and to what use, except of delusion, if there be no washing away of sin by God's abounding grace? What means the Lord's Supper, that eating of bread with God and drinking of the cup in familiar fellowship with Him? Surely the ordinances of the Lord's house are full of invitation to such as bemoan their transgressions and are willing to come to Jesus for pardon and renewal. The very existence of a church, and of a Gospel ministry, and the toleration of divine worship are promises and prophecies of the forgiveness of sins.

THE FOUNTAIN OPENED.

Furthermore, my brethren, why did Christ institute the Christian ministry, and send forth His servants to proclaim His Gospel? For what is the Gospel but a declaration that Christ is exalted on high to give repentance unto Israel and remission of sins? Is not its great promise this—that God will put away our transgressions upon our believing in Jesus Christ, our Great Sacrifice? Assuredly there is a fountain opened for sin and for uncleanness; heavy-laden soul, that fountain is opened for thee. Now, once in the end of the world hath the Son of God appeared to put away sin by the sacrifice of Himself; poor guilty one, if thou believest, thy guilt was put away by His atoning death.

Why are we so earnestly commanded to preach this Gospel to every creature, if the creature hearing it and believing it must, nevertheless, still lie under his sin? There is forgiveness. Through the name of Jesus whosoever believeth in Him shall receive remission of sins. "Through this man is preached unto you the forgiveness of sins." "He that believeth in Him is justified from all things from which he could not be justified by the law of Moses." Paul saith, "God for Christ's sake hath forgiven you," and it is even so.

Now, you do not want any more arguments, but if you did I would venture to offer this. Why are we taught in our Saviour has left us, to say, "Forgive us our debts as we forgive our debtors," or, "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive them that trespass against us?" It is evident that God means us to give a real, true, and hearty absolution to all who have offended us. If, then, our forgiveness is real, so is His; if ours be sincere, so is His; if ours be complete, so is His; only much more so, inasmuch as the great God of all is so much more gracious than we poor, fallen creatures ever can be. Mind you do really and heartily forgive others, for your own pardon is to be measured thereby. See well to this.

The best of all arguments is this. God has actually forgiven multitudes of sinners. We have read in Holy Scripture of men who walked with God and had this testimony, that they pleased God; but they could not have pleased God if their sins still provoked Him to wrath; therefore He must have put their sins away. But I need not talk of past ages; there be many sitting among you this day who if you will ask them will tell you that they enjoy a clear sense of forgiven sin. They remember well that happy day when Jesus washed their sins away; and their state of peace, of joyful privilege, and of expectant hope, is to them intensely delightful, and may be to you an evident testimony that remission of sin is a real experience, and is known among God's people at this day. Sin can still be put away; the spot which seemed indelible can be washed out, till all is white as snow, through the precious blood of Christ. Our texts, all of them declare it, saying with one breath, "I will forgive their iniquity, and I will remember their sin no more."

II. Secondly, this forgiveness is sin. This is a wonder to me, a wonder of wonders, that God should say that He will do what some sense He cannot do; that He should utter speech which includes an impossibility, and yet that it should be strictly true as He intends it. We may not speak, except after the manner of men, the Lord God as having memory; and yet how blessed it is that He should Himself use the speech which is current among ourselves, and represent Himself after the manner of a man, and then say "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more forever." He wishes us to know that His pardon is so true and deep that it amounts to an absolute oblivion, a total forgetting of all the wrong-doing of the pardoned ones.

TANTAMOUNT TO FORGETTING

You know what we do when we exercise memory. To speak popularly, a man lays up a thing in his mind; but when sin is forgiven, it is not laid up in God's mind. A certain matter has happened and we remember it; storing it away in our memory. We reckon a man to be fortunate who has good memory, so that he can lay by things in his brain where he can get at them in time of need. The Lord will not do this with our sins. As for the ungodly, their sins are written with an iron pen, and the measure of their iniquity is daily filling, till it be poured out upon their own head; their sins have gone before them to the judgment seat, and are crying aloud for vengeance. As for God's people, their case is otherwise, the Lord imputeth not their iniquities to them, and does not treasure them up against a day of wrath. Of course the Lord remembers their evil doings, in the sense that He cannot forget anything; but judicially as a judge, He forgets the transgressions of the pardoned ones. They are and come not under His official ken.

In remembering, men also consider and meditate on things; but the Lord will not think over the sins of His people. A grievous wrong is apt to engross our thoughts. It often casts its shadow upon the mind, and you cannot get rid of it. I have known persons brood over an offence as a hen gathers her chickens under her wings. The wrong grows worse as they think it over. They carefully observe the offence from different points of view, and whereas they were indignant at first, they nurse their wrath and make it so warm, that it turns to fury. At first, they would have been satisfied with an apology; but when they have brooded over the injustice, it seems so atrocious that they demand vengeance on the offender. The merciful Lord doth not so to those who repent. No; for He saith, "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more."

Sometimes you have almost forgotten a thing, and it is quite gone out of your mind; but an event happens which recalls it so vividly that it seems as if it were perpetrated but yesterday. God will not recall the sin of the pardoned. I am blessed, thank God, with a splendid memory for forgetting what anybody says or does against me. I forget it, not because I try to do so, but because I cannot help it; and therefore I claim no credit for it. The other day when I was speaking kindly with a person I was reminded by another that this man had done me a great injustice years ago. I had no recollection of it, and when it was brought before my mind I was grateful that I had forgotten it, because I could honestly treat the man as a friend, as indeed he now is. The occurrence was banished from my mind till my memory was refreshed about it. The gracious Lord can never be refreshed in His memory concerning the sins of His people; they are gone past recall. "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath He removed our transgressions from us."

Furthermore, this not remembering, means that God will never seek any further atonement. The apostle saith: "Now where remission of these is, there is no more offering for sin." The one sacrifice of Jesus has made an end of sin. Under the old law they offered an expiatory sacrifice, but they must needs offer it again and again.

There was remembrance of sins made every year on the day of atonement; but now the blessed One hath entered once for all within the veil, and hath put away sin forever by the sacrifice of Himself, so that there remaineth no more sacrifice for sin. The Lord will never demand another victim, nor seek another expiatory offering. The sufferings of Jesus are so all-sufficient that no believer shall be made to suffer penalty for his unrighteousness.

Look at that fiction of

which is coming back into the English Church, and is hankered after by certain Dissenters. They are beginning to believe in a modified form of purgatory, and this is a dark sign of the times. Purgatory has always paid the Pope well; it is the fattest province of his dominions, and has furnished his larder plentifully. But how can God's people go to purgatory? for if they go there at all, they go there for sins which God does not remember, and so He cannot give a reason for sending them there. I have no authentic communication by which to describe purgatory, but by Romish report it is a terrible place; now, if true believers go there, then God either does remember their sins, which He says He will not do; or else He punishes them for sins which He does not recollect. Stand you to the truth revealed in Scripture, and to that only. The wicked shall go away into everlasting punishment, and the righteous into life eternal. If you are forgiven God will never remember your sins; so that in any shape or way you shall never have to make an atonement for them.

Again, when it is said that God forgets our sins it signifies that He will never punish us for them. How can He when He has forgotten them? Next, that He will never upbraid us with them—"He giveth liberally and upbraideth not." How can He upbraid us with what He has forgotten? He will not even lay them to our charge. See what Ezekiel says—"All his transgressions that he hath committed, they shall not be mentioned unto him." The apostle bravely demanded, "Who shall lay anything to the charge of God's elect?" Shall God do it? "It is God that justifieth," how then, can He accuse? Shall Christ do it? He is the Judge; but He cannot accuse, for "it is Christ that died, yea, rather that is risen again, who sitteth at the right hand of God, who also maketh intercession for us." Shall Jesus intercede for us and yet accuse us? Shall there come sweet waters and bitter waters out of the same fountain? No, that cannot be. The Lord has forgotten our sins, and therefore He can never lay them to our charge.

SECOND CLASS CHRISTIANS.

Once more, when the Lord says, "I will not remember their sins," what does it mean but this—that He will not treat us any the less generously on account of our having been great sinners. You that have been the chief of sinners, He will not put you in the second class of Christians, and treat you with a sort of second-rate love. He will not even remember that you have sinned, but treat you as if you had been perfectly innocent, and were totally clear from all iniquity. He will not remember your faults. Why, look how the Lord takes some of the biggest sinners and uses them for His glory. Is not this a proof that He hath ceased to remember their sins? When I think of Peter standing up on the Day of Pentecost, and three thousand being converted under his first sermon, I think no more of Peter's failure and the cock crowing. I can see that the Lord has forgotten his threefold denial, and placed him in the front to be a soul-winner.

See how condescendingly the Lord has taken some here present, and has honored them, and given them to bring blood-bought souls to Himself, in proof that He has wholly forgotten their sin. Then to think that He should adopt us into His family, we that were His enemies, and rebellious, and children of the devil. Is it not wonderful that He puts us among the children, and even makes us "heirs of God, joint heirs with Jesus Christ." Surely, when that testament was written by which he made us heirs with Christ, it was clear proof that the Father did not any more remember our iniquities.

Oh, that God would comfort His mourners by this sermon! I have a notion in my head that if when I was under the sense of sin I could have heard this subject handled, I should have found liberty at once. Though I had been hidden away in the back seat of the gallery out of sight, if only I had heard of such mercy as this, I should have jumped at it. I cannot tell how it might have been, for I do not remember hearing so plain a declaration of boundless grace. Oh, how I pray and hope that the Lord will lead some poor soul to accept this unspeakable blessing! Come, ye consciously guilty ones, and touch the silver sceptre of your reigning Saviour. He is ready to forgive: the atonement is made and accepted; the Saviour who died has risen again; therefore come to Him, and be at peace. Oh, that the blessed Spirit may lead you to feel the power of the reconciling blood!

III. I finish with the blessed fact that

FORGIVENESS IS TO BE HAD.

How is it to be had? Let me speak briefly, and do you catch up every word and think over it. Forgiveness is to be had through the atoning blood. Why does God forget our sin? Is it not on this wise? He looks upon His Son Jesus bearing that sin. Did you ever think of what God the Father sees in Jesus on the cross? Why you and I have seen enough to make us break our hearts, but when the Father saw His only begotten Son suffering even to death, it made such an infinite impression upon His great soul that He forgot the sins for which His Son gave His life.

Next remember that this forgetfulness of God is caused by overflowing mercy. God is love: "His mercy endureth forever;" and He desired vent for His love. His great heart was filled with a desire to display the grace which pervaded His nature; He must be gracious, and He would be gracious; and because of that divine resolve He cast our sins behind His back. Come, then, if you wish to have your sins forgiven! Come and bow before the mercy of God. How does God forget sin? Well, it is through His everlasting love. Do you not see then that if you want to enter into this pardon, this forgetfulness of sin, you must come to God on the terms of His free love, and ask Him to forgive you because His name is love? "Have mercy upon me, O God, according to Thy loving-kindness; according unto the multitude of Thy tender mercies blot out my transgressions."

Again, God forgets His people's sins because of the complacency He has in them as renewed and sanctified creatures. When He hears their cries of repentance, when He hears their declarations of faith, when He sees the love which His Spirit has wrought in them, when He beholds them growing more and more like His dear Son, He delights in them. His joy is fulfilled in them. He is well pleased with them, and communes with them lovingly.

Oh, you that would have the pardon of sin, come for it this morning in God's appointed way. "Repent," says He; that is, be sorry for your sin; change your mind about it and hate it, though once you loved it. Then confess it, for He saith, "only acknowledge thine iniquity." Chief of all, "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved," and that saving includes and oblivion covering all your sinful thoughts, and words, and acts. Trust the Lord Jesus Christ. There is the pith of it. Trust thyself in the hands that were nailed to the cross for thee; trust thyself to the love of the heart which was pierced, with a spear, and forthwith there came out blood and water. Hast thou done this? Then thou art even now forgiven; thy sin has gone; it is cast into the depths of the sea.

Go down those aisles with thy heart dancing within thee for delight, for there is nothing laid against thee now since thou art a believer in the Lord Jesus. God imputeth not iniquity to the man who has cast himself on the Saviour. Go thou hence and never forget thy sin, nor the mercy which has forgiven it. Always repent and always praise the Lord. Honor the forgetfulness of God in not remembering thy faults and henceforth do thou tell this blessed news to everyone thou seest—there is forgiveness, such forgiveness as was never heard of until God Himself revealed it by saying of His people, "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." God bless you dear friends, henceforth and forever. Amen.

"I'M TOO OLD NOW, YOU KNOW."

AND yet he wasn't so very old. Indeed, it was a question whether he could be called old at all. And I can imagine our friend Tomkins under different circumstances resenting this very appellation.

What were the circumstances?

I had been impressing on his mind the manifold claims of total abstinence. One by one I had broken down his arguments, until, by his own confession, he was vanquished. He could see, he said, that personal abstinence was an advantageous thing. He needed no more conviction on the subject.

And now, I very naturally expected to reap the spoil, of course. I proudly supposed that I had but to produce my pledge-paper, push a pencil into his hand, and bear away his signature in triumph.

But in the very midst of my rosy visions, and just as I was vividly picturing Tomkins' extensive form adorning some temperance platform preparatory to a stern denunciation of the drinking habits of the age, he said, "But I'm too old, you know."

My behavior under such trying circumstances was, I am proud to say, highly creditable. I neither got angry and stormed, nor sulked and retired. Pocketing the affront, and swallowing with a gulp my disappointment, which began to rise in the biggest of lumps, I proceeded, like a good general, to retrieve my dismal defeat.

Turning to Tomkins with the sweetest of smiles, I said, "Indeed!"

Perhaps I had nothing else to say at that particular moment. Perhaps if I had said anything more I should have said too much. Perhaps I wanted cooling. Never mind, it answered my purpose well, for it led to Tomkins' fuller explanation.

"You see, if I were a young fellow with more life than I knew what to do with, it would be easy enough. I would gladly become a total abstainer. But old blood, and old habits, and old connections, forbid it. I'm too old to try new things. Very sorry, but I'm too old now, you know."

By this time I had my ammunition ready, and my artillery in position, and began thus to fire away.

"Tomkins, a man is never too old to do a right thing. On other questions you would be the first to say this. I might even venture to surmise that you yourself have held up this very principle to admiration. How inconsistent then it is of you to use it for your own convenience! Too old to do right? Too old to follow your own convictions? Too old to take right steps? Too old to change for the better? I am ashamed of you. Who would have thought that so respectable, so moral, and above all, so Christian a man as Tomkins, should be found uttering such an unworthy sentiment as this? You ought to know better. You are not too old to do a right thing."

"But perhaps you mean that you are not able to give up strong drink now; that it has got too strong a hold upon you; that you are morally incapable."

"Then I answer, a man is never too old to be free. I think I heard you the other day humming the tune, 'Britons never, never will be slaves.' Of course you didn't mean it. Of course you meant quite the reverse—'Britons never, never will be free.' O! Tomkins, is it not shameful to bend the neck in homage to a wine glass, to call whiskey and water your lord and master? Where is your manhood? Where is your self-respect? Where is your proper pride? O, sad confession, 'I am too old now.'"

An Execution in Dahomey.

An Attack on a Missionary Ship.

"I rather fear that the wind lies in another quarter altogether, and that you are not dealing quite fairly with me. You are making your age a stalking-horse for something else. Your limbs seem muscular enough. I do not perceive any tottering. There is no lack of self-control, so far as I can see. Your appetite, however, seems a little shaky.

"Tomkins, it's not your age, but your taste which is in fault. You like it. It is grateful to your palate. You love it too much to give it up. This, I firmly believe, is the one great reason why you refuse to become an abstainer. It would be too great a self-sacrifice. It would cost too much. O, be honest, and say right out, 'I love it too much to give it up,' instead of 'I'm too old now, you know.'

"And, remember, you are not too old to do harm by your example. Youth looks up to age, and generally endeavors to imitate it. Some of your young admirers, be sure of it, will seek to copy old Tomkins. With such a weight of experience upon him, with so many years' wisdom to draw upon, with such knowledge of the world, Tomkins, of all men, must be right. Ah! how they will be deceived, for, in the matter of strong drink, you think one thing and do another. You have your convictions, and daily crush them. Oh! do try to appreciate the responsibilities of age. You can do more harm to-day than you did yesterday. No, you are not too old to do immense harm by your influence.

"Now, Tomkins, play the man, and act up to your convictions. The shorter the time you have left, the more you should try to do in it. Surely, it is not right to argue that age exempts you from self-sacrifice. Let your last years be your best years. The more it costs, the more cheerfully let it be done. I am sure you will look back with more satisfaction on a hard thing accomplished, for the sake of others, than on the petty excuse, 'I'm too old now, you know.'

"You are a Christian man. Your soul is resting on the merits of the Lord Jesus. You owe your all to Him. And when at last, through faith in His atoning blood, you dwell with your Redeemer in the home beyond, think you you will regret the step? No, you will delight in the remembrance of the moment when, for the sake of the example to others, you confessed, 'I'm not too old.'

AN EXECUTION IN DAHOMEY.

THE above picture represents an execution in the kingdom of Dahomey, in Western Africa, one of the dark places of heathenish cruelty, and, as yet, only partially penetrated by the missionaries of the Gospel of Christ. The country itself borders on the extensive territories occupied by the Ashantees, and its inhabitants are among the most powerful of native Africans. For warlike aggression and ferocious cruelty, this people have not been surpassed, even by the most bloodthirsty of their neighbors. Scenes of cruelty and blood have been enacted, the bare recital of which makes the most courageous to tremble.

Dalzel, a traveller, informs us that the king's body-guard consists of a troop of women. He says, "Within the walls of the different royal palaces in Dahomey are immured not less than three thousand women; several hundreds of these are trained to the use of arms, under female generals and officers, appointed by the king. These female warriors are regularly exercised, and go through their evolutions with as much expertness as the male soldiers." This strange corps of Amazon warriors takes a prominent part in the raids which are frequently made by the King of Dahomey into neighboring territories, for he is seldom at peace long together.

The following interesting incident is related by Commodore Wilmot, who once ventured to visit the sable monarch of his sanguinary tribe of Dahomians. He narrates that "while sitting in the tent a messenger arrived, saying, 'The king calls you.' I went and stood under the platform where he was. Tens of thousands of people were assembled; not a word, not a whisper was heard. I saw one of the victims ready for slaughter on the platform, held by a narrow strip of white cloth under his arms. His face was expressive of the deepest alarm, and much of its blackness had disappeared; there was a whiteness about it most extraordinary.

"The king said, 'You have come here as my friend, have witnessed all my customs, and shared good-naturedly in the distribution of my cowries and cloths; I love you as my friend, and you have shown that you can bear patience, and have sympathy with the black man. I now give you your share of the victims, and present you with this man, who from henceforth belongs to you, to do as you like with him, to educate him, take him with you, or anything else you choose.' The poor fellow was then lowered down, and the white band placed in my hands. The expression of joy in his countenance cannot be described; it said, 'The bitterness of death, and such a death, is passed, and I cannot comprehend my position.' Not a sound escaped his lips, but the eye told what the heart felt, and even the king himself participated in his joy. The chiefs and people cheered me as I passed through them with the late intended victim behind me."

A MISSIONARY SHIP BOARDED BY NATIVES.

Narrow Escape of Two Missionaries.

THE picture on this page depicts the excitement among the unchristianized natives of South-west Africa upon the approach of a missionary ship toward the coast. In the early part of the history of missions, one of the greatest difficulties experienced by the missionaries was in gaining the confidence of the barbarians and cannibals, whose eternal welfare they sought. Sometimes the animosity of the natives was manifested in the most unmistakable and alarming manner. To a considerable extent this was owing, not so much to the savage instincts of the heathen, as to the brutal treachery of parties of white men, from whose misconduct the natives had previously suffered. It was owing to this cause that the amiable and beloved Bishop Patteson and his companions were slain a few years ago by the natives of Melanesia.

When Messrs. Tyerman and Bennett were on a tour of inspection among the stations of the London Missionary Society on the coast of New Zealand, their vessel was lying at the mouth of a river, while they went on shore for a short time. During their absence the natives had pushed off from the beach in their canoes, and reaching the ship, clambered up its sides with marvellous agility, and crowding the deck, began to appropriate to themselves everything portable which they could discover. An attempt was made by the crew to clear the deck, in effecting which one of the natives fell overboard. Supposing that their countryman had been thrown into the sea, the natives immediately made the shore resound with their war cries and clamor for revenge.

The deck was soon thronged. The natives armed themselves with axes, billets of wood, and whatever else their hands could grasp. Not one of the passengers or crew could stir. An attempt at resistance would have been followed by instant death. The cries of "We are about to die!" burst from every tongue. Some of the blacks felt the bodies of the white men, and seemed to enjoy their expected meal in anticipation; while others held the uplifted axe, anxious for the signal to give the blow. One of the number, Mr. Threlkeld prepared himself to receive the impending blow of the club on his head so that he might be more easily despatched. His little boy inquired, "Will it hurt us to be eaten?" Another Englishman, though confidently looking forward to the glorious realities of eternity, still felt it his duty to speak in a friendly manner to the savages. Aboard, though certain of death, prepared to meet the shock with fortitude, except the cook, who, rather than be devoured, prepared to attach some shot to his feet and leap overboard.

While in this state of suspense the mission-boat hove in sight, and with it a ray of hope inspired every breast. The natives, too, relaxed their ferocious appearance. In the boat was the chieftain himself, who had been induced to return with the missionaries for the purpose of visiting the ship. Order was soon restored, and the multitude of irate cannibals dispersed.

A GALLANT RESCUE.

"COME along; who's afraid?" said a young man named Herbert Wilson to his young companion, Edward Rice. "We are going this trip in spite of wind and flood, and the croakings of a set of fellows who have no more courage than a pack of school-girls."

"All right," said one of the men of whom the other had spoken disparagingly, "go ahead. I don't care; it is not my funeral. If you two like to risk your lives, there's no one to prevent you."

"Better take a man with you," said another, "there's Johnson he knows the river well. You would find him useful, for there are a lot of banks and rocks that you can see well enough generally," but they are under water now and you'll know nothing about them till you strike, and then you'll know fast enough."

"Nonsense Harry," said the first speaker, "I am as good a man in a boat as any of your village yokels. I've been out on the Hudson and the Ohio, and the Mississippi many a time in a boat no bigger than this, and I guess I can navigate this stream without help."

"Ah," said Harry, "that's your mistake, you don't see the dangers because they are under water, and headstrong fellows like you always go that way in other things beside boating. You think yourselves so awfully smart because you live in a big city that you can show us the way around. Now just you put that conceit of yours out of sight for once, and take a man with you who may not be quite so clever as you are in things you admire in the city, but who knows his business and can take you down this river safely if any one can."

"Not I," said Wilson, "I tell you I'm going down with Rice, here. He is only a youngster but he can pull a good oar and he is not afraid to trust himself with me; are you Ned?"

"No," said Rice resolutely, "we know our way about, and where Wilson goes I go."

After this there was no more to be said, and the two strolled down to the point where their boat was moored, and were soon in mid-stream, pulling rapidly.

"Look out, Ned," he shouted after they had been pulling for about twenty minutes, "back water, the tide swirls a good deal just ahead, I guess that is one of the sunken rocks those fellows talked about. Pull hard with your right and we shall just escape it."

Rice pulled hard, as directed, backing water with his left oar to give the boat a sharper curve, and Wilson did the same, but it was of no use; the boat was broadside to the stream and her bow having touched the rock before she turned, she capsize and was keel uppermost in an instant. With a desperate struggle Wilson managed to grasp the boat, climbed upon it and then by the aid of an oar he still held, assisted his boyish friend to mount beside him. Their hope now was that the boat might float ashore. But no; one of the rowlocks had caught in some tangled weeds and held it firmly against the rock. "What shall we do now?" moaned Rice. "This place looks so lonely we might be here for a day without anyone seeing us and there is no swimming in such a current as this. There is a boat on the beach far away down yonder, but there seems to be no one with it. Let us shout and see if we can make anyone hear."

Then they shouted together as loudly as they could and the hills around echoed their cry, but no answer came. Would they have to remain there with the tide rising higher every moment, or would the rising water lift the boat in the night and carry them no one knew where, perhaps out to sea, or hoisting their frail support like a toy, dash it against some rocks and they be drowned. It was a horrible thought. The minds of both were busy as they maintained their precarious foothold with difficulty. At last Wilson said hoarsely, "Ned, can you pray? It is many a long day since I prayed, but I think we ought to, for we may not get out of this alive."

Rice's heart sank at that foreboding, and he said, "Yes, Herbert, I always pray, every night and morning. I promised mother I would when I left home," and then with a newly found earnestness inspired by terror and anxiety he prayed aloud for succor.

It was growing dark, and still no help. They shouted again and again. At last they saw two figures on the bank near the boat, apparently a girl about ten years of age with long, flowing hair, and an older girl, probably her attendant or nurse. Again they shouted, and with joy observed that they were seen. They expected to see the girls run to the house for help, but they did not, for though the watchers on the boat's keel did not know it there was no one to help. But what were they doing? Wilson said, "Surely those two are never going to risk their lives in coming out to us."

But they were. The little girl entered the boat and grasping both oars with her tiny hands held them firmly while the other girl shoved off the boat and deftly jumped in herself. Then seating herself in the stern she pulled one oar while the little girl with all her strength pulled at the other. They worked hard but cautiously hugging the shore until they came quite close to the spot where the eager watchers were. Then the older girl took both oars and very dexterously shot across to the wreck. They were saved. It was a gallant rescue, and the two brave girls were laden with a torrent of thanks.

Years afterward the memory of those hours of agony clung to both the saved men. It was a time never to be forgotten by either, and when the little girl rescuer grew up to womanhood she was wooed and won by Edward Rice, and was the means in the hands of God of leading him and his headstrong friend to One who could rescue them from eternal shipwreck on the sunken rocks of the world.

ONLY A TRAMP.

A Serial Story by Grace Stebbing.

The Tramp's Guest.

JEM BLAKE felt sore at heart, and miserable, an very discontented with himself, just in the mood to resent anything like blame, and to be sent deeper into the slough of worthlessness and despondency by harsh words. But the stranger had praised his father, who had always been the foremost object of his own unspoken admiration, and now he had actually praised Jem himself, an individual for whom Jem had begun of late to have a secret, bitter contempt, far greater than that entertained for him by the foreman of the works at Mr. Barnes's factory. He faced fully round to his welcome companion with a wider stare of amazement than before.

"You're joking a fellow?" he said anxiously. "You don't really think that I look like anything better than a drunken sot, fit for a share of a pigsty, do you?"

There was an evident eager longing for the better answer that none could mistake, and a sudden brilliant smile flashed into the face of the listener as he asked instead of answered:

"I suppose your name does not happen to be Aleck, does it?"

"What a queer chap you are," said the younger man, relapsing back into sullenness. "No; my name ain't Aleck, it's Jem; and if you only talked to me because you thought I were some feller as you'd knowed, I wish you'd kept away."

"But I did nothing of the sort," was the reply, with a graver face and a sadder tone. "The Aleck whom I knew, and loved better than I could have loved a brother, is dead; but he used often, in by-gone days, to ask my opinion as you did just now, and to come to me for counsel, and I gave him bad counsel until he got a light that I knew nothing of, and grew too wise to try to learn of a bad teacher. Now I thought that perhaps I had found some one to help this time, and not to hinder."

"Well, an' so you have then," said Jem Blake, with a sudden impulse to meet sympathy with sympathy. "A name don't make no odds, an' you've helped me—at least," more dolefully, "you tried to, and you'd ha' done it if you could any-ways ha' made out to say that I looked fit for help."

"And so you do," answered Charles Wynn decidedly, "and no more like a drunken sot than I am. Come, let us get up, and away from the neighborhood of your enemy over there. I'll walk with you to your lodging, if you'll let me. I suppose it lies somewhere in the town, like my own?"

There was a short pause, and then the answer came in a shamed tone. "It did lie nigh by Barnes's Factory—but I got kicked out by the landlord last night—owed three weeks' rent, an' now it lies in any corner the perliceman's bull's-eye don't find out."

"Umph!" murmured the ex-tramp thoughtfully, and then in a louder tone, "And what is your employment? what is your daily work?"

"Anything I can get," said Jem. "Mostly nothing the last fortnight. I did work at one of Barnes's machines for three years, but I got turned off for being drunk now and again two months ago, and some mean chap went and skulked into my place the very next day, without giving me a chance to beg it back."

"Oh!" ejaculated Charles Wynn. He guessed correctly who had slipped so quickly into poor Jem's post; but he had certainly not skulked into it with any shadow of meanness. He began to turn a good many thoughts and small plans rapidly over in his mind; while Jem Blake walked on beside him heedless where he went, seeing that it was necessarily a matter of complete indifference.

The two men reached Wynn's cottage in time, and he opened the door and entered.

"Oh!" ejaculated Jem Blake dolefully; "you are at home then? Well, thank you for letting a fellow walk with you. Good-night."

"Thanks," said Wynn cheerfully; "I'm always grateful for kind wishes; but we'll wish each other 'good-night' again when we've had our supper, and are going to bed. Come along in; you said you'd be another Aleck to me, so you'll have to be my guest to-night, and to-morrow you shall go right straight off to the good mayor himself, and ask for some more work; and if he won't say 'Yes' to you, I'll have a try at him."

Jem Blake listened, and allowed himself to be pulled by main force into the tidy kitchen in a state of dumb, dazed wonder. In this half-stupefied condition he remained, while his unexpected host closed the door, lighted his lamp, drew down the blind, lighted the fire with the despatch and neatness acquired in long years of practice, put on the kettle, laid the cloth with bread and cheese, and began to toast a couple of herrings, originally intended for his own dinner to-morrow. During this latter employment he burst out all unconsciously into bright snatches of song. Such joyous sounds had not passed his lips for months.

Jem came four feet nearer to the fire, and stared with all his might. His companion was very pleasant to look at just then, with a beaming gladness on his face, that was already beginning to lose something of the haggardness that had so deeply impressed Bobby Balston, as it lay against the wall of Silverdale Church, and his voice was very pleasant to listen to, with the ring of hopeful happiness sounding through whatever air he might happen to be singing.

But the herrings were cooked at last, and laid on a hot plate, and as their toaster brought them forward, and placed them at one side of the table, he ceased singing, and exclaimed with a boy's cheerfulness, "There now, I do call this jolly! I haven't had a guest for I don't know how long. Draw up your chair, Jem, and fall to on them at once; Aleck used to say he never found anyone who could beat me at cooking bloaters. Don't let them get cold."

Thus admonished Jem did draw up a chair, sit down, and gaze at the fish, but still like a person in a dream. His host busied himself with pouring out the tea, cutting bread, and so on, and carefully kept his eyes from his troubled guest.

At last Jem blurted out, "If I eat these, where's yours?"

"Mine? Oh, I've had my dinner," was the off-hand answer. "Eat them up at once, there's a good fellow, or they will do me no credit, and there's nothing like good food for driving away the craving for drink."

"N—no," began Jem, and then he broke down. He was still a very young man remember, and moreover his moral nature was weakened by drinking and fasting. He pushed away the plate, dropped his arms and his head on the table, and burst out in a perfect tempest of blubbing sobs.

"You don't think it," he stammered and stutered; "but—but—I—I am—a drunken sot, and—and—I'm not worthy our kindness or—or your help."

"No more was I worth kindness or help two months ago," said Charles Wynn, in a low, quiet tone. "I was a poor homeless vagabond like you, then, and ever so much more dingy and disreputable-looking, I can tell you. But I got help and kindness all the same, help that was better than help; for it gave me hope that I might yet gain strength to help myself. Now the mercy is granted me of being able to help you. And if you only knew the comfort you have been to me already you would not grudge me the pleasure of seeing you eat your supper."

But the herrings got cold, and had to be rewarmed before penitent Jem Blake could be persuaded to eat a fellow-workman's food.

"There," said Wynn, when at length the meal was ended, and he rose to clear the supper-table, and get his room into its usual state of woman-like tidiness, "there, don't you feel better now?"

"Ay, better for not lying drunk by the roadside, like a log in a ditch," was the still heavy-toned answer. "You've pulled me up this once, but once you let go your grip of me, and those other blackguards get hold of a fellow, I expect I shall be just as bad as ever again."

"Then I must just keep my hand on you," was the ready reply, "until you feel able to stand alone."

And then Charles Wynn came and sat down by his guest, with a small, shiny-black book in his hand, and his voice was very different when he spoke again:

"You and I must help each other," he said gravely. "We are both weak; you cannot feel more afraid than I do of stumbling from the right path, but we can help each other, if we will, and our Father will help us both. Aleck used to tell me this in the old days, and now I tell it to you. When I tramped into Silverdale, two months ago, the first words I heard in the place were the words, 'O God, the Father of heaven.' The vicar was reading them in the church, and I crouched closer into my corner, overwhelmed with a feeling of utter despair. 'God, the Father of heaven,' came before me at that moment in His almighty power, as a justly enraged Judge. And now, the words are to me so infinitely sweet and precious that I am never tired of repeating to myself, at work, when I am walking, when I am eating, even sometimes when I am sleeping, 'God, the Father of heaven, have mercy.'

"You remember there is a text in the Bible, 'God is love'; so that in asking mercy one knows one has it. Just now, your great want is for strength to repent and be healed, and as it's time to turn in, we'll seal our friendship, as Aleck used to say, by putting up a prayer together for what we most want."

And so saying, Charles Wynn knelt down, and prayed in low, moved tones, which touched his hearer's heart even more deeply than he had hoped. After he had finished there was a moment's pause. Jem Blake slid noiselessly upon his knees, with his head bowed upon the table. At length a murmur, only just audible, and that could scarcely be said to break the silence, rose from his lips in a tone of deep entreaty. Jem was praying.

There were only two human beings praying together in that humble cottage kitchen; but no doubt their Brother was with them, their Advocate and Mediator, to grant their requests.

No more words were spoken between the host and guest until they said "good-night," and ten minutes later they were asleep.

The cold and darkness, together with the occasionally almost impassable state of the roads between Southford and Silverdale, very much interfered with the growing friendship between Charles Wynn and little Bobby Balston during the winter months. The man had to fall back upon his less interesting, but far more harassing companion, Jim Blake. As for the child, those ready and eager to lavish love and attention upon him were too numerous for him to be able very greatly to miss the kindness of his "potato-man"; but Bobby's memory was a particularly retentive one, and "cut of sight" was not by any means "out of mind" with him.

Spring came round, and on the fifth of April Mr. Barnes's clerk had a folded sheet of paper put into his hands in the morning, by the carrier just over from Silverdale.

"I was to be sure to give it to you myself," said the man, laughing, "for fear, as there wasn't no address upon it, as you mightn't think it was of any importance. I hope that you may think that it is now when you have opened it."

And so saying, with another good-humored laugh, the carrier went off, and the ex-tramp unfolded the mysterious paper. The contents at a first glance might have seemed equally mysterious to any stranger who had read them over his shoulder, but on Charles Wynn's face they called up a pleasant, tender smile.

"The weather's luvly now. Muvver says she won't be afraid for me going long warks agen, so I'm going to-day to Sleepy Dell to see the primroses. Your littel Brownie."

Although it was Saturday Wynn had planned out work for himself, as it happened, that would have kept him within walls all day; but as it was, the letter the carrier had brought proved of sufficient importance, to the receiver at any rate, to make him decide to put aside his own arrangements for the sake of accepting the implied invitation to Sleepy Dell.

It was not altogether a modest fear as to being too troublesomely pressing in declaring his wishes that had made Bobby say no more; but writing a letter was a work of time, even when it did consist of but three short sentences. Moreover, even the space of a whole sheet of letter paper proves limited when such words as "muvver," and "weather," and "Brownie," take up a whole line to each of themselves; but it was no matter, for what he had not said was as plain as what he had said, and Charles Wynn would no more have thought of declining the proposed meeting, when it was possible to manage it, than he would have thought of making wilful blunders in Mr. Barnes's ledgers. He went home to dinner with light steps, and a feeling akin to a schoolboy's just come in for an unexpected holiday.

Our friend's face fell somewhat as he entered his cottage. For the first time during the past six months he had forgotten his self-imposed companion, Jim Blake; and when the sight of him now forced back the recollection it did not seem to be altogether a welcome one. Not, however, that there was anything in poor Jim's present appearance or occupation that spoke for him unfavorably.

The factory hands left work at twelve o'clock, the clerks did not leave the office until one, accordingly it had fallen to Jim's share of the household duties, since, to his intense thankfulness, Wynn had refused to part with him, to be the cook of the small establishment, so far as the preparation of the midday meal was concerned. When the clerk came in the factory lad had already laid the cloth, peeled the potatoes, and was just transferring an appetizing-looking piece of bacon from the saucepan to a hot dish. He raised his eyes as his friend entered, with his face beaming with satisfaction.

JESUS' DEATH ON THE CROSS.

S. S. Lesson for November 26. Mark 15 : 27-37. Golden Texts, 1 Pet. 11 : 24; 3 : 18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Predictions Fulfilled in the Passion—No Man Independent of Christ—The Effect of Contact Never Nugatory—The Challenge of the Priests—The Grand Testimony of the Thief—Alone Against a World—Inspired Expressions of Agony—The Break in the Cloud.

ALREADY in the sufferings of our beloved Lord the words of the Psalmist had been fulfilled when he said, "Be not far from Me; for trouble is near; for there is none to help. Many bulls have compassed Me: strong bulls of Bashan have beset Me round. They gaped upon Me with their mouths, as a ravening and a roaring lion. . . . For dogs have compassed Me: the assembly of the wicked have inclosed Me" (Ps. 22 : 11-16). "In Mine adversity they rejoiced and gathered themselves together, yea, the abjects gathered themselves together against Me" (Ps. 35 : 15).

As though the Jews would degrade their Victim to the utmost, "with Him they crucify two thieves, the one on His right hand and the other on His left. And the Scripture was fulfilled, which saith, And He was numbered with the transgressors." In this, as in all else, He was representing us; that we might be separated from transgressors, He was numbered with them. "For Christ also hath once suffered for sins, the just for the unjust, that He might bring us to God, being put to death in the flesh, but quickened by the Spirit." There it was; the Just for the unjust, Jesus taking our place, that He might bring us in Himself to His place of sonship, and make us, who have been heirs of sin, shame and death, to become "heirs of God." And this He has done for you and me, dear reader, whether we will or no. Oh, remember that He has laid you under an eternal obligation to Him, and whether you surrender to Him, believe and are saved by Him or not, you cannot undo the fact that Christ has represented you upon the cross, and by so doing, has made it an unrighteous, a dishonorable thing for you to live for yourself. "He hath made Him to be sin for us, who knew no sin; that we might be made the righteousness of God in Him" (2 Cor. 5 : 21). You cannot be independent of Him, "who His own self bare our sins in His own body on the tree, that we being dead to sins should live unto righteousness," something must come of it if we have to do with Him, and something for salvation or damnation will surely come of it, that Jesus has had to do with us upon the cross. Ignore it, make light of it, forget it, trifle with it, argue against it as you will, it is nevertheless true that Jesus Christ, the Son of God, has really borne your sins in His own body on the tree; you cannot get rid of it, it is a fact, one in which you are concerned, and one for the result of which you are responsible. God has meant salvation for you by this, He has meant complete freedom from the condemnation and the power of sin. Reader, do you long to leave sin, the world, the flesh, and live unto God and unto righteousness? Then turn right round, and let everybody know you do so, and take your place in Christ, covered by, represented by, included in Jesus. He has undertaken your desperate case, and He has bound Himself to carry it through; He has loved you to the death, never doubt Him, never let the tempter deceive you and make you think hard thoughts of Jesus.

JESUS IS GOD;

No one can come in contact with Him and nothing happen. When blind, lame, sick, and leprous came near to Him, they left Him seeing, walking, healed, and cleansed. But now, hanging on the cross, could He have the same power? could He, who Himself was dying, do anything for the two thieves who hung, apparently enduring just what Jesus did? They had heard Him pray, "Father forgive them, for they know not what they do," at the very hour when He was nailed to the cross. This was SOMETHING ALTOGETHER NEW.

Oaths and curses were heard in plenty from those who were put to this death of torture, but a prayer for the executioners, and such a prayer, coming right from His heart, this was altogether new!

It is possible that the thieves were waiting for their trial, while Jesus was undergoing His; and they may have witnessed the vacillation of Pilate, and have marked that Jesus was unjustly condemned. Anyway, the Spirit of God had awakened one of them. A continuous strain of mockery was going up from the soldiers, who offered Him vinegar, "saying, If Thou be the King of the Jews, save Thyself" (Luke 23 : 37); from those passing by, who "reviled Him, wagging their heads, and saying, Thou that destroyest the temple, and buildest it in three days, save Thyself. If Thou be the Son of God, come down from the cross." The chief priests, forgetting for the time the dignity and the sacredness of their office, gave themselves up to mock Him, and the scribes and elders of the people set the example of mocking Jesus as alas, alas, is too much the case in our days, and they said, "He saved others; Himself He cannot save. If He be the King of Israel, let Him now come down from the cross, and we will believe Him. He trusted in God; let Him deliver Him now, if He will have Him: for He said, I am the Son of God" (Matt. 27 : 39-43). But Jesus

DID NOT ACCEPT THE CHALLENGE.

No doubt these wicked men vaunted that His power was gone and that He could not prove Himself to be either the King of the Jews or the Son of God. But Jesus had not yet come to the end of what He was about to do. He did not, would not save Himself, for that would have been to lose us for whom He died. No, He would not spare Himself one suffering, nor justify Himself before any of His accusers, but He would, by-and-by, lie down in the grave and arise when He would, and shake off the death in which no sin of His own could bind Him, He would prove that He could save a world, and yet conquer the death by which He saved it.

One of the malefactors who was crucified with Him, in all the Satanic rage which suffering without grace produces, joined in the mockery of Jesus, Matthew says both of them did. Perhaps at first it was so, and then the second thief became a witness for Jesus when there was none other upon earth to plead His cause. "Dost not thou fear God, he said to his fellow, seeing thou art in the same condemnation?" Here was faithful dealing, would to God every visitor of the sick and dying were as true and direct! Many souls are sent into eternity unprepared, because those who visit them do not take the trouble to ascertain how they stand with God. "Dost not thou fear God, seeing thou art in the same condemnation? And we indeed justly" (he included himself); "for we receive the due reward of our deeds, but this Man hath done nothing amiss."

It was a grand testimony! First, his frank acknowledgment of his own and his companions' sins, "We receive the due reward of our deeds;" no attempt whatever at self-justification; and then he dared to say that which Pilate had said with his lips and contradicted by his acts,

"THIS MAN HATH DONE NOTHING AMISS."

Priests, scribes, elders, governors, people, were loud in condemning Jesus; disciples kept so far out of the way that they bore no witness to Him at this critical hour, but the convicted thief, alone in the whole world, uttered a protest in His favor. Alone against a world, alone in the presence of cowardly disciples! Lord, let it be thus with us, rather than that we should not witness for Thee.

And the poor thief prayed, it was no long prayer, but direct, personal, and to the point, "Lord, remember me, when Thou comest into Thy kingdom." What then, did he believe at such an hour that the dying Man at his side was King, and a King who had power beyond the grave? Even so. It is almost startling to think of the revulsion of feeling which must have taken place in that man's breast, from the sullen endurance of a hardened criminal, to the joy unspeakable of communion with Jesus! There on the cross, he experienced that wondrous passing from death unto life, which some of us remember at the time of our conversion. And Jesus in the midst of His deep suffering, had the joy of in His dying hour; He said, "Verily, I say unto thee, To-day shalt thou be with Me in Paradise" (Luke 23 : 40-43).

Three hours had Jesus been upon the cross; man, urged on by devils, mocked and jeered, but the very elements of nature seemed to be awed into respect and mute sympathy, as darkness crept over the earth until the ninth hour. And what took place during that darkness? That which was begun in Gethsemane was consummated now. Sin and sickness, all the waves and billows of the Almighty, were going over the devoted head of the Son of God. "I am poured out like water, and all My bones are out of joint: My heart is like wax; it is melted in the midst of My bowels. My strength is dried up like a potsherd; and My tongue cleaveth to My jaws; and thou hast brought Me into the dust of death. . . . They pierced My hands and My feet. I may tell all My bones" (Ps. 22 : 14-17). And again, "Save Me, O God; for the waters are come in unto My soul. I sink in deep mire, where there is no standing; I am come into deep waters, where the floods overflow Me. I am weary of My crying; My throat is dried: Mine eyes fail while I wait for My God. . . . Thou hast known My reproach, and My shame, and My dishonor: Mine adversaries are all before Thee. Reproach hath broken Mine heart; and I am full of heaviness: and I looked for some to take pity, but there was none; and for comforters, but I found none. They gave Me also gall for My meat; and in My thirst they gave Me vinegar to drink" (Ps. 69 : 1-3; 19-21). But even these inspired words can give a very faint idea of what our most precious Lord then suffered. We learn it, i.e., we get glimpses of it, in the experience we obtain of that redemption which it has purchased us.

At the ninth hour, the darkness was not only without, it had penetrated His very heart, and He cried, "My God, My God, why hast Thou forsaken Me." In that hour He knew all the horror of a backslider's experience; the awful, inexpressible void which only those feel who have known the sunshine of God's love and have lost it through sin. The sin He had adopted hung like an awful veil between Him, the Man anointed, but also under the curse, and His God! Truly He hath redeemed us from the curse of the law, being made a curse for us" (Gal. 3 : 13).

BUT THE CLOUD BROKE, and He saw once again the light of His Father's countenance and said, "Father, into Thy hands I commend My Spirit," (Luke 23 : 46). He was about to put on death as He had put on sin. Oh, how foreign to Him who is the Resurrection and the Life! But ere He gave up the ghost, for He had power to lay down His life and to take it again, He said, "It is finished" (John 19 : 30). Here is our guarantee for full salvation, sin and death were met face to face and conquered, by our beloved Lord upon the cross; the victory was a complete one, both are conquered and the victory is ours, sin has lost its power and death has lost its sting. Jesus lives and Jesus reigns. "I am He that liveth and was dead; and behold, I am alive for evermore" (Rev. 1 : 18).

FOREIGN TOPICS.

The New Rules to Regulate the Proceedings of the British House of Commons, the necessity for which was the main reason for convoking an autumn session of Parliament, were the subject of an acrimonious debate which was protracted throughout last week. The first rule was passed on November 16th by a vote of 304 to 260. The Parnellites voted with the government for the rule. It is explained by one of the party that they so voted because it was certain that some measure of the kind would be passed, and they preferred a measure that would shackle the Conservatives to one that would operate only against themselves.

An Important Declaration in Reference to Ireland was made by Mr. Gladstone in the course of a speech delivered on November 9th at a banquet given by the new Lord Mayor of London. The British Premier said: "The government had not scrupled to use the powers intrusted to them with vigor and determination. At the same time they relied more confidently on measures of justice. He could now, he said, record his conviction that a new tone of sentiment was dawning among the Irish, to seek amelioration of law by peaceful efforts. He ventured to say that the foundations of society in Ireland were now in but little danger. The monthly return of agrarian outrages was now 111, as compared with 511 committed in October, 1881. There might be in Ireland extravagant opinions and desires that could never be fulfilled; but if the Irish be content to walk in the ways of legality, the empire was strong and free enough to entertain in a friendly and kindly spirit any demand that may be made for free discussion and perfect publicity in matters relating to its Irish policy." The speech is regarded by the Irish press as an intimation that the Liberal party will vote for a measure of home rule in a modified form.

The Socialistic Agitation Recently Observed in France appears to be spreading through Europe. The English correspondent of the New York Sun in the course of a long letter on the subject says: "In France there is no subsidence of the uneasy feeling which has prevailed for the past month. Energetic measures on the part of the government have prevented and quelled actual outbreaks, but the agitation of the Socialists is prosecuted with the utmost activity. In Austria a widespread agitation has been started, having for its apparent object the reduction of the enormous burdens to which the ponderous military system of the country subjects its people. Socialist agents are credited with conducting the machinery of the movement, and several serious disturbances have already occurred in Vienna. In Russia, in the Baltic provinces, the new and formidable revolutionary movement is avowedly directed by the Nihilist organization. It is confined exclusively to the agricultural population, among whom several emissaries of the Nihilistic Committee have been arrested. The Government is unable to send a military force into these provinces, and the landed proprietors are organizing a gendarmerie, to be commanded by themselves, for defence against the revolutionists. The main grievance alleged in this Russian agrarian movement is not unlike the main question in Ireland."

A Shocking Disaster Occurred at Halifax, N. S., on November 7th. The poor asylum was reported on fire soon after midnight and the fire brigade was summoned. There were about five hundred inmates, all of whom were removed without loss of life. But the flames spread to the wing used as a hospital and were carried by the elevator shaft to the roof, and the whole building was soon burning throughout. There were seventy patients in the beds, most of them perfectly helpless. The fire was now burning fiercely, and the heat cracked the roof till the lead poured down in streams of brilliant fire, and the slates flew in every direction in deadly showers, rendering any near approach to the building almost certain death. Notwithstanding this, there were hundreds of persons outside who would willingly have entered the building if they could have found their way through the place. Indeed, several did go in, but without guidance could do nothing in that immense building, and had to return to the yards. An attempt to raise ladders to the windows was made, but the ladders were too short, and after a fireman had been knocked down by falling bricks, and it was seen that the ladders even would be swept away in a few minutes, these attempts were stopped. The fire burst through the roof and the scene was one never to be forgotten. Far above the roar of the flames and the crack of the bursting slates were heard the cries of the wretched patients in the hospital, who were roasting to death. It is feared that over thirty of the poor sufferers must have perished in the flames.

Prognostications of Undisturbed Peace in Europe were recently made at Pesth by Count Kalnoky, the Austrian Prime Minister, who dwelt with great satisfaction on the fact that Italy, barely a year ago, recorded in an unequivocal manner her wish to unite with the views of the Austro-German alliance. These friendly relations, he considered, might now be regarded as firmly consolidated. Referring to the attitude of Russia, Count Kalnoky said the peaceful convictions which the Czar had given expression to and had succeeded in upholding, were a pledge that from Russia no danger threatened the peace of Europe. Count Kalnoky referred also to the friendly relations existing between the Western Powers, and drew therefrom the conclusion that no disturbance of the general peace need be apprehended. It is an ominous fact that such congratulations on the part of European statesmen have only too frequently been followed by an outbreak of war.

A Plot to Murder Judge Lawson who Committed the High Sheriff of Dublin to prison recently, is believed to have been foiled at the moment of execution. The judge, who before his elevation to the bench was very unpopular in Ireland owing to the vigor with which he prosecuted cases against the land leaguers and agitators, has increased his unpopularity since he became a judge by the severity of his sentences, and especially by his treatment of Mr. Gray. On November 11th, as he was going to his club in Dublin, the police detailed to protect him noticed suspicious movements on the part of an individual on the opposite side of the street. The man was afterward seen to cross the road toward Judge Lawson and to put his hand in the breast of his coat, whereupon he was knocked down by a policeman and found to be holding a six-chambered revolver. The prisoner, who was taken to the station, gave his name as Corrigan, which is known to be false. He is known to be a foreman carpenter, and as the affair is believed to have originated in a secret society, numerous arrests are expected.

The Policy of the New French Cabinet which has been anticipated with some anxiety in consequence of the recent manifestation of anarchical disaffection at Lyons and other places, has been outlined by the premier, M. Duclerc, in a statement at the opening of the Legislature. He said that the object of the government will be to efface the divisions in the Republican party and thereby enable it to resist the attacks of hostile factions. It will do its utmost to repress any factious manifestations from whatever quarter. With regard to finances the government will be solely occupied with the general interests of the country. It will resolutely urge the adoption of laws upon military organization. The relations of France with the Powers, are satisfactory, and the foreign policy of France will be one of neither provocation nor abdication.

The Sufferings of the Russian Political exiles in Siberia are graphically described by one of themselves. He says: "This place is by itself the strongest prison. On the north there are eternal snow and ice; on the south impassable forests filled with bears. You cannot run away from here even being let loose. To live here means to suffer cold, hunger and premature death. Every exile here must turn into a savage; he must live in a dirty and stinking tent, feed upon fish and wear undressed furs and only furs. Bread is a great luxury here; it is beyond our means. Add to that unbearable frosts and the nights six months long. We live in darkness, for we have no candles. We have nothing to do but to shiver under a pile of furs till hunger forces us to stir, to make a fire and to cook some miserable food, then again shivering. We would gladly build houses that could keep us warm, but our executioners don't allow us to do that. We cannot do anything under such circumstances. However terrible the polar night, is the polar day, strange to say, is even more horrible for us. The perpetual bright light reflected by snow irritates the nerves very much and often causes insanity."

The Affairs of Egypt are Apparently to be settled under the direction of England alone without the intervention of Turkey or the other Powers. Mr. Gladstone stated in the House of Commons on November 9th, that the object of Lord Dufferin's mission to Egypt is to conduct necessary negotiations with the Egyptian government. No machinery exists, he said, by which the Egyptian people could be consulted with regard to their future government. A despatch from Constantinople says that England has informed the Porte that she does not consider the present a convenient moment for entering into negotiations relative to the Egyptian question, and that she cannot approve the idea of sending a Turkish commission to Egypt during the continuance of Lord Dufferin's mission in that country.

The Homage Offered to Actors and Actresses of which New York is just now witnessing a manifestation of extraordinary intensity, has evoked an indignant protest from a French journalist, who denounces in vigorous terms its developments in the French capital. He says: "From the prince of the blood royal, who visits him in his dressing room, down to the voyous who flatten their noses against the windows of the photograph shops in staring at his portraits, everybody joins in a chorus in singing the glory of the actor. When an artiste issues from the throng after twenty years of toil, misery and genius he conquers the world by one evening's grimaces. He struts along an absolute monarch amid thunders of applause, his face grimed and stained with paint and rouge. He airs his carnival costumes and his impudent fatuities. The artiste is undoubtedly a king. With the rotten boards of the stage he has built himself, or rather the public have built him, a throne on which he sits with impudent air. This being, formerly cast out of society into his ghetto, has now taken possession of the whole of social life."

The English Committee Charged with the duty of erecting a memorial to the poet Longfellow, has invited the Prince of Wales to accept the chairmanship. The prince in acceding to the request wrote, that he was very glad that an opportunity has been afforded him to show the high respect he entertains for the memory of the greatest of American poets, and his appreciation of the value and excellence of Longfellow's works. The prince's brother, the Duke of Albany, has also joined the committee.

Mr. Eli Johnson is Receiving a very Cordial reception in Australia. Crowded audiences assemble wherever he lectures, and the revelations of the box so well known on the temperance platforms of this country are received with considerable surprise. The Australian papers give verbatim reports of Mr. Johnson's lectures, and state that a genuine temperance revival is in progress as the result of his labors.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE visitor to London passing down the busy thoroughfare of Cheapside is impressed with the narrowness and darkness of many of the streets that turn out of it. The London smoke and occasional fog render the best streets gloomy, even on the brightest days. The blue sky is rarely seen, and the sunlight struggles with difficulty through the dense atmosphere. But the streets that turn out of Cheapside are unusually gloomy. They are lined on each side with lofty warehouses principally devoted to the dry goods trade, and those high buildings render the streets so dusky, that in many of the offices on the ground floor it is often necessary to use artificial light even at midday. One of the busiest and best known of those streets is Bread Street, and in that street the renowned author of "Paradise Lost" was born in the year 1608.

Some few years before that date a modest office had been opened in Bread Street, by a man who described himself as "a scrivener." His profession, though not precisely identical with that of a lawyer, had so much in common with it, that much of the work, which in our day, citizens commission their lawyers to do for them, was in the early part of the seventeenth century intrusted to a scrivener. The particular office mentioned was known by the title of and a rude carving of the bird ornamented its exterior, much in the same way as we see it over the buildings in Broadway, New York, and other of our great cities. The Spread Eagle was the crest of John Milton, the Bread Street Scrivener.

The scrivener's office was a monument of fidelity to Christian principle. It had been opened in consequence of religious persecution. John Milton's father was a man of means, and his son need never have entered the profession for a livelihood, but that son had become a convert to Protestantism, and the wealthy Roman Catholic father expelled him from the paternal roof and disinherited him. Hence the necessity to labor for bread, which John Milton accepted rather than abjure his faith, hence the journey from Oxford to London, and the opening of the scrivener's office. The faithful man realized the truth of God's promise, "When thy father and thy mother forsake thee the Lord will take thee up." His intelligence, integrity, and industry became known in London; merchants brought their business to the Spread Eagle, and John Milton, the Protestant scrivener, was soon on the way, as his son said, "to gain a plentiful fortune." He married and lived over his office, and there on December 9th, 1608, was born the child, whose name will be honored while the English language is spoken, as one of the grandest of the poets.

From that busy city scene we might have expected to come forth a merchant or a lawyer or even a statesman, but surely it was a strange nest from which a poet should take wing. Yet it is remarkable that in the same city so many poets have been born. It was the birthplace of Chaucer, Spencer, Cowley, Pope, Gray, Keats, and others.

The thriving scrivener was able to give his boy a good education, and he not only sent him to St. Paul's school, but had tutors for him at home. The boy was eager to learn, and so earnestly did he strive after knowledge that at twelve years of age he generally heard St. Paul's deep-toned bell strike the hour of midnight before he closed his books.

A PORTRAIT of John Milton survives, which was taken about this period of his life. It represents a happy, beautiful boy, with a neat lace frill, black braided dress, light auburn hair, and a delicate, almost girl-like complexion, and an expression strangely dissimilar from the stern, thoughtful, resolute countenance which years and trouble and care moulded into the shape which we generally associate with Milton.

His future career, however, seemed even at that early age to have dawned upon him, for the paraphrases of two of the "Psalms of David" which are included among his works were written before he was fifteen. They were the 114th and 136th Psalms. The following are the opening lines respectively:

On Psalm cxiv.

"When the blest seed of Terah's faithful son,
After long toil their liberty had won,
And passed from Pharian fields to Canaan land,
Led by the strength of the Almighty's hand,
Jehovah's wonders were in Israel shown,
His praise and glory were in Israel known." etc.

Psalm cxxxvi.

"Let us with a gladsome mind
Praise the Lord, for He is kind,
For His mercy aye endure,
Ever faithful, ever sure." etc.

At the age of sixteen John Milton was sent to the University of Cambridge to study for the profession of his own and his father's choice, that of the Church. Seven years did he spend in those halls of learning, working hard, taking his B.A. and M.A. degrees, but all the time drifting farther and farther away from the profession to which he had been destined by his father. The Church in the days of Laud was not the Church to which John Milton's piety and learning were leading him. He had a higher, a holier aim than that of preaching the debased theology of that corrupt time. When he finally left Cambridge, it was with no definite plan for the future, but with the hope that by reading and meditation he might be prepared to usefully serve his day and generation as opportunity might offer. He accordingly retired to the suburban retreat of Horton, seventeen miles from London, where his father, weary of the cares of business, and having acquired a modest competence, was living in peaceful retirement. There young Milton went, and among his books and papers he spent five tranquil years of self-cultivation and mental, moral, and spiritual architecture. The spirit in which he read may be inferred from the well-known lines of "Paradise Regained":

"Who reads

Incessantly, and to his reading brings not
A spirit and judgment equal or superior,
Uncertain and unsettled still remains,
Deep vers'd in books, and shallow in himself."

But that Milton read industriously is evident; for a memorandum book in his handwriting, prepared during the Horton period of his life, which curiously enough was only discovered in 1874, having lain unnoticed for more than two centuries, contains memoranda of facts and thoughts culled from more than eighty authors, Greek, Latin, French, Italian, and English.

In 1637, his quiet country life was broken in upon by the entrance of that dread disturber, Death. His mother died, and Milton, partly in order to remove from the scene of her sufferings, and partly in order to gratify a long-cherished desire, obtained liberty from his father to visit the Continent of Europe; and in 1638, attended by a servant, he set out on his travels.

VISIT TO PARIS.

He first went to Paris, where he remained for a few days. He felt less interest in seeing a city which was then the main centre of Popery, and had not long before run red with Protestant blood, than in making the acquaintance of that great and good Dutch scholar, De Groot, or Grotius, who was residing in Paris as ambassador from the States of Holland. Grotius had been a sufferer for conscience's sake, and had once escaped death by being packed up by his wife as a bundle of books in a large chest. To him Milton went, and Grotius received the young Englishman kindly, and entertained him in a manner worthy of his character and abilities.

From Paris Milton went to Florence by way of Nice and Genoa. There he received a cordial reception, the cultured young English traveller by his frank and scholarly conversation winning many friends. But he was quietly and impressively cautioned against talking in the same way which he arrived in Rome. The Florentines told him that he would inevitably be seized by the inquisition, and subjected to imprisonment and torture he uttered in the Eternal city opinions such as had expressed in Florence. Milton, however, was not made of the stuff that fear can drive to evasion or dissembling, and when he arrived in Rome was prepared to tell the truth and leave consequences to God.

MILTON'S RULE

he has said in his autobiography, was "not of my own accord to introduce in those places conversation about religion, but if interrogated respecting the faith, then, whatsoever I should suffer, to resemble nothing. What I was, if any one asked concealed from no one; if any one in the very city of the Pope attacked the orthodox religion, I defended it most freely." In Rome Milton met some English Jesuits with whom he had "many disputes." By them he was taken into a society of learned monks for the purpose of discussion, at which Milton gave his reasons for the faith that was in him, and defending Protestant doctrine with much learning and eloquence. (One scene is represented in the lower left-hand corner of the frontispiece.)

Milton's modest, unassuming manner probably disarmed any disposition there might have been to interfere with his personal liberty, and he was allowed to study the Roman antiquities unmolested for about two months. He then set out for Naples where he desired to make the acquaintance of Giovanni Manso, Marquis of Villa, the friend and protector of Tasso and Marini. Manso showed the young Englishman much kindness, but was deterred from introducing him into the best circle of Neapolitan society by the bold and fearless way in which Milton spoke wherever he might be, of religious and political topics. Manso knew that it was to be compromised with the authorities, and in regard for his own safety rendered it necessary that he should not take his guest into general gatherings of Neapolitan scholars.

Leaving Naples, Milton returned by way of Rome and Florence, making a stay of two months in the latter city, that he might make whom he had been unable to see on his first visit. Then, Galileo was in prison in the inquisition, asserting that the earth revolved around the sun, a theory which the Romish priests denounced as unscriptural. They failed to convince him that he was wrong by argument, but they tortured him until the poor sufferer consented to sign a paper stating that the theory he had propounded was in error. Having obtained his signature, they were content, though they knew they had not convinced him. Nor did Galileo conceal the belief; for having made the declaration demanded of him, he quietly observed, "It moves though, for all that." By way, however, of impressing him with the wisdom of holding his doctrines in silence, he was shut up in the dungeons of the inquisition, and even week, for three years, had to repeat the seven Penitential Psalms of David. He was already seventy-four years of age when he was released and was allowed to live in his own house. The Milton visited him, and found him almost blind. Four years afterward he died.

Milton now hurried homeward. He intended to have visited Greece and Sicily, but he had heard the first rumbling of the political earthquake which culminated in the revolution in England, the triumph of civil and religious liberty, and the execution of the tyrant, Charles I. Milton knew what the duty of every patriot lay in that troubled time. He wrote, "I consider it dishonorable to be enjoying myself at my ease in foreign lands, while my countrymen are striking a blow for freedom." He therefore, returned home by way of Geneva and Paris, and in August, 1639, he again set foot upon his native shore. He had been away a year and three months. In the account of his travels, he inscribed the following statement, "I again thank God to witness, that in all these places, where so many things were considered lawful, I lived sound and untouched from all profligacy and vice; having have heard the Prophet predict that a deliverer should be born from his descendants, and bearing his own name, Mahommed Ibn Abdallah. The famous Imami Aly, the son-in-law of the Prophet, usband of Fatima, was told, according to tradition, that his future champion should rise from the descendants of Hussein; and in the fatal day of Kerbela Aly comforted Hussein with the assurance that their blood should be avenged in the future, when God should raise up El Mahdi to stand in their place, the Lord of Mankind."

A TRAVESTY OF CHRIST'S COMING.

It is impossible not to perceive in this doctrine of the Mahdi a travesty of the Christian truth of Christ's second coming. The coming of the Mahdi is to be preceded by a time of great and general trouble. Gog and Magog—in whom the Turks recognize (as do so many students of prophecy among ourselves) the Russian power—must first burst the bounds set for them by Iskander Abu el Karnein—Alexander the Great—who has become a popular traditions a hero of Islam. The loss of the Sultan's dominions, swallowed up by the infidels (or Christians) is expected to follow. What is specially remarkable, however, is that many of the Turks believe that the present year, 1882—the 300th of the Hegira—is the appointed time.

The Moslem Armageddon is to be fought in the vicinity of Homs, the ancient Emesa, a city of Syria, 86 miles north-east of Damascus, or, according to others, of Aleppo. There the hostile forces are to assemble—the faithful Mahomedans on the one hand and the combined "unbelievers" on the other. "The final result of the battle is decided by the appearance of El Mahdi, who will rally the dispersed Moslems and put the infidels to flight. A long reign of peace is to follow, and is only terminated by the Gom-ed-Din, when Mahommed himself will descend to bestride the pillar which rises out of the great eastern wall of the Haram at Jerusalem, while at the same time Jesus, son of Mary, will stand on the summit of the tall eastern minaret of the Damascus mosque."

MOSLEM ANTICIPATIONS.

This expectation of the coming of the Mahdi is not confined to any particular class or country; even the wild Ariazeh Arabs, who roam the deserts east of Damascus, are looking forward to the great catastrophe. But it is especially cherished, according to the apparently well-informed writer in Blackwood, by the "middle class of the orthodox inhabitants of cities and towns, whose religious eneiets present the most dangerous narrowness of view, and among whom fanaticism has a real existence. Such are the white-turbaned youths who study in the Moslem schools, the venerable elders, whose green turbans bear witness to their performance of at least one pilgrimage to Mecca; such are the doctors of the Tenzil, or plain exoteric interpretation of the Koran, who take the Scripture literally, without seeking for any mystical hidden meaning. They do not, indeed, represent the mass of the nation, but their presence, their hatred of all that is non-Moslem, their eager dissemination of scandalous misrepresentations of Christian dogmas, their zealous attempts to win the peasantry to the side of Islam, must not be for a moment forgotten by those who would understand aright the tendencies of modern Moslem thought. . . .

"It is among this class—Sokhtas, Ulemmas, Kadis, Sheikhs, and Imams of the great mosques, gentlemen of old family, living in houses which have belonged to their ancestors for many centuries—that a real belief in the coming of the Mahdi and in the future triumph of Islam exists. It is by such doctors of the Henifeh school of Sunnees that the Sultan's claim to the Khalifate is supported, and the propaganda of Pan-Islamism, with the Padishah as religious head, is vigorously fomented.

Among them are found men sincerely devout and completely convinced, no less than hypocrites who look forward to the good things which may be obtained through the re-establishment of the old order, uncontrolled by the public opinion of the Western infidels."

THE SYRIAN DRUSES' IDEA OF THE MAHDI.

Among the Druses of Syria, also, the idea of the future incarnation of "Hakem" as a universal monarch, shared in by the Mahomedans of India, is fully developed; the appearance of this Hakem being, it is supposed, accompanied by the similar appearance of Hamzeh as a religious teacher—a curious shadowing forth of the Beast and False Prophet of the Book of Revelation.

"The followers of Hakem and Hamzeh were at first distinguished from the Moslems of Egypt only by one tenet—that the incarnation generally expected had actually taken place in the birth of the then reigning Khalif, Hakim bin Amr Illah. As a descendant of Fatima, his claim was by no means unnatural; and whether or not he believed in his own supernatural character, there can be little doubt that he found, in the assumption of a religious pretension so august, a very powerful political weapon, with which, had he been a wiser and less extravagant man, he might have hoped to revolutionize Islam, and to obtain general recognition as a universal Moslem ruler.

"If, then, in our own days, a man of real genius should arise, a man not hampered by too narrow an orthodoxy or hindered by scruples such as prevent the truest and most moral from advancing the interests of personal ambition by trading on the follies or the feelings of the untaught; if at the same time he were an Arab by birth (a fellow-countryman at least, if not a supposed descendant of the Koreish Prophet), a prince or a cherif, well-versed in the Koran, learned in the subtleties of the traditional interpretation, of ready wit and eloquence—a popular hero, in short, and a shrewd politician as well—such a man would find, in the expectation of the Mahdi and in the present condition of all Islam, an opportunity for the attainment of widespread power and for the indulgence of the most unbounded ambition such as has not arisen for many centuries. He might revolutionize the history of the East, and make the religion of Islam, which seems already to show symptoms of decrepitude and disintegration, an enthusiastic faith, uniting the various scattered races and sects which now turn to Western Christian states for deliverance from Moslem rulers."

THE CLAIMS OF ES SENOUSSEI.

Now the very remarkable and ominous fact in connection with this state of the Mahomedan peoples of the East, is, that at this very time a man fulfilling to a considerable extent the above enumerated requirement, is riveting the gaze of all Europe. He is the powerful chief of the Tripolitan Arabs, named Es Senoussi, the head of the great Moslem agitation which pervades Northern Africa.

Of this singular personage M. Gabriel Charnes gives an account in the Débats, which is sufficiently alarming. According to him it would appear that European civilization has in Es Senoussi an exceedingly formidable foe. He says: "Though nominally belonging to Turkey, the region of Cyrenaica is in reality in the hands of an Arab Government, perfectly organized, and of which the ramifications extend northward as far as Morocco, and southward to the very centre of Africa. At the head of this government is the Marabout Mahommed-es-Senoussi. His authority over all the tribes is absolute and unbounded, and to him all taxes are paid. At any moment these tribes might be engaged by him in the most savage and ambitious of enterprises without any local authority being able to exercise the slightest control.

Es Senoussi lives in no town, but in the little oasis of Djerboub, from whence he rules over wide regions where his commands are equivalent to Divine decrees. Should he at any time determine to throw into Egypt, Tunis, and Algeria the fanatical population under his influence, it would be a terrible time for the Christian world. The dream of Mahommed-es-Senoussi, who is a young and handsome chief, is to purge Africa from the Europeans."

HIS ANTICIPATED PROCLAMATION

To this end it is anticipated that he intends, next November, when the thirteenth century of the Hegira comes to an end, to proclaim himself the Mahdi. And this belief is strengthened by the circumstance that the father of Es Senoussi prophesied that the advent of the Mahdi promised by the Prophet would take place when the Christians took possession of all the countries comprised between the two T's, which is interpreted to mean between Tangier in the west and Tripoli in the east, and this condition was therefore accomplished with the conquest of Tunis. It would seem, therefore, that Es Senoussi's hour had struck.

Before the final overthrow of Arabi Pasha on September 15th, 30,000 Arab horsemen in Eastern Tripoli moved toward the Egyptian frontier, with a view of effecting a junction with the army of Arabi Pasha. In reference to this intelligence, which it evidently regards as authentic, the Times said, "It is precisely in the interior of Eastern Tripoli that the focus of Arab agitation headed by the chief Es Senoussi, now appears to have its centre. The country is bounded on the North by the coast line of the Mediterranean, which extends from El Biban, on the Tunisian frontier, to Cape El Kanais, in Egypt.

"The importance of the relations between the North African Arabs of Egypt and Tripoli is generally underrated, owing to a misconception which exists as to the nature of the so-called deserts of the Barka and Libya, which are popularly supposed to present an impenetrable barrier to any movement of the Arabs toward Egypt. Captain Beechey takes great pains to correct this error. The Arabian cavalry of Tripoli, moreover, are fine men, well-armed and equipped, and well horsed." "We must then," adds this writer, "neither treat lightly the possibility of Tripolitan cavalry getting into Egypt, nor the possibility of their doing good service to Arabi when they get there. Arabi may be routed past hope of retrieving his position before he receives Tripolitan aid, and he may not. We must not forget or ignore the extraordinary rapidity with which Arab cavalry moves, and which baffles all calculations."

A CRISIS IN MAHOMMEDANISM AT HAND.

One thing is quite certain—namely, that a great crisis in the Mahomedan world is at hand. "We have," writes the Spectator, in a startling article, "for many months past repeatedly drawn attention to the rapid approach of a great crisis, when the Sultan will be obliged to choose for himself between his present position and the very different position indicated in the Mahomedan conviction that action is needed, even though the Empire should cease to be Turkish and should become Arabic." That, we may be sure, is an alternative really before the mind of the Sultan.

"We may be quite certain that among the dreams of that shrewd dreamer, the dream of landing Turkish troops in Egypt, not to fight on the side of the English but against them, has been one of the most prominent; and that it was chiefly the tremendous danger of the step which daunted him. But the time must soon come, and is rapidly coming, when he will find it absolutely necessary either to forfeit all claims on the religious loyalty of Mahomedans, or to forfeit all claims on the international confidence of Europe. And when that time comes, the result of his choice, both in Europe and Asia, will be a disturbance of the political equilibrium so vast that at present we cannot even adequately anticipate its nature.

"But one thing we can already see, that whenever this occurs—and it must occur before long—it will be a matter of the very first importance that Europe should be united, and should act with strength and perfect concert in the face of that convulsion. If, as is most probable, the Khalif absorbs the Sultan—and that might happen without the consent of the individual Sultan and against his will—in other words, if religious enthusiasm once more gets the upper hand, Europe, including Russia, will have her hands full with the ferment east and west, from the Adriatic to the Persian Gulf.

"And even if the Sultan could persuade any substantial section of his Turks to remain faithful to him, in spite of his opposition to the Mahomedan movement of the day, which does not seem to be very likely, Europe would have eventually to strengthen his hands, and to pull the strings of his policy, so as to evade, as far as might be, the vast dangers which must accompany the coming crisis. In either case alike, Europe, if surprised, unready, and without concert, would have to witness massacre and anarchy on a greater scale than Europe has known for many centuries."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The thanks of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are due to a large number of subscribers who have written to the office, expressing their high regard for the journal, and stating their intention to introduce it to their friends, with the view of obtaining new subscribers for the coming year. Their efforts would have a better chance of success if commenced now, than at the end of next month, when people will have made their arrangements for 1883. In recognition of this fact a concession in price will be made. They may offer THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, postage paid, from this time to the end of 1883 for $1.50—that is, fourteen months for one year's subscription. This concession is made in order to aid the friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and to encourage them to proceed at once with their kindly project. It is hoped that every subscriber will use his influence, however small it may be, to send at least one new subscription, in addition to his own, for 1883.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Relative Strength of Parties in the United States Senate has been variously estimated by politicians. The most elaborate calculation yet made is that of the Washington correspondent of the New York Times, who thus places the figures: The seventy-six members are now classified politically as follows: Thirty-seven Republicans, thirty-seven Democrats, one Readjuster, and one Independent, who is the presiding officer. On the 3d of March next, twenty-six of these Senators will retire—eleven Republicans, fourteen Democrats, and one Independent. Eight of the places to be vacated have already been provided for by the election of three Republicans—Messrs. Wilson, Dolph, and Anthony—four Democrats—Messrs. Beck, Gibson, Lamar, and Colquitt—and one Readjuster—Mr. Riddleberger. The legislatures by which the remaining vacancies will be filled are so constituted that of the eighteen seats, seven will surely be filled by Republicans and nine will surely be filled by Democrats, so that without taking into account either Colorado or Nebraska, the Senate after March 3d, 1883, will be composed of thirty-six Republicans, thirty-six Democrats, and two Readjusters. There can, therefore, be no more than thirty-eight Republicans, which is one less than a majority, while it is possible that the number will not exceed thirty-six. It is expected that the number will be thirty-seven, so that both Readjusters will be needed to secure a majority vote. The most trustworthy reports place the Democratic majority in the next House of Representatives at sixty-five. The three hundred and twenty-five members will probably be divided as follows when the House is organized: Democrats, 195; Republicans, 123; Readjusters, 5; Independents, 2.

Sunday-School Politics is a Phrase Sneeringly applied by certain prominent secular journals to the principles which resulted in the recent Republican defeat. Sneering is a very bad habit to indulge in, especially under present circumstances. A wiser and more statesmanlike course would be to endeavor to understand the causes which prevented avowed Republicans from voting the Republican ticket this year, and then attempting, as far as possible, to remove the grounds of offence, before a greater calamity befalls the party. It is certain that in the Republican party there are thousands of voters who, if placed in the dilemma of abandoning their party or abandoning the principles they gained in the Sunday-school, will choose the former course. These men may not be conspicuous in State conventions, nor prominent among the crowds of office-seekers, but they are very influential in their respective districts where they are known and respected. These men will not always be bound by a policy initiated by such men as unhappily were placed in command of the Republican campaign in New York, and who led the party in the House last session. It will be a cold day for the Republican party when it adopts a policy antagonistic to Sunday-school politics.

A Very Important Subject of Inquiry is that undertaken by the joint Committee of Congress now holding its sessions in New York. It is charged with the duty of ascertaining the causes of the decay of our shipping trade. How serious this question is may be learned from the Government reports, which show that while in 1860 two-thirds of our imports and exports were carried in American vessels, something less than a sixth is now so carried. The vast profits of this trade, generally estimated at over one hundred million dollars a year, now go into the pockets of the shipowners of England, Germany, and other European nations, instead of into those of our own citizens. The work of ascertaining the cause of this misfortune will not be difficult, and we may hope the committee will have the courage to report it.

The Defeat of Governor St. John, of Kansas, who was nominated by the Republicans of the State for a third term, has been a keen disappointment to the temperance party there and elsewhere. Various causes have been assigned for it, and doubtless one powerful cause was an objection felt to any one enjoying a third term of the office. Governor St. John himself believes that his defeat was secured mainly by the expenditure of a large sum of money furnished by the whiskey ring. He says that $100,000 were sent into the State, and this with the defection in the Republican party accomplished the result. He is not discouraged, however, and says that he "for one proposes to camp on the skirmish line and keep up the fight until victory is secured for prohibition."

The Creditors of Archbishop Purcell have published an appeal to the cardinal, archbishops, bishops and priests of the United States praying for the restitution of some part of the four million dollars involved in the failure. The appeal calls the attention of the dignitaries addressed, to the fact that the archbishop said in a letter published at the time that the money was spent in the cause of religion, to build churches, school-houses, orphan asylums, a theological seminary, a library supplied with 16,000 volumes, and in feeding, clothing, and educating priests in France, Rome, and the United States, and the archdiocese was responsible for the sum expended. The fee of the ecclesiastical property was held in his own name as security for the money deposited with him, and with a view to the payment of the debt thus incurred the archbishop and his brother, the Very Reverend Edward Purcell, made an assignment of their real and personal property for the benefit of the creditors. The assignee asked the courts to order the sale, but Bishop Elder, the present administrator of the diocese, and a few German priests opposed the sale of the property purchased with the money, "and paid or agreed to pay $40,000 to attorneys to frustrate the designs of the archbishop and the assignee, and thus defraud the creditors out of their legal rights." The creditors have also sent an appeal to the Pope.

Dr. Deems Presided on Tuesday, November 14th, at the inaugural lecture of the course connected with the American Institute of Christian Philosophy. The lecture was delivered in the Broadway Tabernacle by the Rev. Washington Gladden, of Springfield, Mass. The list of lecturers for the course includes the names of Dr. Patton, of Princeton, Dr. Tucker, of Atlanta, Dr. J. B. Thomas, of Brooklyn, and Dr. Lyman Abbott. All the lectures will be free, and Dr. Deems desires us in mentioning the course to say that its object is to formulate and publish for the church universal the highest truths of a rational Christian philosophy and to give clergymen and laymen an arsenal of weapons wherewith to meet the assaults of modern infidelity and agnosticism. Those who are aware how largely society is impregnated with atheistical doctrines will realize how useful is the work these lectures are designed to perform.

Mr. Charles Spurgeon, one of the Twin Sons of Mr. C. H. Spurgeon, whose sermons are published every week in this journal, preached twice in New York last Sunday, and in the Academy of Music in Brooklyn the preceding Sunday afternoon. Large congregations were attracted to hear him. Mr. Spurgeon modestly observed that he was aware his enthusiastic reception was due to the fame and popularity of his father. On each occasion he preached a plain, earnest Gospel sermon, not marked by the humor or originality which characterize the sermons of his father.

The Garfield Monument Fair to be Held in the Capitol at Washington on November 25th, is stated by the managers to be an assured success. $15,000 in cash has already been collected and the managers have been compelled in consequence of the great demand for space to utilize the Agricultural Department as an annex. Applications are now being made to gentlemen who will make private gifts which can be sold at the close of the exposition. Letters from all parts of the country have been received, promising support.

The Importance of the Duty of Revising the tariff has been recognized by at least one Republican leader. Senator Edmunds, of Vermont, recently declared that the interests of the party if no other motive should prompt Republicans at the coming session of Congress, is to give especial attention to the reduction of the revenue by a judicious revision of the tariff and the internal revenue taxes. He says the reduction must come, and if the Republican Congress does not set about and accomplish it, the Democrats will certainly make capital by the neglect in the campaign of 1884.

Numerous Inquiries are Made by Friends of intemperate men for some place where they may be temporarily restrained and permanently reclaimed. For the benefit of such inquirers it may be stated that such a place is established at Eighty-Sixth Street and Madison Avenue, New York. A Christian gentleman who recently visited it writes: "I have taken the pains to inquire into the workings of this asylum, and I venture to say that there is no institution of a charitable character in this great city, that can compare with the quiet, Christian, healthful work of this Home. This is not the time to enter into any description of this building and its surroundings, but suffice it to say that there is no institution for intemperate persons in the world that is carried on in the manner in which the Christian Home of New York is conducted. From the moment a patient enters this Home until he leaves, he is surrounded with nothing but the simplest yet most earnest and devout Christian influence. Hundreds of reclaimed men in this city can testify of its work."

A Novel Life-boat was Submitted by its Inventor to the Board of Life Saving Appliances at its session in New York last week. It consists of a boat of canvas in a frame of iron. The bottom is of double, and the top of single, canvas, and an opening at the top admits the passengers. It is claimed by the inventor that this car will ride the surf and land safely on any beach. Its chief recommendation is that it is so strong that it can be used on a rockbound coast without fear of its iron frame being stove in. The life-boat of the Gospel to which the sinner is invited to trust himself, possesses this qualification. On the great Captain of Salvation death and hell have exhausted their fury in vain (Acts 2 : 24-36).

A Charge of Stealing a Chinese God was brought against a prisoner in a New York court on November 7th. The idol was valued at forty dollars and the man having been found guilty of the theft, Judge Cowing said to him: "You couldn't have had much respect for the Chinese deity to commit such an act as that. I will give you a chance to reform, and will send you to State prison for two years." The prisoner was not to blame for showing disrespect to the Chinese idol, because it was not entitled to respect, being an inanimate piece of matter. The fact was, however, that he showed too much regard for it. He purloined it because being worth forty dollars, it represented to him the deity of money before which he and too many others offer very sincere homage (Col. 3 : 5).

A Five Dollar Gold Piece Pronounced Spurious by the experts was found to be genuine on being tested last week by an experienced jeweller. A Boston bank sent a quantity of gold to the Sub-Treasury a few days ago, and, on the following morning, a curiously colored five-dollar piece, which had been discovered in the lot, was returned to the bank with the information that it was counterfeit. The clerk who had received the coin was apprised of his error, with an accompanying warning to be more careful in the future. Not relishing this reflection upon his ability, he took it to a jewelry manufacturer and had the piece cut in two. The parts were subjected to the severest tests, all of which showed the metal to be of standard quality. The clerk, highly elated with this proof of the soundness of his judgment, called at the Sub-Treasury, and much to the surprise of the experts there, detailed his experience with the jeweller. The peculiar color of the coin was said to have been caused by heat, to which it had been at some time subjected. Something like this often happens in those religious circles where men are estimated by their appearance and their professions. Sometimes genuine religious principle that would stand the test of persecution is doubted, through being hidden under a manner that painful experience or natural disposition has rendered less brilliant than that of hypocritical professors of holiness who are often accepted at their own valuation (1 Cor. 3 : 13).

An Electric Storm of Extraordinary Intensity prevailed over the whole of the country on Friday last, and even affected the cables under the Atlantic. It first began to make itself felt in Washington about four o'clock in the morning and increased in intensity till 9 : 45, when communication from every direction was cut off. This electric storm seemed to go in successive negative and positive waves, alternately neutralizing the currents on the wires or increasing their intensity to such a degree as to burn everything up. The switchboard was on fire a dozen times during the forenoon, and half a dozen keys of the instruments were melted by the current which continued to pass through. The screws burned up and the points parted. The chief operator of the Western Union in New York said, "There has not been such a disturbance of the telegraph lines since Colonel Ingersoll laughed at the aurora borealis last spring and it repaid him by grounding all the wires, which prevented the Western press from receiving his lecture." An ingenious operator in endeavoring to reduce the arrears of telegrams waiting for transmission made a curious discovery. He found that in those cases where he had two wires in operation between the same places he could send a message by uniting them, thus making a circuit entirely of wire instead of relying on the earth for one half of the circuit. There was no disturbance when the wires were entirely disconnected from the earth. The discovery was typical of that time which may soon come when amid universal distress and disturbance only those who have been kept separate from the world will be in peaceful communication with their Lord (Rev. 7 : 3).

A Remarkable Fulfilment of a Dream is Recorded in a California newspaper. On Friday night, November 3d, a lady living at Oakland had a very vivid dream in which she had seen a boat upset and a man drowned. She gazed earnestly at the face of the drowning man and recognized the features of her brother. The following morning she visited her brother's office and telling him of her dream begged him not to venture on the water as he usually did on Sundays. He laughed at her fears and on the following Sunday went fishing as he had arranged. When about two hundred yards from the wharf the boat capsized in a sudden squall, and he with his companion fell into the water. His companion was rescued, but he was drowned. It is impossible to account for this strange premonition of the disaster given to the sister of the doomed man, but strange and unreasonable as it may have seemed to him when it was given, he must have bitterly regretted in his last moments that he despised it, as he had despised the other warnings given in Scripture against the desecration of the Lord's day. When the ordinary admonitions against sin have failed, extraordinary ones seldom succeed (Luke, 16 : 31).

A Carload of Gunpowder under Falling Fire-brands alarmed a railroad conductor in California recently. The Tribune states that a locomotive with a raging wood-fire beneath the boiler, was dragging a long train up a heavy grade near Colfax, Cal., a week or two ago, when the wire netting over the smoke-stack blew out. Instantly a stream of live coals shot into the air and fell back upon the cars so thickly that there was great danger of a conflagration. The conductor stationed brakemen on top of the train and was hoping to surmount the grade without accident when, on looking over his way-bills, he discovered to his horror, that the car directly behind the locomotive was loaded with gunpowder. He immediately uncoupled it, without alarming the passengers, and while the other cars stood on the grade with the brakes hard on, the powder car was drawn swiftly up the slope and left on a side track. The engine then returned and took the rest of the train forward. Men often speak of some dispensation of God's providence that breaks up a cherished connection by death, or quarrel, or removal, as inscrutable; the day may come when the rupture like the separation of those cars will be found to have been necessary for the safety of all concerned (Psa. 73 : 16-19).

A Personator of George Washington was last week fined heavily for his want of reverence for the father of his country. A Memphis magistrate had before him one morning a young man who at a masked ball the night before had figured as George Washington, to whom, however, his resemblance was so entirely superficial that he became intoxicated and abusive before the night was over. The magistrate pronounced sentence in the following homely but emphatic language: "Now, if you had got drunk as a private citizen, and had ripped around as such, I should have fined you $5; but inasmuch as you appeared at the masked ball and committed the offence while personating the character of George Washington, the reverend father of his country, I will have to inflict a fine on you of $20. I won't have this patriotism business brought into disrepute." The Memphis judge recognized a principle, Christians in these days too often forget. They, while professing entire sanctification, attend theatres, dancing-parties and amusements of all kinds, and try to justify themselves in doing so by saying there is no harm in them. They do not realize that in naming the name of Christ, and in calling themselves Christians, they by attending such places bring discredit on the name of their Saviour. (2 Tim. 2 : 19).

THE LAW WRITTEN ON THE HEART.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"After those days, saith the Lord, I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts."—Jeremiah 31 : 33.

LAST Lord's-day morning we spoke of the first great blessing of the covenant of grace, namely, the full forgiveness of sins.* Then we dilated upon that wonderful promise, "Their sins and their iniquities will I remember no more." I hope our consciences were pacified and our hearts filled with wonder as we thought of God's casting behind His back all the sins of His people; so that we could sing with David, "Bless the Lord, O my soul: and all that is within me, bless his holy name. Bless the Lord, O my soul, and forget not all His benefits: who forgiveth all thine iniquities."

This great blessing of pardoned sin is always connected with the renewal of the heart. It is not given because of the change of heart, but it is always given with the change of heart. If God takes away the guilt of sin, He is sure at the same time to remove the power of sin. If He puts away our offences against His law, He also makes us desire in future to obey the law. In our text we observe the excellence and dignity of the law of God. The Gospel has not come into the world to set aside the law. Salvation by grace does not erase a single precept of the law nor lower the standard of justice in the smallest degree; on the contrary, as Paul says, we do not make void the law through faith, but we establish the law. The law is never honored by fallen man till he comes from under its condemning rule, and walks by faith, and lives under the covenant of grace. When we were under the covenant of works we dishonored the law, but now we venerate it as a perfect display of moral rectitude.

Thus the law is had in honor among believers, and though they are no more under it as a covenant of works, they are in a measure conformed to it as they see it in the life of Christ Jesus, and they delight in it after the inward man. Things required by the law are bestowed by the Gospel. God demands obedience under the law.

GOD WORKS OBEDIENCE

under the Gospel. Holiness is asked of us by the law; holiness is wrought in us by the Gospel; so that the difference between the economies of law and Gospel is not to be found in any diminution of the demands of the law, but in the actual giving unto the redeemed that which the law exacted of them, and in the working in them that which the law required.

Notice, beloved friends, that under the old covenant the law of God was given in a most awe-inspiring manner, and yet it did not secure loyal obedience. God came to Sinai, and the mountain was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire; and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly. So terrible was the sight of God manifesting Himself on Sinai that even Moses said, "I exceedingly fear and quake." So terrible was the sound of Jehovah's voice, even when He was not declaring vengeance, but simply expounding righteousness, that the people could not endure it any longer; and yet no permanent impression was left upon their minds, no obedience was shown in their lives. Men may be cowed by power, but they can only be converted by love.

* See CHRISTIAN HERALD, November 16th. "God's Non-remembrance of Sin." Page 729.

The sword of justice hath less power over human hearts than the sceptre of mercy.

Further to preserve that law, God Himself inscribed it upon two tables of stone, and He gave these tablets into the hands of Moses.

WHAT A TREASURE!

Surely no particles of matter had hitherto been so honored as these slabs, which had been touched by the finger of God, and bore on them the legible impress of His mind. But these laws on stone were not kept; neither the stones nor the laws were revered. When Moses came down from the hill with those priceless tablets in his hands, he saw the people wholly given up to base idolatry, and in his indignation he dashed the tablets to the ground and broke them in pieces, as well he might when he saw how the people had spiritually broken them and violated every word of the Most High.

From all which I gather that the law is never really obeyed as the result of servile fear. You may preach up the anger of God, and the terrors of the world to come, but these do not melt the heart to loyal obedience. It is needful for other ends that man should know of God's resolve to punish sin, but the heart is not by that fact won to virtue.

Man revolts yet more and more; so stubborn is he that the more he is commanded the more he rebels. The decalogue upon your church walls and in your daily service has its ends, but it can never be operative upon men's lives until it is also written on their hearts. Tablets of stone, though apparently durable, can readily enough be broken, and so can God's commands; so are they indeed broken every day by us, and those who have the clearest knowledge of the will of God nevertheless offend against Him. As long as they have nothing to keep them in check but a servile dread of punishment, or a selfish hope of reward, they yield no loyal homage to the statutes of the Lord.

HOW GOD SECURES OBEDIENCE.

At this time I have to show you the way in which God secures to Himself obedience to His law in quite another fashion; not by thundering it out from Sinai nor by engraving it upon tablets of stone, but by coming in gentleness and infinite compassion into the hearts of men, and there, upon fleshy tables, inscribing the commands of His law in such a manner that they are joyfully obeyed, and men become the willing servants of God.

We shall, first of all, look at the tablets—"I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts"; secondly, at the writing; thirdly, at the writer; and, fourthly, at the results which come of this wondrous writing. Oh, that the Spirit may illuminate us now.

I. First, I invite your attention to upon which God writes His law—"I will put my law in their inward parts." Just as once He put the two tables into the ark of gopher wood, so He will put His holy law into our inward nature, and enclose it in our thoughts and minds and memories and affections, as a jewel in a casket. Then He adds, "And I will write it in their hearts." Just as the holy words were engraven upon stone, so shall they now be written in the heart, in the handwriting of the Lord Himself. Mark that the law is written not on the heart, but in the heart, in the very texture and constitution of it, so that into the centre and core of the soul obedience shall be infused as a vital principle.

Thus, you see, the Lord has selected for His tablets that which is the seat of life. It is in the heart that life is to be found, a wound there is fatal; where the seat of life is there the seat of obedience shall be. In the heart life has its permanent palace and perpetual abode; and God saith that, instead of writing His holy law on stones which may be left at a distance, He will write it on the heart, which must always be within us. It is a wonderful thing that God should do this. It displays infinitely greater wisdom than if the law had been inscribed on slabs of granite or engraven on plates of gold. What wisdom is this which operates upon the original spring of life, so that all that flows forth from man shall come from a sanctified fountain-head!

But before God can write upon man's heart it must be prepared. It is most unfit to be.

A WRITING-TABLE FOR THE LORD

until it is renewed. The heart must first of all undergo erasures. What is written on the heart already, some of us know to our deep regret. Original sin has cut deep lines, Satan has scored his horrible handwriting in black letters, and our evil habits have left their impressions. How can the Lord write there? No one would expect the holy God to inscribe His holy law upon an unholy mind. The former things must be taken away, that there may be clear space upon which new and better things may be engraven. But who can erase these lines? "Can the Ethiopian change his skin, or the leopard his spots? then may we also do good, that are accustomed to do evil." The God who can take away the spots from the leopard, and the blackness from the Ethiopian, can also remove the evil lines which now deface the heart.

As the heart must undergo erasure, it must also experience a thorough cleansing, not of the surface only, but of its entire fabric. Truly, brethren, it was far easier for Hercules to purge the Augean stables than for our hearts to be purged; for the sin that lies within us is not an accumulation of external defilement, but an inward, all-pervading corruption. The taint of secret and spiritual evil is in man's natural life, every pulse of his soul is disordered by it. The eggs of all crimes are within our being; the accursed virus, from whose deadly venom every foul design will come, is present in the soul. Not only tendency to sin, but sin itself hath taken possession of the soul, and blackened and polluted it through and through, till there is not a fibre of the heart untinged with iniquity. God cannot write His law in our inward parts till with water and with blood He has purged us.

In addition to this, the heart needs to be softened, for the heart is naturally hard, and in some men it has become harder than an adamant stone. They have resisted God's love till they are impervious to it; they have stood out obstinately against God's will till they have become desperately set on mischief, and nothing can affect them. God must melt the heart, must transform it from granite into flesh; and He has the power to do it. Blessed be His name, according to the covenant of grace He has promised to work this wonder, and He will.

Nor would the softening be enough, for there are some who have a tenderness of the most deceiving kind. They receive the word with joy; they feel every expression of it, but they speedily go their way and forget what manner of men they are. They are as impressible as the water, but the impression is as soon removed; so that another change is needed, namely, to make them retentive of that which is good; else might you engrave and re-engrave, but, like it would be gone in a moment if exposed to heat. The devil, the world, and the temptations of life, would soon erase out of the heart all that God had written there if He did not create it anew with the faculty of holding fast that which is good.

In a word, the heart of man needs to be totally changed, even as Jesus said to Nicodemus, "Ye must be born again." Dear hearers, we preach to you that whosoever believeth in Christ hath everlasting life, and we speak neither more nor less than the truth of God when we say so; but yet, believe us, there must be as great a change in the heart as if a man were slain and made alive again. There must be a new creation, a resurrection from the dead; old things must pass away, and all things must become new. God's law can never be written upon the old natural heart; there must be a new and spiritual nature given, and then upon the centre of that new life, upon the throne of that new power within our life, God will set up the proclamation of His blessed will, and what He commands shall be done.

II. Secondly, let us pass on to notice

THE WRITING.

"I will put my law in their inward parts, and write it in their hearts." What is this writing?

First, the matter of it is the law of God. God writes upon the hearts of His people that which is already revealed; He inscribes there nothing novel and unrevealed, but His own will which He has already given us in the book of the law. He writes upon the heart by gracious operation that which He has already written in the Bible by gracious revelation. He writes: not philosophy, nor imagination, nor superstition, nor fanaticism, nor idle fancies. A fancy as to a man's being a prophet, or a prince, or an angel, may be on a man's heart, but God did not write it there, for His own declaration is, "I will write my law in their hearts," and He speaks not of anything beyond. The nonsense of modern pretenders to prophecy is no writing of God; it would be a dishonor to a sane man to ascribe it to Him; how can it be of the Lord? He here promises to write His own law on the heart, but nothing else. Be you content to have the law written on your soul, and wander not into vain imaginings lest you receive a strong delusion to believe a lie.

But to come a little closer to the matter; what does the Scripture mean by writing the law of God in the heart? The writing itself includes a great many things. A man who has the law of God written on his heart, first of all, knows it. He is instructed in the ordinances and statutes of the Lord. He is an illuminated person, and no longer one of those who know not the law and are cursed. God's Spirit has taught him what is right and what is wrong; he knows this by heart, and therefore can no longer put darkness for light, and light for darkness.

This law, next, abides upon his memory. When he had it only upon a tablet he must needs go into his house at look at it, but now he carries it about with him in his heart, and knows at once what will be right and what will be wrong. God has given him a touchstone by which he tries things. He finds that "all is not gold that glitters," and all is not holy which pretends to that character. He separates the precious from the vile, and does this habitually; for his knowledge of God's law and his memory of it are attended by a discernment of spirit which God has wrought in him, so that he quickly discerns what is according to the mind of God and what is not. Long before public sentiment has proclaimed a hue and cry against questionable practices, the Christian man, even if deluded for a while by current custom, yet feels a trembling and an uneasiness. Even if he consents outwardly, being overborne by general opinion, a something within protests, and leads him to consider whether the matter can be defended. As soon as he detects the evil, he shrinks from it. It is a grand thing to possess so that, go where you may, you are not dependent upon the judgment of others, and therefore are not deceived as multitudes are.

This, however, is only a part of the matter, and a very small part comparatively. The law is written on a man's heart further than this; when he consents unto the law that it is good; when his conscience, being restored, cries, "Yes, that is so, and ought to be so. Are there not men who in their anger wish that killing were no murder? Are there not others who do not steal, and yet wish they might take their neighbors' goods? Are there not many who wish that fornication and adultery were not vices? This proves that their hearts are depraved; but it is not so with the regenerate, they would not have the law altered on any account. Their vote is with the law, they regard it as the guardian of society, the basis on which the peace of the universe can alone be built, for only by righteousness can any order of things be established.

But, furthermore, there is wrought in the heart by God a love to the law as well as a consent to it, such a love that the man thanks God that He has given him such a fair and lovely representation of what perfect holiness would be; that He has given such measuring lines, by which he knows how a house is to be builded in which God can dwell. The law is fully written on the heart when a man takes pleasure in holiness, and feels a deep pain whenever sin approaches him. It is not so much what you do as what you delight to do, which becomes the clearest test of your character. Many strictly religious people who go to and fro to church and chapel would be uncommonly glad if they did not feel bound to do so. Is not their public worship a dead formality? A great many people have family-prayers and private prayers who wish they could be rid of the nuisance. They say, "You see I deny myself by going so many times to a place of worship and by private prayer, therefore I must be truly religious." The very reverse far nearer the truth.

THE MAIN POINT of the whole is this, that whereas our nature was once contrary to the law of God, so that whatever God forbade we at once desired, and whatever God commanded we therefore began to dislike, the Holy Spirit comes and changes our nature, and makes it congruous to the law, so that now whatsoever God forbids we forbid, whatsoever God commands, our will commands. How much better to have the law written upon the heart than upon tables of stone!

If anybody should inquire how the Lord keeps the writing upon the heart legible, I should like to spend a minute or two in showing the process. How the Holy Ghost first writes the law on the heart I cannot tell. The outward means are the preaching of the word and the reading of it; but how the Holy Ghost directly operates on the soul we do not know; it is one of the great mysteries of grace. So far also we know that one way by which the law is kept written upon a Christian's heart is this—a sense of God's presence. The believer feels that he could not sin with God looking on. It would need a brazen face for a man to play the traitor in the presence of a king; such things are done "under the rose," as men word it, but not before the monarch's face. So the Christian feels that he dwells in God's sight, and this forbids him to disobey. The eye of the Heavenly Father is the best monitor of the child of God.

Next, the Christian has a lively sense within him of the degradation which sin once brought upon him. If there is one thing I never can forget personally, it is the horror of my heart while I was yet under sin, God revealed my state to me. Ah, friends, the old proverb that a burnt child dreads the fire has an intensity of truth about it in the case of one who has ever been burnt by sin so as to be driven to despair by it; he hates it with a perfect hatred, and by that means God writes the law upon his heart.

But a sense of love is a yet more powerful factor. Let a man know that God loves him, and he must try to please God. Another very powerful pen with which the Lord writes is to be found in the sufferings of our Lord Jesus Christ. The cross is the crucifier of sin.

Beside that, God actually establishes His holy law in the throne of the heart by giving to us a new and heavenly life. Once more, the Holy Ghost Himself dwells in believers. I pray you, never forget this marvellous doctrine, that as truly as ever God dwelt in human flesh in the person of the God-man Mediator, so truly doth the Holy Ghost dwell in the bodies of all redeemed men and women who have been born again; and by the force of that indwelling He keeps the mind forever permeated with holiness, forever subservient to the will of the Most High.

III. Now we turn for just a minute to think of

THE WRITER.

Who is it that writes the law upon the heart? It is God Himself. "I will do it" saith He. Note, first, that He has a right to indite His law on the heart. He made the heart; it is His tablet; let Him write there whatever He wills. As clay in the hands of the potter so are we in His hands. Note, next, that He alone can write the law on the heart. It will never be written there by any other hand. The law of God is not to be written on the heart by human power. Alas, how often have I expounded the law of God and the Gospel of God, but I have got no further than the ear; only the living God can write upon the living heart. Moreover, He writes indelibly. I defy the devil to get a single letter of the law of God out of a man's heart when God has written it there. When the Holy Ghost has come with all the power of His divinity and rested on our nature, and stamped into it the life of holiness, then the devil may come with his black wings and all his unhallowed craftiness, but he can never erase the eternal lines. We bear in our hearts the marks of the Lord God eternal, and we shall bear them eternally.

IV. I wish to finish by noticing of the law being thus written in the heart. Frequently the first result is great sorrow. If I have God's law written on my heart, then I say to myself, "Ah me, that I should have lived a law-breaker so long! How could we be so wicked as to break so just a law? How could we be so wilful as to go against our own interests? Knew we not that a breach of the commandment is an injury to ourselves?" Thus we are in bitterness as one that is in bitterness for the death of his first-born. I do not believe God has ever written His law on your hearts if you have not mourned over sin. One of the earliest signs of grace is a dew upon the eyes because of sin.

The next effect of it is, there comes upon the man a strong and stern resolve that he will not break that law again, but will keep it with all his might. That strong resolve soon leads to for another law lifts up its head, a law in our members; and that other law cries, "Not so quick there; your new law which has come into your soul to rule you shall not be obeyed; I will be master." He who is born within us to be our king finds the old Herod ready to slay the young child. The lust of the eye, and the lust of the flesh, and the pride of life, each one of these swears warfare against the new monarch and the fresh power that is come into the heart.

Some of you know what this struggle means. It is a very hard fight with some to keep from actual sin. Have you not when troubled with a quick temper had to put your hand to your mouth to stop yourself from saying what you used to say, but what you never wish to say again? Have you not often gone up-stairs to get alone, feeling that you would soon slip if the Lord did not hold you up? How wise to get alone with God and cry to Him for help! How prudent to watch day and night against evil!

talk about having got beyond all that. I should be glad to think that there are such brethren; but I should want to keep them in a glass-case to show them round, or in an iron safe where thieves could not get at them. I conceive it to be a snare of the devil to imagine that you are beyond the need of daily watchfulness. For my own part, I have not passed beyond conflict and struggle; I bear testimony that the battle grows more stern every day. Those of God's people with whom I associate I find fighting and wrestling still.

Sometimes I know the devil does not roar, but I am more afraid of him when he is quiet than when he rages. I would sooner he would roar of the two, for a roaring devil is better than a sleeping devil. Whenever he gives way he only gives an inch to take an ell; and whenever you begin to say to yourself, "My corruptions are all dead, I have no tendencies to sin now," you are in awful peril. Poor soul, you do not know what you are talking about. God send you to school, and give you a little light, and you will sing to another tune, I am sure, before long.

But does not something better than this come of the divine heart-writing? Oh, yes. There comes actual obedience. The man not only consents to the law that it is good, but he obeys it; and if there be anything which Christ commands, no matter what it is, the man seeks to do it—not only wishes to do it, but actually does it; and if there be aught that is wrong, he not only wishes to abstain from it, but he does abstain from it. God helping him, he becomes upright and righteous, and sober, and godly, and loving, and Christlike, for this it is which the Spirit of God works in him. He would be perfect were it not for the old lusts of the flesh which linger even in the hearts of the regenerate.

OUR FITNESS FOR HEAVEN

is not a thing that will be clapped upon us in the last few minutes of our life, just as we are going to die; but the children of God have a meekness for heaven as soon as ever they are saved, and that meekness grows and increases till they are ripe, and then, like ripe fruit, they drop from the tree and find themselves in the bosom of their Father God. God will never keep a soul out of heaven half a minute after it is fully prepared to go there; and so, when God has fitted us to be partakers of the inheritance of the saints in light, we shall enter at once into the joy of our Lord.

My brethren, I feel I have talked feebly and prosily about one of the most blessed subjects that ever occupied the thoughts of man—how God's law shall be kept, how it shall be honored, how holiness shall come into the world, and we shall no longer be rebellious. Herein let us trust in our Lord Jesus, who is to us the surety of that covenant of which this is one great promise—"I will put my law in their inward parts, and in their hearts will I write it." God do so to us, for Christ's sake. Amen.

ENGINEER SEEDS' HEROISM.

THE illustration on page 748 depicts one of the most daring acts in the annals of railroad travel. It deserves to be widely told if only as an encouragement to others to deeds of courage and self-sacrifice. The hero, Joseph A. Seeds, was the engineer of the train which left Jersey City on the Pennsylvania road about quarter past one on October 22d. It was composed of ten passenger cars containing 620 persons. The smoking-car, which was coupled to the tender, was so much crowded that men stood in the aisle. The train soon began to move swiftly, and when about a mile east of the Hackensack bridge it was going at the rate of forty miles an hour. The New York Sun thus describes the scene that then ensued: "Suddenly smoke and fire poured through the front door of the smoking car, which was open, and created consternation among the passengers. The roaring flames were swept back from the engine, and they almost hid both it and the tender from sight. 'Shut the door, shut the door!' was shouted. The door was closed, but almost immediately it flew open again, and the engineer and fireman emerged from the fire and smoke and stumbled into the car. The train dashed on, with no one to govern the engine. Men rushed to the rear platform, and there met a frightened crowd from the next car. Others raised windows, only to realize at what speed the train was going, and to know that to jump out would be death."

The engineer said that he had opened the furnace door as usual to replenish the exhausted fuel. There is nothing strange or wonderful in that. How often have we not all seen at home a railway train rushing through the night, the open furnace door casting a deep ruddy glow upon the surrounding and silent landscape! There is no more picturesque moment in the career of a railway train; the steam streaking the black night with white, and the engine-driver and his companion standing out in bold relief against the reddened background. In this case the men in charge of the train suddenly found that they were enveloped in flame. One account says that the backward draught shot out this intolerable flame; another hints that there was something wrong with the exhaust apparatus. Anyhow the flames had burst forth, driving the engineer and fireman out of the cab over the tender and into the forward car, where they were sheltered from the heat and in comparative safety. But what safety could there be for either them or the 620 passengers on that train rushing wildly at forty miles an hour with no guiding hand on the engine?

"Get to that closet," shouted Engineer Seeds

to the fireman, pointing to the rear of the car, "and work the air brakes."

But the passage was blocked with passengers, and the fireman found it impossible to make headway.

"What is going to be done?" asked Theodore Reeves, of Newark, of the engineer.

The latter made no reply, but rushed back through the fiery doorway, climbed upon the tender and disappeared in the flames. And now fanned by the wind the fire was burning more fiercely than before. In order to stop the burning train, in order to save the lives of those six hundred and twenty passengers, it only needed the devotion of one life; the daring deed of one brave man. Engineer Seeds had resolved to do it, and there and then, without an instant's hesitation, he retraced his steps, back from the burning car, back across the red-hot tender, back through the flame, the roar, and the smoke that surrounded him, determined to stop the train, or to die doing it. For an awful moment or so the engine-driver was lost. No one could face the blinding smoke; no one could see through the cruel flames. All at once the paralysis of terror which had run through the cars from one end to the other ceased. The train stopped on the bridge over the Hackensack River, the danger was over and the fireman, half mad with excitement, made a rush for his heroic comrade.

The train having come to a standstill, the flames now shot upward and no longer concealed the tender. Those who stood nearest to the door saw a man's head in the water tank on the tender. Two men rushed forward and lifted out the engineer. He had jumped into the water to extinguish the fire that was consuming him, and was found leaning, weak, and only half conscious, against the side of the tank. His clothes had been burned off, and his flesh was scorched on his body and legs. From both hands the flesh hung in shreds.

They dipped water in pails from the river, and put out the flames. Conductor Whelpley put Seeds on another train, and had him removed to Jersey City. Passengers who saw him were forced to tears as they praised his self-sacrifice. One of them said:

"Of all magnificent and brave men he is the best. We hadn't words enough to express our sense of his heroism. If he dies he will be a martyr. He saved a trainful of passengers from an apparently certain and horrible death."

It was hoped at first that the brave man's life might be saved, but after enduring twenty-four hours horrible torture he died in the hospital. He had given his life as a sacrifice for that of others.

THE MESSAGE IN THE VILLAGE CHURCH.

"GRANDPA, what do you think about when you look in the fire so long?" The questioner was a boy of some ten years of age, and he was sitting alone with a white-haired man whom he had been watching intently for nearly half an hour, as the old man sunk in a reverie sat motionless, looking into the red coals which gave out a comfortable glare in a room half sitting-room, half study, one quiet Sunday evening in winter.

"Ah, my boy, I had forgotten you" said the old man arousing himself, and patting his young companion on the head. "What was I thinking of? Well, I was looking at a picture."

"A picture in the fire, grandpa? I cannot see any picture. I guess you fancied it. Is it your spectacles makes you see things there?"

"I suppose you are right, Harry; it must be fancy, but it seemed so plain to me I could have almost believed it was there."

"Tell me about it, grandpa; does it make you happy to sit quite still and fancy pictures, like I am when I have a picture book to look at?"

"Not always, my boy. Some of the pictures make me very sad, but that is my own fault. You see, I cannot alter them as I should like to do; they are finished, and some of them are blurred and spoiled, and the best of them might have been better than they are, but they cannot be touched now. They must remain just as they are, and all the sighs and tears cannot change one line, any more than your crying yesterday could take that ink blot out of your writing book. You will have to show it to the principal to-morrow, and will have a failure marked for it. My pictures are the same, and one of these days I shall have to show them, and if they were to be judged by their merits, I should be in a sad case." And the old man as he spoke heaved a sigh that was almost a groan.

"Do you mean things you have done, grandpa? Were you naughty and careless when you were a boy?"

"Oh, yes, Harry, I was both, and when I grew older I did not mend very much. Now I am old and cannot live very long, I think very often of these things and wish I had been a better boy and a better man."

"What will become of mamma and me when you die, grandpa?"

"I do not know, Harry. I am sure God will take care of you, but I cannot tell how He will do it. Only half an hour ago I was thinking of that very question you have asked, and it called up the picture I was looking at when you spoke to me."

"Then tell me about that, grandpa," said the boy eagerly, his personal connection with it giving a new zest to his interest.

"Well, it is a picture you never saw, Harry, but though I have not looked upon it for more than fifty years it seems more familiar to me than the scene from our parlor windows. I will try to describe it to you as I see it. It is a little village three thousand miles away from here. There are very few houses in it; about a dozen farms, about forty laborers' cottages, a general store, the smith's shop, and the inevitable rum-seller's place. That is all, except the central point in the picture, and that is the old church. It is a conspicuous object in the village, for it is on high ground and all around it is a stone wall to keep the soil of the graveyard from being washed down by the rain into the road. I have clambered over its moss-covered stones many a time, and I could show you, if you were there, the very stone on which I cut my name when I was a boy. The church itself is a venerable old pile, two hundred years old, I suppose. There are tombstones around it with dates on them running back nearly as long. One of them impressed me particularly, it seemed so sad, for under the name and date were two lines that showed the tenant of the tomb had lived a cheerless life. They were "Poorly lived and poorly died, Poorly buried and no one cried."

I used to wonder what kind of a man he must have been, and with a sort of vague pity used to hope he was better off after he was dead than when he was alive.

"The last time I saw the old church it was just such a day as this has been. Snow on the roads, snow on the housetops, snow on the trees, snow everywhere, and the air still and heavy and cold. With a very dear friend I walked from the city where we lived to the little village to attend morning service in the old church. As we walked we discussed our respective positions and prospects,

We were both young men, life was before us, and we wanted to make the best of it. But already with both of us there was a sad consciousness of mistakes made, and difficulties around us the result of our own imprudence. I need not tell you what they were, but they were so serious that we felt that if we would live wisely and happily there must be an effort made to clear ourselves of the consequences of our folly. What pain that effort would cost us each knew, and what it would cost others we could guess. We were very much cast down and very apprehensive of the sorrow and suffering before us and very much distressed by the thought that other people must suffer too. We had settled it by the way, what we ought to do, but though each tried to encourage the other, we both quailed before the ordeal.

"I remember well the place we stood on at that moment. The old church before us with its exposed parts covered with snow, its blackened walls looking blacker by contrast; the bell ringing and the villagers slowly wending their way around the stone wall to the gate that opened into the churchyard. I remember, too, with that strange minuteness that in old age surprises us, how we noticed a youth, whose delight it was to scandalize his neighbors, was walking leisurely away from the church with a bundle of sticks he had gathered that Sunday morning for kindling wood.

"The change in the ringing of the bell warned us that service would soon commence, and we accordingly bent our steps to the church, carrying into the sacred edifice a load of anxiety and apprehension such as rarely lies on hearts so young. But we were in the house of God and He had a message for us. The minister was reading a chapter in the Old Testament, and as we listened the words came to us as a message from God. 'Thou shalt keep him in perfect peace, whose mind is stayed on thee, because he trusteth in thee' (Isaiah 26:3). That passage came like cooling balm on our hot, fevered souls, and gave us even then an earnest of the promised peace. A little later and the preacher was giving out his text. We listened, and again the voice of God spoke to us: 'Turn not to the right hand nor to the left; remove thy foot from evil' (Prov. 4:25). We came out of that church that morning into a new world, as it seemed to us. The strength we needed had been given and we were prepared to do and suffer God's will.

"As I sat down here this afternoon with you, Harry, and thought of the future and of what might happen to you and your dear mother if the Lord should call me, I thought of this youthful trouble and of the message God sent me fifty years ago. I give it to you now, my boy, with the blessing of an old man, who during all that fifty years has proved it true, and to whom every day and hour God has been a loving, faithful Friend."

FAITH HEALING.

A Letter from Mrs. M. Baxter to Inquirers.

THE multitude of requests for prayer which reach us at Bethshan, and which, for the most part, are couched in very similar words, make it a necessity to write, in the name of our Lord, a few words to those who send them to us.

We cannot but fear that many of the writers are looking to our prayers, much in the same way as they would to a new remedy, and there is something like trying a new experiment; which if it fail, will leave them free to try some other. Truly we may act so with fallible man; and while seeking the advice of earthly physicians we have a perfect right, if one fail, to try another. But it is quite a different matter when we come to God. Any one seeking to be healed by the Lord must himself take the chief responsibility of committing his case into God's hands. If he has been led by the Word and by the Spirit of God to renounce all other means, and to abandon his body to the immediate care of God, and if, in so doing, he seeks the prayers of others to strengthen his own faith—well. But if, on the contrary, hearing only how others have been healed by faith, he thinks he would like to try the same, and he wants believing Christians to trust God for him, and instead of him—he is altogether in the wrong. He cannot shift such a responsibility on to the shoulders of another.

Very frequently we are reminded by those who write to us, of the four men who brought the sick of the palsy to Jesus; but Jesus then healed his soul, not his body. "But He saw their faith," the united faith of the man and his friends; and then when he himself acted he was healed. He must arise, he must take up his bed, he must walk, without waiting to consider whether he could or not.

In order to obtain from God any blessing for spirit, soul, or body, we must have to do with Himself. A sinner must himself believe in order to be forgiven, a believer must himself make a full surrender in order to be truly sanctified, and a poor sick one must himself come to the feet of Jesus, himself choose Him as his Physician and trust Him with his case, himself take Him as his Healer, in order to be healed.

We have no more power to heal the body than we have to save the soul; we can only take our needy brethren by the hand and lead them to Jesus for pardon, cleansing power, or healing. Those whom Jesus healed when He was on earth, were for the most part brought into contact with Him. They heard Him speak to them, they touched the hem of His garment; or, He laid His hands on them and healed them. And the exceptions—the centurion's servant, the nobleman's son, the Syro-phenician woman's daughter, were the rarer cases.

The healing by the disciples was in Jesus' name, and therefore only as His representatives. The object of our God in permitting us to be afflicted with sickness, is to draw us nearer to Himself, and His object in healing us is none other than to bring us nearer still to Himself. Hence the necessity that each seeker after healing from the Lord, should seek His face directly, and not through a third party. He has Himself bidden the sick to seek for healing (James 5:14-16), and "Himself took our infirmities and bare our sicknesses" (Matt. 8:16, 17); we are also taught that He healed all that were sick that these words might be fulfilled. Thus the sick have encouragement to come to Him.

We are more willing than we can tell, to come with our sick ones to the feet of Jesus; we only feel that we cannot undertake to come for them, or exercise in their stead, a faith which is not as yet in them.

Many have asked us to pray, and to continue praying, for them. We believe that when anything is committed to God, He really does undertake it; and that to continue asking Him to do it, instead of continuing to thank Him for undertaking it, is to act in unbelief. He is "the same yesterday, to-day, and forever," and He cannot be untrue; let us, therefore, when we present a petition to Him, make sure of His attitude toward us, that we may be right in the attitude that we assume toward Him.

ONLY A TRAMP.

A Serial Story by Grace Stebbing.

A Bit of Diplomacy.

"Do you know, Mr. Wynn," Jim exclaimed gleefully, "do you know, I really do believe that in a little while I shall be as clever at cooking as you are yourself?"

"Umph," grunted Wynn, adding after a moment, in hardly a more gracious manner, "Most people can learn to do common-sense things if they choose, if they are not born fools or idiots."

And then he betook himself into the inner room to wash his hands, while Jim tried to console his crestfallen elation over successful efforts by murmuring confidentially to the smoking bacon:

"Poor chap! poor old chap! He's getting sick to death o' bein' tied down to this place, and to letter writin' all day, and never a change, that's what it is. He's never let out before, but I've seen it comin', and them as is over him, an' think themselves a sight wiser nor Jim Blake, might see it too if they'd half an eye, an' took the trouble to use it. He feels for all the world like a caged lion."

But whatever Charles Wynn might be feeling like, he had fought down his ill-humor with his protégé by the time he came back to the dinner-table; and also, however right Jim Blake might be in his conjectures on the whole, it happened just that minute to be on account of Jim himself, and not on account of his own affairs, that the many-years-wanderer was troubled.

Ever since the tramp had charged himself with the care of the factory lad, last October, he had maintained a constant supervision of some kind or another over him. If duty or inclination had led to his leaving him for any of his unemployed hours, he had always taken care to provide the young fellow with such occupation or companionship as might offer the best hope of keeping him safe from his especial temptations; but on this Saturday, when Bobby Balston had bethought himself that the primroses of Sleepy Dell would look brighter, and smell more sweetly, with his "potato-man" to share the innocent pleasure with him, it so happened that the "potato-man's" own intention had been to soothe or encourage, he could hardly tell which, his own restlessness, and improve Jini's education, by giving him a long lesson in geography that leisure afternoon, and on the manners and customs of foreign parts, his own travels forming the foundation of the interesting instruction.

Small Bobby interfered with these plans, and now came the question, what to do with Jim?

"Take him with you to the Dell," suggested something that certainly must have been outside Charles Wynn's own real self, for he scouted the inner whisper as something perfectly preposterous. Poor Jim was all very well, and had grown as gratefully docile and affectionate with him as a faithful dog; but he had not by any means turned out a second Aleck, nor did he appear at all likely to do so. The little fellow who had the lost friend's second name was much more after his pattern, and Wynn was very resolute that the tranquil pleasure he was looking forward to should not be marred, by the addition of the lumbering factory lad to the otherwise curiously-assorted little party of two.

"But then," as he had questioned himself before, "what else to do with him?"

Suddenly a thought struck him while he was washing his hands, and wringing the water from them, and scarcely waiting to dry them on the towel, he came out into the kitchen dining-room again looking so cheerful that all the cook's elation at the tempting appearance of the table returned, and he heaved a great sigh of relief.

"Thank you," said Wynn, with a laugh, as he took his seat.

Jim Blake stared. "Thank me for what?" he asked.

"Why, for that sigh when you caught sight of my face again," was the laughing answer. "I take it, it meant sympathy with me in having got over my fit of bad temper."

"Sympathy with you in having got over your dismalness," amended Jim; but the amendment was not accepted.

"Don't try to flatter me," was the reply. "I was in as growling a temper five minutes since as the proverbial bear with a sore head, and as I haven't got a sore head I ought to be ashamed of myself. But now, look here; are you afraid of a long walk—mind, a really long walk I mean—sixteen miles about?"

"With you, do you mean?"

"No, not with me, but for me; to do me a favor."

"Oh!" with a brilliant smile that made clumsy Jim quite good-looking for once. That last word had a magical effect. "I'm not afraid of anything, Mr. Wynn, if so be it's to do anything for you. Shall I set off now?" quite contentedly laying down his knife and fork on his still half-full plate, and getting up from his chair. "I'm ready."

"Nonsense; sit down again," said his companion rather huskily. "You'll risk turning me into an unreasonable tyrant, man, if you offer this sort of obedience to my wishes."

Jim rewarded this assertion with a short laugh of scorn. "Well, seein' as this is the first wish you've had for six months, if you mean to allow yourself in two a year, maybe my back will be broad enough to bear them. Howsomever, if it's all the same to you, I'd as lief start soon, for sixteen mile, or fifteen as is nearer the mark from here, I expect, is a goodish stretch for my stiff legs. They ain't used to walking; not like yours, you know."

"Then more shame for them," was the answer. "My wholesome, healthy love of walking is at least one good example that I set to you, and to all the lazy fellows about here. I cannot think how it is men are not ashamed to dawdle around in a mile ring as the greater number of them do, as far as their own feet are concerned, in this old England of ours. Drive? ay, I guess you'll drive fast enough in anything and anyhow, and have your spines and your brains shaken and jolted into semi-idiotcy; but when it comes to a good walk that would put all your muscles into healthy play, and your tempers into tune, then, 'Oh, walking's a bore.' A bore indeed! I'd just like to have the use of a good thick stick on your backs once a week round the town, you idle pack."

And with that contemptuous concluding word Charles Wynn pushed back his plate with one hand, and with the other pushed back the red-brown curls from his forehead. Jim made no answer. He never did to these occasional indignant outbursts of his companion against sloth or bad deeds. Perhaps they made the deeper impression for not being argued over or talked about too much.

The clerk took a half-sheet of paper, and writing a few words on it, inclosed it in an envelope; and then, dinner being over, he rose and fetched a couple of dilapidated-looking volumes, whose contents were more valuable than their outsides, which he had picked up during the week at an old bookshop. Jim grinned knowingly.

"There, Jim," he said, handing him the books. "The service I want of you is to take those over to Williams, the Silverdale clerk and bookbinder, and tell him, will you, that I want some of his good, honest work put into them, but nothing showy; and just give him that note at the same time, will you?"

Jim Blake took the note as readily as the books. He was glad to have it, in fact; for as he had a very poor opinion of his own head, and as he concluded that the message given to him was also inside that envelope, he felt comfortably relieved from all responsibility. As it happened, however, that short epistle had nothing whatever to do with the books. It was one after the nature of those that history and legend tell us used to be sent by the hands of unsuspecting messengers in ancient times—"When this reaches you, cut off the bearer's head."

Charles Wynn gave his messenger with the old "Hudibras" and "Faerie Queen," a half-hour's start, seeing that, as Jim himself had observed, his feet were a good deal slower in their movements than his own, and their road for the first five miles lay in the same path. When the clerk did eventually set out to keep his appointment there was another slight delay at an optician's before he drew in a great, full, contented breath into his lungs, and set off at a swinging trot for Sleepy Dell.

The seven miles were accomplished in less than an hour and a half; and on the brow of the hill overlooking sunlit Silverdale, and many another fair mile beyond, the vigorous pedestrian paused, and looked around him with smiling eyes, and an unconscious sensation of delight in his buoyant life which those who are not fond of walking, or who do not indulge the fondness, can scarcely understand. A healthy walker, who has been walking for the pleasure of walking's sake up to his strength, but not beyond it, almost invariably finds this wayside inn of a world, in which he has been placed by a loving Father, a very bonny one, and the people in it very bonny too.

Charles Wynn's restlessness had been gradually coming to a feverish height during the past months of monotonous occupation and dreary out-of-door atmosphere; but just at that minute, as he stood with his broad-brimmed American straw hat in his hand, looking around at the smiling landscape at his feet, he felt as peacefully contented as the child in the Dell below, whose bright eyes so quickly caught sight of his expected friend.

A shrill shout of delight, and Bobby Balston's small, nimble feet began galloping up the side of the hill, pretty nearly as fast as if they belonged to a mountain goat. The next minute he was caught up by a pair of strong hands, and tossed on to the broad shoulder that was his favorite perch. From there he stooped down, with the tenderness of his loving childhood, and kissed his bearer's forehead.

"Did you like my letter this morning?" Bobby asked. "Muvver said it was beautiful, an' Faver, when I showed it to him, said it was velly won'erful."

"And so it was very wonderful, and beautiful as well," said Wynn, as he sprang downward with the child on his shoulder. "And this is very wonderful too, how a clever little monkey like you go on speaking like a funny little baby. If you don't learn to speak plainly in a couple of hurries, I guess I'll have to pop you down on the next stinging-nettle I come to. Do you hear that Brownie?"

"Yes; and you may, if you like, weally," was the calm, wise answer.

"If I like, really, indeed, you little sceptic," said the young man. "Now just see if I don't like really to punish that lazy little tongue of yours. Here's a regular prime patch of nettles."

And so saying he swung the child round off his shoulder, and deposited him, not on, but beside the said prime patch, and, still more satisfactorily to Bobby's ideas, beside a brilliant-eyed frog, which gave one great flopping hop at the sudden disturbance of its ruminations, and then remained still, gazing at the intruders.

Small Bobby clasped his hands. "Oh," he murmured, with a low sigh, "isn't it nice watching fings?"

Charles Wynn found it strangely pleasant watching the watcher. At length, as the frog finally asserted its superior dignity by taking the initiative in future proceedings, and hopping out of sight, the young man dropped himself down upon the mossy ground, and said, with mock gravity:

"There, see what a terrible fellow you must be; you've frightened that poor frog out of all its wits and seven senses."

Bobby turned round quickly, with an earnest, eager look upon his face. "Its five senses, you mean," he corrected softly; "but oh, Mr. Tatoe—"

"It was to be 'Uncle Tatoe,'" interrupted Wynn; "you know we made that agreement on Christmas-day."

"Yes—only," hesitating.

"Well, Brownie, only what?"

"Only Muvver said, when I told her, that you were grown into a mister, and mightn't quite weally like it after all."

"Umph! Well, when you get home this evening give my very best compliments to mother, and tell her that Uncle Tatoe says that he does really quite like it. So now to go on. What do you want with Uncle Tatoe?"

"Why, something I've been wantin' to speak about a long time, more'n a mumph, I fink; only the frog being frightened made me remember it just now. It's this," and on the child's face came that strangely earnest expression of deep thought that puzzled and astonished more than his parents when it was observed. His companion sat up, and bent more forward toward him. He paused a moment, as though to think how to put his thoughts into words. At last he said gravely:

"Do you fink I must be a wicked little boy because I don't dread God?"

The child's eyes expressed the greatest anxiety for the answer, but as none was immediately forthcoming, he continued:

"You remember we pray to God, 'That it may please Thee to give us a heart to love and dread Thee'; but I don't dread Him a bit; I can't; I love Him all. Do you fink that shows I'm a wicked little boy?"

Bobby Balston's face at that moment was a study, but that of his companion was at least as fair. Drawing the child upon his knees, he said gently:

"Brownie, do you remember a very, very beautiful anecdote in the Bible? The anecdote tells us that the dear Lord Jesus put His hands on the heads of a number of little children, and that then, afterward, in the greatness of His love for them, He took them up in His arms, and blessed them. Do you think that He wanted those little children to dread Him then, or to love Him with all the whole strength of their hearts?"

The anxious doubt faded out of the large brown eyes, and with a happy sigh Bobby let his head sink back against his friend's shoulder as he answered, "Oh, to love Him too much to be afraid! An' I fink somehow His hands must be on my head too. I feel like it. If He takes them off, I s'pose that'll be time to begin to dread?"

"Yes, little Brownie; yes, quite time," said

Charles Wynn, momentarily tightening his clasp around the boy, as though with his weak human arm he would shield him from those future cares and sorrows that might in the coming years teach the dread of the almighty, all-just Judge, to grow beside the love that now answered love.

AFTER HIS DEATH.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 3d. Mark 15: 33-47. Golden Text, ver. 29. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Rending of the Temple Veil—Its Significance—Gentiles alone Impressed—Tainting the World—The Women Afar Off—No Necessity for Distance Now—Joseph's Tardy Sympathy—Nicodemus also at the Burial—The Unnecessary Spices—The New Tomb—The Women Watching—Incredulous Disciples—The Precaution of the Pharisees—As Sure as They Could.

OUR beloved Lord gave up the ghost, He who had called the world into being and who is Himself Life eternal, as our Representative surrendered Himself for a brief space to death. And no sooner had He drawn His last breath than "the veil of the temple was rent in twain from the top to the bottom," from God's side to man's. All barrier was now broken down, "the way into the holiest of all" (Heb. 9: 3) was now made manifest.

"Having, therefore, brethren, boldness to enter into the holiest by the blood of Jesus, by a new and living way, which He hath consecrated for us, through the veil, that is to say, His flesh; and having an High priest over the house of God; let us draw near with a true heart in full assurance of faith, having our hearts sprinkled from an evil conscience, and our bodies washed with pure water" (Heb. 10: 19-22). Glory to our great God and our loving Saviour, all hindrance to His presence is removed, we may stand, live, walk in His continual presence, there is no need to be a moment without Him, "He that overcometh . . . shall go no more out" (Rev. 3: 12). His heart, His body, may be the temple of the Holy Ghost, where the fire on the altar whereon He lies in living sacrifice, shall be "ever burning" (Lev. 6: 9, 12, 13) and the light of Christ within Him, and shining out from Him like that of the candlestick in the tabernacle shall "burn away" "before the Lord continually" (Ex. 27: 20, 21; Lev. 24: 4). Therefore, every veil which comes between God and man is of man's device,

GOD IS NOT RESPONSIBLE FOR IT.

With the rending of the veil "the earth did quake, and the rocks rent; and the graves were opened; and many bodies of the saints which slept arose, and came out of the graves after His resurrection," (for the empire of death was shaken), "and went into the holy city, and appeared unto many." But so hardened were the Jews that we read of no manifest effect upon them though the heathen centurion was convinced by it. He it was on whom it had devolved to give the word of command to the soldiers for Jesus to be mocked and crucified. We may well believe that the unusual deportment of the condemned had almost fascinated his attention, and that unprejudiced as he was, conviction first of the innocence and then of the just claims of Jesus to be King and God must have dawned upon him. When he, "and they that were with him, watching Jesus, saw the earthquake, and those things which were done, they feared greatly, saying, Truly this was the Son of God," (Matt. 27: 51-54); in Luke he said, "Certainly this was a righteous man" (Luke 23: 47). Thus the thief and the heathen centurion both were converted at the cross and both were witnesses to Christ's Kingship and Godhead as none of the disciples were.

The Jews, even while committing the awful sin of condemning and of executing Jesus, were nevertheless most exact in the performance of the ceremonial of their religion. Oh, how like men nowadays! "It was the preparation," and they would not have the bodies remaining on the cross during the Sabbath day, they thought that the dead body of the Son of God defiled the day, and were not aware how their own enmity to God was with a real and spreading corruption; so they

"besought Pilate that their legs might be broken, and that they might be taken away." The soldiers came to do their errand upon the two thieves, but they found nothing to do when they came to Jesus; "He was dead already" (John 19: 31-33). O Lord, whenever Satan comes to tempt me, let him find nothing to do, let him find me dead already, "crucified with Christ." But they "pierced His side, and forthwith came thereout blood and water," for atonement (Lev. 17: 11) for cleansing (1 John 1: 7-9). Reader, do you know the power of that blood? are you reconciled to God by the blood of His cross, and are you cleansed from all sin, clean, whiter than snow?

"There were also women looking on among whom was Mary Magdalene," (who was however, standing close to His cross while He was living John 19: 25) "and Mary, the mother of James the less, and of Joseph and Salome" (who also when He was in Galilee, followed Him and ministered unto Him); "and many other women which came up with Him unto Jerusalem." Was it from fear or of necessity that they were afar off? Had the soldiers driven them away, or were they appalled by the fearful darkness? In any case, if we are found afar off, it is our own doing, He wills it not. And yet what a little thing causes distance from Him! Are we unwilling to come out on the Lord's side and make a stand in our business, in our dress, in our expenditure, because we do not want to lose caste in the world? We do it at the price of being afar off from Jesus. Do we refuse some path which would entail upon us persecution, the hard word, the unkind look, perhaps some real injury to our property or to our reputation? We do so at the cost of being afar off from Jesus.

Oh, how many Christian workers will give away traits, because that is no longer peculiar, will hold a mothers' meeting, because it is "the thing," will visit a few people just when it is not difficult, and just when it does not interfere with personal comfort; but who never dream of going into the district in the evening to meet the poor drinking man, and tell him of deliverance; who never search out the poor harlot and take her with them to a meeting, where she may come under the power of God; who will not do anything which might reflect upon their credit among those whose hearts are as cold to sinners as their own. Oh, is not this following Christ afar off!

"Now when the even was come, because it was the preparation, that is, the day before the Sabbath, Joseph of Arimathea, an honorable counselor, which also waited for the kingdom of God, came, and went in boldly unto Pilate, and craved the body of Jesus." We have many accounts of Joseph; Matthew says, he was "a rich man . . . who also himself was Jesus' disciple," Luke tells us, "he was a good man, and a just;" (the same had not consented to the counsel and deed of them); John says he was "a disciple of Jesus, but secretly for fear of the Jews." In any case, he made no bold defence of Jesus before the council, the thief and the centurion were before him in their testimony. And now when Jesus was dead, when it did not cost him so much as during His lifetime, He came to help in His burial. He would have to do with a dead Christ, but not a living one.

There are many, honorable too, who take this negative position with regard to Jesus, they will have anything to do with Jesus, provided He does not speak or move, they will give Him all honor, but He must not manifest His power. Nicodemus also, the cowardly inquirer, who chose night for his time of coming to Jesus, because he would not have been seen coming, he too would help to bury Jesus. Once he had been snubbed in the council, for saying something on behalf of Jesus, the sneering elders had asked him, "Art thou also of Galilee? Search and look; for out of Galilee ariseth no prophet" (John 7: 52). This seems to have been too much for Nicodemus, he had not made up his mind to deny himself, take up his cross and follow Jesus.

Then it was only when He was dead, that this disciple came forward to declare himself a disciple, and to make known his adhesion to Jesus. He "brought a mixture of myrrh and aloes, about an hundred pound weight," (he did not do it grudgingly). "Then they took the body of Jesus, and wound it in linen clothes as the manner of the Jews is to bury" (John 19: 39, 40). They might have spared themselves the trouble; already it had been pleaded in the courts of heaven, "Thou wilt not leave My soul in hell, neither wilt Thou suffer Thine Holy One to see corruption" (Ps. 16: 10); already the Son of man knew that His Father had said He should see no corruption. They wanted to preserve Jesus! They wanted to hinder decay. But in Him was

NO ELEMENT OF DECAY.

Sin, sickness, death, sat uneasily upon Him, they were adopted things, put on to be put off again. Because He gave up the ghost, death had power to stop the respiration, the circulation and the ordinary physical functions, but the Body was the habitation of Him who is Life eternal, and it could not decay. And we try with our poor devices to keep Christ within us, we attempt to make secure the blessing we have obtained, we are upon a wrong tack; He is the Keeper, His life in us is incorruptible it is not subject to decay. Only as we take His place and try to manage ourselves do we find that things go wrong; He is equal to the charge of us, let Him have it all.

The place of Jesus' burial was Joseph's new tomb, "He made His grave with the wicked, and with the rich in his death," (Isa. 53: 9.) Joseph had hewn this tomb out of the rock; and there he laid Jesus, and "rolled a great stone to the door of the sepulchre, and departed." No man had ever yet lain in that tomb; Jesus was its first inhabitant. But outside that stone, after Joseph of Arimathea and Nicodemus had gone away, Mary Magdalene and the other Mary remained, and might have been seen sitting OVER AGAINST THE SEPULCHRE.

Had the disciples believed or understood that which Jesus had so often taught them about His resurrection, surely they would all have been watching there, but they were slow of heart to believe. And when things turn out differently to our expectation, and instead of the feeling that we have a blessing which we have sought, in power or healing, we seem in our own consciousness to be dead, weak and nothing in ourselves. We have failed to hang on to His declared word who makes even the things which are not to be as though they were! What a device of Satan's it is, to make us act as though the truth of God could not be true if we have not at the moment the consciousness of our senses that it is so. And how blessed it is when, holding fast by the word of God, we look away from, and above our experience, and rest upon the faithfulness of God! Oh, how it establishes our faith to know that God is true.

THE PHARISEES REMEMBERED.

If the disciples did not remember or understand Christ's prediction of His own resurrection, the chief priests and the Pharisees did; the words of Jesus had weight with them. "The next day," (which must have been the Sabbath, on which day they had so often reproved Jesus for healing the sick) "they came together unto Pilate, saying, Sir, we remember that that deceiver said, while He was yet alive, after three days I will rise again. Command therefore that the sepulchre be made sure until the third day, lest His disciples come by night and steal Him away, and say unto the people, He is risen from the dead; so the last error shall be worse than the first." (Matt. 27: 62-64.)

Did Pilate quiver and tremble? We can believe he did. "What," he may have thought, "have I not yet done with this Jesus which is called Christ? Is there a chance that death itself cannot hold the Man whom I have crucified?" He granted their request, "Ye have a watch: go your way, make it as sure as ye can." Yes, as sure as they could; but not sure enough to prevent the Son of God arising when He would. "As sure as ye can" seemed to imply some doubt on Pilate's mind. "So they went," Sabbath day though it was "and made the sepulchre sure, sealing the stone, and setting a watch." But our next lesson will show how useless were their pains, how futile the attempts of man when directed against the Son of God.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Brilliant Pageant was Witnessed in London on Saturday last when Queen Victoria reviewed the troops which had returned from Egypt. The Prince and Princess of Wales and the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh accompanied the Queen. Her Majesty presented medals to two representatives of each regiment engaged, and the other members of the regiments will have medals sent to them. The march past of the Duke of Connaught at the head of the Guards was one of the marked incidents of the procession. The Queen stood up in her carriage as they passed by. The troops afterward marched through the streets and received a hearty welcome from a concourse of people stated to have numbered over a million. The Guards, Highlanders, a brigade of seaman and marines and the Indian contingent, about thirty strong, evoked a most enthusiastic welcome. The streets through which the troops were to march were gayly decorated with flags bearing the mottoes, "Kassassin," "Tel-el-Kebir," "Welcome Home" and others appropriate to the occasion.

General Wolseley has been very Courteously received by Queen Victoria, who sent for him to Scotland on his return. There he dined with Her Majesty at Balmoral, and at the dinner the Queen proposed his health in warm and charmingly chosen words. Sir Garnet's return for the queenly compliment was to couple with his thanks the proposal of the Duke of Connaught's health. This added to the delight of the Queen, who has the name of her soldier son very near her heart.

Explanations of the British Policy in Egypt have been deferred by Mr. Gladstone in spite of frequent questions addressed to him by prominent members of Parliament. He has stated, however, that England's business was to make or to join in making an arrangement for security and good order, but it would do nothing to shut out future amendments. The government was now engaged in considering with Lord Dufferin the establishment of institutions in which Egyptians would be represented, and which would have control over the administration of the expenditure. He also stated that in the event of Arabi Pacha being condemned, he would not be executed without the consent of the British Government.

Rumors of War Between Russia and Austria are being circulated in Europe, though it is hoped on all hands that they are without foundation. They appear to have originated in a speech made by Herr Plener, a prominent member of the Reichstag, at the sitting of the Austrian Delegation at Pesth, who exhorted the government to avoid anything calculated to bring on war. It is evident that Herr Plener possesses weighty information in regard to the relations of Austria with Russia. The report of the Committee on the Foreign Office Budget has been presented. The committee expressed the conviction that an Austro-Russian war was sooner or later inevitable.

The Italian Government now Claims Jurisdiction over the interior of the Pope's palace and the claim has been allowed in the law courts. The Court of Appeal has confirmed the decision of the Court of First Instance, that the jurisdiction of the Italian tribunals extends within the walls of the Vatican. The point arose in connection with a case in which a person employed as an architect in the Vatican sued the major domo of the Pope before the Italian courts. The clerical press expresses indignation at the decision, and declare that it makes the law of Papal guarantees a farce. This last vestige of sovereignty, the independence of the Pope in his own palace will be swept away if this decision is confirmed.

A Collision Between the Steamer Westphalia of the Hamburg American Line, and another vessel, the name of which is at present unknown, occurred off the British coast nearer Beachy Head on November 12th. The Westphalia left New York with ninety passengers on board for Hamburg on November 2d, but on November 13th she was seen entering Portsmouth harbor with a huge hole in her side extending below the water-line. Her captain reported that during the previous night when it was intensely dark he had been in collision with another steamer. The vessels met stem to stem driving in the Westphalia's bulk-heads and rending a hole nine feet wide in her side. The captain of the Westphalia remained six hours where the collision took place, and then finding that in spite of his exertions at the pumps the leak was gaining he made for Portsmouth, leaving a boat with six men to rescue any survivors there might be from the other vessel. The boat's crew who were picked up by a Belgian pilot reported having seen the vessel sink, but were not able to discover her name or flag.

The Affairs of the City of Glasgow Bank are now announced as finally settled. The bank, the collapse of which about four years ago caused widespread distress through Great Britain reducing many families to beggary and rendering many widows and orphans destitute, was a very influential concern. All the bank's immense indebtedness to its depositors has been paid, and the remaining assets have been handed over to a company formed to receive them for the benefit of the few shareholders who were able to pay all the calls of the liquidators. During the four years the liquidators have paid off $55,000,000, of which nearly half came out of the private means of the shareholders.

Mr. Bradlaugh, the Atheist Member of the British Parliament, who is not allowed to sit in the House has made another effort to secure his admission. He has written to the Speaker asking the House to permit him to state at the bar the grounds of the law on which he claims his right to take the seat for Northampton for which he was elected. Mr. Labouchère, the journalist, and Mr. Bradlaugh's colleague in Parliament, gave notice that he would at the first opportunity, move that Mr. Bradlaugh be heard.

The Sudden and Serious Illness of Mr. D. L. Moody is announced in a brief cablegram to the New York daily journals. Its nature is not stated, but he is reported as lying ill from overwork at Cambridge. The many friends of the eminent evangelist in this country will unite with his friends in England in earnest prayer for his speedy recovery.

Mr. Henry M. Stanley Expects to Return to the Congo early next year. His steamer left Antwerp for South Africa on November 12th, laden with such an assortment of goods as will enable him to establish a solid trade with the native kings. The steamer also carries a number of sheep for acclimatization and a selection of European cereals. Mr. Stanley has gone to Nice to recruit his health.

The Disagreement Among the Irish Leaders is said to be still causing trouble in the camp. Reports cabled last week show that in the new organization there is a Davitt section and a Parnell section, and that between the two there is a feud. It has been carried over from the Land League agitation and in some measure accounts for the attitude of the Irish press in America. The origin of the quarrel appears to have been the monopoly of the offices by Mr. Davitt and his friends to the exclusion of the members of Parliament, who being engaged in London with their Parliamentary duties during several months of the year, were compelled to leave the affairs of the League and the control of the finances to the Davitt section. Later when complaints were made about the conduct of the office, the Parnell party alleged that the officials appointed by Mr. Davitt had neglected their duties to go about making speeches not always friendly to Mr. Parnell and his colleagues. Hence the recent struggle to obtain control of the new organization in which Mr. Davitt was defeated.

Disastrous Floods have Occurred in Italy, and the results have assumed the proportions of a national calamity. A correspondent says: "I feel that it is impossible for me to describe in a few words this great catastrophe, as yet unmeasured even by those most competent, who are eye-witnesses and straining every nerve to save human life, not only from the flood, but from starvation. Italy has suffered from many wounds which are still fresh and bleeding, and now a sudden stroke has smitten her from Heaven—more grievous than any previous blow from the hand of man. Each hour brings some fresh catastrophe; the effects immediate destitution; extinction of life from famine and disease—in the future a lengthened unknown time of distress and penury. Italy is sorely distressed; may God help her, and stay His chastening hand; for God alone can bring good out of evil, as, thanks be to His name, He is visibly doing by calling forth the best feelings of a noble and suffering nation."

France in Conquering Tunis has Prepared for herself the elements of future trouble. The Arabs are making incursions into Tunisian territory, which give great anxiety, if not alarm, to those who hold the reins of government in France. M. Grévy complains that the existence of the capitulations embarrass her in her efforts to restore order in Tunis. These capitulations are treaties made by one ruler of Tunis after another with Christian States, enabling them to maintain a separate dominion in the Regency. All the Christian States of Europe, with the exception of Russia, are involved in these treaties. France, of course, would like to see all these privileges of the Powers in Tunis abolished and herself left sole possessor of the field. But the Powers are scarcely likely to give up their privileges on such conditions and for such reasons. What with Algeria and Tunis on hand, beside difficulties of a serious nature in some of her other foreign possessions, France has quite enough to do just now.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Reaped a Magnificent harvest of spiritual blessing at Bristol, more abundant even than the most sanguine anticipated. With a responsiveness to the demands of the hour that was simply marvellous, Christians of all denominations cheerfully and assiduously co-operated with the distinguished evangelists, and with the happiest results. There has been a great outpouring of divine power, and many conversions to Christ are recorded. Messrs. Moody and Sankey commenced their campaign at Cambridge on Saturday, November 4th, and already the tokens for good are most manifest and manifold. They were to remain in the university town until November 12th, when they intended to proceed to Oxford.

An All-night Walk was Taken by an Aged Frenchwoman, in order that she might attend the evangelistic meetings recently conducted in Paris by Messrs. Moody and Sankey. Her history is a remarkable one. It appears that when she was only ten years of age she was awakened to a sense of sin and her need of Christ as a Saviour, through the instrumentality of a New Testament which was given her by an Englishman passing through her town. At the age of twenty-five she married, both her husband and herself being unconverted. Her husband's family made her very unhappy by their unkindness, and she cried to the God of whom she had read in her New Testament. At last, one day she went out of her house into a retired spot, and besought the Lord to have mercy upon her and save her soul. He heard her cry, and gave her perfect peace through faith in Jesus Christ. She was the first convert in her town; the neighbors thought she had become insane, and asked her husband what he was going to do with her. But she lived the Gospel, and commended its excellency by her consistent life. A number of persons became interested in the salvation of sinners, and now there are three of Mr. M'All's meetings in that town.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

WHAT a host of stirring memories arose in the mind of every intelligent citizen last Thursday morning as the announcement was read in every daily paper in the land that Thurlow Weed was dead. The close of such a life as his cannot be passed over as an ordinary event; it stands out from the records of the daily life of the nation with a prominence resting on the public labors of more than half a century. From the day that he cast his first vote in 1824 for Clinton, in the contest for the Governorship of New York, down to the present year, Thurlow Weed has been in the front rank of political warfare, and neither his friends nor his opponents can hear that he has passed away without emotion. Of those who labored with him and against him in his early manhood and in his prime, none are left, while his friends of the new generation, who have known him only as a veteran, have listened to him with reverence, and have received his counsel with respect.

His name recalls political contests and national events which to the boys and girls in our schools, seem remote history. He was a valiant participant in political struggles which the statesmen of our day only dimly remember as events in which their fathers took active interest, but which, when they took place, they were too young to understand. For such a man his foes can well afford to drop a tear of respectful sympathy, while his friends render a hearty tribute of sorrow. What his position was every one knew. He was thorough in all he did and said. A stanch and trusty friend, he was a frank and vigorous opponent, ready at all times to do valiant battle for the cause he loved and served, yet asking for himself and his family no share in the spoils of victory. Such a man is ever sure of the sincere good-will of his fellow-citizens, whether they fight with or against him.

He fought, never wavering under temptation nor deserting under defeat, always active in the foremost rank, prepared to give and take the hardest blows in the contest. He was an enemy before whom it was no disgrace to fall, and whom to overcome was an achievement not to be lightly esteemed. Such a man does not leave the scene of his labors without a tribute of honest respect from those whom he opposed, nor without the tearful regret of those whom he led and served.

Of late years his stalwart figure, as he passed along the streets of New York leaning on the arm of his devoted daughter, or sat on the platform at some religious or philanthropic meeting, aroused the interest of every beholder. His feebleness and darkness increased the sympathetic reverence felt toward him by strangers, while those who knew him intimately were drawn toward him by the warmth of his kindly heart, and the keen interest he continued to take to the last in current, political events.

Though he never held office, except for two terms as a member of Assembly in his early manhood, every one knew how potential had been his influence in the dominant political party, and that the name of had not been given to him without cause. He had made no kings, but Governors, Cabinet ministers, and at least two Presidents owed their elevation to his efforts. Yet that power was never used for the advancement of his own fortunes or those of his family, and he felt himself amply repaid for his labor, if his party triumphed and his country prospered. Such disinterestedness, rare in our times, rendered him a man of whom all sections were proud, and whom even those who were opposed to him, regarded with respect.

Thurlow Weed's life is that of a typical American. He had no advantages of birth, station, or education. The position he attained was attained in spite of and not because of his outward circumstances. His father was a cartman, and even among cartmen was not accounted prosperous. He was generally in trouble, often without a horse, generally behindhand with the world, and was more than once in prison for debt. The family was settled at Cairo, Greene County, N. Y., when Thurlow Weed was born on November 15th, 1797. He received what he has himself described as "a rough-and-ready education," which mainly consisted in his own struggles with the spelling book at home, and in occasional attendance at an evening school. This was aided by inherited shrewdness and quickened by very early habits of keen observation. While other Catskill boys idled, young Thurlow Weed "ran of errands" and "did chores" and "held horses at the door of the tavern instead of lounging within listening to tap-room stories." At nine years of age he was a blower in a blacksmith shop at Catskill, whither his mother, a good-natured shrewd Englishwoman, had removed to be near her husband, whose residence there had unfortunately become involuntary. One of the incidents of his life at Catskill, which he enjoyed describing in after years was his

FIRST SIGHT OF A STEAMBOAT.

When the first steamboat came up the Hudson River he and a few other boys placed their clothes on a plank and swam out to the island (now the steamboat landing) to see the wonder pass. "It came up," he writes, "with an awful noise and surge, its huge paddle wheels exposed and its funnels vomiting fire and smoke," so that to the unaccustomed eyes of young Thurlow and his comrades, it seemed more like a monster from the infernal regions than anything else they could imagine. They were greatly frightened, but it passed harmlessly, and they had it to say in after years that they saw the first steamboat that ever went up the Hudson. Thurlow Weed has often described

HIS FIRST VISIT TO NEW YORK.

The ten-year-old boy had longed to see more of the world. His opportunity came through the kindness of Captain Jacobus Bogardus, who commanded the sloop Jefferson, and who engaged Thurlow as cabin-boy, and in that capacity took him for a voyage to the City of New York. To this city, the boy Thurlow introduced himself by tramping up Broad Street with the trunk of one of the sloop's passengers on his shoulder—a position even more humble than that of his printer prototype, Benjamin Franklin, when he entered Philadelphia ninety years before. Inhabited New York was then nearly all below Grand Street, and contained about 75,000 people. A cabin-boy's life was uncongenial to the boy, and his family removing westward to Onondaga County, Thurlow went with them, and for some time spent his life in the occupations of the backwoods.

The occupation of a printer was, however, the one on which he had set his heart, and he sought, at first unavailingly, to get himself at Catskill. He was, however, allowed to sweep the office and dust the cases, and thus unobserved he picked up a little knowledge of the craft. Then he went to Onondaga Hollow and obtained employment in the office of The Lynx, a newspaper published by Theodore C. Fay. That was in 1811, Weed being then only fourteen. In that office he set his first "take." It was there that Weed committed the an incident which he related many years afterward to the New York Typographical Society. He said: "An obituary notice of the death of the accomplished lady of a then youthful and promising, but now venerable and eminent clergyman (the Rev. Derick C. Lansing), was handed in just before the paper was going to press. In setting it up the word 'consort' occurred. It was new, and did not strike me as conveying the appropriate idea; and instead of referring to the dictionary I substituted the word 'comfort,' so that the deceased was thus made the 'comfort' rather than the 'consort' of the bereaved husband! The paper was thus worked off and sent about the village; and while felicitating myself on an intellectual achievement, the blunder was discovered by Mr. Brown, a one-eyed shoemaker, and my ears yet tingle with the boxing my stupidity cost them."

While he was thus engaged, the Recruiter Sergeant's drum-beat was heard in the land. With Great Britain was in progress, and a regiment was forming in Central New York. Thurlow enlisted, and was soon on the march toward the frontier. The young recruit was noted for zeal and intelligence, and proved himself far superior to the average soldier. Before reaching their destination at Sackett's Harbor, during a halt for dinner, Colonel Petrie, the commander of the regiment, sent for Private Weed, complimented him upon his intelligence and good conduct, and handed him a commission as Quartermaster's Sergeant. That commission, faded but carefully preserved, he exhibited with honest pride at a reunion of the veterans, but a few months ago. It is also well known that many years afterward, he sought an opportunity of serving the man who had so befriended him. Hearing that Colonel Petrie was poor, he petitioned for an office for him and obtained it, and his own pension was devoted to the support of another of his old friends.

After the war, Thurlow resumed his occupation and travelled from place to place, a fair specimen of the careless and wandering tribe of journeyman printers. In 1816, 1817, and 1818, he was employed in New York, working in company with James Harper, afterward the great publisher, the two running an old Ramage press in Fanshaw printing house.

In 1819, he began to take an interest in politics and in conjunction with another printer he commenced the issue of The Republican Agriculturist in Chenango County. In this paper he advocated the interests of De Witt Clinton, then hotly engaged in the contest on his canal policy. Subsequently he acquired possession of The Rochester Balance the name of which he changed, owing to the anti-masonic agitation, which arose about Morgan's disappearance, to The Anti-Masonic Enquirer. Weed lived next door to Morgan, and when he disappeared and the charge was made that the Freemasons had murdered him for disclosing the secrets of the order, Weed placed himself in the van of the movement and made his journal the leading organ in the anti-masonic interest. That was in 1827. Anti-masonry was not at first a political question, but the agitation grew until votes were cast at the elections, not on political principle, but according to whether the candidate was or was not a Freemason. Mr. Weed, a leader in the cause, was on that issue elected to the Legislature.

As the anti-masonic agitation died away, the various elements of political parties, which had acted with Weed and his friends, became united in opposition to Jackson. Out of that union sprang the foundation of

THE EVENING JOURNAL

A prominent writer thus describes its inauguration: "There was at that time no newspaper in Albany to represent adequately the anti-Jackson politics of the State. The Argus, in the hands of Edwin Croswell, stiff-necked and ably conducted for those days, was the mouthpiece of the 'Regency,' and, being the State paper, it had everything its own way. The Evening Journal was established as an Anti-Masonic organ, the first number appearing on the 22d of March, 1830. The founders, who admitted their agency in the enterprise, were thirty in number, all members of the Legislature. Among them were Francis Granger, Millard Fillmore, Timothy Fitch, William H. Maynard, and Albert H. Tracy. The newspaper was printed by B. D. Packard & Co. and Thurlow Weed was made the editor. In his salutatory he carefully avoided saying anything that would indicate that the political principles of the new journal had other object in view than the annihilation of Free Masonry."

Soon after taking charge of the Evening Journal Mr. Weed disposed of his effects in Rochester and took his family to Albany, where he continued as editor of the newspaper until January 28th, 1863, a period of thirty-three years during which he was consulted by the leaders of the Whig party and its successor, the Republican party, as a trusted adviser, and at the same time as a steadfast advocate of party policy. Mr. Weed's influence in the party was growing all that time, and his power in conventions and in the confidence of those who held high office was recognized through the State and was well understood in Washington. So completely was it supposed that William H. Seward, when Governor of New York, was guided by him, that the political cartoons of the time made capital out of the connection.

The story is told that at one time Governor Seward was riding with a stage-driver, when the latter inquired who his passenger was. On being told that he was riding with the governor, he refused to believe it. Arriving at a tavern, Mr. Seward asked the landlord to assure the driver that he had the Governor of the State on the box with him. "Yes, you are Mr. Seward, but you are not the governor," replied the tavern-keeper. "Well, if I am not the governor, who is?" inquired Mr. Seward. "I guess Thurlow Weed is governor of this State," was the reply.

Thurlow Weed's history during the thirty-three years of his residence at Albany is the history of the Republican party. Always in the thick of the struggle, always laboring indefatigably for the candidates of the party, whoever they might be, providing they were regularly chosen, bearing his disappointments with manly fortitude, as in the case of the Seward defeat at Chicago in 1860, he followed the fortunes of the party through good and evil report. His influence was continually exercised through his journal and by his personal presence in councils, caucuses and conventions. Of the details of the events of those years we have no space to speak. They are recounted in history, and with the exception of his visit to Europe in 1861 to endeavor to bring about a more friendly feeling toward the North in the war, Mr. Weed's life was uneventful apart from politics.

In 1862 Thurlow Weed severed his connection with the Albany Evening Journal and became AN EDITOR IN NEW YORK CITY.

He occupied an editorial position on the Times newspaper for one year. He then purchased the Commercial Advertiser, turned it into a stock company, and disposed of the shares among a number of his personal friends. He was a constant and liberal contributor to the columns of the journal while it was in his control. In 1867 a stroke compelled him to give up work, and he sold out most of his stock in the newspaper. He was now seventy years of age, and though only interested in all the political events of the time and in close intimacy with the leaders of the party, he felt the necessity of leaving the brunt of the struggle to younger men. But he was always ready to advise or consult with politicians, and his interest in newspaper work was attested to the last by the appearance of frequent letters in the papers of New York over the familiar initials, "T. W." Mr. Weed never undertook the writing of books, though often solicited thereto by publishers who believed his name would be popular on a title-page. In 1866, however, his friends gathered and printed in a handsome volume of 800 octavo pages his letters from Europe and from the West Indies. The volume was for private circulation only, and was compiled and printed without Mr. Weed's knowledge. These letters are practical and shrewd observations upon what he saw and heard during his journeys, and make no pretension to literary writing.

CHARITABLE GIFTS.

One knew the extent of Thurlow Weed's private beneficence, but those who visited him frequently knew that he was continually solicited for aid by the poor and distressed. A writer to the New York Times says: "If Mr. Weed had given so little to each one he would soon have dissipated the fortune of an Astor. To show something of the extent of these charity demands, we may state a fact. One day a friend who was present in Mr. Weed's study, where applicants of all kinds are usually heard, privately noted the amounts asked for. On footing up the sums he asked Mr. Weed how much he thought he would have expended if he had given all that was asked. Mr. Weed had no idea—possibly a hundred dollars. The figures were shown, and the amount was $2200. He had given almost as much as he named. But his charities were as far as possible kept from notice. He went where he heard of a poor woman in difficulty or distress, and she found her rent paid, or coal or flour coming without bills, or clothes for the children, and money in hand after the strange gentleman had taken his departure. These acts endeared him to hundreds of grateful hearts, and, though they materially lightened his purse, his hand was always open to such claims."

THE MOODY AND SANKEY REVIVAL.

During the revival conducted in this city by Moody and Sankey, Mr. Weed was a frequent attendant on the services. He always sat with the reporters, and was one day conversing with one, who finally asked him who he was, and was told, "I am the oldest reporter in New York." He appeared greatly interested in these meetings, and soon after wrote a letter to the Tribune advising the use in Sunday-schools of a book which had been published in his early life. Some of Mr. Sankey's hymns made a strong impression on his mind, and he was fond of quoting them, especially the one, "Waiting and watching at the beautiful gate." There is good reason for believing that under Mr. Moody's preaching Mr. Weed was brought to a knowledge of the truth as it is in Jesus, and experienced the great change of the new birth.

ILLNESS AND DEATH.

Six or seven years ago Mr. Weed's eyesight began failing him, and from that time he gradually grew blind. His physician explained recently that the old gentleman's blindness was caused by the regular course of cataract. Old age constantly diminished his strength, and as his strength diminished his blindness increased, and for the last three years he has been in total darkness. Last August he suffered from a severe chill, and since that time his friends noticed that he was gradually but perceptibly failing. Thurlow Weed's life was passing away like a dream. Not a pang or disturbing spasm of any kind was seen. Every organ was sound as far as disease was concerned. There was no giving out of any particular part. Only the whole machinery was old and refused to run any longer. As Dr. John T. Metcalfe, one of the consulting physicians, said, in answer to the anxious inquiry of one of Mr. Weed's old friends: "Mr. Weed has no disease whatever. Every organ in his body is perfect. He is dying only because he was born in 1797." This fact was evident to all the physicians. The vital force was exhausted.

On Monday night, November 21st, he fell into a gentle slumber and remained in that condition. So quiet was his slumber that nothing unusual was thought of it except that he was enjoying a sleep that would result in benefit. But when Dr. Chadbourne made his morning visit on Tuesday he found that Mr. Weed could not be aroused. Then it was evident that he had been in a comatose state since about midnight. He remained very quiet, and, except that it was impossible to arouse him, no one could have told from his appearance that Mr. Weed was not sleeping naturally. But he never recovered consciousness, and on Wednesday, November 22d, he ceased to breathe, passing away without a sigh or a struggle.

HIS FAMILY.

The writer previously quoted thus describes Thurlow Weed's domestic affairs: "Mr. Weed was married in April, 1816, to Miss Catherine Ostrander, of Otsego County. Their children were three daughters and one son. James, the son, learned type-setting in the office of the Albany Evening Journal, his father's paper, and became interested in the firm. James died a bachelor in 1851. The youngest daughter, Emily, married William Barnes, of Albany. The second daughter, Maria, married Ogden M. Alden, a well-known farmer and real estate dealer in Dutchess County. These two daughters gladdened the latter days of the veteran editor with five or six grandchildren. The other and eldest daughter, Harriet, remained unmarried, becoming the companion, secretary, and nurse of her father. After the death of Mrs.

Weed, in 1856—a loss that fell heavily upon the husband, inasmuch as it closed an unbroken period of domestic enjoyment of nearly forty years' duration—Harriet took her dead mother's place at the domestic altar. With the tenderest filial devotion, and the most unwearying assiduity, she undertook the brightening of her father's pathway, the care of his declining health, the lightening of the labors in which he was always engaged, the whole order and management of a house that was almost as public as a hotel, and the entertainment of a never-ending procession of friends and acquaintances, including presidents, senators, governors, party leaders, and private citizens without number. How nobly she fulfilled her undertaking is known by all with whom she had communication. Her devotion to her father was above and beyond all praise."

THE large donations he has given to religious institutions and philanthropic enterprises, and the active personal labor he has devoted in the pulpit and in the British Parliament to measures tending to promote the welfare of the poor, have combined to render the name of Thomas Blake known all over the English speaking world. Such men as he deserve universal honor, and in giving his portrait on page 764, it is intended not only to pay a tribute of respect to him, but in the hope that his example may exercise a beneficial influence on others.

Mr. Thomas Blake was born at Ross, England, on November 11th, 1825. He is the fourth and youngest son of the late Mr. William Blake, and though, in the conventional sense, he may be said to have owed nothing to the accident of birth, he is unquestionably indebted to his parents not only for a sound and healthy constitution, but likewise for a scrupulously careful training—moral and educational—kindly, temperately, and constantly enforced by their excellent example.

His first situation was the comparatively humble one of clerk in the post office, which he held for fourteen years. On resigning this appointment he commenced business as a public accountant, estate and insurance agent. Being well known by reason of his long and honorable connection with the post office and highly respected for his sterling character, his business increased so rapidly as very soon to render necessary the employment of a staff of clerks and the occupation of more commodious premises. Every year, indeed, till he finally retired from business, was one of uninterrupted and increasing prosperity.

Nor was his attention confined only to his own immediate business. He held many offices to which no emolument was attached. For eighteen years he was Treasurer and Hon. Secretary of the British and Foreign Schools. He served the town as a Guardian of the Poor for fifteen years. He secured at his own cost the freehold of the "Prospect of Ross," and gave it to the town for the use of its inhabitants forever. Nor is this the only substantial benefit which Ross has derived from Mr. Blake's beneficence, as it is indebted to him for its free library, the freehold and fittings of which were purchased by him at a cost of about $10,000, the same being likewise invested in trustees for the use of the inhabitants forever.

As his wealth increased, he has gone on increasing his donations, till it may with safety be affirmed that fully one half of his expenditure is bestowed in benevolent gifts. In religion he is a staunch Nonconformist of the Baptist persuasion, and is now building at a cost of $15,000 a beautiful Baptist chapel in Ross.

Moreover, for fully five-and-thirty years he has, with rare exceptions, devoted a portion of every Sunday to school-work and lay-preaching among the different bodies of Nonconformists in the district. He is an eloquent and earnest Evangelical preacher. Part of an address by him, on the Approaching Restoration of the Jews and Second Advent of Christ, were printed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of October 27th, 1881.

In politics he is a Liberal, and was elected in 1875 to represent his native place in Parliament, a position he held for several years.

THE CLOUDLESS MORNING.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon Last Sunday Morning,
November 26, 1882.

"A morning without clouds."—2 SAM. 23 : 4.

The Condition of the Cities—The Coming Revolution—Proper Pride in a City—Personal Reasons for Disliking a City—The Infancy of New York—The Founders' Influence—Grand Old New York—Its Glorious Future—Characteristics of the Coming Morning—Greater Financial Prosperity—Reduced Taxes—More and Better Churches—The Fashionable Church and its Music—Haunts of Crime Cleansed—An Englishman's Utopian Idea—No Midnight Carousals—Municipal Politics Cleansed—Prosperous Scoundrels in Jail—A Red Sea to be Crossed.

PULPIT and printing-press for the most part in our day are busy in discussing the condition of the cities at this time ; but would it not be healthfully encouraging to all Christian workers and to all who are toiling to make the world better, if we should this morning, for a little while, look forward to the time when our cities shall be revolutionized by the Gospel of the Son of God, and all the darkness of sin and trouble and crime and suffering shall be gone from the sky, and it shall be "a morning without clouds?"

Every man has

of his nativity or residence, if it be a city distinguished for any dignity or prowess. Cæsar boasted of his native Rome, Virgil of Mantua, Lycurgus of Sparta, Demosthenes of Athens, Archimedes of Syracuse, and Paul of Tarsus. I should have suspicion of baseheartedness in a man who had no especial interest in the city of his birth or residence—no exhilaration at the evidence of its prosperity, or its artistic embellishments, or its scientific advancement.

I have noticed that a man never likes a city where he has not behaved well ! Swartout did not like New York, nor did Parkman like Boston, and people who have a free ride in the prison van never like the city that furnishes the vehicle. When I find Argos and Rhodes and Smyrna trying to prove themselves the birthplace of Homer, I conclude right away that Homer behaved well. He liked them and they liked him. We must not war on laudable city pride, or with the idea of building ourselves up, at any time try to pull others down. Boston must continue to point to its Faneuil Hall and to its Common and to its superior educational advantages. Philadelphia must continue to point to its Independence Hall and its Mint and its Girard College.

If I should find a man coming from any city, having no pride in that city, that city having been the place of his nativity, or now being the place of his residence, I would feel like asking him right away : "What mean thing have you been doing there? what outrageous thing have you been guilty of that

YOU DO NOT LIKE THE PLACE?"

New York is a goodly city. It is on both sides the river, the East River only the main artery of its great throbbing life. We, or our children will live to see three or four bridges spanning that river, and more and more as the years go by, we will be one ; so when I say in my sermon New York, I mean well on to two millions population, and everything from Spuyten Duyvil Creek to Gowanus. That which helps one city, will help the other ; that which blasts one city, will blast the other. Sin is a giant and when it comes to the Hudson or the East River, it steps across it as easily as you step across a figure in a carpet. God's angel of blessing has two wings, and one wing hovers over that city and the other wing hovers over this city.

NEW YORK'S INFANCY.

In infancy our metropolis was put down by the banks of the Hudson. It was as feeble as Moses in the ark of bullrushes by the Nile, and like Miriam, there our fathers stood and watched it. The royal spirit of American commerce came down to bathe. She took it up in her arms and it waxed strong, and foreign ships brought silver and gold to its feet, and it has stretched itself up into a great metropolis, looking up to the mountains and off upon the sea, the mightiest energy in American civilization.

Every city is influenced by the character of the men who founded it. Romulus impressed his life upon Rome. The Pilgrim Fathers will never relax their grasp from New England. William Penn left a legacy of fair dealing and integrity to Philadelphia, and you can now, any day, on the streets of that city, see his customs, his manners, his morals, his hat, his wife's bonnet, and his meeting house. So the Hollanders, founding New York, left their impression on all the following generations.

GRAND OLD NEW YORK !

What southern thoroughfare was ever smitten with pestilence, and our physicians did not throw themselves on the sacrifice? What foreign nation was ever struck with famine, and our ships did not put out laden with breadstuffs? What national struggle, and our citizens did not pour their blood into the trenches? What street of Damascus or Beyrout or Madras has not resounded with the step of our missionaries? What gallery of art, and our painters have not hung in it their pictures? What department of science or literature, and our scholars have not made to it contributions?

I need not talk to you of our public schools, where the children of the cordwainer and the mechanic and the glassblower sit side by side with the favored sons of millionnaires and merchant princes. Nor need I tell you of the asylums for the insane on these islands, where those who cut themselves among the tombs, come forth clothed and in their right mind. Nor need I tell you of the asylums for the blind and the deaf and the dumb and the orphans, the widows, the outcast.

I thank God for the place of our residence, and while there are a thousand things that ought to be corrected, and many wrongs that ought to be overthrown, while I thank God for the past, I look forward this morning to

A GLORIOUS FUTURE.

I think we ought—and I take it for granted you are all interested in this great work of evangelizing the cities and saving the world—we ought to toil with the sunlight in our faces. We are not fighting in a miserable Bull Run of defeat. We are on the way to final victory. We are not following the rider on the black horse, leading us down to death and darkness and doom, but the rider on the white horse with the moon under his feet and the stars of heaven for his tiara. Hail, conqueror, hail !

I know there are sorrows and there are sins and there are sufferings all around about us ; but as in some bitter, cold winter day when we are threshing our arms around us to keep our thumbs from freezing, we think of the warm spring day that will after a while come, or in the dark winter night we look up and we see the northern lights, the windows of heaven illumined by some great victory—just so we look up from the night of suffering and sorrow and wretchedness in our cities, and we see a light streaming through from the other side, and we know we are on the way to morning—more than that, on the way to "a morning without clouds."

I want you to understand, all you who are toiling for Christ, that the castles of sin are all going to be captured. The victory for Christ in these great towns is going to be so complete that not a man on earth or an angel in heaven or a devil in hell will dispute it. How do I know? I know just as certainly as God lives and that this is holy truth. The old Bible is full of it. The nation is to be saved ; of course, all the cities are to be saved. It makes a great difference with you and with me whether we are toiling on toward a defeat or toiling on toward a victory.

Now, in this municipal elevation of which I speak, I have to remark there will be

than our cities have ever seen. Some people seem to have a morbid idea of the millennium, and they think when the better time comes to our cities and the world, people will give their time up to psalm singing and the relating of their religious experience, and as all social life will be purified there will be no hilarity, and as all business will be purified there will be no enterprise. There is no ground for such an absurd anticipation. In the time of which I speak, where now one fortune is made, there will be a hundred fortunes made. We all know business prosperity depends upon confidence between man and man. Now, when that time comes of which I speak, and all double dealing, all dishonesty, and all fraud are gone out of commercial circles, thorough confidence will be established, and there will be better business done, and larger fortunes gathered and mightier successes achieved.

The great business disasters of this country have come from the work of godless speculators and infamous stock gamblers. The great foe to business in New York and Brooklyn is crime. When the right shall have hurled back the wrong, and shall have purified the commercial code, and shall have thundered down fraudulent establishments, and shall have put into the hands of honest men the keys of business, blessed time for the bargain makers. I am not talking an abstraction, I am not making a guess. I am telling you God's eternal truth.

In that day of which I speak

TAXES WILL BE A MERE NOTHING.

Now, our business men are taxed for everything. City taxes, county taxes, State taxes, United States taxes, stamp taxes, license taxes, manufacturing taxes—taxes, taxes, taxes ! Our business men have to make a small fortune every year to pay their taxes. What fastens on our great industries this awful load? Crime, individual and official. We have to pay the board of the villains who are incarcerated in our prisons. We have to take care of the orphans of those who plunged into their graves through beastly indulgence. We have to support the municipal governments, which are vast and expensive just in proportion as the criminal proclivities are vast and tremendous. Who supports the almshouses and police stations and all the machinery of municipal government? The taxpayers.

Ever since the morning of

the politicians have been trying to cipher out what was the cause of the revolution in American politics. Well, in some cities it meant one thing, perhaps, and in some States another thing ; but I will tell you what it meant all over. It meant that the people of the United States are infuriated at the fact that the officers of government and those who have the arrangement of these things, keep taxes up when they might go down. A hundred million dollars more than necessary taxed out of the hard-working population of this country, and stored up as a temptation to public officials. The only way to keep the Congress of the United States from misappropriating fifty million dollars out of the national treasury, is to have no surplus in the Treasury to steal.

In this coming Congress the Republican party will have another opportunity of putting down taxes, and if they do not put down taxes, the revolution in Massachusetts and in New York this autumn will be only as a snowflake compared with the avalanche of popular indignation that shall come down. And I tell you Republicans and you Democrats, that if you do not let down the taxes and let the people up, we will form a new party, anti-excessive taxation, anti-rum, anti-monopoly, anti-abomination, and you who have been fattening on the public spoils and reckless of the public virtue shall not have so much as the wages of a street sweeper.

But in the glorious time of which I speak, grievous taxation will all have ceased. There will be no need of supporting criminals ; there will be no criminals. Virtue will have taken the place of vice. There will be no orphan asylums, for parents will be able to leave a competency to their children. There will be no voting of large sums of moneys for some municipal improvement, which moneys, before they get to the improvement, drop into the pockets of those who voted them. No Oyer and Terminer kept up at vast expense to the people. No empanneling of juries to try theft, and arson, and murder, and slander, and blackmail. Better factories. Grand architecture. Finer equipage. Larger fortunes. Richer opulence. "A morning without clouds."

BETTER CHURCHES.

In that better time, also, coming to these cities, the churches of Christ will be more numerous, and they will be larger, and they will be more devoted to the service of Jesus Christ, and they will accomplish greater influences for good. Now, it is often the case that churches are envious of each other, and denominations collide with each other, and even ministers of Christ sometimes forget the bond of brotherhood. But in the time of which I speak, while there will be just as many differences of opinion as there are now, there will be no acerbity, no hypercriticism, no exclusiveness.

In our great cities the churches are not to-day large enough to hold more than a fourth of the population. The churches that are built—comparatively few of them are fully occupied. The average attendance in the churches of the United States to-day, is not four hundred. Now, in the glorious time of which I speak, there are going to be vast churches, and they are going to be all thronged with worshippers. Oh, what rousing songs they will sing! Oh, what earnest sermons they will preach! Oh, what fervent prayers they will offer! Now, in our time, what is called is a place where a few people, having attended very carefully to their toilet, come and sit down—they do not want to be crowded, they like a whole seat to themselves—and then, if they have any time left from thinking of their store, and from examining the style of the hat in front of them, they sit and listen to a sermon warranted to hit no man's sins, and listen to music which is rendered by a choir warranted to sing tunes that nobody knows! And then after an hour and a half of indolent yawning they go home refreshed. Every man feels better after he has had a sleep!

In many of the churches of Christ in our day, is simply a mockery. I have not a cultivated ear nor a cultivated voice, yet no man can do my singing for me. I have nothing to say against artistic music. The two or five dollars I pay to hear Miss Thursby or Miss Abbott or any of the other great queens of song, is a good investment. But when the people assemble in religious convocation, and the hymn is read, and the angels of God step from their throne to catch the music on their wings, do not let us drive them away by our indifference. I have preached in churches where vast sums of money were employed to keep up the music, and it was as exquisite as any heard on earth, but I thought at the same time, for all matters practical, I would prefer the hearty, out-breaking song of a backwoods Methodist camp-meeting.

Let one of these starveling fancy songs sung in church get up before the throne of God, how would it look standing amid the great doxologies of the redeemed! Let the finest operatic air that ever went up from the church of Christ, get many hours the start, it will be caught and past by the hosanna of the Sabbath-school children. I know a church where the choir did all the singing, save one Christian man who, through perseverance of the saints, went right on, and afterward a committee was appointed to wait on him and ask him if he would not please to stop singing as he bothered the choir.

"Let those refuse to sing
Who never knew our God;
But children of the Heavenly King
Should speak their joys abroad."

"Praise ye the Lord: let everything with breath praise the Lord." In the glorious time coming in our cities and in the world, hosanna will meet hosanna, and hallelujah hallelujah.

In that time, also, of which I speak, all and crime and squalor will be cleansed and will be illumined. How is it to be done? You say perhaps by one influence. Perhaps I say by another. I will tell you what is my idea, and I know I am right in it. The Gospel of the Son of God is the only agency that will ever accomplish this.

THE HAUNTS OF INIQUITY

Mr. Ecsler, of England, had a theory that if the natural forces of wind and tide and sunshine and wave were rightly applied and rightly developed, it would make this whole earth a paradise. In and which rushed from edition to edition, he said: "Fellow-men—I promise to show the means of creating a paradise within ten years, where everything desirable for human life may be had by every man in superabundance without labor and without pay—where the whole face of nature shall be changed into the most beautiful farms, and man may live in the most magnificent palaces, in all imaginable refinements of luxury, and in the most delightful gardens—where he may accomplish without labor in one year more than hitherto could be done in thousands of years, and may level a continent, sink valleys, create lakes, drain lakes and swamps, and intersect the land everywhere with beautiful canals and roads for transporting heavy loads of many thousand tons and for traveling a thousand miles in twenty-four hours.

From the houses to be built will be afforded the most cultured views to be fancied. From the galleries, from the roof and from the turrets may be seen gardens as far as the eye can see, full of fruits and flowers, arranged in the most beautiful order, with walks, colonnades, aqueducts, canals, ponds, plains, amphitheatres, terraces, fountains, sculptured works, pavilions, gondolas, places of popular amusement to tire the eye and fancy. All this to be done by urging the water, the wind and the sunshine to their full development."

He goes on and gives plates of the machinery by which this work is to be done, and he says he only needs at the start a company in which the shares shall be twenty dollars each, and a hundred or two hundred thousand shall be raised just to make a specimen community, and then this being formed, the world will see its practicability and very soon two or three million dollars can be obtained, and in ten years the whole earth will be emparadised. The plan is not so preposterous as some I have heard of! But I will TAKE NO STOCK IN THAT COMPANY!

I do not believe it will ever be done in that way, by any mechanical force, or by any machinery that the human mind can put into play. It is to be done by the Gospel of the Son of God—the omnipotent machinery of love and grace and pardon and salvation. That is to emparadise the nations. Archimedes destroyed a fleet of ships coming up the harbor. You know how he did it? He lifted a great sun-glass, history tells us, and when the fleet of ships came up the harbor of Syracuse he brought to bear this sun-glass and he conveyed the sun's rays upon those ships. Now, the sails are wings of fire, the masts fall, the vessels sink. O! my friends, by converging the rays of the Sun of Righteousness upon the sins, the wickedness of the world, we will make them blaze and expire.

In that day of which I speak, do you believe there will be any

MIDNIGHT CAROUSAL?

Will there be any kicking off from marble steps, of shivering mendicants? Will there be any unwashed, unfed, uncombed children? Will there be any blasphemies in the street? Will there be any inebriates staggering past? No. No wine stores. No lager beer saloons. No distilleries where they make the three X's. No bloodshot eye. No bloated cheek. No instruments of ruin and destruction. No fist-pounded forehead. The grandchildren of that woman who goes down the street with a curse, stoned by the boys that follow her, will be the reformers and the philanthropists and the Christian men and the honest merchants of New York and Brooklyn.

Then, what municipal governments too, we will have in all the cities. Some cities are worse than others, but in many of our cities you just walk down by the city halls and look in at some of the rooms occupied by politicians, and see to what a sensual, loathsome, ignorant, besotted crew city politics is often abandoned. Or they stand around the City Hall picking their teeth, waiting for some emoluments of crumbs to fall to their feet, waiting all day long, and waiting all night long.

Who are those wretched women taken up for drunkenness and carried up to the courts, and put in prison, of course? What will you do with the grogshops that made them drink? Nothing. Who are those prisoners in jail? One of them stole a pair of shoes. That boy stole a dollar. This girl snatched a purse. All of them crimes damaging society less than twenty or thirty dollars. But what will you do with the gambler who last night robbed the young man of a thousand dollars? Nothing. What shall be done with that one who breaks through and destroys the purity of a Christian home, and with an adroitness and perfidy that beats the strategy of hell, flings a shrieking, shrieking soul into a bottomless perdition? Nothing. What will you do with those who fleece that young man, getting him to purloin large sums of money from his employer—the young man who came to an officer of my church and told the story and frantically asked what he might do? Nothing. Ah! we do well to punish small crimes, but I have sometimes thought it would be better in some of our cities, if the officials would only turn out from the jails the petty criminals, the little offenders, the ten-dollar desperadoes, and put in their places some of the who drive their roan span though the streets so swiftly, that honest men have to leap to get out of the way of being run over. Oh, the damnable schemes that professed Christian men will sometimes engage in until God puts the finger of his retribution into the collar of their robe of hypocrisy and rips it clear to the bottom.

But all these wrongs are going to be righted. I expect to live to see the day. I think I hear in the distance the rumbling of the King's chariot. Not always in the minority is the church of God going to be; or are good men going to be. The streets are going to be filled with regenerated populations. Three hundred and sixty bells rang in Moscow when one prince was married; but when Righteousness and Peace kiss each other in all the earth, ten thousand times ten thousand bells shall strike the jubilee. Poverty enriched. Hunger fed. Crime purified. Ignorance enlightened. All the cities saved. Is not this

A CAUSE WORTH WORKING IN?

Oh, you think sometimes it does not amount to much. You toil on in your different spheres, sometimes with great discouragement. People have no faith and say: "It does not amount to anything; you might as well quit that." Why, when Moses stretched his hand over the Red Sea, it did not seem to mean anything especially. People came out, I suppose, and said: "Aha!" Some of them found out what he wanted to do. He wanted the sea parted. It did not amount to anything, this stretching out of his hand over the sea! But after a while the wind blew all night from the east, and the waters were gathered into a glittering palisade on either side, and the billows reared as God pulled back on their crystal bits. Wheel into line, O! Israel, march, march! Pearls crashed under feet. Flying spray gathers into rainbow arch of victory for the conquerors to march under. Shout of hosts on the beach answering the shout of hosts amid sea. And when the last line of the Israelites reach the beach, the cymbals clap and the shields clang and the waters rush over the pursuers and the swift-fingered winds on the white keys of the foam play the grand march of Israel delivered and the awful dirge of Egyptian overthrow.

So you and I go forth, and all the people of God go forth and they stretch their hand over the sea,

THE BOILING SEA OF CRIME

and sin and wretchedness. "It don't amount to anything," people say. Don't it? God's winds of help will after a while begin to blow. A path will be cleared for the army of Christian philanthropists. The path will be lined with the treasures of Christian beneficence, and we will be greeted to the other beach by the clapping of all heaven's cymbals, while those who pursued us and derided us and tried to destroy us will go down under the sea, and all that will be left of them will be cast high and dry upon the beach, the splintered wheel of a chariot, or thrust out from the foam, the breathless nostril of a riderless charger, SUGGESTIONS RELATIVE TO THE SYMBOLISM OF THE GREAT PYRAMID.

It is to be observed that the central vertical line of the Great Pyramid touches the south wall of the Queen's Chamber, a fact in itself remarkable; but when we find that the same line passes through the south end of the Grand Gallery, at the commencement of the short passage leading to the Ante-chamber, it is scarcely possible to avoid the conclusion that there is something more than coincidence—that there is design, treasured up during so many ages, but now unfolded in these last days, when events follow each other with such rapidity that the mind is filled with awe, as it contemplates the fulfilment of prophecy and these prophetic symbolism.

The symbolic teaching of the horizontal passage and the Queen's Chamber being generally considered to apply to the Jewish people, we may notice, in the first place, the height of the east and west walls up to the ridge of the roof—245 pyr. inches each; these added together would give 490 inches, which, divided by 7 (one of the measurements peculiar to this passage and chamber), give 70 inches or years; and it may be deeply interesting to all who look for the Lord Jesus in the very near future to consider if we are not now on to which reference will be again made presently.

Again, the niche placed in the eastern wall—its form giving the idea of raising, building up, pyramidal—then, again, that it is indented—would give the idea of reaching onward, progression—taken together with the idea which the form of the roof affords, pointing upward, the analogy obtaining in the building would lead to the conclusion that here is symbolized the raised and continued history of the Jews.

The five distinct courses in the niche multiplied by 5 giving 25, seems to place the continuation of that state 25 courses higher—i.e., on the 50th course—and the central vertical line seeming to point to the exact position, at the commencement of the passage into the Ante-chamber, by the side of and connected with the step or stone which marks the top and end of the Grand Gallery, which may symbolize the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets—3 x 12 36—divinely-appointed twelve (Eph. 2: 20)—Jesus Christ Himself being the chief cornerstone, as distinguished from the foundation of the Apostles and Prophets. In the same manner we find the 36 roof-stones of the Grand Gallery impressing on the mind the same truth—the Divine influence and teaching of the Church of Christ.

"For through Him we, both Jew and Gentile, have access by one Spirit to the Father." (Eph. 2.) There seems a peculiar fitness in placing

THE STONE IN THE CENTRE.

In the Ante-chamber the wainscots bear a striking analogy to the ramp-stones in the Grand Gallery. Here, however, is the absence of quickening; here is the grave, as if to symbolize nations entombed, but no spiritual life, no resurrection. Here, also, are the granite slabs, or the duplicate slabs in one, aptly symbolizing unbelief, resting upon the wainscots, as if to give force to the illustration, for we read, "They could not believe, because that darkness hath blinded their hearts." In this darkness there are gleams of hope, for over the passage leading into the King's Chamber we notice the division of the wall by lines into five upright compartments, recalling to mind the deliverance of the Israelites from Egypt; how they went up by five in a rank.

THE DIFFICULT MEASUREMENTS of the short passage, the Ante-chamber from north to south, and the passage into the King's Chamber may be met in the following manner;

Taking the length of the passage from the end of the Grand Gallery.....	52 pyr. inches.
The Ante-chamber from N. to S.....	116.260 "
The passage leading from the A.C. to the King's Chamber.....	100 "

Adding these together 268.260 "

Dividing by 50 the number of courses, it gives 5 $\frac{1}{5}$ pyr. inches about, or 5 $\frac{1}{5}$ years, which would accord with Scripture that, through the mercy of God, "for the elect's sake, those days shall be shortened." If we take, again, the measurement (245) of the Queen's Chamber, add them together (490), and multiply by 7, it gives 3430.

The length of the Mosaic dispensation. 1,542 years.

That of the present, basing on the length of the Grand Gallery..... 1,882 " showing a difference of 3,424 " to complete the 3,430 " which the above method very well fits in with. Matt. 25: 13 "Watch, therefore, for ye know neither the day nor the hour wherein the Son of Man cometh."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Another Atheist Saved.—At the noonday meeting on October 30th, the Rev. Mr. Cameron, of Govan said: "One happy result of the work of God which is proceeding in the neighborhood, is the large number of those who confess to having found Christ as their Saviour, and who are applying for Church fellowship. I never had so many at one communion before as on the last occasion. Among those who were admitted to the membership of the Church I am glad to relate, was a dear fellow who formerly was a professed Atheist. He has publicly and with much gracefulness and courage, renounced his former errors, and the change in his general behavior and conduct is so great that his family have also embraced the same Almighty and all loving Saviour, and at their own request have been admitted into Church membership."

Why the Children Died.—"I knew a good old friend who is now with the Master in heaven, and from whom I got great help when he was on earth, who blessed God for the heavy trouble he had experienced. 'Ah,' he said to me, 'my troubles were the means of saving me, sir.' 'What do you mean?' I asked. He answered, 'I used to live a careless, godless life, until my little girl was taken from me, then I paused for a time, and felt myself to be a wicked man; but that wore off soon. Another, and yet another of my children were removed by death, and as each was taken my heart was torn and bleeding, but not till the very last of my dear ones left me did I turn to the Man of Sorrows for salvation and comfort. Nothing can express the calm quiet joy of my soul when He came to my help and pardoned me.'"

Help the Poor Blind.—Mr. Torrance said: "Not long ago a blind man was going along a street in the city, which was undergoing repairs. In a moment or two he would have fallen over the wood and stones into a deep hole and hurt himself had not a kindly man, whose eyesight was good, cried out, 'Blind man, stop!' Not a step or movement did the blind man make until a firm hand seized him and guided him past the dangerous spot into a place of safety. He did not see his danger until an unknown voice warned him. He could not get away from the danger without risk until he was guided out. He had faith in others. This is just the condition in which unsaved sinners are; they are blind and in peril of eternal ruin. Christ, in mercy calls to them to stop, and happy are they who are guided to the safety and peace which His cross alone supplies."

A Scarlet Biography.—The Rev. Robert Hall said: "A man whom Satan had sorely tried, dreamed one night that he saw a figure in the shape of a man, but yet not a man, standing with a long scroll in his hand, on which the biography of some one was inscribed. Looking closely, he read thereon his own life in exact detail, from his birth to the hour at which he fell sleep. All his sins were in glowing scarlet colors; sins which he had forgotten, and some things upon which he prided himself as being uncommonly good, were all in scarlet letters. As he read, he felt inclined to question the justice of the biographer in putting down as sins what were to all appearance good deeds. Before, however, he had time to utter the rebuke which was forming in his mind, a voice asked, 'What was your motive in doing these actions?' With the rapidity of a flash of lightning he saw that he had done nothing from love to God or His children, but only to add glory to his own name. An awful fear fell upon him, so that his trembling made the bed to shake under him. Suddenly an angel came, and with a sponge dipped in a scarlet stream, wiped the scroll, and at once it was whiter than snow. Then, for the first time, he saw on the scroll where his sins had been, the words, 'The blood of Jesus Christ, His Son, cleanseth us from all sin.'"

Good News for a Rheumatic.—I lately called upon a man who has been confined to his bed with chronic rheumatism, for the last sixteen months. When I entered the house I saw him reading the Bible, and quietly inquired, "Are you trying to make your peace with God, brother?" "I am doing the best I can," he answered. "Well," I told him, "you are wasting time, for it is already made for you," and sitting down, I pointed out to him the message of God to men, and the completeness of Christ's finished work on behalf of sinners. I then read to him from his own book the message of salvation and peace, through a crucified Saviour. It was just what he wanted; and, accepting the gift of God as freely as it was offered, he was able to rejoice in the midst of the great pain which he suffered, for the joy of Christ's salvation was unspeakable.

Death in the Shop.—Mr. Mann, speaking on the necessity of immediate decision for Christ, said: "In connection with my mission there was a family who all, with the exception of the eldest son, were resting for salvation on Jesus. Over and over again did I solemnly press upon that young man the urgent necessity of accepting Christ as his Saviour, but his answer invariably was, 'Oh, perhaps next week I will.' And thus time passed on, his heart getting harder and harder. One night, I felt constrained to be very importunate with the young man, and he promised to take Christ the following week, that is to say, at our meeting on the Sabbath following that on which I spoke to him. In the middle of the week his father came to my house, and sorrowfully said that he had come to ask me to John's funeral. 'What!' I exclaimed, 'John dead?' 'Too true, sir; he was with me in a shop fitting it up for opening the next day, and while we were busy I heard a cry, and turning round I saw my John dead on the floor.' Oh, how unsafe is the condition of those who put off the day of salvation."

A Parting Shot.—The Rev. G. L. Carstairs said: "In one of the Monday evening meetings I met a lady friend who had a remarkable story to tell. At one meeting Mr. Moody asked all the Christians to rise. She hesitated a little, but when she saw Mr. Moody approaching, she stood up. Her conscience troubled her exceedingly, and shortly afterward she was forced to return to the same church, go to the same pew, and sit in the same seat as that in which she had falsely proclaimed herself a Christian. She then openly declared that she was not converted. I spoke to her and learned that she was expecting feeling, and thought that she could not trust God without it. At last she said 'I have three miles to come, but will be in town on Thursday; can I see you then?' 'Yes; what hour will suit you?' 'Three o'clock in the afternoon.' I took out my note-book and entered the appointment, and then asked, 'Do you trust that you will see me here on that day?' 'Certainly I do; you have promised.' 'You trust me but you won't trust my Master.' Saying this I left her. On Thursday, true to the appointment she came, but the great business had already been settled; my parting shot had told, and she was now rejoicing in Christ as her Saviour."

The Devil in Anger.—At a recent meeting Mr. Robert Simpson said: "A man in one of the ship-yards in Renfrew was exceedingly bitter against those who were earnest in seeking the salvation of souls in connection with services held in a tent. He vowed repeatedly that he would wreak his vengeance upon them. It so happened that his foreman was one of the conductors of the meetings, and he naturally felt anxious about this man's soul, and spoke to him personally. In a fury for ving been singled out among his mates, the man angrily said, "You have spoken to me here in the yard; I will speak to you in the tent to-night." At the time the meeting had commenced he had shed himself into a violent rage against these ranting hypocrites, as he termed them, who tormented decent folk with their nonsense, and he had intended to disturb the services. He was restrained, however, by a power which he had never experienced before. Inwardly chafing, he waited till the after meeting, when the speaker for the evening asked him, "Are you saved, my friend?" No, he retorted; "I am not; but if you will come outside I will show you how I will save you." Leaping back a little the gentleman said, "I have spoken to many about their salvation, and for years have preached the Gospel, and before that I was a good fighting man, but never before did I get such an answer to a kind inquiry." Abashed, the infuriated man went out, and for the next two days it seemed as if the devil were in full possession of him. The truth is the devil was really angry, for he saw that he was about to lose that man. Three days afterward the shipwright appeared at the tent, and when he was asked about his soul, began to weep like a child. Nothing could comfort him until the Holy Spirit led him to Christ, and His love was experienced as a healing balm, and now he lives to aid instead of hurting those who long for the salvation of the lost."

THE COMING KINGDOMS AND THE COMING KINGS.

By Nathaniel Starkey.

Man's Dream of Universal Dominion—Satanic Ambition—The Predicted Sway of Antichrist—His Six Names in Scripture—The Shadows of Rapidly Approaching Events—The End of the Beast—Extent and Duration of His Kingdom—The Kingdom of Jehovah-Jesus—The Discipline of Christ's Bride—The Marriage Period—The Imminent Translation of Watchful Christians—Universality of Christ's Kingdom—The Redeemer of Israel—Earth's Deliverer—Millennium and Jubilee.

In the light of prophetic truth, two kingdoms, one kings, and two alone, have yet to be revealed each in its own time and in its own way. These coming kingdoms and these coming kings are to come in some sense universal, being the greatest on earth for the time, including and controlling all other kingdoms—one, the worst in character and the briefest in duration; the other, the best in character and the longest in duration.

Now, upon the principle contained in the words, "That is not first which is spiritual, but that which is natural, and afterward that which is spiritual," we shall speak first of that which is natural, the kingdom of man; for these two are opposing and antagonistic, the kingdom of man being the antithesis of the kingdom of God. Ever since man was formed and placed by his Maker in Paradise, the arch-enemy of God and man has been engaged upon man's ruin, not so much out of enmity to man as to God, concerned most of all to tarnish His glory by spoiling the work of His hands. Indeed, whenever Satan has succeeded in setting a man against his Maker, and in making man his ally in the conflict against God, Satan has befriended the man, given him gold and silver, glory and honor, a name and a place among men; for, as we take it, that was no empty lying boast of his, when he said to our Lord, "All this power and the glory thereof is delivered unto me, and to whomsoever I will I give it. If Thou therefore wilt worship me, all shall be Thine." (Luke 4:6, 7.)

THE DREAM OF UNIVERSAL DOMINION.

Now, universal dominion has not been the ambitious dream of man alone, but also the ambitious device of Satan, God's enemy, and how nearly that device and design of Satan has been accomplished in the Alexanders, Cæsars, and Napoleons of the past, let history tell. But Satan and his friends have been thwarted, defeated, denied hitherto, because One still ruleth in the heavens, and among the inhabitants of the earth, and His hour has not yet come to give Satan the full length of his chain. But that hour will come, and with the hour the man in whom Satan shall become incarnate, and receive power to exercise his full measure of infernal malice against God, a limit never hitherto attained. Has God found His man, a man after His own heart, who shall fulfil all His will? Satan shall also find his man, a man after his own heart, who shall fulfil all his will; and if Jehovah will make His man King of kings and Lord of lords forever, Satan will also make his man king of kings and lord of lords for so long as God will let him.

THE SWAY OF THE ANTICHRIST.

This power has been long ago shown in vision to the prophets and seers of old, and if it be true, as some devoutly believe, that the time of its revelation is at hand, it behooves all devout minds to give heed thereto, that they be not taken at unawares when that wicked shall be revealed; for this is he whose mark in the hand or in the forehead shall be fatal to all who receive it. This power has been variously shown, seen and expressed in the several portions of Holy Writ as recorded by the seers and prophets of old; and without attempting to solve the problem contained in the mystic number of six hundred threescore and six, upon which the imagination has exhausted so much ingenuity, this we notice as worthy of remark, that six thrice repeated is said to be "the number of a man," and that the ruler of this kingdom of man, whoever he may be, is designated by six names in the Scriptures, two by the prophet Daniel, three by the Apostle Paul, and one by the Seer in Patmos.

HIS SIX NAMES IN SCRIPTURE.

In Dan. 10:6, we read of "The prince that shall come," and in chap. 11:21 we read, "A vile person shall stand up;" in 2 Thess. 2:3, he is called "That man of sin," and "The son of perdition," and in verse 8 of the same chapter, "That Wicked" (in the New Version rendered "The lawless one") and in the Revelation, in various places, he is generally called "The beast." And there should be no difficulty in identifying the beast of Daniel and the beast of Revelation, the one described as "dreadful, terrible, and exceedingly strong, having great iron teeth, devouring and breaking in pieces, and stamping the residue with his feet;" the other, after carrying the Mother of Harlots tamely and submissively, at length casts her off, turns round upon her in hatred, makes her desolate and naked, eats her flesh, and burns her with fire. And when at length shall come the time to judge this harlot, in whom is found the blood of saints, a voice shall be heard in righteous judgment, saying, "Render unto her even as she rendered, and double unto her the double according to her works, in the cup which she mingled mingle to her double, because strong is the Lord God who judgeth her."

THE SHADOWS OF COMING EVENTS.

Then this rampant beast, so often applied by the Protestant commentators to the Papacy—but wrongly, seeing that it is not a religious but an infidel power, sitting in the temple of God, showing himself that he is God—shall abolish all creeds and churches, expel all bishops from their dioceses, all Church dignitaries from their state-secured benefices, and appropriate their revenues, which will be eating up her flesh and burning her with fire. And already we see this lawless one rising among the nations of Europe, under the various names of Fenianism, Communism, Socialism, and Nihilism, a spirit of insubordination prevailing everywhere, and disordering everything in social, commercial, political and religious life. But both these, the beast of Daniel and the beast of the Apocalypse, being one, are described as coming to one end.

THE END OF "THE BEAST."

Daniel says: "I beheld till the beast was slain, and his body destroyed and given to the burning flame;" and John sees the beast "taken and cast alive into a lake of fire burning with brimstone;" and the Apostle Paul tells us exactly how and when this lawless one comes to his end; not when the Lord Jesus shall come secretly for His saints, but when He shall come manifestly with them, so that "every eye shall see Him, and they also who pierced Him," when, "revealed from heaven with His mighty angels in flaming fire taking vengeance on them that know not God, and that obey not the Gospel of our Lord Jesus Christ, who shall be punished with everlasting destruction from the presence of the Lord, and from the glory of His power, when He shall come to be glorified in His saints, and to be admired in all them that believe in that day," which He will not be when He comes secretly, the unready believers being ashamed before Him then.

So much, then, for the "prince that shall come;" thus soon does this lawless one come to his end. "For this is the king that shall do according to his will, shall exalt himself and magnify himself above every god, and speak marvellous things against the God of gods." (Dan. 11:36, 37.) This is that "other which shall come in his own name," concerning whom our Lord said to the Jews, "him ye will receive." (John 5:43.) This is "the liar that denieth that Jesus is the Christ, the antichrist that denieth the Father and the Son," which Papal Rome never did. (1 John 2:22.)

EXTENT OF HIS KINGDOM.

But now a word or two as to his kingdom, its extent and duration. Daniel records it thus, "The fourth beast shall devour the whole earth, and shall tread it down and break it in pieces. And he shall think to change times and laws, and they shall be given into his hand until a time, and times, and the dividing of time. But the judgment shall sit, and they shall take away his kingdom to consume and to destroy it unto the end." John says, "All the world wondered after the beast, saying, 'Who is like unto the beast? Who is able to make war with him?' And there was a mouth given unto him, speaking great things and blasphemies, and power was given unto him to continue forty and two months." Thus Daniel and John are agreed as to the extent and duration of this kingdom of the beast, as being universal, and of three years and a half continuance. Thus when sin has so abounded as to become universal under the dominion of the man of sin, grace will much more abound in cutting it short, and so rendering the worst reign on earth one of the briefest.

THE KINGDOM OF JEHOVAH-JESUS.

So much for the kingdom of man, which we have seen to be the kingdom of the beast, for what is a man better than a beast when he ceases to worship or worships only self and Satan? Howbeit that is not first which is spiritual, for that is permanent, but that which is natural because that is temporary, and afterward that which is spiritual, that it may be permanent. For when the combined force of Satan and his anointed shall have done their worst for the world, their kingdom shall be shaken and removed away; that the Kingdom of Jehovah and His Anointed as the best for the world as a thing that cannot be shaken may remain; which kingdom, its extent and duration, we have now to consider.

In the beginning—whenver that was—Jehovah's purpose became revealed to form a world for a race as yet uncreated, a world, in which His Son, The Word, should have the pre-eminence. And willing to create that race in the image and after the likeness of that Son, the purpose of Jehovah became further revealed, to elect out of that race a bride for His Son—a bride composed of the choicest of the sons and daughters of men, to share the throne and dominion of the newly-created world with His Son. But the race must have its week of schooling, and so for six millenniums the race must know, by contact with evil, what conflict and conquest means, and, alas, what defeat means, too. And hard have been the tasks, and stern has been the schoolmaster, and long has been the term of schooling, too, to some.

THE DISCIPLINE OF CHRIST'S BRIDE.

And harder have been the tasks, and sterner the schoolmaster, through the intrusion of a dog astray, which the master of the school-house has suffered to continue "wandering about seeking whom he may devour." Chained, indeed, and limited in his power, but with so much of license as to compel the scholars oft to cry, in agony, "Deliver my soul from the sword, my darling from the power of the dog." "Save me from the lion's mouth."

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

The thanks of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are due to a large number of subscribers who have written to the office, expressing their high regard for the journal, and stating their intention to introduce it to their friends, with the view of obtaining new subscribers for the coming year. Their efforts would have a better chance of success if commenced now, than at the end of next month, when people will have made their arrangements for 1883. In recognition of this fact a concession in price will be made. They may offer THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, postage paid, from this time to the end of 1883 for $1.50—that is, fourteen months for one year's subscription. This concession is made in order to aid the friends of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD and to encourage them to proceed at once with their kindly project. It is hoped that every subscriber will use his influence, however small it may be, to send at least one new subscription, in addition to his own, for 1883.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Recommendations on the subject of internal revenue reform, which he will incorporate in his message to Congress, are outlined in a communication from a Washington newspaper correspondent who appears to speak with authority. According to this statement President Arthur is opposed to any proposition looking to the abolition of the entire internal revenue system, but with the view of affording substantial relief to the tax-payers, will advise a reduction of internal revenue taxation. It is believed that he will recommend the abolition of all internal revenue taxes except those on tobacco in its various forms and upon distilled spirits and fermented liquors, and except, also, the special tax upon the manufacturers of and dealers in such articles, with a reduction in the tax upon whiskey and tobacco upon the basis of the bill which passed the House of Representatives at the last session of Congress. If this recommendation is adopted, the remaining sources of internal revenue will yield, according to the estimates of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, about $100,000,000 per annum. It is expected that the President will also urge upon Congress the importance of an immediate revision of the tariff, with a view to reducing the aggregate income of the government to such an amount as is absolutely required to meet the interest on the public debt and the current and ordinary expenses of the government.

The Observance of Thanksgiving Day has degenerated in too many homes into a mere occasion for feasting and merriment. While gloom and austerity would be inconsistent with the spirit in which the day ought to be celebrated, yet the tendency to the other extreme, which of late years appears to have increased, is to be deplored. Every intelligent citizen is impressed with the unexampled prosperity which our country enjoys, but it should not be forgotten, especially on the day set apart as Thanksgiving Day, that we owe that prosperity to the Almighty "giver of every good and perfect gift." Christian citizens should set the example, rendering to their Heavenly Father with cheerfulness, yet with becoming solemnity, the thanks due to Him for all His mercies. Nor would it be out of place, at the same time, to offer earnest prayers that a like outpouring of spiritual blessings might be granted us. We have need to pray that as God has blessed us above all peoples of the earth, so we may be conspicuous among the nations as a God-fearing, God-serving people.

New Evidence of the Obstinate Determination of the Mormon leaders to resist public opinion and the voice of morality and religion has been furnished. It is stated that at a meeting of the higher priesthood, President Taylor instructed them that priests and bishops and their councillors are not entitled to hold their positions unless they qualify by becoming polygamists. There are a few such officers who are monogamists. One has since resigned rather than take another wife. One has been appointed President of Seventies on condition that he takes a new wife. One very young and new-made apostle, it is understood, has complied with the condition of holding his office.

The Increase in the Recent Issue of Silver dollars has encouraged the hope that the coin may be becoming less unpopular than heretofore, and so that the immense quantities, now lying unused in the Treasury vaults, may be reduced. An explanation of the increased circulation, recently given by an official, however, destroys that hope. He states that since October 15th, no silver certificates have been issued directly upon deposits of gold coin. Gold is deposited in New York now for the delivery of silver dollars at the Mint at New Orleans, and after these dollars have gone out of the Mint they are deposited in the Sub-Treasury for silver certificates, so that while a great number of the standard dollars are going out from the Mint they at once go back to the Sub-Treasury and remain in the hands of the Government.

Prohibition in Oregon has Advanced one stage in its progress toward realization. The proposed prohibitory amendment was passed by the Senate of Oregon by a vote of 18 to 10, and by the House by a vote of 52 to 6, two members being absent from each house. The measure will come before the next Legislature, two years hence, and if agreed to then will be submitted to the vote of the people.

The Agitation for the Reduction in the rates of letter postage from three to two cents has derived strength from the favorable reports of the financial standing of the Post-Office Department. Mr. Hill, of New Jersey, who was instrumental in introducing the use of the post-card into this country, has had an interview with the postmaster-general, in which he urged the reduction. It is calculated, that if the business of the post-office did not increase, the reduction of the rate from three to two cents would involve a decrease in the aggregate revenue of $10,000,000 a year. But against that amount there should be set the probability that the reduction would result in an increase in the number of letters sent; and also the probability that the steady increase in the business of the post-office, resulting from the growth of the country and the expansion of business, would be maintained. If that increase should be kept up at its present ratio, that alone would reduce the loss revenue to $7,000,000. The postmaster-general said to prefer a different method of giving relief to the people. That method is to supply stamp envelopes, instead of stamps, for three cents each. The public, however, give Mr. Howe credit for more sense than would be displayed by the advocacy of such a scheme.

The Four Million Dollars of Indebtedness incurred by Archbishop Purcell is clearly felt to be a reproach on the Roman Catholic Church and many of its members. A prominent organ of the church in a recent issue declares that the honor of the church is at stake and can only be preserved by a settlement of the claims against the archbishop, "by compromise, it may be, but certainly by the payment of all that it is by any means possible to pay, with the understanding that all obligations are thereby discharged." As to the matter of raising so large a sum, the same journal suggests that a new subscription should be started, or as that has already been tried with comparatively little success, that a gigantic lottery scheme be gotten up, the proceeds to be used in settling with the archbishop's creditors. Admitting that lotteries have an immoral tendency, the paper argues with characteristic sophistry that to raise money in that way for so righteous a purpose would be immeasurably better than not to raise the money at all, and leave so great a reproach upon the Roman Catholic Church.

The American Author of "Home, Sweet Home" will probably be buried in his native country after all. It is announced that Mr. W. W. Corcoran, the Washington philanthropist, is taking steps to secure the removal of the remains of John Howard Payne, the author of "Home, Sweet Home," from their lonely grave in Tunis to Oak Hill Cemetery at Washington, where he will erect a fitting monument to Payne's memory. The State Department at Washington and the English Foreign office have cordially co-operated with him, and the French authorities at Tunis promise to supervise the transfer of the remains to this country next spring.

Several Legacies to Religious and Philanthropic objects are devised in the will of the late Eliza A. Smith, a former resident of New York, which was admitted to probate in Philadelphia, on November 17th. They amount to $28,000, and are distributed as follows: American Bible Society of New York, $5000; Board of Foreign Missions of the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church of America, $5000; Board of Domestic Missions of the Presbyterian Assembly of America, $4000; American Tract Society, $5000; Board of Education of the Presbyterian Church of the United States, $3000; American Sunday-school Union $3000; American Seamen's Fund Society of New York, $1000; Orphans' Asylum of New York City, $1000; Association for the Relief of Respectable Aged Indigent Females of New York, $1000.

A Remarkable Record of Ministerial Labor is that contained in a life, recently published, of the Rev. Edward Palmer, by his son, the Rev. B. M. Palmer, of New Orleans, whose portrait and life appeared in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of December 8th, 1881. Dr. Palmer in summarizing his father's labors states that his ministerial work extended "over a period of fifty-eight years, of which thirty-four were spent with one charge, thirteen years with another, two and a half years with a third, and eight years, the last of them, in a sort of patriarchal relation to the Church at large." For more than thirty years it was his habit to preach at 10.30 o'clock in the morning of each Sabbath, then to ride sixteen miles and preach in the afternoon to a large body of slaves, catechize the children, attend to cases of discipline, and examine candidates for church membership; then to ride back the same sixteen miles and preach at night to the same congregation as in the morning. Nor in all that time did he take a single vacation, except twice, when convalescing from dangerous illness. He died in his ninety-fourth year having been in the ministry from the time he was thirty-six years of age. Such a record is a striking fulfillment of God's promise (Isaiah 40: 31).

The Gambling Spirit is not Confined to the frequenters of gambling houses as many a Wall Street broker could testify. There is an instance of the fact in the case of a prisoner in the jail at Troy, N.Y., who though formerly moving in the highest circles and engaged in a prosperous business is now awaiting his trial for forgery. An intimate friend of the prisoner, speaking of his case said: "He was wrapped up in iron speculations. He made on one operation $5000. This made him crazy on the subject. He neglected his business and put every dollar he could raise into iron. When the market went down and he had used all the money his relatives would advance he put the forged paper on the market. I did all I could to save him from exposure, but in vain." This is only one case among thousands of others who heedless of the warnings of the Bible are hasting to get rich and are on the path that ends in crime and disgrace (Prov. 28 : 20).

A House is Cumbersome Plunder to Carry away but the attempt was made last week in Brooklyn. The building was a frame structure valued at one hundred and fifty dollars. It was situated in an unfrequented neighborhood and was unoccupied. On Sunday, November 19th, six men appeared on the scene equipped with tools. They quickly raised the house from its foundations and were removing it bodily when the owner received information of what was going on and had them arrested. The Bible contains many warnings of the uncertainty of riches and of the possibility of their being lost or stolen, but if any kind of wealth might have been considered secure a house would surely have been the form. This attempt, however, shows that desperate men will even try to steal a house. The conspirators failed in this case, and had they succeeded would not have been contented (Job 20 : 19, 20). The Christian, however poor he may be in worldly possessions, is assured that his mansion in the skies is secure (2 Cor. 5 : 1).

A Percentage on Plunder Offered Recently at a church collection led to the discovery of a crime. When the plate was passed round in a church at Connellville, Mo., on a recent Sunday, a man who was known to be poor placed a twenty-dollar note in it. There was thought to be some mistake, but he said that he really desired to make the contribution. The note was soon identified, by means of its number having been recorded, as part of $2000 recently stolen, and then the giver confessed. What he had intended as a relief for his conscience led to his detection. The man doubtless regrets by this time that he attempted to relieve his conscience in that way. When we read of large sums of money given or bequeathed by notorious evil-doers to Christian and philanthropic institutions we naturally suspect that they are influenced by the same motive as operated with the donor of the twenty-dollar note. They do not often suffer punishment at the hands of the law, but they are deceived in thinking that God will compound their sins in that way (Ezek. 7 : 19).

Two Children Lost in the Woods of Michigian were discovered recently after a search of eight days. A letter from Calumet, Michigan, to the Boston Post gives a graphic description of the incident. The writer states that the children, brother and sister, were respectively nine and seven years of age. They wandered from a thin settlement in the mining region into the woods to pick berries, and did not return at night. A thorough search was organized for them in which most of the inhabitants joined. The search was continued fruitlessly for a week, but when all hope was abandoned they were found. One of the searching parties became separated, and a few of them sat down by a brook to rest. One of the number describes what followed: "We were tired and bewildered, and shouted loudly for our companions to come to us, when from a heap of bushes came a boy, saying, 'Where are you? Who is it?' We, thinking he belonged to some party of searchers, asked, 'Who are you with?' His answer came, 'My sister.' Up we sprang to our feet, and knew, even in the midst of our amazement, that the lost children were found and alive and in their right senses, although they had been alone in that dismal wood, amid lightning and tempest, for eight days, with nothing to eat but berries. The boy of but nine years had built huts of brush to cover them at night, had gathered and loaded both himself and sister with great bunches of blueberries where they were to be found, and was trying to follow the tortuous course of the brook, which, he remembered, emptied into Torch Lake. He was still brave." The joy of the parents at the discovery of the children may be imagined. The incident is in many of its features a remarkable illustration of our Saviour's parable of the lost sheep (Luke 15 : 4-7).

The Effort to Discover Perpetual Motion has cost another life. That will-o'-the-wisp has led many to poverty, madness and death. The most recent victim is a man who lived near Wilkesbarre, Pa., who shot himself on November 23d. He devoted all his leisure time for many years to the making of machines with the view of finding perpetual motion, and for the last two years did nothing else. Finally crazed by disappointment, he committed suicide. A memorandum found among his papers showed that before he lost his reason he contemplated such a death. He wrote: "I shall die in my atheistical faith as fearlessly as the heathen dieth in the faith of his existence. I am but eluding misery and pain." How terrible must be the awakening in the other world of a man who entered it hoping to elude misery and pain. Had he been better enlightened he would have found a better way of living and dying than that he chose. But there are many men who will read of this suicide's vain pursuit with contempt who are spending their lives in pursuits which can only end in disappointment as bitter as his (Eccles. 6).

A Strange Freak of a Drunken Man Carries a warning with it which may be useful. It is stated in a local journal that a notorious drunkard named Ira Jobes, while drunk at Corwin, Ohio, met a man of noted piety in a store, and at once expressed a desire to be prayed for by him. The man refused, but Jobes drew a pistol and compelled him to pray for five minutes by the watch, frequently prompting him as to the nature of the petition. He was especially desirous that the prayer should be directed to the salvation of his soul. On the following day he was shot by an antagonist in a brawl, and will probably die. The drunkard's request was probably prompted only by a desire to turn religion into ridicule, but it may have been that a presentiment of the near approach of his death was upon him. There are many people who on the threshold of death render this tribute to the efficacy of prayer by sending for a priest or a Christian friend to pray for them, forgetting that intercession in such cases without a personal application is unavailing, no matter how good the intercessor may be (Ezek. 14 : 14).

An Attempt to Rescue Money from a Burning house resulted in the sacrifice of a woman's life at Scranton, Pa., on November 24th. About two o'clock in the morning the wife of a miner named Ruddy discovered that the frame house in which the family lived was on fire. The miner, who was crippled by a recent mine accident, caught up the youngest child and with great difficulty struggled from the building, while his wife devoted her energies to rescuing the other five children. Mrs. Ruddy, as soon as she had the children out, rushed into the burning house and upstairs for her husband's savings, amounting to $260 in gold, but she had no sooner entered than the flames broke out at all points, and the house fell in with a crash, enveloping her in a sheet of fire. The spectators were powerless to render assistance, and the poor woman perished in sight of her husband and children. Most of the money after which she went was found uninjured. It is a pity that the woman was not restrained from making the desperate attempt in which she lost her life. She was doubtless impelled to it by the reflection that her husband was crippled and there were six children to support. As it turned out, however, she would have better consulted the interests of those she loved had she not ventured to return. How many people there are who are metaphorically doing the very same thing. They are so anxious to secure money for the support of their families that they are sacrificing in the pursuit health, life, and often the soul too (Prov. 23 : 4, 5).

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"Be not moved away from the hope of the gospel."—Colossians 1 : 23.

The Battle with Evil—Not Ended at Conversion—Holding the Conquered Fort—Be not Moved Away—I. No Part of the Hope to be Given up—What the Hope Includes—Full Salvation—Final Perseverance—Resurrection—The Second Advent—Eternal Blessedness—II. Hold the Ground of the Hope—What it is—III. How We may be Moved Away—By Self-Conceit—By Despondency—By False Teaching—By Reliance on Feeling—By a Dazzle of Intellect—By Persecution—IV. Why We Should not be Moved Away—No Better Hope—The Way to Bondage—Desertion of the Saviour—Leaving Intrenchments.

MANY a soul has a great struggle to attain to the hope of the Gospel. Not without hand-to-hand fighting do many hearts lay hold on Christ and eternal life. Conscience often sets up a chevaux de frise around the hill of Calvary, and thus cuts off the convinced sinner from approaching his Saviour. Doubts and fears,

THE BLACK WATCH OF EVIL, drive back the coming ones, and worry those who would fain hide in the Rock of Ages. Satan summons all his hosts to push men back from the cross that they may not come to Christ and live.

But, brethren, the battle does not end when by a desperate rush a man has come to Christ. In many it assumes a new form; the enemy now attempts to drag the trembler from his refuge, and eject him from his stronghold. It is difficult to get at the hope of the Gospel; but quite as difficult to keep it so as not to be moved away from it. If Satan spends great power in keeping us from the hope, he uses equal force in endeavoring to drag us away from it, and equal cunning in endeavoring to allure us from it. Hence the apostle tells us not to be moved away from the hope of the Gospel; the exhortation is needful in presence of an imminent danger.

Do not think that in the moment when you believe in Christ the conflict is over, or you will be bitterly disappointed. It is then that the battle renews itself, and every inch of the road swarms with foemen. Between here and heaven you will always have to fight more or less, and frequently the severest struggle will be at a time when you are least prepared for it. There is but a short space between one battle and another in this world. It is a series of skirmishes even when it does not assume the form of a pitched battle. He that would win heaven must fight for it. He that would take the new Jerusalem must scale it, and if he has the wit to take Jacob's ladder and set it against the wall and climb up that way, he will win the city. "The kingdom of heaven suffereth violence, and the violent take it by force." At this time our subject is not the winning, but the wearing; not the taking, but the holding of the fort: "Be not moved away," you that have come to it, "Be not moved away from the hope of the Gospel."

I. First, be not moved away from the subject of that hope so as to give up any part of the hope which is revealed to you by the Gospel.

WHAT IS YOUR HOPE?

First, it is the hope of full salvation—the hope that, inasmuch as you have believed in Jesus Christ, you are free from all condemnation at the present moment, and shall be free from all condemnation in the future as to all your sins; and that, in addition to this, He that takes away the condemnation of sin will also destroy the power of it over you. You shall one day be presented "without spot or wrinkle, or any such thing," cleansed from all guilt, and cleansed from all tendency to sin and to corruption, and made like unto the perfect creature of God when first it comes from His hands. Oh, this is a blessed hope! "He that hath this hope in him purifieth himself, even as Christ is pure."

Let no man debase the currency of heaven or clip the coin of the realm of the Great King. The first part of it—hold to it, that the Lord Jesus Christ has cleansed you from all the guilt and penalty of sin, so that not a speck remains to accuse or condemn you. Hold to it, moreover, that if He has once washed you, you shall not need to wash again in that fountain filled with blood, for "he that is washed needeth not except to wash his feet;" and that washing shall be given to him by the condescending hands of Christ. The water shall be a second cure of that which the blood has already cleansed and removed.

Never take off a fraction from that other part of full salvation, namely, the possibility and the absolute certainty that every sinful tendency now in your nature shall be utterly destroyed. There shall remain in you no root of bitterness, no scar of evil, no footprint of iniquity. There shall be no tinder in your soul upon which the sparks of temptation can fall, so as to live and make a flame; and when the Prince of this world cometh He shall find nothing in you. Then you shall enter into your rest eternal; for God keeps not His ripe wheat in the field, but takes it home when it is once fit to be gathered into the garner. This is your hope through the Gospel; be not moved away from it.

In connection with this there is the hope of final perseverance. I confess that to me it is one of the most attractive doctrines of God's word, that "the righteous shall hold on his way, and he that hath clean hands shall be stronger and stronger." For I am "confident of this very thing, that He which hath begun a good work in you will perform it until the day of Jesus Christ." There are many assurances to this effect, and if anything definite is taught in Scripture, I am confident that this is among the plainest of such teachings.

I beseech you, do not shun this doctrine as though it would lead you into the least presumption if properly understood. Its legitimate effect is the very reverse of carelessness. If it be true that, once enlisted in this army of the Lord, you must and shall fight until you are a conqueror, then there is no temptation to lay down the sword for a while in the hope of taking it up again at a more convenient season. If, as some say, you may be Christ's soldier to day and desert to-morrow, and then be enlisted again—if it be indeed true that a man may be regenerated and then lose the divine life, and upon repentance be re-regenerated and re-re-re-re-regenerated I know not how many times, I am not aware that this novelty is hinted at in

MY UNREVISED NEW TESTAMENT.

There I read of being "born again," but not of being born again and again and again and again and again—again—I say I cannot find a trace of this in the Bible.

On the other hand, I find that if the one regeneration fails, which is impossible, there would remain nothing else to be done. God's best work is broken down, and He will never try it again. If, grace does utterly depart, which I believe to be impossible, there remains no hope for such a one. God's supreme effort, according to that theory, has been made and failed. We have but made the supposition to show you the danger, upon whose brink you stand, and over whose verge you would slide if grace did not prevent. If you indeed believe in Christ Jesus, set this to your seal, that He will keep you to the end. For dear life hold on to the hope of final preservation; for there is a purifying, encouraging, stimulating power about that precious truth. "He keepeth the feet of His saints;" "be not moved away from the hope of the Gospel."

We have a hope beyond this; for we believe that we shall experience the resurrection. Though they fall down and men call them corpses, they are precious in the sight of the Lord, and the grave shall be a refining pot, out of which the pure metal of our purified body shall come forth. At the word of the Lord the dry bones shall live; they shall be clothed with flesh, and skin shall come upon them, if after that fashion the body is to be raised. But, if not—if the body is to assume another form, and we are to be made like unto a glory which as yet we cannot comprehend, then we may be sure of this—that we shall so rise that mortality shall put on immortality, and corruption shall give place to incorruption.

In any case,

OUR BODIES SHALL RISE

again. The grace of God secures the bodies as well as the souls of the saints. Christ bought not the half of a man, but the whole trinity of our manhood is His redeemed inheritance; spirit, soul, and body shall dwell for ever with Him, for He has redeemed our undivided manhood. Never give up that hope either concerning yourselves or your friends. Let nothing shake your confidence in the resurrection; let no philosophical explanation fritter it away. No other historical fact is so well attested as the resurrection of Christ, and that is the very corner-stone of our confidence. Often and often when I am sore beset with devilish temptations and insinuations as to the eternal hope of my soul and body, I fly to this—Jesus Christ did rise from the dead, and, inasmuch as He rose from the dead, He has come back to tell us that there is another world, and that not only our souls but our bodies shall inherit a far more blessed condition than this present one. Hold on to this hope of the Gospel, and never let it go.

Then, remember, you have the hope of

if Jesus comes before you die you will meet Him—gladly meet and welcome the Son of God upon this earth. You shall be changed so that you shall be fit to inherit the incorruptible glories of the skies. You shall see your Redeemer when He stands in the latter day upon the earth. As Job said, "In my flesh shall I see God, whom my eyes shall see for myself, and not another." Have joy, then, at every thought of your Master's coming. Do not put it among dark prophecies or doubtful dreams. It is a clearly revealed truth that Jesus will come again and take His people up to their eternal home; "Wherefore comfort one another with these words," and be not moved away from that hope of the Gospel, which lies so sweetly in the second advent of our Lord Jesus Christ.

And, once more, we have this hope—that when we have passed through all that concerns time and are in eternity, that shoreless, bottomless sea, there remains for us no fear or dread; but we shall be "forever with the Lord." Be not dismayed as though there would be an after-probation, or a purgatory, or a limbus patrum, or any of those pretty places that have filled priests' pockets so long, and are now being newly vamped and produced by our proud thinkers as an aid to their pretty speculations. We will have no purgatory under any form, it is the larder of priests, and the refuge of heresy-mongers; but there is not a word of it in God's book. We stand to the text—"So shall we be forever with the Lord."

II. But now, secondly, I charge you, beloved, before God, that ye be not moved away from the hope of the Gospel as to the ground of that hope. And

WHAT IS THE GROUND OF THAT HOPE?

The ground of that hope is, first, the rich, free, sovereign grace of God, because He has said, "I will have mercy on whom I will have mercy, and I will have compassion on whom I will have compassion." The Lord claims for Himself the prerogative of mercy, and as He can exercise it without the violation of His justice through the atoning sacrifice of Christ, we joy and rejoice in the fact that men are not saved because of any natural goodness of disposition, or because of anything that they have done, or ever shall do. Because God is gracious, therefore He bestows His grace upon the undeserving and the lost. Be not moved away from this.

The ground of our salvation is, next, the merit of Christ—what Christ is—what Christ has done—what Christ has suffered. This is the ground upon which God saves the sons of men. Even Cardinal Bellarmine, the mighty opponent of Luther, perhaps the best opponent that he had, whose eyes saw much of Gospel light, once said this, that albeit that good works are necessary unto salvation, yet, inasmuch as no man can be sure that he has performed as many good works as will save him, it is, upon the whole, safest to trust alone in the merits and sufferings of Christ. Cardinal! the safest way suits me. If that be the best and safest, what better do any of us want? Heaven is too precious a thing to be purchased by anything that we can by any possibility do; but it is not too great to be purchased by the blood of Christ; and when we come to His atonement our anchor holds abidingly. "Be not moved away from the hope of the Gospel."

Another ground of our hope is this—that God has solemnly pledged that "whosoever believeth in Christ shall not perish, but shall have everlasting life." If, then, we do really and in very deed believe in Jesus Christ and rest on Him, we cannot perish, for God cannot contradict Himself.

But, once again, our hope of the Gospel is grounded in the infallibility of Scripture. The Papist has an infallible pope, but we have an infallible Bible. If that which is spoken in this Book be not true, neither is our hope sure. If these things be questionable, our confidence is questionable; but if this word of God abides fast forever and ever, though heaven and earth should pass away, then he that believes and builds on this infallible truth may rejoice and stand fast. I beseech you, "be not moved away from the hope of the Gospel."

III. So far have I come with all my heart and soul, and I believe that you, dear friends, the members of this church at any rate, have accompanied me therein. Now let us consider from the hope of the Gospel unless grace be given to prevent us.

We may be moved from the hope of the Gospel in the following ways. Sometimes by a conceit of ourselves. You may get off the ground of confidence in free grace to think, "Now I am somebody. Have not I prayed at the prayer-meeting? Did not friends say that they were edified by it? Have not I preached a wonderful sermon? Am I not generous? Have not I given large sums to the church and to the poor? Am I not somebody?" Ah! you and the devil together can make a fine tale about that, and I have no doubt that all he tells you you will very greedily suck in, for we like to be praised, and, though the praise comes from Satan himself, it is welcome to our proud flesh. Well, whenever we get to think we are somebody, we are moved away from the hope of the Gospel.

Jesus Christ came into the world to save sinners. Somebody says, "But I am not one." Ah, then He did not come to save you! "Do you say I was a sinner once, but I have grown so perfect that I DO NOT SIN NOW."

Don't you? Then you are removed from that hope which belongs to those who confess and lament their sins. You un-Christianize yourself as soon as you strike your name out of the list of sinners who are saved by the Saviour's grace. You are a sinner and Christ died to save you, but do not be moved away from the hope of the Gospel by a vain notion that you are no longer sinful. Christ came not to heal the whole, but those who are sick.

Do not be moved away, on the other hand, by despondency. Satan does not mind which way you get off the rock, whether it is by jumping up or by jumping down. It is all the same to him, so long as you leave the rock of your salvation. Many there are that go up in a balloon of conceit, while others are ready to roll down the steep of despondency and despair. But be not moved away from the hope of the Gospel either one way or the other. The least sin ought to make you humble, but the greatest sin ought not to make you despair.

You may be moved away from the hope of the Gospel also by false teaching. If, for instance, you do not believe Christ to be "Light of light, very God of very God," you have moved away from our hope, which depends upon His godhead. If you think that the priest can save you, you are moved away from the one only Priest before whom all other priests must let their censers die out into blackness. He alone can save you. If you listen to any teaching which puts your working or your doing into the place of Christ, you are drinking in error, and you will be removed from the hope of your calling, which is free grace, received by faith, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord.

You can be removed from the hope of your calling by hoping to live by feelings. Ah! there are many Christians who get tempted that way. They feel so happy, and that is the reason why they believe that they are saved. That is not the reason why I believe I am saved. I am saved because I trust Christ, and if I were as miserable as misery itself I should be just as truly saved as if I were as happy as heaven itself. It is faith that does it, not feeling. Some have very joyous feelings; they swim in trances and deliriums, and yet they are all wrong. Rest you on Christ, whether it is bright day or dark night with you; though He slay you, trust in Him—as much trust in Him as if He pressed you to His bosom. Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ, who came into the world to save sinners, and good feelings will follow by-and-by; but, just now, your first business is this—"He that believeth in Him is not condemned." "He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life." Stand you to that hope of the Gospel.

Many are moved away from the hope of their calling by

A DAZZLE OF INTELLECT.

They are content simply to believe in Jesus till they meet some fine man, a thinker with a big forehead and a large box which ought to be full of brains. We have not been inside to see what is there, but the preacher talks much of his thought and culture. He tells you that you are behind the age, that a faith which believes God might do very well for the times of Cromwell and the roundhead Puritans, but that, nowadays, we are far in advance of all that kind of thing. Whenever a brother dazzles you like that, let him dazzle. We have believed in Christ Jesus and found salvation, and by God's grace we will not be moved away from the hope of our calling.

Lastly, be not moved away by persecution, or by sneers, or by ridicule. The persecution of this present day is a small thing compared with what our forefathers suffered. Look at that picture of the amphitheatre, by Doré. All is over. Every seat is empty. The stars, like the eyes of God, are looking down upon the arena. There lie the bodies of the saints, and there are the tigers and the lions prowling over the sanded floor, tearing the carcasses which they have slain. But the painter pictures a vision of angels, descending from over the uttermost parapet of the amphitheatre; they are tenderly watching over those precious bodies, for they have triumphed, and from the mouths of the beasts they have gone to the thrones of the angels. Only hold you fast where the saints held fast at the first, "in nothing terrified by your adversaries." No more mind the advance of learning than they dreaded the universality of ignorance.

IV. Lastly, why is it that we cannot be moved away from the hope of the Gospel? What would follow if we were?

Well, first, we will not be moved away from the hope of our calling, for there is NOTHING BETTER TO TAKE ITS PLACE.

A man would not think of going to Australia if he heard that the wages were less there than here, and the expense of living greater, and that the people were poorer. "No," he would say, "I shall not jump out of the frying-pan into the fire. I shall certainly stop where I am rather than go farther and fare worse." Well, we are just of that mind. We do not see how we could improve ourselves.

Jonathan Edwards, in one of his treatises, speaks somewhat to this effect: "If any man can prove this form of the Gospel to be untrue and a mere dream, the very best thing that he can do is to sit down and weep forever to think that he has disproved the brightest hope that ever shone upon the eyes of men." And that is so. To have the glorious hope that, believing in Christ, we are saved, is such a blessedness and such a joy that nothing can compare with it.

Remember, too, that if we are moved away from the hope of our calling we shall soon be in bondage. A tree that is frequently moved usually dies; but growth there cannot be; and a man who begins in the spirit, and hopes to be made perfect by the flesh, begins in free grace and then gets tagging on his own works, begins by trusting in Christ and then makes confession to a priest, rests in the precious blood, and then dabbles in sacraments, and hopes to find salvation there; he can never grow in grace. He cannot bless others, he does not himself know the way to blessing.

Beside, if we were moved away from the hope of our calling, what mean, miserable wretches we should be, for we should have deserted our Saviour. I wonder where I could hide my dishonorable head if I once came here to preach to you salvation by the works of the flesh and not by the grace of God. I hope that you would hiss me from the platform, and I hope that you will so serve everybody that shall succeed me when I am gone who shall preach to you any other Gospel than that ye have received. Hold fast with all your might right solemnly to the grand old faith, for if you do not, in rejecting that way of salvation you reject yourselves.

For us to leave the plan of salvation—and with this I close—is something like a soldier entrenched in accepting an invitation to come out of it. You remember how the black monarch who has been so much run after in England, said that our soldiers ought to come out of the entrenchments. They were rats, he said, to hide behind earthworks. If they would only come out, he would destroy them; but our soldiers were wise enough not to venture into the open until the proper time. So the world, the flesh, the devil, and error say, "Come out! Come out: You talk about an infallible Scripture and an almighty Saviour, and a simple faith in Him. Come out and fight us fairly on the level." Yes, but we do not see it, and we shall never attempt it.

As I was riding along in the south of France one day I saw a pair of fine birds overheard. The driver called out in the French tongue, "Eagles!" Yes; and there was a man below with a gun, who was wishful to get a nearer acquaintance with the eagles, but they did not come down to oblige him. He pointed his rifle at them, but his shots did not reach half way, for the royal birds kept above. The higher air is the fit dominion for eagles. Up there is the eagle's playground, where he plays with the callow lightnings. Up above the smoke and clouds he dwells.

KEEP THERE, EAGLES!

Keep there! If men can get you within range, they mean no good to you. Keep up, Christians. Keep up in the higher element, resting in Jesus Christ, and do not come down to find a perch for yourself among the trees of philosophy.

Whatever we do let us never leave the way of truth, of peace, of safety. We are going along the king's highway, and the thieves on the side of the road say, "Come off the highway; it is so dull and monotonous. Come into the woods; we will show you fair flowers, and ferny dells, and quiet caves. Come, listen to the birds that sing all day and all night too. Come quick with us." We heed you not; he that travels along the king's highway is under the king's protection; but he that wanders into the dark mountains and lonesome woods may take care of himself. We shall do as we have done—follow the way that leads from the banishment—the way of trusting in the Saviour and in Him alone.

As you hold to the faith, so may God bless and enrich you. As with simple heart you plod along the road that leads to heaven by the righteousness of the Son of God, may the Lord be with you and comfort you. But if you turn back, woe unto you! A curse will fall upon you in that day of shame and crime! The Lord keep you that you may keep the faith. Amen.

DR. NORMAN KERR.

The Medical Philanthropist.

THE gentleman whose portrait we give on page 764 is well known to the American temperance public through his lecture on "Scriptural and Ecclesiastical Wines" which has been widely circulated here, and is widely known for the deep and practical interest he takes in the cause of total abstinence.

Dr. Kerr was born at Glasgow in 1834. He became a diligent and successful student, graduating in the University of that city in both medicine and surgery. He must have been deeply impressed with the evils of intemperance early in life, for when only twenty-three years of age he reorganized an Abstinence Society for his University, a former organization having ten years before come to an untimely end. Of the 1000 students in the University, 100 became members of the new society, and this, in those early times, was considered a great achievement. Dr. Kerr was also among the earliest members of the United Kingdom Alliance, and has ever been one of Sir Wilfrid Lawson's most uncompromising supporters. He has, with pen and with voice, advocated the Permissive Bill, and has yielded to that consensus of opinion which has been brought to bear upon Sir Wilfrid. There is no doubt that Dr. Kerr's mind was, in the first instance, chiefly turned to the temperance question by the writings of Dr. F. R. Lees.

Circumstances called Dr. Kerr from his native land. He was appointed Surgeon-Superintendent in the Royal Canadian Mail Trans-Atlantic Steamers, which position he held for nine years. He resided continuously in Canada, and during this period when in a temperature of 38 degrees below zero he was a thorough abstainer, and proved in his own person that which scientists, like Dr. B. W. Richardson, have demonstrated in their laboratory—that alcohol lowers the temperature of the body by drawing warmth from the region of the heart, where it is wanted to the surface of the body where it is not wanted. Equally in warm climates Dr. Kerr has proved the advantage of the total abstinence régime for he has slept with the thermometer 103 in the shade without experiencing any ill effects.

Thirteen years ago Dr. Kerr returned to England and settled in London. As a Christian he was horrified at the drunkenness he saw around, and as a philanthropist he determined to do all that one man could to stamp it out. Like Paul, on Mars Hill, Dr. Norman Kerr felt his spirit stirred within him as he saw the city wholly given to the idolatry of Bacchus. Since his arrival in London his labors for temperance have been herculean. It is the surprise of all acquainted with the facts how he gets through his enormous work. Added to the cares of a heavy practice, there are labors for temperance and for other philanthropic movements. Dr. Kerr himself says that when he is tired he seeks rest, and does not have recourse to those stimulants which are but as the spur to the jaded horse—it makes the animal go the faster, but it does not give it strength—merely exhausting the strength it has.

Dr. Kerr's voice has been heard in nearly every important town in England on the subject of Temperance Reform, while his literary labors on its behalf have also been very great. He has read papers before the British Medical Association, at its Autumnal Meeting, for several years on "Alcohol as a Medicine," and allied topics, and these have been circulated in thousands. On this subject he holds that there are very few cases of illness or disease when the administration of alcohol is really necessary; but when employed as a remedial agent he says, "It should be used with as much caution as prussic acid or any other deadly poison." He has treated in eighteen years an aggregate of forty thousand cases, suffering from all kinds of diseases and accidents, without the administration of alcohol more than once in each two thousand cases.

Dr. Kerr also takes strong ground on the subject of communion wine, maintaining that it is unsafe for the reclaimed drunkard to approach the Lord's table while the alcoholic fluid forms one of its constituents. He advocates the use of unfermented wine, and has written a pamphlet to prove that such a beverage is to be obtained, and that in fact it was in use in ancient times.

Dr. Kerr has taken an active part in the movement for placing habitual drunkards under restraint, believing that these unfortunates should not be left to ruin themselves body and soul, for the want of a period of temporary restraint, during which medical skill and religious influences may have a fair chance to operate for their recovery.

RICHARD WEAVER, The Eminent Evangelist.

RICHARD WEAVER was born at the village of Asterley, England, on the 25th of June, 1827. His father and mother were about as ill-matched as man and woman could possibly be; the former being a reckless profligate, and the latter a sincere and devoted Christian. Referring to his early days Richard Weaver says: "I could tell some sad tales of sorrow that I witnessed when quite a child. Many a time have I clung to my mother, and cried to my drunken father: 'Don't kill my mother.' Yes, I think as I write this of the days of my childhood, when the praying mother has been down on her knees asking God to help her in her distress. My eldest brother was always kind to her. The Lord reward him! But we others were a burden to her night and day. She told her Father in heaven all her sorrows and our sins." The still small voice of God uttered in the tones of that loving mother often touched Richard's heart even during the days of childhood and youth.

As he grew up, drinking and fighting, became his favorite amusements. Amid these and similar excesses he was SAVED FROM A FEARFUL DEATH.

Standing at the mouth of a pit, his foot slipped and he fell over. As he slipped down he instinctively clutched the rails of the tramway over the pit, and there he hung with a hundred yards of empty air beneath him. He truly says, "If I had fallen, I must have been dashed in pieces, and my soul have gone to hell." But his cries brought a man to his rescue, and his life was saved. Yet, though he had cried out in terror in that moment of anguish, the merciful escape produced no lasting impression. He passed night after night at the ale house, where his joviality and gifts as a singer made him a welcome guest.

DRUNKEN ABUSE OF HIS MOTHER.

One scene Richard will probably never recall without feelings of the deepest remorse. He had been spending a night of drunken carousal at a public-house, where he quarrelled with one of his mates with whom he soon came to blows. Bruised and bleeding, Richard reached home as the day was breaking. As he approached the cottage, the first sound that fell upon his ears was the voice of his loving mother tenderly interceding with God on his behalf. This hurt him more, he says, than the blows he had received in the fight, and found its way to his heart. As soon as the knock was heard, the poor woman ran to the door, and beheld with feelings which no language could describe his disfigured and sodden face. When she had given him a chair, and washed away the dirt and blood, and ministered to him as he needed, she knelt down and prayed again that God would save her boy, and pleaded with the lad himself.

But while she prayed, the lad cursed, swearing that he would murder her if she did not leave off praying and preaching to him. He went up to bed, but the mother's love constrained her to follow him; and, kneeling down by his bedside, again she besought her heavenly Father on his behalf. But her reprobate son, in a rage, sprang out of bed, and grasping her gray hair, shook her while on her knees. She took hold of his arm with trembling hands and said, "This is hard work, Lord, to nurse and watch our children till they begin to be men, and then to hear them say that they will murder us for asking Thee to save them." And then turning to her son, "I will never give thee up."

HE RESOLVES UPON SUICIDE.

Having removed to Staffordshire he became, if possible, more abandoned than he had ever been before. After one of the terrible drinking bouts, in which he now indulged, with maddened brain and burning brow, he rushed upstairs determined to destroy himself. He took the razor from his box and untied his neckerchief, then tried to chalk upon the floor some message to his landlady. While sharpening the instrument of death, a voice came to him, "Remember that old woman that cried in her prayers, 'Lord, save my lad.'" "What will she say," he thought, "when she hears of my sending my soul into eternity before its time?" Casting aside the razor he ran downstairs and told his landlady what he had been tempted to do. She threw up her hands in fear, and though not a godly woman, exclaimed, "The Lord have mercy on thee." He began to wring his hands and curse the day when he was born; but she said: "Lord bless thee, lad; thank God thou'rt yet alive. There's hope for thee yet."

Though thus saved from self-destruction he continued his evil courses, notwithstanding the rebukes of conscience and the strivings of the Spirit, until, in order to drown painful thoughts and memories, he went to a rumshop and got drunk.

HIS CONVERSION.

The next morning when his drunkenness had died out of him, Richard, still in fear of hell, went out into a field, and crept into a sandhole where no eye could see him but the eye of God, and there, praying to his Father in secret, he told Him all his sorrows, confessed all his iniquities, cried to be delivered, trusted in the blood of Christ, and was made free.

The joy of his old mother on hearing of his conversion, knew no bounds. The news was so good that it seemed to her too good to be true, and the tempter whispered doubts into her ear. But God said: "Be not faithless but believe. The child is made whole." This occurred in 1852.

HIS BACKSLIDING AND RESTORATION.

For six months Richard held on his way, though greatly persecuted, but one day some of the men, in his presence, grossly insulted a Christian young woman, a friend of his. His blood was up in a moment, and striking out with both his fists, according to ancient custom, he fiercely avenged her of her chief assailant, and would have seriously injured him, even if he had escaped with his life had not some of the bystanders stayed his arm.

This was the beginning of sorrows. For several months he returned to his old courses, with more abandonment than ever. During this sad period of backsliding, he suffered dreadful remorse and self-accusation.

About this time he was sparring one night in a boxing saloon with a black man; and, striking a tremendous blow, the blood streamed down the negro's face. He was alarmed by what he had done and went home to his lodgings, fell upon his knees, confessed with bitter tears his backsliding and was graciously received by the loving Father he had forsaken.

His subsequent career, as a popular evangelist since 1856, has been marked, as our readers are aware, by manifold labors and extraordinary usefulness. Addressing with great power vast crowds on the simple truths of the Gospel, he has been the means of leading thousands of degraded men and women into "the way everlasting."

GRACE'S DEBT OF GRATITUDE DISCHARGED.

"You stay here and graze, Brownie, while I see what can be done." So saying, the speaker, a middle-aged man clad in the dress of a substantial well-to-do farmer, dismounted and turned his horse loose in a little enclosure at the foot of a hill. He then strode rapidly up the path to the summit, where, after looking about him on all sides, he began restlessly pacing to and fro. There was a small plantation there, through which a road had been cleared leading to a large mansion, the country residence of a city millionaire. Farmer Grayley patrolled this road for about a hundred yards like a sentinel on guard; at every turn looking eagerly toward the village, about a mile distant. He was evidently waiting for some one, and if one might judge by the wistful troubled look on his face very anxiously waiting, too.

"Here she is at last," he exclaimed, after he had taken some half score turns over his chosen sentry ground, as a young lady plainly, but tastefully attired, appeared at the other end of the plantation, bending her steps toward the great house. "Good morning, Miss Chester, I've been waiting to speak to you. I rode over here thinking I should meet you before you went in. My wife is very ill and she wants to see you badly. If you can come it will be a real charity."

"Of course, I will come, Mr. Grayley, I shall be at liberty at two o'clock. Tell Mrs. Grayley I am very sorry she is sick. Is it the old trouble?"

"Yes," said the farmer, "the old trouble; but it is worse this time, and I'm afraid she will have a hard struggle to get over it."

Faithful to her promise, Grace Chester at the appointed time was by the sick woman's bedside.

"Grace," said the sufferer, "I am so glad to see you. I have been longing for you all night and all day. I am very ill, and something tells me that I shall never be any better."

Grace Chester gently soothed the distressed mother, but even Grace, inexperienced as she was, could see that she was growing rapidly worse.

"Come here, Grace," she said, "I want a promise from you. I feel I am dying. I do not grieve for myself. I am only going home. I know He is able to keep what I committed to Him long ago. The Saviour will take me to be with Him in glory. But the children, my heart aches for them, there will be no one to take care of them when I am gone. Edward is a good father, but he will not know how to manage them. Promise me, Grace, that you will look after them. God will repay you for your trouble."

Grace Chester bent over the anxious mother and gave the promise and kissed her. She did so with a full heart, for she owed Mrs. Grayley a debt of gratitude dating from her own orphanhood. Years ago her father and mother had both died within a few weeks of each other, and she, with a little brother and sister, had been left unprotected. Then Mrs. Grayley had gone to the desolate home, and with infinite kindness and attention had taught her how to care for the children, and had been an unfailing source of comfort to her. Now, that she had grown up to womanhood and was earning a living for herself and them, by teaching the millionaire's children at the great house, she could enjoy the pleasure of repaying in some measure the old debt. Mrs. Grayley had cast her bread upon the waters, and was finding it after many days.

Mrs. Grayley gradually grew worse during the days that followed. Grace Chester was at her side every hour she could spare from her teaching, and had the satisfaction of seeing that her presence cheered the sinking spirit of the sufferer. At last it became evident that Mrs. Grayley's death must come in a few hours at furthest. Grace could scarcely catch the low whispers in which she spoke. Farmer Grayley was in the room, his manly face marked with the traces of tears. They were bending over the dying woman, watching her as with closed eyes she drew her breath in gasps. Suddenly she opened her eyes and fixing them on Grace said faintly, "Remember—the children," and turning her face aside with a loving farewell gaze on her husband, her spirit winged its flight from the poor worn body.

Grace faithfully fulfilled her promise. The housekeeper Farmer Grayley engaged to attend to the home, had no trouble with the children. To them Grace was a second mother, watching over their welfare, helping them in their childish troubles, and caring for their clothing, all unknown to the father who wondered that they were so little trouble to him. He was seldom at home when Grace Chester was there, but he could see that some busy, womanly hands, more tasteful and orderly than those of his housekeeper, must have been at work.

It was more than a year after his wife's death that he learned from his eldest daughter, in answer to questions, how much he had been indebted for his peace and comfort to Grace Chester's ministrations. "She comes nearly every day," said the child, "and she looks around to see if there is anything wants doing and she does it. She mended my frock when I rent it on the gate, and she teaches us hymns and little Mary her prayers."

Farmer Grayley thought he would like to witness one of those visits, but though he tried to meet her he failed. The end of it was that Farmer Grayley had to repeat his visit to the plantation on the hill-top, where he knew she must be every morning at a fixed hour. There he met her and begged her to be in fact, as she had long been in spirit and love, a second mother to his motherless children. It was a happier day at the farm than either father or children hoped to have seen, when Grace, after a quiet wedding, entered upon her duties.

ONLY A TRAMP.

A Serial Story by Grace Stebbing.

What Wynn Bought at the Optician's.

AFTER a short pause, he said, in a less agitated voice; "But after all, Brownie, do you know I guess that after a fashion you are a little out in your notion that you have no dread for God?"

Bobby lifted himself up again, and looked round rather grieved. "Oh, I hope not! I like having only the love much best."

"And a very happy thing that you do," said his friend; "but I don't think you will be very miserable when you hear me explain what I mean. You love mother very much, don't you?"

A momentary sparkle of indignation shot from Bobby's eyes. "Evvybody knows I love Muvver."

"Well, supposing mother were to give you a piece of meat to carry to good old Mrs. Sharplin, on one of her favorite plates, would you not dread to vex her by dropping it?"

"Ye—es," murmured Bobby, the dawning of an intelligent smile beginning to appear on his face; but he liked to hear his friend, so he said no more, beyond a gentle, enquiring, "Go on, please."

Charles Wynn smiled. "I believe you could 'go on' as well as I can, now you have got the clue, you small Brownie. However, God has given us in our hearts a great many of His wishes to take care of, a great many of His commandments to keep, and the more you love Him, the more I expect you would dread to break them, eh?"

You would not like to make God sorry, would you, as you love Him so much?"

For answer the child laid his head back again. "Yes," he added in a tone of quiet satisfaction. "In that way I do have the heart to dread. I should dread vevvy much to make God sorry about me."

Bobby's head had been lying for twenty minutes so quietly against his friend's shoulder, that at last Wynn said gently:

"Are you asleep, little Brownie?"

Little Brownie started up briskly enough. "No; but I fought you were. I've been finking whole heaps of finking, but I'd like to talk now, and—and—oh, I know. We haven't hardly a mite looked at the primroses, have we?"

"No, indeed; if I were the primroses I should shut myself up in the middle of my leaves, I almost think, I should be so offended at being treated with such neglect."

"What monster big leaves they'd have to be to cover you up!" laughed Bobby. "But shall we come now? The vevvy best primroses is generally down over there, just a wee bit nearer to the river. Shall you carry me?"

"Why, of course," was the decided answer. "What's the good of having a 'potato-man' if you can't turn him into a horse now and again! But before I carry you over to look at the best primroses, suppose you just have a look at something I have got here."

And as he spoke, Wynn drew out of his pocket a small parcel he had deposited there on leaving the optician's in Southford, and gave it into Bobby Balston's hands to be opened. With eager, little inquisitive fingers he had very soon got the string untied, and the paper taken off.

"What is it? Whatever can it be?" he asked, turning about an unknown little object, composed of glass and brass, with very wondering eyes. Wynn laughed.

"Well, whatever it is, you had better find out some use for it, because I have bought it on purpose for you, and it would be a pity for even a Brownie to have a present that it could get no pleasure out of. At least I think so."

"And so do I, and so please, Uncle Tatoe, you will just tell me how to get pleasure out of this, won't you, or show me?"

"Yes; show you will be the best plan," said the giver, as he took back the mysterious gift, and proceeded to unscrew a portion of it, and then to take out an inner piece of glass. Then taking a minute green insect just crawling up a blade of grass beside him, he popped it inside the brass box, clapped the piece of glass over it, and then screwed on the top again. Having done all this before the attentive gaze of Master Bobby, he handed the whole affair back to him, and told him to hold it up to the light, and to look into it. No second bidding was needed.

Once at his eyes it seemed as if it must be glued there, so perfectly motionless did it remain in that position, and for so long. At length, with a long-drawn breath, it was slowly lowered, and the child's eyes, with an almost awe struck look in them, were raised to the young man's face.

"Uncle Tateo, is that—is this—a real, true, alive fairy-tale?"

"One of God's own real fairy-tales then, my little Brownie," was the answer, with a grave smile. "You are only seeing that little insect as the Creator has really made it. but the tiny creature is fashioned so delicately that you cannot see the chief part of its beauty with your own eye alone. This instrument is so arranged as to help our eyes to see more. Its very name, a microscope, means to look at little things."

"Oh—h," murmured Bobby, and taking another long look into the glass, "is it just only for these sort of little green flies to be looked at, do you mean, it is made?"

"No, indeed," said the nicknamed "Uncle Tateo;" "it is useful for looking at all sorts of atoms of things. Atoms of Brownies, if only we can find one small enough to put to prison between those two glasses; and as you are so fond of looking at things—flowers, and insects, and specks of dust, and seeds, and cobwebs—I thought this would be just the very best toy you could have to amuse yourself with on wet days, when you cannot get out. But come; time is passing. If we are to see those best primroses we must be quick about it. Are you going to walk home afterward, or to ride there?"

Bobby laughed. "I know which I should like. You know there's lots of times for walking when I can't have my potato-horse."

"You impudent little old man," ejaculated Charles Wynn, laughing; "whatever poor names I have been called before in my life, I was never called such a mean thing as a potato-horse. As well be an orange-peel-pig at once."

And so the two most especially dissimilar companions chattered on together in the closest sympathy of friendship; the great, broad fellow, two inches over six feet in height, with the seven-year-old boy, small for his age, perched upon his shoulder. The one, so calmly, earnestly contemplative by nature, so able to pass even hours in stillness and silence, puzzling over the riddles and marvels life presented to his child-mind; the other, so restlessly eager to be ever up and doing, that as yet he had scarcely given himself time to see whether the hammer was coming down on the head of the nail, or on his own fingers.

But with all the differences in them, there were four things in common—honesty, earnestness, unselfishness, and a longing after the righteousness that is in Christ. And these four things cemented the friendship, begun on the one side when Bobby Balston softly hushed his mother, eight months ago, lest she should awaken the weary tramp, sleeping in the church porch. It is rather difficult to assign the precise moment to the beginning of the friendship on the other side; perhaps it sprang into most palpable life when small Bobby gave the stranger tramp permission the first time to carry his tired little oddity home to his mother. As he was being carried home now from Sleepy Dell, similarly mounted on his friend's shoulder, he suddenly exclaimed:

"Oh, but I've forgotten one thing! I've forgotten all this time to say fank you."

"What for? for that hair you so cruelly pulled out of my head just now, barbarous Brownie?"

"Oh, no!" was the laughing answer. "It was such a wee little hair, it wasn't really wurf a 'fank you,' and it couldn't have hurted you, at least I don't fink so. I put it in my box, and it looks ever such a big rope now. But it's the mifurcope itself I felt so much 'fank you' for, that I never remembered to say it."

"Then," said Wynn, lifting the boy down from his shoulder to the road at the entrance of Silverdale village, "then you shall say 'thank you' now, instead of 'fank you,' to make up for forgetfulness."

Bobby shook his head and pursed up his lips mischievously.

"I'll—I'll—say—'thank you'—next time."

And then, with a beaming smile and nod, and a firm clasp on his new, wonderful treasure—the "mifurcope," he ran off home, or, rather, he began to run home; for he had not gone twenty yards before he turned and flew back again; and taking the man's hand in his own, he said earnestly "That was for fun I said that. I'll say fifty hundred 'fank'—I mean 'thank you's' now, if you like."

"You shall not say even one 'fank you,' if you would rather not," replied Charles Wynn, stooping a long way down to kiss the smooth, broad forehead. Then he added, as though by an unrestrainable impulse, "If I were to go away, little Brownie, should you be sorry?"

What answer Bobby Balston would have given to that startling question, beyond the look of terror that leaped into his eyes, it is impossible to say; for at that minute his sister Jessy came running up the road, with rosy cheeks and smiling eyes to proffer an invitation, from her father and mother, that Mr. Wynn would go into their cottage to have some tea before he set out on his long walk home again. But Mr. Wynn had another engagement to keep, and with thanks to Jessy for herself and her parents, and a second hasty good-by to troubled Bobby, he turned off down the short lane leading to the Williams's abode.

In a former chapter it has been told how he rescued Jim Blake from the possible temptation to spend an independent afternoon in the public-house, by sending him off for a long walk to carry some books of his to be bound. It was also mentioned at the same time that Charles Wynn employed unsuspecting Jim to carry a note containing requests entirely relating to himself, after a fashion in vogue a good many hundred years ago.

But, after all, our tramp's short, pencilled letter was a very innocent one.

"MY DEAR MR. WILLIAMS: I am going to ask a favor of you. From what I have seen and heard of your wife, I believe she is a woman likely to have a peculiarly strong and useful influence over lads. The young fellow I am now sending to you with my books is rather more than a lad certainly, but he has little more than a boy's power to resist the temptations of some worthless companions he has become intimate with in Southford. If you and your wife would show him a little kindness to-day, and keep him with you until about half-past five, I will come round then, and pick him up to take the walk back with me; I should be very glad to get him friends in Silverdale."

"Yours truly,

"CHARLES WYNN (the Tramp)."

"And no fault o' mine that you aren't a tramp now, poor fellow, or dead more like," muttered James Williams, with a red flush of shame in his cheeks as he remembered a certain Sunday some months ago. The ex-tramp had never heard of his afternoon repentance; Williams had begged that he might not.

"You see, sir," he had said with some shrewd reasonableness, "if he is one of them as has the spirit of independence you say, he would look on it as more impertinence on my part than kindness, to dare to offer him a bit o' help after the way I've just been a treating him. No, I'll wait, please, sir, till the time comes, if so be it may, when I can do him a good turn really, not only offer or try to offer."

And so the matter had rested, and the time had never come, until now, when the man himself, whom he had so cruelly wounded, condescended so generously to ask a favor of him, not for himself, but for another, and from the gracious way of asking the favor conferred one, and full forgiveness for the past beside. Leaving Jim Blake in the sitting-room the clerk went into the little kitchen in search of his wife, employed, as usual at that hour on Saturdays, in making the seed-cake for Sunday's tea.

"Ah, the cake!" he exclaimed; "the very thing. Make it a very big one, my dear, or make two; but a very big one will look best, I think."

And as Mrs. Williams looked round with mild surprise in her eyes, her husband put the letter Jim Blake had brought him into her hands.

"Ain't that for all the world, 'Forgive our enemies and slanderers,' Molly, writ in big print all through it?" he asked, as he saw the tears gathering slowly in her eyes, and Mrs. Williams put the pencilled sheet quietly back to him.

"Yes, James dear, I think it shall be the big cake. Lads like cake, and two little ones don't look so cut and come again like. They must stop to tea; we must make them somehow. If"—and actually a sparkle of mischief shone out on her face in a smile—"if you can't manage Mr. Wynn I'll come to the fore, and just tell him that if he won't stay I shall know it for a sign that he hasn't half forgiven you yet."

Mrs. Mary Williams went back to her cake making. If there did come just a suspicion of a smile on her countenance her husband did not see it, and it was summarily dismissed. Adding a second portion to the ingredients already in the pan, she bethought her of one of the visitors whom she was resolved to entertain that evening.

"By the way, James," she asked, "what have ye done with the lad Blake all this time? Is he here? or is he not come into Silverdale yet?"

"Why, Molly, woman, what are ye thinking of?" was the somewhat impatient reply. "How do ye suppose I got that letter if the young fellow didn't bring it himself? More by token he's kicking his heels alone in our parlor at this present identical minute, and I don't mind confessing to you that, although I'm more than willing enough to oblige Mr. Wynn, and none less to hinder the lad himself from the public-house this afternoon, it passes me entirely to know whatever I'm going to do with the hobbledohoy for nigh upon two hours till the other one turns up to help me make talk for him."

And the poor clerk rumbled up his hair, and looked very terribly tired out, and bored in prospect of what he considered promised to be a very much heavier task than the week-day bookbinding, or the Sunday duties in the church. His wife quietly came to his relief, as she many a time did on their way through life together.

"Send the lad in here to me, James dear," she said, after a moment's thought.

The suggestion seemed first-rate to Williams, and after giving the astonished and delighted Jim the information that his friend was coming there to meet him toward evening, he despatched him into the kitchen, and from that moment felt himself quit of all responsibility as to his good conduct during the remainder of the afternoon. Mrs. Williams despatched her visitor into the garden to gather apples, and afterward was employed in eating two of the best, while he peeled the rest.

"You see," said gentle Mary Williams, "if you come from Devonshire I should really like to have your opinion on those yellow-skinned apples of ours. It's my belief as they're something in especial, and your county did ought to know a thing or two more about apples than most."

Jim munched away at the juicy fruit, but with a shade of dolefulness on his face. "I don't know about my county, ma'am; but it's my belief as for myself I knows nothing. If you want to learn anything, you just ask Mr. Wynn when he comes. He'll be able to tell you, 'I guess,' as he'd say himself. But for all he's so fond of talking about guessing, he's a fellow as does it less than anybody I ever met with. If he don't know a thing pat out, he says so, and don't give you something wrong to have sticking in your head for the rest o' your days."

Mrs. Williams raised her eyes from her pasteboard with an approving smile. She liked to hear people speak well of others. "You set great store by Mr. Wynn, I'm thinking," she said presently.

"And so I ought," was the emphatic answer,

"And there's finer folks than me as says they does the same, and them as did ought to be able to see further through a deal board nor I can; but if they don't look out there'll be ne'er a one of us will have him much longer to set store by."

And so the two chatted on, exchanging many a confidence, and growing into friendship, as the minutes passed, as quickly as Charles Wynn could wish. As he had said in his note, he was very anxious to secure good friends for the factory lad, remote from the evil influences that had gathered around him at Southford. As matters stood at present, the ex-tramp was beginning to feel greatly hampered by the charge he had taken upon himself. The busy mayor and manufacturer, quickly guessing that it would be so, had very soon left off making offers to relieve his new clerk of his self-imposed lodger.

"Wynn won't like to throw the young fellow off now that he has got such a wholesome hold upon him," said the mayor one day to Mr. Copleston. "I feel that Providence provided Blake in the nick of time to be the very rope we wanted to hold him by."

The equally busy vicar acquiesced in the idea, and so the restless-natured fellow was left alone to his monotonous day's toil, and his uncongenial evening companionship, till his whole being seemed to experience a sensation of suffocation. Providence helps us in every turn and point of our lives, but very seldom to the extent of relieving us of the necessity to take trouble ourselves.

RESURRECTION OF CHRIST.

S. S. Lesson for Dec. 10. Mark 16: 1-8. Golden Text, 1 Cor. 15: 20. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Women's Money Spent for Naught—A Visitor Before them at the Sepulchre—Mary Souls—She Came in Darkness—At Ease with Angels—The Recognized Voice—The Anticipation of Difficulty—The Messenger of the Resurrection and Ascension—When the Resurrection Power will be Fully known—Complete Self-Renunciation—Higher Ground Yet.

THE women who had followed the company which bore the body of Jesus to the grave, and with them the two Marys who had sat over against the sepulchre, "rested the Sabbath-day, according to the commandment." (Luke 23: 56). But "when the Sabbath was past, Mary Magdalene, and Mary the mother of James, and Salome had bought sweet spices, that they might come and anoint Him." But Jesus had been already anointed for His burial (Mark 14: 8), and in spite of all which He had said to them about it, no clear conception of His resurrection had really entered into their hearts; and thus they would deal with His body as Nicodemus had done, in the expectation that it would decay and become subject to corruption. They spent their money for naught; Jesus was already risen.

UNAIDED HE HAD RISEN.

conquered death, and destroyed "him that had the power of death, that is the devil" (Heb. 2: 14).

There was one who had been at the sepulchre before this little company, "Now when Jesus was risen early the first day of the week, He appeared first to Mary Magdalene, out of whom He had cast seven devils." Yes, she had not waited, like these women, for "the rising of the sun;" love to her great Deliverer had carried her to the sepulchre, "while it was yet dark," and she made the discovery that the stone was rolled away. O how many there are, who want to find Jesus as they have not yet found and known Him, and yet they are waiting till the way is made more easy, until more light is upon their path, until they have more people with them: there are few of the Mary souls who plunge into the darkness, and find that all which stood between them and Jesus is gone, "rolled away." Mary ran and told Peter and John; and they came, examined the sepulchre, and then turned away. But Mary could not turn away.

If we are right in presuming that she was the same Mary who had anointed Him for His burial, then, as she had understood His death she had also a more intelligent anticipation than they of

His resurrection. The stone rolled away meant more to her than to any other; and she could not leave the sepulchre as Peter and John had done, "they knew not the Scripture that He must rise again from the dead," but Mary knew something of it; she "stood without at the sepulchre, weeping," and then she stooped down and looked into the sepulchre, and saw there

WHAT THE DISCIPLES HAD NOT SEEN.

There were angels, heavenly messengers in that tomb and out of the grave of Jesus her Lord, they spoke and said, "Woman, why weepest thou?" And she, who once was the dwelling-place of seven devils, was at ease now with angels. She spoke on the theme which occupied all her heart, "They have taken away my Lord, and I know not where they have laid Him." "My Lord," He was hers in life or in death, and He was all in all to her.

"She turned herself back, and saw Jesus standing and knew not that it was Jesus." How should she? During that last week of continually augmenting suffering that holy face must have grown years older, and now, the burden was gone and the Man who stood before her had passed through death. She thought Him to be the gardener, and it needed His very voice to recall her: "Mary." It was enough: and her soul, full to overflowing, replied, "Rabboni." The trial of her faith was over. The very same Jesus stood before her, to whom she had ministered after He had done such great things for her. But she was not to touch Him, it was now to be faith, not sight, and Jesus charged her with a message to the disciples concerning His resurrection (John 20: 1-17).

O how different was the visit to the sepulchre of which we read in our subject for to-day. True Mary Magdalene had so far acted in unbelief as to join the other women in buying and preparing sweet spices to anoint Jesus; but she was already at the sepulchre before they had started on their way thither. To them the way was one of difficulty; "they said among themselves, Who shall roll us away the stone from the door of the sepulchre?" There are some believers who are always

ANTICIPATING DIFFICULTIES.

They dare not claim the promises of God for themselves, because they apprehend that they would be unable to retain the blessing which they would receive, they will not testify any blessing received, because either they are afraid of somebody expecting too much from them: or they fear it would cost them so much confusion and palpitation of heart as would make them uncomfortable. They will not stand out separate from the world in their outward life, because they are afraid of the contempt of those around them. "Who shall roll us away the stone?" is their hearts' constant language.

The women when they saw an angel in the tomb, were affrighted, they did not live as much in heaven's atmosphere as Mary did. The angel spoke to them, but he did not allay their fears. He said, "Ye seek Jesus of Nazareth, which was crucified: He is risen; He is not here; behold the place where they laid Him. But go your way, tell His disciples and Peter (Peter the poor backslider), that He goeth before you into Galilee: there shall ye see Him, as He said unto you." Circumstances had power over them, things were not as they had expected, they had not looked for an open, empty grave, and for the presence of an angel. All which Mary took so naturally and quietly startled them. "They went out quickly, and fled from the sepulchre; for they trembled and were amazed." They did not give the message with which the angel charged them, "neither said they anything to any man; for they were afraid."

This could not have been had they understood the teaching of their Lord. What was there to fear, if their Saviour lived? What ground had they to cause them to tremble and to be amazed? Surely none but their own unbelief! But Jesus is ever ready to meet His own children where they are, and to bring them nearer to Him. "As they went to tell His disciples, behold, Jesus met them, saying, All hail! And they came and held Him by the feet, and worshipped Him." (Matt. 28). Just that which Mary might not do, was permitted to her sisters who were weaker in the faith, she might not touch Him, but they might hold Him by the feet. O how we see here that faith is above feeling! Mary was not with herself. She had helped to buy and to prepare the spices, but she seems to have forgotten them when she started for the sepulchre; He alone, her Lord and Master, filled her thoughts. When she ran and told Peter and John that the stone was rolled away, the companionship of these disciples had no power to draw her away. She was like one alone, misunderstood by men, even by the first of the disciples, but absorbed with Jesus, and thus it came to pass that she was made the first messenger of the resurrection. Jesus said to her, "Go to My brethren, and say unto them, I ascend to My Father, your Father; and to My God, and your God." As she was the messenger of the resurrection, so was she of the ascension of Christ; she understood Him. Thousands of Christians are constantly occupied in seeking to understand their own experience, but perhaps only one in a thousand is really seeking to understand Jesus Himself. Jesus' dealings with me, with you, this is a common object of study; but Himself: O who understands Him? Alone among the crowds who had been healed and blessed by Him, alone among the many declared followers of Jesus, alone and apart from the twelve, there was but one Mary, but one soul who entered into the truth of the resurrection, when as yet no man knew it!

"But now is Christ risen from the dead, and become the firstfruits of them that slept." The Christ, the anointed One is risen from the dead, "death hath no more dominion over Him." (Rom. 6: 9). Until the Lord shall come again, and "we which are alive and remain unto the coming of the Lord . . . shall be caught up together with them (the dead in Christ who rise first) to meet the Lord in the air," we can never know fully

"THE POWER OF HIS RESURRECTION."

Sin has sown in us elements of decay which make death early begin his work, in taking down some of the pins of this our tabernacle (2 Peter 1: 14) but Jesus who Himself is Life, passed through the whole domain of death, Life has taken possession where death once held undisputed sway, and life for spirit, soul and body is in Him; who is in us if we believe. Now if a child of God must die, it is only that he may rise again, and pass from corruption to incorruption, from temporary death to endless life.

And if this is so for the body, how much more gloriously is it true for the soul. Self is the life of our human soul, everything takes a form for us as it touches ourselves; as it exalts, rejoices, grieves, pains, comforts, rights or wrongs ourselves. Now Jesus "pleased not Himself." (Rom. 15: 3). Before he called upon any of us to deny or ignore ourselves, He Himself led the way, and never was there a more complete than in the life of our Lord. And just as disease and death entering in, bring about dissolution in our physical man, so self is the element of dissolution in our moral and spiritual nature. Whatever there be of spiritual life in any of us who believe, it is another life entering into us, and unless our own life, our self yields before it, and takes the place of death, where it may not speak, or move, or be considered, the life of God cannot fill us. "Except a corn of wheat fall into the ground and die, it abideth alone, but if it die, it bringeth forth much fruit. He that loveth his life shall lose it, but he that hateth his life, (i.e., himself his own interests) in this world, shall keep it unto life eternal." (John 12: 24, 25).

We have yet to see the power of a band of men and women wholly yielded to the Lord, living without a self, or rather having only one Self among them, and that is Jesus! Men and women on whom temptations to self-interest fall powerless, who are proof against jealousy, who, being emptied of self, are filled with God! Praise God, for the disinterestedness of the Salvation Army, but Lord lead us higher, give us another Pentecost.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Later Intelligence Respecting the Relations of Austria and Russia, tends to discredit the rumors in circulation last week of a probability of war breaking out between the two countries. It is affirmed that both Herr Plener and the reporter of the Committee on the Foreign Office Budget, who at the sitting of the Austrian delegation in Pesth on Thursday, intimated the possibility of a war with Russia, are unofficial personages, and their utterances are not regarded as authoritative. The uneasy feeling has not wholly subsided, as the utterances, though made by unofficial persons, were of an extreme character and indicate a warlike spirit among the people.

The Activity in Socialistic Circles in Europe is observed in three centres. In France threatening letters have been sent to prominent members of the Legitimist party, and a dynamite bomb has been thrown into the house of one of the nobles. In Germany the police have found it necessary, under the Socialist law, to interdict the sale of a pamphlet, purporting to be a contribution on the labor question in the shape of two speeches delivered in the Reichstag. In Russia the students of the University of Kasan, in consequence of the severity of the police regulations, fomented disorders, and the university has been closed. Seventeen persons have been arrested in Odessa on suspicion of being Nihilists.

The Charges Against the Treasurer and managers of the funds of the Irish Land League are reiterated in the Press. It is asserted by an Irish writer that at least $565,000 of the sum sent from America and contributed by Irishmen in Ireland, is not accounted for. The entire amount was $1,224,100. Of this only about $423,000 is charged among the detailed expenses which with the expenses of organization and the balance handed over to the new league by Mr. Egan, leaves the amount above mentioned unaccounted for.

The Surrender of Three Cuban Political refugees to the Spanish Government by an English official, has led to a dispute between the two countries. It appears that the three men escaped from the custody of the police, and took refuge at Gibraltar with the intention of sailing for the United States. The Spanish Government, soon after their escape, notified the British authorities at Gibraltar that certain convicts might seek an asylum there and cautioned them to be on their guard against receiving them. There is an extradition treaty between Spain and England, but it does not apply to political offenders. The men ought, therefore, to have been held until some offence within the treaty was proved against them. Instructions to that effect were sent out from England, but before they arrived the Gibraltar officials had surrendered them, under the impression that they were correctly described by the Spanish Consul as escaped convicts. The British Government has now sent to Spain a courteous request for their return, but it has been refused. A war has in past times resulted from such a complication, but in this case it is believed that diplomatists will succeed in settling the difficulty.

In the Island of Jamaica a Manifestation of disaffection with British rule has reached a crisis. Dissatisfaction has been prevalent for a long time, owing to the practice of the British Government of sending out needy men from Great Britain to fill the remunerative posts in the civil service of Jamaica, although natives of the colony, well-fitted to perform the duties of the offices, could be appointed. The native civil servants complain that they are not promoted to the higher offices, but that when a vacancy occurs the Government sends a man out who has to be taught his duties. An additional cause of complaint has arisen out of a demand on the treasury of Jamaica, by the British Government, for a sum of money worth about $20,000 toward defraying the costs of an international dispute in which the island was involved. Public meetings are being held in every township in the colony, at which the government is denounced. These demonstrations are attended by planters, negroes, creoles, Europeans, freeholders, and laborers. The public meeting at Kingston City Hall on the 2d of November, was attended by over 3000 people of all colors, creeds, and classes, and the speeches were delivered by gentlemen representative of every interest in the colony.

The Cable Reports of Mr. D. L. Moody's serious illness, published by the daily journals, of which mention was made in these columns last week, happily prove to have been unfounded. Mr. Moody has, in reply to the sympathetic inquiries of his friends, sent word by cable that there is no foundation for the reports that he is suffering from nervous prostration. He is, he says, perfectly well. This is intelligence which will be very welcome to the many friends of the evangelist here, who, knowing the arduous labors he is performing in England, were prepared to credit the report of his breakdown.

The Turkish Astrologers Employed by the Sultan of Turkey, have been much disturbed by the appearance of the comet, which is looked upon as an ominous visitor, especially as it appears at a time when the Mahomedan world is looking for a Messiah. A letter from Constantinople, published in the New York Herald, says that the Sultan was not without an idea that he might in the end be recognized as the instrument for carrying out the Divine will. The calculations, it is said, had been going on swimmingly, when this large comet turned up so suddenly. All that the astrologers have been able to make out as yet is that it is of a most malignant aspect and bodes evil to some one or the other. Unlike the comet of last year, it stretches right across the eastern sky, and in the eyes of the magicians has somewhat the appearance of a broad-bladed, flaming sword.

A Modern Sir Walter Raleigh.—An Incident occurred in connection with the recent visit of the second son of Queen Victoria, and his wife, the Duchess of Edinburgh, to Bristol which must have reminded those who witnessed it of the famous story in English history of Sir Walter Raleigh and Queen Elizabeth. The heavy downpour of rain had rendered the streets very muddy, and upon the royal visitors arriving at Colston Hall a member of the Town Council, seeing that the Duchess, on alighting from her carriage, was about to step upon a very dirty pavement, pulled off his overcoat, and threw it down that she might use it as a carpet. The councillor doubtless was glad of the opportunity of thus proving his loyalty to the royal family, as well as of performing a graceful act of courtesy to a delicate lady. Christians are not often so ready to make sacrifices in proof of their loyalty to their Heavenly King.

A Mahomedan Patient's Gratitude.—The medical missionary at the Christian Hospital, Nazareth, relates the case of a young man from whom he extracted a large calculus. By the blessing of God on the means used, he made an excellent recovery. His sufferings were, as are those of all who are afflicted with that terrible malady, excruciating in the extreme. When he was released he felt as if he had come to a new state of life. His boundless gratitude made the name of Jesus to him sweeter than anything he had ever heard of before. On leaving, he showed the doctor a Napoleon, and said, "This is all I possess, and it is the sum of many farthings saved and earned by very hard labor, and for a long time I had it sewn to my breast as the most helpful friend I had. It is therefore not only the only money I possess, but it is what I have cherished as my most valued treasure. I wish to offer it to Jesus, the Good Physician." The man would not be contented until the physician accepted the gift in trust for the work of the Saviour.

The Marriage of Mr. William Bramwell Booth, eldest son of General Booth of the Salvation Army, and chief of its staff with Miss Florence Eleanor Soper, a young lady, who has acted as chief of the staff of the Army in Paris, controlled by Miss Booth was solemnized on October 12th. A wedding service was afterward conducted by the "General" in the Congress Hall, which was well filled despite the charge of a shilling for admission. The bridal party entered the hall in procession, and made its way to the platform, amid the cheering of the large assemblage and the waving of a forest of handkerchiefs. Previously the arrival was announced within doors by a man holding up a large poster with the words printed on it, "Behold the bridegroom cometh." On the right of the "General" was seated the bridegroom, and on the left the bride, a fair-haired girl, who wore no head-dress, and whose simple decoration was an orange-tinted flower in the neck of her plain blue dress. The bride and bridegroom subscribed to the articles of marriage which Salvation soldiers are required to acquiesce in before the General will marry them, and which declare that they marry "the better to serve and please God, and serve the interests of the Salvation Army," that they "will never try to prevent each other doing or giving anything that was in their power to do or to give to help the Army," and that they will "use all their influence with each other to promote constant and entire self-sacrifice for the salvation of the world."

The Confessional in Russia is thus Described by the Rev. H. Grattan Guinness who has recently paid a visit to Russia. He says: "I stood in St. Isaac's Cathedral, Moscow, close to a long line of intending communicants as they advanced one by one to the confessional, and observed what passed. The confession took place behind a screen near the altar. A stout, middle-aged priest, with long black hair, stood beside a small table on which lay a book and a crucifix. As each person advanced to make his confession he knelt for a moment before the crucifix, bowing his head to the ground. He then rose and held a whispered communication with the priest, which lasted but a few minutes, as the number seeking absolution was considerable. When the confession is conducted in a private house it sometimes lasts an hour, or even more. Confession over, the priest lifted the end of a broad band which he wore round his neck, embroidered with crosses and considered peculiarly sacred, and laying this on the head of the person who had confessed, he made the sign of the cross with his hand above it, saying, 'In the name of Jesus Christ, your sins be forgiven you.' Thereupon the person kissed the crucifix and retired."

A Corpse Literally Turned to Dust was found in a grave at Mirfield, England, a few weeks ago. Those who were present were forcibly reminded of the solemn words: "Dust thou art and unto dust shall thou return," which in this case were signally verified. A lady was interred in the graveyard of the parish church at Mirfield, Yorkshire, and she was placed in the grave of her father. It is exactly seventy-one years since he was buried, and all that long time the grave has never been interfered with for any purpose; a heavy old-fashioned slab-stone being placed over it at the time of interment. When the grave was opened last week, not a vestige of either the body or coffin remained: all that was left was a few handfuls of black mould. At that time bodies were placed much nearer the surface of the ground than they are at present, and that may have forwarded the process of decomposition.

Mrs. Amanda Smith is Carrying on a Most successful evangelistic work at Clay Ashland, St. Paul's River, Liberia. The Observer of Monrovia says she is "promoting a revival of religion and the cause of temperance in the settlement and vicinity of Clay Ashland."

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

THE NEW LORD MAYOR OF LONDON AND HIS PROCESSION.

THE LORD MAYOR OF LONDON.

An Ancient Office—Quaint Old Titles and Customs—The Ancient Water Pageant—Manner of Election—Inaugural Ceremonies—The Grand Banquet—The Newly-Chosen Official—His Honorable Career—Charities and Civic Offices—Christian Responsibility.

MR. HENRY EDWARD KNIGHT, the Alderman of the City of London, chosen to succeed to the Mayoralty for the ensuing year, was duly installed in office on November 9th, with the customary pageant and festivities. The office on which he entered is a very ancient as well as a very honorable one. In Saxon times the city was almost an independent state, and when William the Conqueror seized the country in 1066, he did not obtain possession of the City of London until he had made a separate treaty with its municipal officers. The Mayor was then called the Portreeve, which title was changed, by William, to the Norman title of Bailiff, and in 1189 that was again changed to Mayor.

The first holder of the new title was Henry Fitzalwyn, who filled the office for twenty-four years. On his death a new charter was granted, which directed that the Mayor be chosen annually, which has ever since been done, though in early times the same individual held the office more than once. A familiar instance is that of Whittington thrice Lord Mayor of London, and two instances have occurred in comparatively recent times, the latest being 1862, when Alderman Cubitt who filled the office in 1861 was re-elected. It was in 1354 that the Mayor of London received the royal permission to be called Lord Mayor. The title, however, does not include the right to sit in the House of Lords.

The Lord Mayor is elected by the corporation, not as with us by the direct vote of the people. He is always one of the aldermen. The aldermen were first appointed by Henry III. in 1242, and for 150 years were elected annually by the citizens but in 1394 King Richard II. issued a charter directing that an alderman when elected should hold the office for "the term of his natural life."

THE CEREMONY OF ELECTION.

The election of Lord Mayor takes place on September 29th. Anciently the ceremony took place on October 13th, but in 1546, the time was altered to Michaelmas Day by an Act of Common Council. The form observed is this: A precept is issued from the Mayor's Court to the several livery companies, requiring their attendance at Guildhall in their livery gowns and hoods, to go thence to St. Lawrence Jewry to attend Divine service, thence to elect Lord Mayor. The Lord Mayor for the current year, and sheriffs, go from the Mansion House in full state to the Guildhall, and are received by the aldermen and officers, and the business proceeds.

At the election, a nosegay is presented to each of the dignitaries by the hall-keeper. An imposing procession is then formed of all the chief officers and magistrates, who proceed to church. Formerly the Lord Mayor, aldermen, and sheriffs received the Sacrament of the Holy Communion on this day. At the close of the service, the sword-bearer, in the name of the Lord Mayor, invites the rector to dinner. Having returned to the Hall, the election goes on in a formal and dignified manner until completed.

THE OFFICE OF LORD MAYOR.

The dignity and power of the Lord Mayor as first city officer is very great. He becomes, when sworn in, the Queen's representative in the civil government of the city, and chief justice of the metropolis. The office is one of the most constant claims on the time of its holder, and such are the restraints of its duties during the year that whoever undertakes it usually arranges his commercial affairs so as to be able to withdraw his attention from them altogether and devote his whole time to the public service. A salary in some measure appropriate to the dignity of the office is annually allowed by the corporation, amounting to $40,000, beside the use of the magnificent Mansion House as a residence, and the splendid furniture and carriages which have been provided. In the case of liberal and hospitable Lord Mayors, this sum has been considerably below the actual expenditure, but with some it has been found sufficient, and a few have not nearly expended the amount voted for the support of the office.

LORD MAYOR'S DAY.

On November 9th, the newly-chosen Mayor enters into office. On that occasion he meets the aldermen, sheriffs, recorder, and other great officers at an early hour at the Guildhall, whence in the state carriages, attended by them in their respective carriages, he proceeds to Westminster Hall, where his lordship, after some ancient ceremonies, takes the prescribed oaths before the Barons of the Exchequer. He then passes with the recorder to each of the courts in the hall, and invites the several judges to dinner on that day, when he again returns to the city.

His lordship is preceded by the Artillery Company, next to which march the company of which he is a member, and then the other city companies in their regular order, with their distinguishing banners and bands of music; among the rest the armorers have usually men on horseback, completely equipped in various kinds of ancient armor. To these succeed the domestics and servants of the Lord Mayor, and then the state coach, finely ornamented with abundance of gilding, and so large as to contain between the seats two stools, on one of which, facing the door, sits the sword-bearer with the sword of state, and on the other the mace-bearer carrying the city mace. The train is closed by the carriages of the retired Lord Mayor, of the aldermen, the recorder, the sheriffs, the chamberlain, the common sergeant, the town clerk, and other great officers, and in this order the procession reaches the Guildhall.

ANCIENT CUSTOMS.

In ancient times, the procession known as "Lord Mayor's Show" was by water, when the old bridges, the quaint boats, the picturesque costume of the day, gave a character to the display which it can never again possess, for then the good citizens of London also devised pageants and allegorical tableaux, widely different from the "show" as it is now exhibited. One of the most stately and splendid of these fanciful exhibitions was that which ushered in the mayoralty of Sir John Chaplin, of the Clothworkers' Company, in 1677.

Fame was represented in her roofless temple, surrounded by personifications of "A minute, an hour, a day, a week, a month, and a year." The Minute was a little creature in a sky blue robe, painted all over with minute glasses of gold. Her fair hair was pressed down by a light coronet, with little globes of glass on the points. The Hour was a young girl, draped in maize-color, sprinkled with clocks and bells. Her hair was brown, she had a more sober face, and her coronet was composed of sundials. The Day was a handsome woman, in a skirt tinted like the dawn, her mantle was blue, like mid-day, and her hair black, with a coronet, half of silver, half of jet, to typify light and darkness.

A graceful virgin personified the week; she was arrayed in a robe of seven colors, with a silver mantle, dark brown hair, a gold coronet, and a black shield, with mystic characters graven on it. Next to her was a lady of larger size, "The Month of May," who has a light green robe, beautifully flowered, a silver mantle bordered with gold, a chaplet of blossoms, and a cornucopia in one hand, out of which she disperses the riches of the season.

Lastly, "a very lovely one" represented the Year—the period of the mayoralty—who had a close-fitting silk bodice, a skirt embroidered with the zodiacal signs, dark heavy tresses, and a graceful turban, and the Lord Mayor's standard in her hand. It will be noticed that not a little poetical fancy was exhibited in this pageant, and it was a spectacle at once rare and striking.

THE BANQUET AT THE GUILDHALL.

The day closes at the Guildhall by an entertainment of appropriate magnificence, at which it is common to see members of the royal family, the most distinguished public characters, and often the ambassadors of foreign courts. About a thousand individuals take their seats at this dinner, to which they are admitted by tickets from the Lord Mayor and sheriffs, who, in fixed proportions, bear the share of the expense, which generally amounts to about $15,000. The first Lord Mayor's banquet given in the present Guildhall, was by Sir John Shaw, who was knighted on the field of Bosworth. These gorgeous and extravagant banquets became at length so costly that in the reign of Philip and Mary a law was made to restrain the expense both of provisions and liveries; but the mayors, seems, did not regard it, for in 1544 an Order of Council was issued to remind the citizens of their relapse into luxury. The Lord Mayor's feast given to the King and Queen and royal family in 1727, cost no less than $24,450. That given in 1761 to George III. and Queen Charlotte cost $34,490.

At the inaugural banquet on November 9th, the great hall is brilliantly illuminated, carpeted, and adorned with evergreens. At five o'clock the Lord Mayor, in a rich state gown and collar, accompanied by the Lady Mayoress, who has her page and maids of honor, walks majestically into the Council Chamber, where the guests are to be received. Trumpeters and marshals and sword-bearers precede them, and the aldermen, in their gayest costume, bring up the rear. The Lady Mayoress takes her seat on the throne, which is placed on a raised dais at the end of the Council Chamber, while the Lord Mayor remains standing to receive his guests. When the dinner is announced, at seven o'clock, it is the duty of the Prime Minister to conduct the Lady Mayoress to her seat in the dining-hall. The trumpeters cause the ancient building to resound with melody while the guests are taking their places; a band discourses sweet music during the dinner, after which speeches are made, among them a speech from the Prime Minister, which is always anticipated with interest. This is chiefly occasioned by the fact that frequently the Prime Minister discusses on the occasional events which occur after Parliament is prorogued, which generally happens in July, and sometimes he takes the opportunity to express his intentions as to his future policy.

THE SOVEREIGN OF THE CITY.

During his year of office the state observed by the Lord Mayor at his official residence, the Mansion House, is almost regal. Certainly no subject of Queen Victoria maintains an equal amount of courtly ceremony, nor can the state banquets of the greatest of English nobility surpass in splendor the princely entertainments continually furnished by the sovereign of the city.

Mr. Alderman Knight, the newly-chosen Lord Mayor whose portrait appears on our front page, was born on March 25th, 1833. He was the youngest son of the late Mr. J. W. Knight, of St. Albans. He was educated at the City of London School, where his scholastic diligence gained for him honors in all the classes he passed through. He commenced his business life with the firm of Messrs. George Brettell & Co., of Wood Street, hosiery manufacturers and exporters, whose goods are well known in the American market, but soon afterward started on his own account in Love Lane, London, and has there built up a most successful and extensive business. He was annually chosen a member of the Common Council for the ward of Cripplegate Within from 1867 to 1874, in which latter year, upon the death of one of the aldermen of the ward, he was unanimously elected alderman of the ward he had served for seven years in the Council.

MUNICIPAL HONORS AND SERVICES.

He has largely contributed to the prosperity of his ward by the erection of several fine blocks of warehouses. In his capacity as Chairman of the Improvement Committee of the Commission of Sewers he was greatly instrumental in promoting improvements in several important streets; and as Chairman of the Improvement Committee of the Corporation, he successfully carried through several delicate and difficult negotiations. He has served on many other corporation committees, and was Chairman of the City of London School Committee in 1869, being the first old pupil of the school to attain that position.

He filled the office of Sheriff in 1875-6, and among other notable events of his shrievalty was reception banquet and ball given in the Guildhall in May to the Prince of Wales upon his return from India. He is a man of large and liberal charity, and has been a conspicuous supporter of the charitable institutions of the city, and as Chairman of the Governors of Lady Holles's Schools has been eminently successful in the establishment of a large middle-class school for girls. He is also Chairman of the Governors of the Hampton Grammar Schools, and has resuscitated old educational downfalls at Hampton; and in addition to a public elementary school has erected a first-class grammar school for over 200 boys. He is a member of three livery companies—the spectacle-makers, the fruiterers, and the linens.

He has been twice married, and has a large family by his first wife, but no children by his present wife. He has travelled considerably abroad, and last year made a lengthened tour throughout the United States and Canada. He is highly esteemed and held in the warmest regard by his ward, and has established a successful Ward Club for the purpose of affording social intercourse among its members. He is a conscientious and consistent member of the Episcopal Church.

It may be hoped that in his exalted and influential position he may be enabled so to act as to move, before the millions of critical observers, at the influence of vital godliness does not incapacitate any man from fulfilling ably the functions of his high office, and that it is possible to faithfully discharge the duties intrusted to him, while respectably maintaining the consistency of his Christian character.

"NO FEAR."

A Temperance Appeal.

JACK PENNY is a man who uses the liquor freely, and who never attempts to disguise the fact. He steps as naturally into the tavern as to his own front door. He takes his two, three, or, five glasses a day as easily as his wife takes her cup of tea. Sometimes he drinks more. He drinks when the fit takes him. A fancy, a notion, that a glass of ale would not come amiss, is immediately acted upon. He never reasons about it, or gives himself the trouble to count the number of his glasses. He thirsts, he drinks, he pays, he goes his way, and then dismisses the matter from his mind.

Jack has been reasoned with. He has been told of the danger of his mode of life. To his face he has been compared to a ship drifting upon the rocks. He has been urged to abandon his free use of stimulants. Words both mild and strong have been heaped upon his devoted head.

But Jack would simply answer with a short, indolent laugh, "No fear."

And this was the full extent of his reply. He never cared to argue the matter. He would never promise to think of it. He would never pay any very earnest attention. All that could be got from him were these two short words, "No fear."

Now, I am far from saying that all who use this expression of Jack's are equally brainless. I am persuaded that many are not. And it is with this conviction stamped deeply into my mind that I address such, who, with him, are in the habit of saying, "No fear."

Let us expand this saying a little—

"I am a man who can handle strong drink without any possibility of mischief. I can drink and sink with absolute impunity. I fear no ill results. There is no reason to fear such results. Here is 'no fear' whatever."

Friend, so others have said, and yet they have fallen. They have used language as strong as our own. They have laughed as incredulously at you. But, where are they now? Untraceable, any of them. When last seen, they were on the very skirts of darkness. They were about to plunge into its awful depths.

Alas! They are unrecognizable now. Ragged, hungry, wretched, mingling with other outcasts, unless, many of them are literally sighing for death. Life is to them too weary a burden to be borne. And with the unceasing craving upon them, and their inability to give it only the minutest satisfaction, who can wonder at it? "No fear," they said one and all, but there was cause for fear, nevertheless.

In what are you better than they? They were as honest as you, without doubt. They really believed that there was no cause for fear. They deemed their advisers as silly and old-womanish, as you think yours to be at this present moment. They were equal to you in force of will. And, when warned, they drank no more than you. Their outward circumstances were no more unfavorable than yours. You may call them weak-minded, or by any other term of contempt you please, but, I assure you, they were your equals in every respect. You may say mockingly, "No fear," but, believe me, you are no better than they were before they fell. If they were no match for the drink, is it not a trifle presumptuous for you to think you are?

And, let me tell you, that if you do not fear for yourself, others are fearing for you. You may laugh lightly and say, "No fear," but others are shaking their heads dismally as though they foreboded future trouble. And they are the people, too, who know you best. Ask your wife whether she fears or not. If you could see her red and swollen eyes sometimes, and hear the sobbing that made them so, you would perhaps begin to doubt whether you were really in the right.

Discretion is the better part of valor, Jack Penny. This is another thought worth pondering. Granted, for once, that the risk you are running is but small, that you occupy a surer and safer position than any other mortal on the earth, and that you are better qualified than any one else to measure your strength with the drink, you cannot deny that it is better to be quite out of the reach of danger than even to be but a step within the danger line, where, at least, a chance shot may reach you. If duty called you to the conflict, the matter would be very different. But when it is a mere question of choice, and nothing is to be gained by it, not even honor, why run the risk? And if in your view discretion be the better part of valor, how much more so in mine, for I count the risk at a much higher rate?

"No fear?" I say there is not only fear that your earthly prospects will be blasted, but your eternal ones too. You don't find that the public-house and God's house go well together, to judge by your neglect of the latter. And neither does anybody else. It is impossible to put the soul in its right and lawful position if your heart is always in the public-house. "Where your treasure is, there will your heart be also."

O, Jack, eternity is very long, and your soul is very precious, and time is very short, and the judgment is very strict. "Why will ye die?"

A BELFAST PROFESSOR ON PROPHECY.

By the Rev. Professor Murphy, D.D., LL.D., Before the General Assembly's College, Belfast.

THE opening lecture of the session 1822-3 was delivered in the hall of the Gamble Library, on November 7th, by the Rev. Professor Murphy, D.D., LL.D., the subject being "A Time, Times, and Half a Time."

Professor Murphy said: "We may sum up the conclusions to which the time and times, and half a time appear to lead, omitting those that are past.

In 1897, the period of the Mahomedan horn scattering the power of the holy people appears to come to an end. The Turkish Empire will soon cease to have a place and a part in European politics, and be "broken without hand." Subsequently will come a sifting process among the Jews, during which the wicked are severed from the wise, who come to understand what they have long misunderstood—the signs of the times and the revelations of the New Testament. And at last will come the time of which the angel says to Daniel, "Happy is he that waiteth and cometh to the thousand three hundred and five and thirty days." This is the time when at length

THE SANCTUARY WILL BE CLEANSED.

There is much implied in this. I do not see how we can understand less by it than this, that then at length the Jews, or the great majority of them, will look back over the wanderings of nineteen centuries, "Behold the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world," and acknowledge, with mingled emotions of thankfulness, sorrow, and gladness, Jesus, the Messiah, the Son of David, the seed of the woman, the Son of God, "Who bore our griefs and carried our sorrows, upon whom the Lord laid the iniquity of us all." Then will they have come unto Mount Zion indeed, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem, to myriads of angels, to the Church of the firstborn who are written in heaven, to God, the Judge of all, to the spirits of just men made perfect, to Jesus, the Mediator of the new covenant, and to the blood of sprinkling that speaketh better things than that of Abel. And then will they, with unspeakable joy and hope, set themselves to build the old wastes, to raise up the former desolations, to repair the waste cities, the desolations of many generations.

At the auspicious finale in the Eastern world, will seemingly come in the West, the battle of the great day of God Almighty, when "the beast was taken, and with him the false prophet that wrought miracles before him, with which he deceived them that had received the mark of the beast and them that worshipped his image. These both were cast alive into the lake of fire burning with brimstone." Then follow in the apostle's vision the binding of Satan and of the Most High for a thousand years. My young friends, you stand on the vantage ground attained by all the past ages of the Churches. Whether as the future ministers or members of the Church, this theme is intensely interesting to you.

The very period of 1260 years, which we have been considering, had not commenced to run in its earliest form when Porphyry was born, and in its latest application is not yet exhausted. In like manner, the Prophet of the New Testament speaks not only of this famous period, but of a thousand years subsequent to its close, toward which we are approaching. There is, therefore, prediction in abundance as yet awaiting its times, and prediction already verified.

THE MAHOMMEDAN DELUSION is nearly at the end of its work. The Turkish power has undergone remarkable changes within the memory of the present generation. In 1827, Greece was cut off from Turkey, and erected into an independent kingdom. In 1875 the Berlin Congress confirmed the separation of Herzegovina, Servia, Bulgaria, and other provinces from Turkey, in addition to its eastern losses through the war with Russia. At the same time Cyprus was ceded in some form, and a protectorate over Asia Minor granted to England. Since that date Thessaly has been transferred to Greece. It is evident that the dismemberment of this Eastern Power is going on at a rapid pace.

The Jews are awaiting their destiny. It will not be altogether such as they expect. The only event regarding them at present is the persecution they are undergoing in Russia. The fugitives escaping from this barbarous treatment are received with sympathy by many in this country, and helped on their way—many of them, strangely enough, to the Western hemisphere. This disturbance may lead these scattered wanderers to consider their ways, to ponder over the New Testament, and to confess at length that Jesus of Nazareth is the Messiah.

THE DOOM OF ANTICHRIST.

These facts and many others that will recur to the reflecting mind impress upon us the duty of studying prophecy, that we may understand the times, and know what Israel ought to do. History has at length elucidated the pages of prophecy; and there is really nothing to hinder the earnest and candid enquirer arriving at the great leading events that are still in the womb of the future. The churches that are conformed to the mind of the Spirit in the Word of God are wonderfully awake and alert in the cause of salvation. The world is now open to the evangelist, the preacher of the everlasting Gospel; and it is a happy coincidence that there is a corresponding measure of response in the Church. The time for the study of prophecy is well-nigh ended. The time for action is now upon us.

HOLY festivities to-day. We gather other sheaves into the spiritual garner. The decorations on platform and galleries with which we celebrated the coming in of the temporal harvests, when we were gathered last Thursday are still kept in their places as symbols of a more glorious spiritual harvest—the coming in of great church prosperities. Another large group added to this membership. On the church roll now the names of about 2800 souls. Our joy is like the joy of heaven. Spread the banquet, fill all the chalices. We are not to-day at the funeral of a dead Christ; we are celebrating the marriage of the King's Son.

It was

in English history when Queen Elizabeth visited Lord Leicester at Kenilworth Castle. The clocks in all the towers and throughout the castle were stopped at the moment of her arrival, so continuing to point to that moment as the one surpassing all others in interest. The doors of a great banquetting hall were opened. The queen marched in to the sound of the trumpeters. Four hundred servants waited upon the guests. It was a scene that astonished all nations when they heard of it. Five thousand dollars a day did the banquet cost as it went on day after day. She was greeted to the palace gates with floating islands, and torches and the thunders of cannon, and fireworks that set the night ablaze, and a burst of music that lifted the whole scene into enchantment. Beginning in that way, it went on from joy to joy, and from excitement to excitement, and from rapture to rapture. That was the great banquet that Lord Leicester spread in Kenilworth Castle.

Cardinal Wolsey entertained the French ambassadors in Hampton Court. The best cooks of all the land provided for the table. The guests were kept hunting in the parks all the day so that their appetite might be keen, and then in the evening hour they were shown into the banquetting hall, the table aglitter with imperial plate and ablush with the very costliest wines, and the second course of that feast was made of food in all shapes, of men and birds and beasts, and dancing groups, and jousting parties riding upon each other with uplifted lances. Lords and princes and ambassadors, their cups gleaming to the brim, drank first to the health of the King of England, and then to the health of the Emperor of France. That was the banquet that Cardinal Wolsey spread in Hampton Court.

But to-day, my brothers and sisters, I invite you to

A GRANDER ENTERTAINMENT.

My Lord, the King, is the banqueter. Angels of God are the cupbearers, all the redeemed are the guests; the halls of eternal love frescoed with light, and paved with joy, and curtained with unfading beauty are the banquetting place, the harmonies of eternity are the music, the chalices of God are the plate, and I am one of the servants come out with invitations to all the people, and oh, that you might break the seal of the invitation and read written in ink of blood and with the tremulous hand of a dying Christ: "Come, come, for all things are now ready."

Sometimes there have been great disappointment at a banquet. The wine has given out, or the servants have been rebellious, or the lights have failed; but I walk all around the banquetting table of my Lord to-day, and I find everything complete, and I swing open the door of this banquetting house and I say: "All things are ready, now ready."

I. Illustrating my text, I go on and in the first place say that the Lord Jesus CHRIST IS READY.

Cardinal Wolsey did not come into the banquetting hall until the second course of the feast, and when he entered booted and spurred, all the guests arose and cheered him; but I have to tell you that our banqueter, the Lord Jesus Christ, comes in at the beginning of the feast. Ay, He has been waiting for His guests, waiting for some of them 1882 years, waiting with mangled feet, waiting with hand on the punctured side, waiting with hand on the lacerated temples,

WAITING, WAITING!

Wonder it is that the banqueter did not get weary and say: "Shut the door, and let the laggard stay out." No, He has been waiting. How much He is in earnest. Shall I show you? I gather up all the tears that flooded His cheek in sympathy, all the blood that channeled His brow and back and hand and foot to purchase our redemption. I gather up all the groans coming from midnight chill and mountain hunger and desert loneliness, and I put them into one bitter cry—I gather up all the pangs that shot from cross and spike and spear, into one groan—I take one drop of sweat on His brow and I put it under the glass of the Gospel, and it enlarges to lakes of sorrow, to oceans of agony. That Christ to-day, emaciated and worn and weary, comes here, and with a pathos in which every word is a heartbreak and every sentence a martyrdom, He says to you and He says to me: "Come, come, for all things are now ready."

Ahasuerus made a feast that lasted 180 days. This lasts forever. Lords and princes were invited to that. You and I are invited to this. Yes, He has been waiting, He is waiting now. Other kings wrap themselves in robes of beauty and power before they come into a banquet. So does Christ. Oh, He is the fairest of the fair. In His hand is the omnipotent surgery that opened blind eyes and straightened crooked limbs and hoisted the pillars of heaven, and swung the twelve gates which are twelve pearls.

Oh, what a Christ—a Christ of beauty, a Christ of power. There are not enough cups on earth to dip up this ocean of beauty. There are not ladders to scale these heights of love. Oh, Thou flower of eternity, Thy breath is the perfume of heaven. Oh, Thou daybreak of the soul, let all nations clap their hands in Thy radiance. Chorus! Come men and angels and cherubim and seraphim and archangel, all heights, all depths, all immensities. Chorus! Roll on through the heavens in chariot of universal acclaim, over bridges of hosanna, under arches of coronation, by the towers chiming with eternal jubilee. Chorus! Unto Him that loved us and washed us from our sins in His own blood, and made us kings and priests unto God, to Him be glory.

Ah! there is

that I would like to write; but I have no sheet fair enough to write it on, and there is no pencil good enough to inscribe it. Give me a sheet from the heavenly records, and some pencil used by angel in describing a victory, and then with hand struck by supernatural energy, and with pencil dipped in the everlasting morning, I will write it out in capitals of love: J-E-S-U-S Jesus! It is this One that is waiting for you and for me, for we are on the same platform before God.

It is this One that is waiting for you and waiting for me. How long He waited for me! How long He has waited for you! Waiting as a banqueter waits for his delayed guests, the meats smoking, and beakers brimming, and the minstrel with his finger on the stiff string ready to strike at the first clash of the the hoofs at the gateway. Waiting as a mother waits for her boy that ten years ago went off dragging her bleeding heart after him. Waiting. Oh, can you not give me some comparison intense enough, importunate enough, high as heaven, deep as hell, and vast as eternity? Not expecting that you can help me with such a comparison, I simply say He is waiting as only an sympathetic Christ knows how to wait for a wandering soul.

"Bow the knee and kiss the Son,
Come and welcome, sinner, come."

II. But I remark again, not only Christ is waiting, but

THE HOLY SPIRIT IS WAITING.

Why are some sermons a dead failure? why are there songs that do not get their wing under the people? why are there prayers that go no high up than a hunter's halloo? Because there is a missing link that only the Holy Spirit can make. If that spirit should come through this assembly, this morning, there would be a power felt like that when Saul was unhorsed on the road to Damascus, like as when Lydia's heart was broken in his fine story, like as when three hundred souls were lifted out of midnight into midnoon at the pe-tecost.

Do you notice that sometimes that Spirit takes an insignificant agency to save a soul? I think is very often that at just one passage of Scripture just one word of Scripture, a soul is saved because the Holy Spirit gives it supernatural power. I you know what it was that saved Martin Luther? It was that one verse: "The just shall live by faith." Do you know what it was that brought Augustine from his horrible dissipations? It was that one verse: "Put ye on the Lord Jesus Christ and make not provision for the flesh, to fulfil the lusts thereof." Do you know what it was that saved Hedley Vicars, the celebrated soldier? It was the one passage: "Believe in the Lord Jesus Christ and thou shalt be saved." Do you know what it was that brought Jonathan Edwards to Christ? It was the one passage: "Now unto Him be glory forever and ever."

ONE THANKSGIVING MORNING

in this church I read my text, "Oh, give thanks unto the Lord, for He is good," and a young man stood in the gallery and said to himself: "I have never rendered one acceptable offering of gratitude to God in all my life. Here, Lord, I am Thine forever." By that one passage of Scripture he was brought into the kingdom, and if I might tell my own experience I might tell how one Sabbath afternoon I was brought to the peace of the Gospel by reading of the Syrophenician's cry to Christ where she said: "Even the dogs eat of the crumbs that fall from the master's table." Philosophic sermons never saved anybody. Metaphysical sermons never saved anybody. An earnest plea going right out of the heart blessed of the Holy Ghost, that is what saves, that is what brings people into the kingdom of Christ.

I suppose the worldly thought that Thomas Chalmers preached great sermons in his early ministry, but Thomas Chalmers says he never preached at all until he came out of his sick room, and weak and emaciated, he stood and told the story of Christ to the people, and in the great day of eternity it will be found that not so much the eloquent sermons brought men to Christ as the story told, perhaps, by those who were unknown on earth, the simple story of the Saviour's love and mercy, sent by the power of the Holy Ghost straight to the heart. Come, Holy Ghost. Ay, He is here this morning. He fills all the places. Did I say Christ was ready? I tell you the Holy Ghost is ready.

III. Then I go on and tell you

THE CHURCH IS READY.

There are those here who say: "No one cares for my soul." We do care for it. You see a man bowing his head in prayer and you say: "That man is indifferent." That man bows his head in prayer that the truth may go to every heart. The air is full of prayers. They are going up this morning from this assembly. Hundreds of prayers straight to the throne of a listening God. The air is full of prayers—prayers ascending noon by noon from Fulton Street prayer meeting, Friday night by Friday night all over this land, going up from praying circles. Yea, there is not a minute of an hour of any day that there are not supplications ascending to the throne of mercy. The church is ready.

And if you should this morning start for your father's house, there would be hundreds and thousands in this assemblage who would say if they knew it: "Make room for that man, make room for him at the holy sacrament; bring the silver bowl for his baptism; give him full right to the privileges of the church of Jesus Christ." Oh, I know there are those who say the church is a mass of hypocrites, but they do not really think so. It is a glorious church. Christ purchased it. Christ built it. Christ swung all its gates. Christ curtained it with upholstery crimson with crucifixion carnage. Come into it. Come into it. I do not pick out this man or that man and say: "You may come." I say all may come—whosoever will. "Come with us and we will do you good. The Lord hath promised good concerning Israel."

"We are a garden walled around
Chosen and made peculiar ground,
A little plot enclosed by grace
Out of the world's wild wilderness."

Do not say you have never been invited. I invite you now to the King's feast. One and all. All!

IV. But I go further and tell you that

THE ANGELS ARE READY.

Some people think when we speak about angels we are getting into the region of fancy. They say it is very well for a man when he has just entered the ministry to preach about the angels of heaven, but after he has gone on further it is hardly worth while. My friends, there is not any more evidence in the Bible that there is a God than that there are angels. Did they not swarm around Jacob's ladder? When Lazarus' soul went up did they not escort it? Did not David say: "The chariots of God are twenty thousand, even thousands of angels." Are they not represented as the chief harpists of the judgment day? Did not one angel one night slay 180,000 of Sennacherib's troops? Oh, yes, our world is in communication with two other worlds; heaven and hell. All that communication is by angels. When a bad man is to die, a man who has despised God and rejected the Gospel, the bad spirits come upon sulphurous wings and they shackle him, and they try to push him off the precipices into the ruin, and they lift a guffaw of diabolical exultation. But there is a line of angels, bright and beautiful and loving angels, mighty angels, reaching all the way from earth to heaven, and when others gather like them I suppose the air is full of them. They hover. They hover about. They push down iniquity from your heart. They are ready to rejoice.

LOOK! THERE IS AN ANGEL

on the throne of God. One moment ago, it was God before Christ and heard the doxology of the leemed. It is here now. Bright immortal, what comes from the golden city? Speak, spirit blest. The answer comes melting on the air: "Come, come, for all things are now ready." Angels ready to bear the tidings. Angels ready to drop the benediction. Angels ready to kindle the joy. All ready. Ready, cherubim and seraphim. Ready, thrones and principalities and powers. Ready, Michael the archangel.

V. Yes, I go further and say that your

GLORIFIED KINDRED ARE READY.

I have not any sympathy with modern spiritualism. I believe it is born in perdition. When I see it ravages it makes with human intellects, when it sees the homes that it has devastated, when I see the bad morals that very often follow in its wake, I have no faith in modern spiritualism. I think John Milton and George Whitefield have not anything better to do than to crawl under Rochester's wheels and rattle the leaves they had better stay in glory.

But the Bible distinctly teaches that the glorified heaven are in sympathy with our redemption. There is joy in heaven among the angels of God for one sinner that repenteth, and if the angels do it, do not our departed kindred there hear it? There are those there who toiled for your salvation, and when they bade you good-by in the last hour, they said, "Meet me in heaven," there was hovering over the pillow the awful possibility that they might not meet. But oh, the paths when that hand was thrust out from the cover, and they said good-by.

FOR HOW LONG GOOD-BY WAS IT?

Now, suppose you should pass into the kingdom of God this morning. Suppose you should say: "I'm done with the sins of this world. Fie upon all these follies. O Christ! I take Thee now, I take Thy service, I respond to Thy love, Thine am I forever"—why, before the tear of repentance had dried on your cheek, before your first prayer had closed, the angel standing with message for thy soul, would cry upward, "He is coming!" and angels poised mid-air would cry upward: "He is coming!" and all along the line of light from doorway to doorway, from wing tip to wing tip, the news would go upward until it reached the gate, and then it would flash to the house of many mansions, and find your kindred out, and those before the throne would say: "Rejoice with me, my prayers are answered. Give me another harp with which to strike the joy. Saved, saved, saved!"

VI. Now, my friends, if Christ is ready, and the Holy Ghost is ready, and the church is ready, and the angels of God are ready, and your glorified kindred are ready,

ARE YOU READY?

I give with all the emphasis of my soul the question: "Are you ready?" If you do not get into the King's feast it will be because you do not accept the invitation—earnest invitation. Arm stretched out soaked with blood from elbow to finger-tip, lips quivering in mortal anguish, two eyes beaming everlasting love while He says: "Come, come, come, for all things are now ready."

At Kenilworth Castle, I told you, they stopped the clocks when Queen Elizabeth arrived, that the hand of time might point to that moment as the one most significant and tremendous; but if this morning, the King should enter the castle of your soul, well might you stop all the clocks and have the finger of time pointing to this moment as the one most stupendous in all your life. Would that I could come all through these aisles and all through these galleries, not addressing you perfunctorily, but taking you by the hand as a brother takes a brother by the hand, and saying to one and all, to each: "Come, come, the door is open, enter now and sit down at the feast."

Old man, God has been waiting for thee long years. Would that some tear of repentance might trickle down thy wrinkled cheek. Has not Christ done enough in feeding thee and clothing thee all these years to win from thee one word of gratitude? Come, all the young. Christ is the fairest of the fair. Wait not until thy heart gets hard. Come, the furthest away from Christ.

Drunkard, Christ can put out the fire of that thirst. He can restore thy broken home. He can break that shackle. Come now, to-day, and get His pardon and its strength. Libertine, Christ knew where you were last night. He knows all the story of thy sin. Come to Him this day. He will wash away thy sin and He will throw around thee the robe of His pardon. Harlot, thy feet foul with hell, thy laughter the horror of the street—O Mary Magdalen! Christ waits for thee.

And the one furthest off, further than any I have mentioned, a case not so hopeful as any I have mentioned:

SELF-RIGHTEOUS MAN,

feeling thyself all right, having no need of Christ, no need of pardon, no need of help—O self-righteous man! dost thou think in those rags thou canst enter the feast? Thou canst not. God's servant at the gate would tear off thy robe and leave thee naked at the gate. O self-righteous man! the last to come. Come to the feast. Come, repent thy sin. Come, take Christ for thy portion.

Day of grace going away. Shadows on the cliff reaching further and further over the plain. The banquet has already begun. Christ has entered into that banquet to which you are invited. The guests are taking their places. The servant of the King has his hand on the door of the banqueting room, and he begins to swing it shut. Now is

YOUR TIME TO GO IN.

Now is my time to enter. I must go in. You must go in. He is swinging the door shut. Now, it is half shut. Now, it is three-fourths shut.

Now, it is just ajar. After a while, it will be forever shut!

"Why will ye waste on trifling cares
That life which God's compassion spares?
While in the endless round of thought
The one thing needful is forgot."

A Cow Devoted to Foreign Missions by its owner has added $300 to the receipts. At the recent meeting of the American Board at Portland it was related that a late Christian lady of Maine some years prior to her death had been in the habit of selling the milk from one cow and depositing the amount from year to year in the savings bank. When she was dying she said the gross sum had been laid aside for foreign missions. This widow's mite when given in at Portland amounted to $300. Secretary Alden related the incident in the public meeting. He said: "It is always so. Whatever is done for missions, or wherever it is done, the spirit of some self-sacrificing woman will be found coming to the front!"

Why the Steamer Cedar Grove Foundered is explained by Mr. A. W. Masters, her chief-officer. She was bound from London to Halifax, N. S., but on November 29th she went ashore during a tempestuous gale on a stony ledge called Walker's reef, about seventy miles from Halifax. She struck the ledge in the night, and the terror of the passengers and crew and the general confusion is described as appalling. The captain, however, retained his presence of mind and ordered the three boats lowered. Two of these boats arrived safely at Halifax, and the third boat was picked up by a passing steamer; but the captain of the Cedar Grove and six men are missing, and are believed to have gone down with the vessel. Mr. Masters attributes the loss of the steamer Cedar Grove to a disturbance or disarrangement of the compasses by local attraction. He says that compasses are more liable to error in new steamers than in older vessels. He says that if the steamer had been steered on the course indicated by the compass she would have made Sambro. It is not surprising that the calamity should have occurred if the compasses were disarranged by the local causes the officer mentions. In human affairs too many a life has been wrecked owing to the conscience, the guide God has given us, having been warped and deflected by the influence of our surroundings.

A Scottish Teetotal Judge Made at a Recent Gospel Temperance meeting in Dundee, the following statement of the circumstances which led him to become an abstainer: "Being a member of the Town Council of Dundee, I was appointed to the magistracy. It was my duty to occupy the bench in the police court. It was the scenes in the police court that made me an abstainer. Drunkenness has two sides; one attractive and fascinating, where everything is bright, and there is an outward appearance of comfort; the other side is seen when the victim's head becomes cool, and there is a reaction. I saw the results of drinking in that aspect, and the argument of personal abstinence was borne in upon me with a force I dare not resist. Many people were placed at that bar who had been taken off the streets drunk. What was I to do with them; was I to send them to jail, or fine them? If they came there for the first time I might earnestly admonish them not to come back again, and that it would be better for them to abstain altogether. But what right had I to tell these people to abstain if I took drink myself; my tongue seemed tied. If it was good for these people to abstain, might they not say, 'Why not begin yourself?' I did so, and from that time I became an abstainer, and I will continue."

THE COMING KINGDOMS AND THE COMING KINGS.

By Nathaniel Starkey.

THIS bride for Jehovah's Son shall not consist of such as our first parents when they came fresh from their Maker's hand. Good indeed, good as Omnipotence could make them, and by Him pronounced "very good," men in stature, but babes without experience. Rather shall they be a race of men, matured men, overcomers, conquerors, kings, who by contact and contest with evil, shall have conquered and overcome evil with good, and so have gained the inestimable boon of experience. For they must obtain authority over self, sin, and Satan here, ere they can exercise authority over two, five, or ten cities hereafter, whatever that may mean. They must learn to be true worshippers here, ere, as kingly priests, they can teach others to worship truly hereafter. And so Joseph must be first schooled in Potiphar's house, then in prison, and then on Pharaoh's throne; Moses must be first schooled in the Court of Egypt, then in the Desert of Midian, then as leader and commander of the people; and David must be first schooled by Saul, hunted like a partridge on the mountains, and then occupy Israel's splendid throne for the space of forty years.

THE MARRIAGE PERIOD.

But the long week of sore travail and salutary discipline will have an end. It has been long written, "The night is far spent, the day is at hand," and with the day shall come that kingdom which shall be an age-lasting kingdom, and the presence of the king shall make it day. And when about six thousand years of sin, sadness, and sorrow, shall have been filled full to the brim, the Master of the feast Himself shall come, and turn our water into wine, and send forth the proclamation, "Gather My saints together unto Me, those that have made a covenant with Me by sacrifice," for "the marriage of the Lamb is come, and His wife hath made herself ready," and "blessed are they which are called to the marriage supper of the Lamb." Then shall the righteous dead awake and come forth from the dust of the ages past; then Abel and Noah shall awake from their long sleep of death, and together with the watching and waiting ones then alive and remaining over, shall be changed in a moment and caught away to meet the Lord in the air, and so to be ever with the Lord.

THE TRANSLATION.

This event some of us have learned to look for daily, believing that it will take place before the period already spoken of (assigned for the development and destruction of the man of sin) because the Man-child is caught up unto God and to His throne prior to the time, times, and half a time, wherein the remnant of the woman's seed are nourished in the wilderness from the face of the serpent.

Then, after the bride has been with the Bridegroom some three years and a half (during which time that Scripture shall be fulfilled, "I will overturn, overturn, overturn, until He shall come, whose right it is, and I will give it Him")—at the close of this period He shall appear on the clouds of heaven, in power and great glory, for the destruction of enemies, and the establishment of His own kingdom upon the ruin of Satan's empire, for the dethronement of the usurper, and the enthronement of earth's rightful King and Lord. Then shall "the Lord God give unto Him the throne of His father David, and He shall reign over the house of Jacob forever, and of His kingdom there shall be no end;" for so runs the Father's decree, "Yet have I set My king upon My holy hill of Zion," and to the Son He saith, "Ask of Me and I will give Thee the heathen for Thine inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for Thy possession."

The heathen here asked for inheritance, and the uttermost parts of the earth for possession, surely declares, clearly as words can.

THE UNIVERSALITY OF CHRIST'S KINGDOM, when the knowledge of the Lord shall fill the earth as the waters cover the sea—that kingdom for which men have been so long praying with more or less intelligence of the prayer, "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth, as it is done in heaven," for "He shall have dominion from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth. Yea, all kings shall fall down before Him, all nations shall call Him blessed." For then, shortly after the complete overthrow and destruction of His foes, it shall be said, "Come, behold the works of the Lord, what desolations He hath made in the earth. He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; He breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; He burneth the chariot in the fire. Be still and know that I am God; I will be exalted among the heathen, I will be exalted in the earth."

THE REDEEMER OF ISRAEL.

But first the earth's Redeemer must be known as Israel's Redeemer, for the Redeemer must first come to Zion and turn away ungodliness from Jacob, for then shall they look on Him whom they pierced, and be in bitterness as one in bitterness for his firstborn; for so it is written, "If they abide not still in unbelief, they shall be grafted in, for God is able to graft them in again." And that He will is evident from the words of Isaiah, "All thy children shall be taught of the Lord and great shall be the peace of thy children. Thy people also shall be all righteous, they shall inherit the land forever." And Paul adds to the Romans, "So all Israel shall be saved."

For then must Israel be the regal nation upon earth, Palestine its land of Beulah, and Hephzibah its capital, for "My delight is in her, saith the Lord," and, "she shall be called, Sought out, a city not forsaken." "For the sons of the stranger shall build up thy walls, and their kings shall minister unto thee. They shall build the old wastes, and they shall raise up the former desolations. Strangers shall stand and feed your flocks, and the sons of the alien shall be your ploughmen and your vine-dressers, but ye shall be named the priests of the Lord, men shall call you the ministers of our God." For so shall a law proceed from Him, and He shall cause His judgment to rest for a light of His people, and through these He shall become a light to lighten the Gentiles, when once more He has become the glory of His people Israel.

Not yet has the ancient promise made to their father Abraham been fulfilled, as it remains yet to be fulfilled, "I will give unto thee all the land of Canaan for an everlasting possession, and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

THE DELIVERER OF EARTH.

Yet not to Zion only shall He come as Zion's Deliverer, but as the earth's Deliverer, too, because the creation also itself shall be delivered from the bondage of corruption into the liberty of the glory of the children of God, for then shall the groaning creation cease to groan. Its weary week of work shall then be past, its Sabbath shall have come, for One then sitting on its throne shall say, "Behold, I create all things new." The seventh chiliad of the world's history we anticipate as being the world's Sabbath, its day of rest and worship, when all things animate or inanimate, with breath or without it, shall praise the Lord. "Men shall be blessed in Him, all nations shall call Him blessed."

Beasts of prey shall have their very nature changed, for "The wolf shall dwell with the lamb, the leopard shall lie down with the kid, the cow and the bear shall feed, their young ones shall lie down together, and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad, the desert shall rejoice and blossom like the rose; it shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice with joy and singing; the parched ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water."

For when He that sitteth on the throne shall create all things new, the heavens and the earth that are now shall exist under new conditions—conditions of atmosphere and temperature favorable to health and longevity, and most probably freed from the extremes of cold and heat which now render such vast regions uninhabitable and uncultivated. But when He shall say, "Be ye glad and rejoice in that which I create," all nations shall call Him blessed, and all regions chant His praise.

EARTH'S MILLENNIUM AND JUBILEE.

So much, then, for Millennial blessedness which earth shall celebrate its jubilee. One Lord as His name One; the knowledge of the Lord covering the earth as the waters cover the sea; Satan bound, and saints free; truth springing out of truth and righteousness looking down from heaven; swords beaten into ploughshares, and spears into pruning-hooks; the very art of war forgotten in the arts of peace abounding; the days men like the days of a tree, and long enjoying the work of their hands; and, best of all, the tabernacle of God shall be with men, and He will dwell with them: they shall be His people, and God Himself shall be with them, and be their God. And this for a thousand years! Thus shall the kingdom of man be, as it were, for a moment time, while the kingdom of God shall be, as it were, forever and ever.

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND

A Walking Belfry.—At a Gospel Temperance meeting in Cowcaddens, the Rev. Mr. Andrew said: "I saw a curious picture the other day. It was that of a man walking along with a bell hung over his shoulder, which rings by striking against his knee. This man is called 'the walking belfry.' It is not because there is not a bell in the church belfry that this man goes about the town calling out, 'Come along to hear the Gospel,' but because in some parts of the town people cannot hear the sound of the bell, and he does this to prevent any one having the excuse that they did not know was church time. Every man, woman, and child can follow his example by inviting their neighbors to hear the Gospel."

Button-holing the Frenchmen.—At the same meeting Mr. Torrance said: "An English gentleman going through the streets of Paris recently, was so moved with pity by the evident godless condition of its inhabitants, that he could not restrain an earnest desire to preach the Gospel of Christ to them. His knowledge of the language was very limited; but strong in faith, he uttered aloud in French, as he walked along, 'God love you; God loves you.' When any one paused to look wonderingly at him, he would at once, with irresistible courtesy, button-hole the person, and tell the old, old story of the Cross. In this way several Frenchmen were led to seek peace in the sufficient sacrifice of 'the Lamb of God, which taketh away the sin of the world.'"

A Good Servant of the Devil.—A Book-keeper said: "I am still young in years, but very early in life I started out to earn my own living. I broke away from the teachings of my Christian father, and thought no one could really enjoy life unless he were a good servant of the devil. Every night I went to bed drunk, and in the morning I had 'tak' a hair o' th' dog which bit me,' to enable me to do my business for the day. In the course of time I was appointed to a good position in London; there I rioted in sin until I lost my situation. Then I returned to Glasgow, and in one of the meetings my soul found the true source of pleasure, and I rejected the poisonous stream of which I had been hitherto drinking so eagerly. Christ gives me living water to drink."

Saved in a Soldiers' Hospital.—Surgeon-Major White said: "I have before my mind just now the face of a friend—an old comrade in arms, who served his country in many foreign lands. One day he was brought into my hospital very ill. I pressed upon him the need of salvation through Christ, knowing that very soon it might be too late for him to obtain forgiveness through His blood. 'Ah, sir,' he said to me, 'I know I have led a bad life, but when I leave the hospital I will be a different man, I will do my duty, keep sober, stop swearing, and go to church regularly.' 'Henry,' I replied, 'you will never leave the hospital alive; you are dying; make your peace with God through faith in Jesus, now.' My duties then called me away, so I was unable to speak with him that day again. As I walked the hospital next morning, I met a medical friend and asked, 'How is Henry this morning?' 'The same in body, but face is fairly beaming,' was the reply. In a few days his wife who was attending him during sickness, came to me and said, 'Henry is going; will you come and see him?' I went at once, and inquired, 'Henry, is there anything between you and God?' 'No, sir; not a shadow of doubt,' he exclaimed. In a short time he passed away rejoicing in Christ, who, even at that late hour, plucked him as a brand from the burning."

Particular Friend.—Mr. Shorrey also said: "A young Englishman was sent out to New York by his friends, to get rid of his habits of drinking, and to find a place to send a man to for that purpose, and fortunately for him he dropped into a meeting, where the Lord met him, and delivered him from his enemy. One day he met some of the men to whom he used to drink during the voyage across the Atlantic. They gathered round and invited him into a drinking saloon; his reply was, 'No; I have a friend with me.' 'Well, bring your friend with you.' 'He does not drink.' 'Tell him to wait on you then.' 'He would leave me at once if I went in.' 'Who is he, and where is this particular friend of yours?' 'He is the Lord Jesus Christ, and He is in my heart.'"

Poor Granny's Laughter.—Mr. Clyde said: "One day I called upon an old woman whose daughter attends these meetings, and upon whom I and Muir had previously called to talk about things of God. She had not two pennies to her name against the other, so poor was she. Yet, we spoke together of Jesus and his love, she stood out laughing. Rather taken aback, I asked, 'Granny! are you really laughing on your death-bed?' 'A canna help it,' she exclaimed, 'the Lord is so good to me.' 'When did you get this at joy?' I inquired. 'Yon day, when Mr. Muir and you were up to see me, and I gave myself to the good Saviour.' There was this poor woman of Christ's own joy, thanking God for His goodness in the midst of poverty, and in prospect of almost immediate death!"

Salvation at a Funeral.—Mr. Mabon said: "There is a family who now attend my Sunday services regularly, whose child died lately. I went to see it before and after death, and attended his funeral. This was the fifth child which they had died, and the parents' hearts rebelled against God for so dealing with them. I prayed them to surrender their hearts to their heavenly Father, and, for their eternal good, was thus using the pruning-knife, and taking their children to the deathless land of light. The Holy Spirit blessed the counsel given, and they both are now waiting for Christ, and anticipate reunion with their loved ones above. At the funeral also there was a friend from Edinburgh, who was a skeptic. His grief was so intense that the floor was wet with tears. I spoke with him about the Saviour, and the comforts in sorrow, and trust that he, too, is awakened and regenerated man, living for Him who has forgiven him, and blessed him with peace."

A Miner "Making a Fool of Himself."—Mr. Lander said: "Some time ago I visited the Hampshire coast, and almost every evening called on a miner's household. The husband was a confirmed drunkard. The wife was a Roman Catholic, and looked upon me as a heretic. For a long time my efforts and prayers seemed to fall to the ground, and I could not even persuade them to come to an evangelistic meeting held in the district, and was inclined to cease my endeavor on their behalf. One night, to my surprise, the miner came into the meeting and kept his seat until the close, when I went to him, and pressed upon his attention the necessity of fleeing from the wrath to come, and accepting Christ as his Saviour. We then prayed together, and the miner pronounced my words, 'I will accept Christ, and follow Him, with the help of God.' He went home, and before going to sleep, told his friends what the Lord had done for him. Two days afterward a neighbor called upon his wife and said, 'You ought to make a stop talking to the men in the pit about Jesus and their souls; he is making a regular fool of himself.' 'Weel,' said John's wife, 'whether he is makin' a fool o' himself or no, a dinna ken I care, bit a ken this, that there's an awfu' cheenge cam ower him, for noo he's sae kin' tae me an' th' weans, that ma hert's like tae brak' wi' joy. An' what's mair, I intend tae gang wi' John this an' every night tae the meetin', until I get cheanged in th' same way, an' a hope it winna be lang."

A Christian Skipper.—Major Colquhoun said: "Last night three men from a steam-lighter in the harbor came to the meeting, and stayed to be spoken with. A worker asked one, 'Are you a Christian?' 'Yes.' 'Is your friend?' 'No.' It turned out that the man who was spoken to first was the skipper, the next man the engineer, and the other was the mate of the boat. The engineer had come to discover the secret of the power, or what it was, that had turned the skipper into a Christian; the mate was a backslider. The Scriptures were opened up to them, and the engineer decided for Christ on the spot, and realized the power which he sought. There was another man higher up in the pew who had listened to the conversation and as the skipper and the engineer rose to go, he said, 'I, too, will trust in Christ.' This Christian skipper brought his men to the meeting, and they came because they saw a power in his daily life that convinced them of their need of a Saviour."

The Devil's Trick Detected.—Mr. Mabon said: "After one of Mr. Moody's open-air meetings, in Hawick, my attention was attracted to one young man in particular. I saw that he was anxious, but yet rather ashamed of his anxiety. Going up to him, I put my arm into his, and inquired, 'Would you like to be saved, my friend?' 'Yes,' he replied; 'but there are difficulties; and I cannot trust until they are removed.' 'What are they?' I asked. 'How is it that Christ says in one place, "It is finished," and in another, "Strive to enter in." If the work is finished, why strive?' I said to him in answer, 'Because Christ knew that the devil would put every sort of difficulty in the way of sin-sick souls to prevent them believing in His finished work.' 'Then, if I simply believe, am I saved?' he eagerly exclaimed. 'Yes,' I answered; 'for if you really believe in Christ, you will follow Him.' 'I do believe,' he said. 'Then you are saved,' was my rejoinder. Even in the dark avenue where we were walking I saw the instant change in his face when the truth came home to his mind. The next night I was addressing an audience, and told this story to them, adding the words, 'Perhaps the young man is here.' 'Yes, sir, I am,' replied a clear voice, 'and I am happy in Christ now.'"

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

A HELPLESS SUFFERER.

Mr. Micaiah Adams, writing from Marion, N.Y., on August 28th, 1882, thus describes the healing of his wife: "I have delayed writing you the full particulars of my wife's healing, but she is still gaining in strength and is able to do all the house-work, except washing. Before her healing she had been entirely helpless for months. Sometimes she would get so that she could, by the help of a cane or chair, get from one room to the other, but she has been so bad again that she could not even comb her hair nor dress herself. I have had one doctor, here in town, a hundred times, but he could do her no good, except to ease pain for the present."

"Her hands and finger-joints were enlarged to twice their natural size, and one hip was very much deformed. All this went away at once on the sixth of July. You cannot tell how surprised I was, that next morning, when she opened the door, all dressed, and said, 'I am well.'"

"I would not know where to stop in describing her sickness, and you cannot think how much I have suffered in taking care of her. Please excuse all mistakes; I am seventy-nine years old."

BETHSHAN.

At the weekly meeting at Bethshan, London, on Wednesday afternoon, November 1st, the Rev. W. E. Boardman presided. After praise and prayer, the following testimonies were given:

Mrs. Bailey said: "I have been an invalid for about twenty-five years. In my weak condition I was induced to visit this Home, and now I can work or do anything; in fact, I walked quite ten miles yesterday without experiencing any ill effects."

A Gentleman, whose name was not mentioned, said: "For many years I have suffered from indigestion, and whenever I had food it was always a great pain to eat it. I suffered very much, and used to take medicine two or three times a day. At last I determined to have no more medicine, but to put my faith in the Lord for healing, and, marvellous to relate, from that day, now two years ago, to this, I have not had the least pain."

Miss Gerard, of Peckham, remarked: "The Lord has helped me both in body and soul. For the last four years I have been a sufferer from which resulted in one of my legs being two and a half inches shorter than the other. My doctor said that he could not cure me. A friend one day asserted, 'If you could throw down your crutches, you would be all right.' I then commenced to pray to God and said, 'Heal my hip, for Jesus Christ's sake.' One morning I was walking up the passage of the house, when I experienced a very peculiar feeling, and cried out to my mother, who was near, 'My crutches feel of no use to me; and look, my leg is quite long!' And now my leg is perfectly cured. Some months ago I was out on an inclement day, and caught a severe cold, which ended in acute inflammation of the windpipe. The doctor said nothing could be done for me, but remembering my previous cure, I sent to Bethshan, and also prayed to the Lord. The next morning I was stooping down washing my arms, when I thought I heard a voice near me. I ran to the other side of the room and cried, 'Praise the Lord. O my soul!' for I felt I was perfectly cured, as you see I am now."

A MERE SKELETON.

An Evangelist confirmed the testimony given by the previous speaker regarding her cure, he being personally acquainted with her, and therefore, qualified to judge as to the efficacy of the marvellous case of healing which had been narrated. He also said: "I will mention an instance which occurred quite recently. A woman, about forty years of age, was born with a painful and inconvenient disease, and I was asked to go and see her. Fourteen months ago I did so, and found her nothing but skin and bone. She had been always more or less doctored during her life, but I asked her to give up the doctors, and, for healing, to put her faith in Christ. This she did, without, however, saying anything to me, and now she is able to walk about and to go whither she likes, and do whatever she pleases. There is also another case of a woman who was bedridden for ten years, and whom I went to visit and pray with. Now she is perfectly cured."

Miss Taylor said: "I want just to tell you how good the Lord has been to me. I came here about ten days ago, having been suffering for thirteen years from consumption, inherited from both parents, and, therefore, the doctors gave me no hope of recovery. I visited Bethshan, and although the night was bitterly cold, I woke up next morning feeling perfectly well—better, in fact, than I had felt for thirteen years past."

A Postman said: "I have been suffering from a diseased heel, and was anointed for healing here, now, nearly a month ago. Since then I have had a continual struggle, but sometimes I have been enabled to believe. Last week my son brought home The Christian Herald, and there I read some remarks which seemed as if they were made especially for my case, and my unbelief fled at once. I believed in Christ as the Great Physician, and my heel became perfectly restored, and I was enabled to go on my duty again, as postman."

Other testimonies were given, and numerous petitions were presented asking for complete restoration to health, among the applicants being a niece of the celebrated author of the hymn, "Just as I am."

After a few impressive words from Dr. Boardman, who incidentally mentioned the case of complete restoration to health of a student, at Cambridge, by means of faith, the meeting was brought to a conclusion.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Annual Report of the Treasurer of the United States ought to be studied even by people who usually avoid figures and statistics as uninteresting. Every intelligent citizen should take an interest in a statement which indicates unprecedented national prosperity. Among the figures furnished by the Treasurer, the following items are specimens of the general character of the report. He states that the receipts of the government show an increase over those of 1881 of $22,251,054.23 in the revenue from customs; $11,233,209.94 from the internal revenue; $2,551,277.20 from sales of public lands, and $6,707,416.34 from miscellaneous sources—making a total increase in the net revenue of $42,742,957.71. The total net revenue was $403,525,250.28. The net expenditures decreased from $260,712,887.59 to $257,981,440.20, a reduction of $2,731,447.39; which, added to the increase in receipts, makes an increase of $45,474,405.10 in the surplus revenues applicable to the reduction of the public debt. The expenditures on account of interest on the public debt show a reduction of $11,431,534.39 from $82,508,741.18 in 1881, to $71,077,206.79 in 1882. The excess of revenues over expenditures was $145,543,810.08, and the total amount applied during the fiscal year to the reduction of the debt $166,281,505.55.

Among the Recommendations Made by Mr. Knox, the controller of the currency, in his report is a proposition he has previously advocated. It is to issue $805,000,000 of three per cent bonds, having twenty-five years to run, in exchange for $700,000,000 of four per cent bonds now outstanding. A similar proposition would also be embraced with regard to the four and one half per cents, though the rate of premium allowed in the increased amount of bonds issued would be different. As will be seen this proposal would involve an increase in the principal of the debt, though the annual interest would amount to a smaller sum.

The Sudden Removal of Five Government officers on account of the Star Route trials was the chief topic in political circles throughout the week. The five men are Charles E. Henry, Marshal of the District of Columbia; D. B. Ainger, Postmaster of the District of Columbia; Myron M.

Parker, Assistant Postmaster; M. D. Helm, Foreman in the Government Printing-office, in charge of the Congressional Record, and manager of the afternoon newspaper organ of Thomas J. Brady, and ex-Senator George E. Spencer, Government Director of the Union Pacific Railroad. Action was taken by the President in response to a letter sent to him by Mr. George Bliss, government counsel, and a report made by Attorney-General Brewster upon the subject of that letter. The course pursued by the government officers who have been removed was considered at a special Cabinet meeting. After that meeting Attorney-General Brewster wrote a report which was read to the Cabinet at the adjourned meeting, and was approved by the vote of every member. Marshal Henry was an intimate personal friend of the late president, and his appointment as Marshal was made by President Garfield. It is stated by the friends of the removed officials that they can prove themselves innocent of complicity in the Star Route affair, but it is certain that public expressions of opinion in each case were interpreted by the government as evidence of their sympathy with the defendants.

The Details of the Election in Utah which have been anxiously expected as a means of discovering what are the actual results of the Edmunds Bill have now been received. The registration of the Territory is 32,450, and the vote fell short more than 6000. The Mormon vote was 21,451; that of the Gentiles, 4883. About 1000 registered Gentiles and about 5000 registered Mormons omitted to vote. At the last Congressional election the Mormons polled 18,000 votes, only 3000 fewer than at the recent election, and yet at least 10,000 polygamists were disfranchised under the Edmunds act. This shows that their actual voting strength prior to the passage of that act was 35,000 in a population of 145,000. The Gentiles claim that they can poll 8000 votes. This would give a voting population of 33,000 in a total of 145,000.

An Attempt to Enforce the Observance of the Lord's Day in New York was made last Sunday. The new penal code requires the police to arrest persons doing business on Sunday, while previous to that enactment Sabbath-breakers could only be sued for damages. The opinion of the Corporation Counsel was sought by the police for guidance to them in enforcing the code. The captains were told that all liquor stores must be kept closed. No loaded wagons must be permitted to go about the streets except mail wagons and express wagons containing trunks and other baggage of travellers. Concerts and other public performances, whether called "sacred" or not, must be prohibited. There must not be any vending in the streets except the sale of the daily newspapers. Cigar stores and barber shops need not be kept closed, but care must be taken by the proprietors not to permit their business to be visible from the streets. No interference was wished for in cases where business was conducted behind closed doors and windows, and without offensive noise. Vessels might be unloaded at covered piers, but not on open wharves. The street cars and other public conveyances need not be stopped. It appears that the theatres in Cincinnati, which have been closed for some weeks, have again been opened on Sunday as before the agitation.

A Tragedy on the Stage of a Theatre is not an unusual announcement, but that enacted at Cincinnati on Thursday last was a real, not a mimic, tragedy. In a popular play which has been represented on the stage of most American theatres, and is known as Si Slocum, one of the actors shoots at an apple placed on the head of an actress. That play was performed at Cincinnati on Thursday, November 30th, and Frank I. Frayne, a well-known actor, appeared in the part. He had been accustomed to it for several years and was considered an unerring shot. Precautions were always taken to avoid a catastrophe in case of his missing his aim, such as the insertion of an iron plate in the lady's hair so fixed as that the bullet striking it might glance upward and pass away harmlessly. But on Thursday the audience were horrified to see the actress as soon as the shot was fired, fall to the floor with a bullet wound in her forehead. The pin securing the rifle barrel to the stock had broken, causing the barrel to drop nearly an inch, and the bullet taking a downward course had struck and killed the actress. The distress the actor who fired the shot was intense, but unavailing; the woman, who was shortly to have been his wife, lay dead by his hand. This is the second occurrence of the kind in recent time. The audience who paid to see such a play enacted and by their presence encouraged it, must share with the perpetrator of the deed the responsibility for that woman's death.

Some Remarkable Items were Furnished by Mr. Nimmo, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics, to Washington clergyman who wrote to him for detailed information as to the facts which made the national Thanksgiving this year especially appropriate. Mr. Nimmo said: "Notwithstanding the fact that the season of 1881 was one of the most unfavorable ever known, we still had bread enough and to spare, and beside a large quantity of cotton for export. The value of our exports of bread and breadstuffs during the year ended June 30th, 1882, the same being the product of the crop of 1881, amounted to $182,670,528. The value of our exports of cotton was $199,812,644. We also considerably increased the value of our exports of manufactured articles. The foregoing facts indicate the exuberance of our soil and the vigor of our industrial enterprises. Our imports during the year ended June 30th, 1882, amounted to $724,639,574, being larger than during any previous year in the history of the country. Notwithstanding the decrease of our exports, owing to the cause above referred to, and the increase of our imports the balance of trade in our favor was nearly $26,000,000."

Among the Thanksgiving Festivities last Thursday, none were more interesting than that of the Five Points Mission which celebrated its thirty-second Thanksgiving. From half-past one until three the children connected with the mission gave an entertainment, consisting of singing, recitations and calisthenics. The dining-room was then thrown open, and a crowd of children soon filled the seven long tables, which were heavily laden with almost everything their hearts could desire in the shape of food. Mountains of confectionery, baskets of fruit and flowers, turkeys, hams, and joints of beef were temptingly arranged by the friends of the mission for the admiration and inner satisfaction of the children. The tables were furnished and attended by representatives of various Christian churches. About 700 children dined at the mission.

An Astronomer's Faith in the Efficacy of prayer has been proved by a letter published last week from Professor Brooks, of the Red House Observatory, who asked in behalf of astronomical science and astronomers that prayers be offered for clear weather on December 6th, the date of the transit of Venus. He said: "The solution of the sublimest problem known to science was to be attempted on that occasion, the opportunity for which will not occur again for 122 years. Millions of dollars and months of valuable time have been expended in preparation for the great event."

The Good Work Being Done by the Children's Aid Society deserves the most public acknowledgment by Christian philanthropists. Its efficient work is no less conspicuous than the economy of its management. From the thirtieth report of the society now issued, it appears that its twenty-one schools have during the year, educated and partially fed and clothed 3676 children taken from the streets, at an average annual cost of $23.52 for each child, and its lodging-houses have fed, sheltered, and taught 14,122 boys and girls at an annual cost for each of $40.47. Its emigration agency, by which 3957 boys and girls and a small percentage of men and women have been furnished with homes and employment in the West, has been managed with a similar regard to getting the largest possible return for the money expended. Another important department has been the Summer Home of which 4033 children have received the benefit at an average cost for each of $1.58. The total receipts for the year were $237,624.25.

Two Conflicting Affidavits are Likely to result in the imprisonment of a man in Iowa. A suit was instituted against him at Dubuque, Iowa, in which in order to evade a certain statute he presented the plea that he was a British subject. That plea would have availed him had not a politician recalled the fact the man had voted in the last two elections, and informed the court of it. The man had sworn that he was a naturalized citizen of the United States in order that he might cast his vote, and then swore that he was a British subject in order to evade a law of the United States. It is difficult to see how he can escape punishment for perjury, however the question of his nationality may be settled. Neither will those escape punishment who in endeavoring to make the best of both worlds, talk and act in the world as men of the world and in the Christian Church as Christian men. We may make mistakes in assigning them to one or the other, but the day is fast approaching when their status will be finally settled (Matt. 25 : 32, 33).

An Interesting Hunting Incident is Reported from Virginia. On November 28th two gentlemen were hunting opossum in Chesterfield County, Va., when they heard their dogs baying in a reedy swamp close by. The gentlemen concluded to go home and procure a gun, and on their return found that the dogs were 'after two large bucks, one with eight points and the other with ten points. The buck with the eight prongs had killed the one with ten points with one of its prongs. The prong entered near the eye and came out near the ear. By some means the prongs of the bucks became interlocked, and had evidently been so for several days, as the dead animal had been dragged a considerable distance, and had been killed long enough to become offensive. The live buck, which had undoubtedly suffered for food, was in a very poor and emaciated condition, and was shot and killed before the marksmen could recognize what it was in the dark. In the conflict between the two deer the victor bought his triumph at a fearful cost to himself. His sufferings, while dragging around the corpse of his victim, unable to release himself and unable to eat, must have been extreme. Many human conflicts in which fiendish rage has been shown have had a similar ending (Job 5 : 2).

A Lady's Apprehension that She was the victim of approaching insanity led to an amusing discovery in Boston on November 26th. She applied for advice to a prominent physician in the city. On entering his office the doctor observed that she was flushed and excited. She said she had a very strange sensation which led her to apprehend some serious brain trouble—in short, insanity. The peculiar sensation she described was a feeling running round in a circle on the top of her head. The doctor took off her hat and examined her head, but found nothing, and she remarked that the sensation had left her. She put on her hat, and, after sitting a few moments, jumped up with a scream saying that it had come again. Another examination followed—first of the head, then of the hat, and in the hat a small, but active, mouse was discovered. This incident, the truth of which is vouched for on excellent authority, shows how some of our forebodings of coming trouble may be susceptible of a very simple explanation. Happily for her, this lady's forebodings were unfounded; but it is to be feared that other apprehensions may not prove so groundless. They are those felt by the Christian friends of ladies whose extraordinary, but fashionable head-gear gives rise to fears that pride and love of display fills their hearts, to the exclusion of love of God (Isaiah 3 : 16-24).

A Father's Ingenious Device to Secure a lodging for himself and family is described in the New York Times. A gentleman in Brooklyn, whose family included nine children, spent many days recently in searching for a flat, but though he found many suitable, the owners refused to rent them to him on account of his large family. On the last day of his search he instructed his wife to prepare a luncheon for the children and send them to picnic in the beautiful grounds of Greenwood Cemetery. She did so, and husband and wife then started on their search for a flat. They soon found a place that suited them, but before the bargain could be completed the janitress, according to the usual custom, asked how many children they had. "Nine," replied the man, "but," he continued, in a tone of sadness and with a far-away look, "they are all in Greenwood Cemetery." "Ah," said the woman, as a sigh of relief escaped her lips, "then there will be no objection." A lease for a year was signed, and in the evening the family moved in. When the couple entered with their household goods and numerous progeny the woman in charge of the building was thunderstruck by the arrival of the youngsters. "I thought," she cried hysterically, "you said your children were all dead." "Oh, no," returned the father, "I merely observed that they were all in Greenwood Cemetery, where we had sent them to picnic for the day!" A reply which sent the woman away deeply mortified. There can be no question as to the ingenuity of the father's device, but it is such tricks as that which lower the standard of truth among us. The falsehoods of trade and the falsehoods of courtesy are not condemned as they should be. Christians ought, especially in this day, both by word and act, to avoid the very appearance of deceit (Prov. 12 : 22).

A Warning of an Approaching Disastrous storm has been sent to President Arthur by Professor E. Stone Wiggins, LL.D., Astronomer of the Canadian Finance Department. Professor Wiggins predicts that the storm will appear in the Gulf of Mexico on March 9th, 1883, and will cross the entire continent in a north-westerly direction. He says: "No vessel, whatever her dimensions, will be safe out of harbor, and none of small tonnage can hope to survive the tidal wave and fury of this tempest. As the wind will blow from the south-east the New England States will also suffer severely from the wind and floods. No point outside of harbor, in the whole area of the Atlantic, especially north of the Equator, will be a place of safety, for this will be preeminently the greatest storm that has visited this continent since the days of your illustrious first president. In view of this event, therefore, I take the great liberty of representing to your excellency the advisability of ordering all United States ships into safe harbors not later than the 5th of March till this storm be passed." The warning, if verified by events, may be the means of saving many lives, for it is not likely that it will be disregarded. Men heed the warnings of their fellow-men in such matters though comparatively few pay any attention to the Divine warning of the approaching end of the age when those who have not entered the Harbor of Refuge will be involved in unspeakable woe (Matt. 16 : 3).

An Eagle Bearing the Stars and Stripes is likely soon to be seen over the heights of Nebraska. The Wood River Times states that two weeks ago a rancher saw a huge eagle flutter over his barnyard, interested in a fat turkey, and immediately secured his rifle. The first shot broke the eagle's wing, and in its crippled condition it circled around uttering screams of pain. The man was watching the result before firing again, when he discovered another eagle coming from a distance. It was evidently a mate of the first one. Like an arrow it flew to the rescue, and examining its wound and seeing its mate could not escape, it took hold of it by its claws and beak and flew to the mountain side, where it laid down the victim of the sportive hunter. During the past seven days the men on the ranch have noticed each day that the mate carried food to the wounded bird regularly, feeding it upon squirrels, rabbits, birds, and mice. The rancher could kill the two birds any day, but has refrained on account of the affection displayed between them. A small American flag will be fastened about the wounded bird, and when it again flies it will carry the emblem of freedom with it to the highest mountain peak. The bird so decorated will doubtless be an object of interest to every one who sees it and knows its history. That bird at least need fear no rifle again; its burden will be its protection. But significant as that burden is, it was a more beneficent burden that John saw carried on angel's wing through the air. (Rev. 14 : 6).

THE GENERAL CONVOCATION AROUND MOUNT SION.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"But ye are come unto Mount Sion, and . . . to the general assembly and church of the firstborn, which are written in heaven . . . and to the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel."—Hebrews 12 : 22-24.

The Glorious Present Tense—I. A Sevenfold Contrast—Law and Grace—As to Place—As to the Fire—The Blackness—The Darkness—The Tempest—Blasts of the Trumpet—The Terrible Voice—II. A Comparison—The Olympian Games—An Education for Heaven—Wrestling a Part of the Festival—The Great Church Meeting—All High Born—Enrolled—A Festival not a Battle—III. A Coming to be Enjoyed—The Birthright—The Enrollment—Participation in Service—Possessing the Inheritance.

THE whole passage will be considered, but our special central text will be verse 23: "To the general assembly and church of the firstborn, which are written in heaven."

Paul is displaying the superiority of the new covenant to the old. He tells us what Israel after the flesh came to at their best in the morning hours of the law, and what the firstborn after the Spirit have come to under the Gospel. He pictures the great assembly of the chosen people round about Mount Sinai, and then his inspired mind describes an infinitely larger and happier gathering, to which all believers have come, around Mount Sion. Not only the Hebrews to whom he was writing, but all the people of God are gathered together in one general assembly, of which the blessed God is the centre. He shows us the joyful difference between the two gatherings, and the feelings and pursuits of those who compose them.

What we shall want this morning is a little careful attention to the deep meaning of the text, and an intensely earnest desire actually to enter into the enjoyment of the privileges which are herein set before us. Our text contains an incalculable wealth of meaning; it is written according to God's riches in glory by Christ Jesus. Surely it was written as with a pen of diamond upon plates of gold set with jewels. May God of His grace lead us fully into it.

We would not only speak of privilege as possible, but would say with Paul, unto it." As surely as we are not come to the terrors of the law, so surely we are come to the blessings of the Gospel. Read in verse 18, "Ye are not come," and then in verse 22, "But ye are come." We do not only hear of Sion and her festivities, but we are come to them. We do not merely know the letter of the Gospel, but we are come into the inner and spiritual meaning of it by personal enjoyment. "We are come." I would ring out those words as a sort of musical accompaniment to the truths uttered. All through the sermon let our hearts rejoicingly say, "We are come," "We are come." We have obtained by faith all that which is set before us in the text.

WE ARE COME

I. First, I want to set out, as I may be able, presented in the entire passage which we have read—a contrast between the economy of law and the economy of grace.

Every good thing is enhanced in value by its opposite. Light is all the brighter to eyes which have wept in darkness; food is all the sweeter after you have known hunger; and Sion is all the fairer because of Sinai. The contrast between free grace and law makes grace appear the more precious to minds that have known the rigor of the commandment.

The contrast presented here is sevenfold. It may be that the idea of this sevenfold contrast first occurred to Bengel, that prince of critics; but I have ventured to differ from his form of it, and I hope that in so doing I have set forth the contrast as to the seven things more clearly than he has done, so that even the humblest here will catch each point, and retain each contrast in his memory. Notice the contrasts.

First, as to place (v. 18), "Ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched;" (v. 22) "but ye are come unto Mount Sion, and unto the city of the living God, the heavenly Jerusalem." Behold Sinai with its rugged crags; scarce had a human foot ever trodden it; perhaps until that hour in which Jehovah descended upon it in splendor it had remained a virgin peak, which the foot of man had never polluted. There was no habitation of man upon it, neither did it yield pasturage for flocks. The mount of God stood out in terrible sublimity against the sky, holding communion with the stars, but refusing to deal with men. It was sublime, but stern and

TEMPEST BEATEN.

We gather to quite another centre, even unto the palace-crowned steep of Sion. There David dwelt of old, and there David's Lord revealed Himself. The hill of Sion rose above the city of Jerusalem, and the two together formed the favored spot where Jehovah deigned to dwell in solemn state in the midst of His chosen nation; "for the Lord hath chosen Sion; He hath desired it for His habitation." There the service of His sanctuary was carried on, and around it clustered all the palaces of Judah and the habitations of the chosen people. It was called "the city of vision," and the city of peace. God dwelt in the midst of her, and therefore she was not moved. "Beautiful for situation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Sion." "God is known in her palaces for a refuge." "God shall help her, and that right early."

This is a type of the dispensation in which the Lord comes to man in a vision of peace, and manifests Himself in forgiving grace. The Lord dwells with men in the person of the man Christ Jesus, and we come to Him and find our habitation in Him in all generations. Even as the sparrow hath found a house, and the swallow a nest for herself, where she may lay her young, so do we come to dwell at the altars of God, in the city which His grace has founded and His power has garrisoned. The places in their contrast are full of teaching.

This mount that might be touched we are told, in the next place, "burned with fire." God's presence made the mountain melt and flow down. "The Lord also thundered in the heavens, and the Highest gave His voice; hail-stones and coals of fire." Sinai was altogether on a smoke; innumerable lightnings flashed forth around the summit of the hill, and Jehovah revealed Himself in flaming fire. What, then, have believers come to instead of fire? Why, to another form of fire; to "an innumerable company of angels"—"He maketh His angels spirits, His ministers a flame of fire." Some of those bright beings are called seraphim, or burning ones, for they come and go like flames of fire.

What mighty spirits, what flaming spirits, what pure spirits, what glorious spirits they are; and we have communion with them! We have come to an innumerable company of angels. We do not always realize it as we should; but these loving spirits are about us as surely as they were around Jacob in his dream. If our eyes were opened we should see horses of fire and chariots of fire round about the Lord's servants. "Millions of spiritual creatures walk this earth, both when we wake and when we sleep." God comes to us by them: "He rode upon a cherub, and did fly." Angels contend against evil spirits, and are our defenders. This, then, is our position; we are come to the countless hosts of our Father's messengers, and not to devouring flame.

Pursue the contrast, and you find on Mount Sinai

THERE WAS BLACKNESS,

doubtless made the more intensely black as the vivid lightnings flashed out from it. "Ye are not come unto blackness," says Paul. What is the contrast to this? "But ye are come to the general assembly and church of the firstborn, which are written in heaven." Perhaps you do not for a moment see any contrast, but I will soon show it to you. Blackness is the symbol of sorrow, it is the garb of mourning. Everywhere we associate blackness with grief; but now Paul sets before us the grandest embodiment of joy.

You say to me, "Do you mean the church in heaven?" Yes, I mean the church in heaven and on earth too; why divide it? There is only one church. Here and there, earth and heaven make a little division to our senses, but there is no division in the mind of God; He sees one general assembly of all His people, of all nations, and kindreds, and people, and tongues. What a contrast this—between the blackness of coming sorrow by the law and the joyous whiteness of the garments of those who believe.

Follow the next point of contrast, and you have darkness mentioned. "Nor unto blackness and darkness." The cloud on Sinai was so dark as to obscure the day, except that every now and then the lightning-flash lit up the scene. What are we come to in contrast to that darkness? "To God the Judge of all." Possibly it does not strike you with joy when I mention it; but this is, perhaps, the most joyous of all the clauses of the passage. "God is light, and in Him is no darkness at all." What a contrast to the darkness of the law is a reconciled God!

"Oh, but," say you, "He is there as the Judge of all, and that makes us tremble." Why? Wherefore? It makes me leave off trembling when I think that I am come "to God the Judge of all," that Christ has brought me near, even to the Judge, so that I have nothing to dread from Him. What can the Judge do but pronounce sentence of acquittal upon the man for whom Christ has made expiation? What can He do to harm us? Nothing, but much to help us; for, rolling every slander away, He will make the righteous to shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father. This is, in fact, the highest delight of all the saints—to gather unto their God!

And what follows next? Why, tempest. It is said, "Ye are not come unto the mount that might be touched, and that burned with fire, nor unto blackness and darkness and tempest." All over the top of Sinai there swept fierce winds and terrible tornadoes, for the Lord was there. All heaven seemed convulsed when God did rend it, and descended in majesty upon the sacred mount. But what do you and I see? The very

REVERSE OF TEMPEST

—"The spirits of just men made perfect," serenely resting. What more is there for them to do? They are perfect, they have fought the fight, they have run the race, they are crowned, they are full of ecstatic bliss, the light of God is on their brows, the glory of God is reflected from their faces; everything like tempest is far gone from them; they have reached the fair haven, and are tossed with tempest no more.

Follow the contrast further, and you come to the sound of a trumpet. This resounded from the top of Sinai. Clarion notes most clear and shrill rang out again and again the high commands of the thrice-holy God. You are not come to that. Instead of a trumpet, which signifies war and the stern summons of a king, ye are come unto "Jesus the Mediator of the new covenant," and the silver tones of "Come unto Me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Here is nothing to disturb the ear; for "He shall not cry nor lift up nor cause His voice to be heard in the streets. A bruised reed shall He not break, and the smoking flax shall He not quench." No message thunders out, "Stand off!" but holy affection cries, "Come, and welcome!"

The seventh contrast lies in this—together with the trumpet there sounded out a voice, a voice which was so terrible that they asked that they might not hear it again. They cowered down under it, like poor, frightened children, terrified by the penetrating sound. They could not endure another word; they begged that the voice would be silent. We have come to another voice, the voice of "the blood of sprinkling, that speaketh better things than that of Abel." There is a voice from Sion, there is a voice that rolls over the heads of the innumerable company of angels, a voice of the Lord that is full of majesty, and exceedingly comfortable to the "general assembly and church of the firstborn," who know the joyful sound. We are come to it, for we have been washed in it, and its sweet, prevailing note is filling our heart with music even now.

Now, dear friends, I have set forth the contrast, and I want you to think it out by the help of the ever-blessed Spirit. To all that was transacted at Sinai the people could not come, nor did they wish to come; they kept at a distance, for they were afraid; but to all that is displayed on Sion we may come; nay, what is better, I hope we can say with the apostle, "We are come." The veil is rent from the top to the bottom, and we have access to God through Jesus Christ our Lord. There I leave the instructive contrast. May the Holy Spirit bless it.

II. I beg you, in the second place, to follow me in what may not perhaps so much strike you, but it is certainly worthy of your attention, namely, in our more central text. Our position is that "We are come to the general assembly and church of the firstborn, which are written in heaven." It is a comparison, not with anything Jewish, for that would not have been suitable, but with a Gentile festival, which more readily lent itself to the apostle's great thought. Let me give you, first of all, a rough sketch.

In Greece, in her happier times, in order to preserve a national unity, the various states, kingdoms, or republics, which constituted Greece proper, held at the foot of Olympus a great gathering, to which none came as participators except citizens of the various Greek nationalities. The object of the gathering was that every part of the Greek nature might be educated and displayed, and the unity of the Greek race be remembered. Poets came and sang verses which they had composed with care; orators stood and discoursed to gain the crown for eloquence; men of all kinds of mental attainments were there emulating each other. At the same time all sorts of athletic exercises for the development of the body were going on.

The territory in which this was held was considered to be sacred. Though the states were often at war with one another, they never carried the war into that particular region. It was a quiet, peaceful, neutral spot. Do you not espy a parallel? No man was allowed to compete in any of the exercises and contests except he had been at least ten months or more in preparation for them. Those who were conquerors had no gold given them as reward; a simple crown of olive was all; but it was thought quite sufficient reward for the most exhausting feats, and for the greatest self-denial, such as resistance unto blood and dislocation of bones. The apostle, I do not doubt, had seen it; at any rate, the word which he uses properly and naturally suggests it.

Think for a moment! Before us stands the city which is the centre of this unrivalled congregation of the firstborn; Jerusalem stands in her place, and her Acropolis, Mount Sion, looks down upon the scene. To the city of the living God the living children of God have come. See, yonder are the runners and the wrestlers. Perhaps you do not think there can be much festivity about engagements which involve so much of endurance as running and striving for the mastery, but the Greeks were of another mind, and these contests were a part of the pleasures of the festival. How much I wish that we could look upon all the conflicts, sufferings, and troubles of this mortal life as occupations of the great festive gathering which is now being held in heaven and in earth around the city of our God.

See, yonder is the Judge, the great Umpire of His people's efforts, ready to award the crowns. And who are those sitting in their seats, and looking on? These are they who have taken their turn in these grand displays, and, having won their crowns, there they sit, "the spirits of the just made perfect," "the cloud of witnesses." Today, my brethren, you are participating in that great international gathering of all the people of God. Are you not glad to be here? When I was visiting one of our sick friends he uttered a sentence which stuck to me, and indeed suggested my subject. He said, "I have had some in attending the Tabernacle." "How is that?" "Because I have been used to worship with a great company of godly people, used to join in the songs of great multitudes, and I shall feel at home among the number that no man can number."

THE FESTIVAL.

Brethren, you are come to-day to the great festival in which earth and heaven unite. That assembly is one and indivisible. Around the throne of the Most High the apostle represents all the saints as gathered to hold one glorious feast. "Has it begun?" say you. Yes, it is going on now, and you are come to it; if you are living by faith as you ought to live you are now engaged in it. "Oh, but," say you, "I am wrestling." That is a part of the festival. "I never thought of that," cries one. But it is even so. When the national meeting was held at Olympus there were contests of all kinds, and these were not regarded with sorrow, but with exultation. "What! would you have me look at my sufferings and wrestlings as part of a festival?" Yes; that is all a part of the grand display which the Lord is making before all intelligent beings, wherein the power of love, the energy of faith, the splendor of grace, and the triumph of good are being made manifest to the glory of God by us.

"Oh," say you, "I cannot look at my sorrows in such a light." No doubt the men who were wrestling or racing found that for the present it was not joyous; yet they did not shun it, for they had earnestly desired the day when they might be allowed to share in the national display; they counted it a high honor to be permitted to take part even in the roughest contests. None but a Greek could do so. You also have put your name down for a place in the church of God; this is a high honor, to which none but the twice-born, whose names are written in heaven, can be admitted; accept the hardness with the honor. "Oh, but," say you, "I have run a long time, I have run for fifty years!"

SPLENDID RUNNING

this! I do not believe that even at Olympus they ever saw a man run for fifty years at a stretch. Keep on! Do not suffer the glory of the day to fail.

You say this sheds a strange light upon Christian life. Say, a blessed light, which will delight the eyes and hearts of enthusiastic believers. The Father of all takes delight in this assembly; it is the joy of Christ to look down upon His champions, whose faith He sustains, whose faith He accepts. He is saying to devils, "Look on, and see what lovers of right can do?" Look on, ye innumerable company of angels, and see what grace can do in the hearts of poor, feeble men and women, making them strong to do exploits.

Our text adds to the term "general assembly" that of the "church of the firstborn." "Oh," say the commentators, "this is tautology." Not so. The apostle felt bound, after having used such a remarkable comparison, to call us back to the solemnity of the matter, and remind us that it is "a church" which is gathered. You and I have come to a great church-meeting, where all the saints of God are met at this moment. This is what you and I have come to. Oh, for words with which to speak our joy for admission into such a company!

Note, dear friends, the individuals

WHO COMPOSE THE COMPANY.

They are all high born, for they are all firstborn. There is but one emphatically firstborn, namely, Jesus Christ Himself, the firstborn of every creature; but being one with Him we become the firstborn of God through the new birth. By our union to Christ, and by the blessed processes of grace, we are made and known to be the firstborn of God. Now the firstborn among men had the ascendancy and sway in the household, even as "the meek shall inherit the earth." The day comes when righteousness shall be to the fore. The firstborn had the excellency.

There are younger brothers in every family who receive comparatively little if they happen to be descended from great lords; but there are no younger brethren in the family of God. They are all firstborn, all heirs, and what is wonderful to tell, each one of them has all the estate; for so infinite is it, that, though if I have all, you can have all too; an innumerable company of this blessed firstborn race can have the whole of God to be their portion forever and ever.

But then it is added that they are enrolled. As I have already told you, they enrolled the competitors in the Greek festivals, and a man took care months before to get his name set down for a place. Thus God has enrolled the names of His people. They are written—where? In the earth? No; the wicked are written in the earth, but the names of the Lord's people are written in heaven. In the divine decree that never changes, in the divine heart that never alters, in the divine memory that never fails, in the divine thought that never forgets, all the names of the godly are written.

I do not know how to set this out, but I do want you to feel as if you were standing this morning in that great assembly with spiritual exercises going on around you, such as struggling against sin, striving for the mastery over error, patiently enduring pain, and working holy work. The Judge is looking on, with the crown in His hand, ready to place it upon each conqueror's head; the air breathes perfume, and is full of music, for all around is joy. If we all understand that this period is not comparable to a battle, whereof the result hangs in the balance, but comparable to those deeds of prowess wherewith of old men celebrated a victory, then the face of things is altered, and our toils are transfigured. We are here amid the throng, not as spectators only, but sharing in the overflowing joy. Oh, the bliss of feeling that even now heaven is begun below, and the sufferings of this present life are but a part of the glory of the Lord manifested in His people!

III. We will conclude by noticing the third point, which is—to be enjoyed. This is the essence of it all—"We are come," unto this general assembly and church of the firstborn. How then do we come? A difficulty meets us at the outset. You that have never thought of this great assembly which my imagination and heart have tried to picture this morning, you cannot come. The porter stands at the barrier, and keeps you back. You cry, "Let me come!" No, you may not come. This festival is only for the firstborn, and you are not that by nature. You must first be born again, and become one of the firstborn. The Spirit of God must make you a new creature in Christ Jesus, and then the porter will open the wicket, and say, "Come in, and welcome." Which part are you going to take in this great gathering? Will you fight against sin? Will you wrestle against error? Will you run for the crown? Will you sing or speak? What will you do in this great congress of all the saints? But these questions do not apply until first you are born from above.

Next, you must be enrolled. Your name must be written down, not in our church-book, but in the church-book of the Lord above. I would to God that some of you would be moved to say, "Oh, that my name were written there!" The name of every believer is upon Christ's heart and hand and shoulder. If thou believest that Jesus is the Christ, if thou art trusting in Him, thy name is among the enrolled.

But you say again, "How am I to get into that assembly? I hope I have been born again, and that my name is written among the Lord's redeemed people, but still I do not feel as if I were in the festive gathering yet; I feel more like one contending for very life." So did many at Olympus. They were fighting and wrestling, and while so engaged they endured great hardness; yet their valiant strike was a part of the grand scene, and they would not have been absent on any account. So, dear friends, what we must do is this, first—God helping us, let us partake in the joy of the one church.

If we wish to feel we are among the Lord's host let us participate in their service. There is something for you and for me to do; and to enjoy this holiday we must all take a share in its engagements. Come, brother, quicken your pace, you are not making enough progress in the divine life; hasten your steps, throw away every weight, and cast off the garment which entangles your feet. You, too, dear brother, over there in the workshop, where you hear bad language, and see bad practices—go you in for the wrestling; see what you can do; in the name of the Lord grasp the evil which opposes you; sling an evil custom on its back, and win a victory for purity and truth. Thus shall we each by vying with the rest contribute to the grand result, and share in the general triumph.

And when we are participating in the service, let us next feel that we can possess the inheritance. It is "the assembly of the firstborn;" let no man miss his birthright. See how the apostle introduces Esau as a warning, and how he bids us regard our afflictions as chastisements which prove our sonship. Come, then and rejoice in your Father's riches which are all your own. Let us not remain half-starved through the penury of our unbelief; but let us be filled to the full through the richness of the faith which the Spirit of God has wrought in us.

At this moment our question is, "Lord, what wilt thou have me to do?" Our cry is—"Here am I; send me." Use me, my Lord, glorify Thyself in me; and while the innumerable company of angels look on, help me to do and dare and wrestle and win, till Thou shalt give to me also the crown of life that fadeth not away. This will not be a payment of debt, but a gift of grace. The metaphor of a Greek assembly excludes all notion of wages for work. No mercenary thought entered the mind of a single Greek who strove for the mastery at the assembly. He had nothing to win but a crown of olive. No money was ever given; it would have degraded the panegiris to a common show. Therefore, you are not invited to contend that you may win a reward by your own merit. Ours is holiday work which it is joy to perform. Moved by a spiritual chivalry, saints do and dare for Jesus out of love to Him. His service is its own reward. To die for Him is life; to live for Him is heaven. Let others boast their pedigree and nationality, we have reached the august convocation of the ransomed of the Lord who have come to Zion with songs and everlasting joy upon their heads. Amen.

LIFE AMONG THE INDIANS OF THE FAR NORTHWEST.

THE Rev. W. Spendlove, a missionary among the Red Indians on the Mackenzie River, Northwest America, in a recent letter, gives some interesting details of his work for Christ, and his successes in leading many of these simple, hardy men to the Saviour. He says: "When I tell you that I am situated not far from the Arctic Circle you will at once conclude that I am beyond the boundary of civilization. The Mackenzie River is surpassed in length by only two or three others in the world, taking its rise far beyond what is called the 'Dominion of Canada.' On the banks of this fine river, about midway between the two great lakes, Great Bear Lake and Great Slave Lake, is my station situated. Here I have been laboring for more than two years, engaging in all kinds of duties which devolve upon a missionary to the Indians.

"Seeing then I am located in such a remote part, cut off from regular communications with the busy world, and having no means to obtain food—at least, a sufficiency—you will like to know how we keep body and soul together. The Fur Company, the only white settlers here, visit the borders of civilization once a year, to take out the furs and bring in articles of clothing, etc., to trade the same, when they bring us a small allowance of tea, sugar, coffee, flour, and raisins, which are enjoyed by us as luxuries. The rest of our provisions consists of wild animal food, anything that is really eatable. We eat the moose, deer, beaver, bear, and many wild birds. In the summer we have fish and many kinds of berries, the latter when ripe we preserve for winter use. But meat is our principal food, and when fresh it is wholesome, and is easily masticated, but when preserved by a process called drying, it is dry indeed, and requires teeth of iron to bite it, and a digestion nearly as strong.

Missionary Travelling in the Far North West.

Chinamen Burning the Goddess of Mercy.

"Upon arriving here I set to work learning the language—always a missionary's first task. After six months' study, combined with other duties, I could speak to the natives a little, and at the close of the first year could preach the Gospel in their tongue. The duties of most missionaries are many and various, the hands must work as well as the head, and sometimes the duties that devolve upon one in a single day are so diverse that really if a man cannot turn his hand to anything he will often find himself in difficulties. My church required a porch, so I tried my hand as a carpenter and built one, though I nearly cut off a finger; but experience teaches how to use axe and saw. The short, but hot summer, permits but little cultivation of the land, but this I tried, and succeeded in raising some fine vegetables. Then there is travelling, teaching school, preaching, attending to the sick, and a general supervision of household duties.

"We have no beasts of burden, no conveyances to ride in, no highways or hard roads, no streets. We get a few things from England once a year, which are doubled in value before they reach us, hence we require to be careful, so careful of buttons, needles, and cotton, in fact everything. Our supply of groceries is so limited that it only creates and not satisfies the desire for them. I have been upon five missionary journeys on snow shoes, walking sometimes two hundred miles, and the picture shows just how one looks while prosecuting such a journey.

"God is with us, and blessing the labor of our hands. The Red Indians have all joined themselves either to Protestant or Catholic missions, and have been and are willing to be taught God's Holy Word, and there are many among them who love the name of Jesus."

BURNING THE GODDESS OF MERCY.

(See Illustration.)

MR. JAMES CAMERON, missionary of Si-ch'uen, China, says: "In the course of conversation I laid my hand on the shoulder of the young brother of our host, and said to him, 'Were I to throw you into that fire, what would you do? Remain in it till you were burnt, eh?' 'No, certainly not.' 'Now, suppose I took an idol off that shelf at our back, and threw it in, would it come out, do you think?' He did not know. 'No, I am sure it would burn; and if so, how can it be a god, or how possibly save or protect you when it cannot do so for itself?' Thereupon Mr. Ho rose, went over to the shrine, and took an idol down, saying, 'We will just see what it can do.' Our host, in fear and excitement, besought him not to touch them, but it availed him nothing. Over it was brought, and when he had reseated himself he said, 'Of course it will burn.'

"He then held it well in the light of the fire and turned it slowly round, requesting them all to look well at it, and further asked what god it was. 'Oh, yes,' they all knew it, 'it was the Goddess of Mercy.' 'Yes,' he replied, 'it is so; and being a piece of wood will burn; so here goes the test, and on the fire he put it, face downward. There was for a little, until it began to ignite. On seeing this the host called out excitedly, 'See! see! it burns, it burns!' Silence was again obtained for a time, and all eyes were still fixed upon the burning idol, when lo! there rose from it a pale blue flame. Our host became quite troubled, and in fear shouted, 'Look! look! see the blue flames.' 'Yes,' Mr. Ho sarcastically replied, 'see it, that surely is the god; now take' (addressing his brothers) 'a little spirits and put it in the fire and you will have plenty of blue flames.' All assented to the correctness of this remark.

"We both now tried to impress upon their minds the folly of trusting such gods or fearing them either. As the idol burned away, all restraint was removed, and the conversation became general; many cutting remarks were made about their late honored goddess. 'See,' one would say 'it just burns like any other piece of wood.' Another took the tongs and turned it over to let the fire have a better hold upon it; one even had the temerity to spit upon it. But the climax was reached when 'mine host' lifted the tongs and caught the head of the idol and it came away a charred cinder. This set every one laughing, and for the rest of the evening there was not the faintest appearance of concern upon any. All agreed that the idols were useless, for had this one had power, it would have struck our friend dead, or in some way wreaked signal vengeance upon him; but no, there he sat as hale and hearty as before.

"On their confessing their belief in the folly of worshipping idols, we warned them against going to the other extreme; that is, of thinking there was no God. There certainly was a God, and Him they ought to love, serve, and obey. He was the Creator and Preserver of all. This God we worshipped daily, and we came to beseech men to worship Him too.

"After supper, when Mr. Ho was seeing the guests away, one of his brothers went to the shrine and, as an experiment, took an idol down, saying, 'I ALSO WILL BURN ONE.'

"Upon this his nephew said to him, 'No, you had better not. If he,' (meaning his own father) 'does so I cannot oppose him, but don't you attempt it.' The idol was at once returned to its place.

"On the father's return he took both idols down and said, 'Several generations in our family have worshipped these, but I am determined they shall be worshipped no more.' Before the last was consigned to the flames, curiosity quite mastered their fears; so they proposed to dissect the god. He was laid on the table, and the plug removed from the cavity in his back, when appeared the representatives of all the internal organs. These were carefully removed and laughed over, as one after another commented upon them. Silk threads were said to represent intestines, while several seeds did duty for heart, lungs, etc. The silk our hostess kept, as it could be used for sewing, but the rest of the things were given over to the fire with the idol. All traces of idolatry were then destroyed. The host said smiling, 'Well, that was a dear fire, those idols cost a large sum of money.'

WHY JACK BRADLEY EMIGRATED.

(See Illustration.)

It was a raw, cold morning in the month of January. The London streets were thick with a slush—half snow and half mud—which soaked through the scanty shoe-leather of the early wayfarers, and chilled them to the bone. In the busy district of Clerkenwell, the thoroughfares were already thronged with workers on their way to their daily toil. Among these were two men, honest-looking enough, but rather shabbily attired, who said but little to each other as they strode rapidly along, pulling with considerable energy at their short clay pipes.

"Bitingly cold!" exclaimed the slimmer of the two, taking the pipe for a moment from between his chattering teeth, "I wish we were there!"

"'Tis so," rejoined his companion, "no mistake about that; my feet are like ice."

They trudged on for a few minutes more in silence, and then the first speaker again spoke.

"Have you the price of a drink, Jack? I am clean stumped myself, down to the very last penny, and I should like summat afore going in."

"Not a brass farden, Bill, sorry to say. My missus took my last tuppence afore I come out. Said she wanted it for breakfast."

Again they trudged on in moody silence, pulling harder than ever at their pipes. By-and-by the more talkative one again broke out.

"I say, Jack, I'll tell you what we'll do. We'll get old Wylie to stick us up two 'goes' till Saturday."

"Hum!" responded Jack, rather dubiously, "We may try, but I don't believe he'll do it."

"Won't he? Not after all the money he's had of us? We'll try him, as you say, anyhow."

The Black Bull Tavern, owned by Jonas Wylie, Esq. Guardian of the Poor and Churchwarden of the parish, stood but a few doors from the factory where Jack Bradley and Bill Morgan worked and, having still five minutes to spare, the two men pushed open the familiar door and walked in. It wasn't much more than six hours since they last stood before the bar, yet the place seemed greatly changed. Behind the bar, instead of the portly frame and ruddy countenance of the host, stood a shock-headed potman, with unwashed face and sleeves rolled up, sweeping out the room. In front of the bar, where stood the laughing, talking crowd, a shivering, threadbare wretch, slowly sipped a glass of hot gin.

"Good morning, Tom," said Morgan, addressing the potman, whom he knew quite well, in a tone of unusual respect; "Guv'nor ain't up, I s'pose? But you'll do as well; me and Jack 'ud like a drop o' gin 'ot, and pay on Saturday."

The potman paused for a moment and surveyed the two workmen with a look in which contempt and amusement struggled for the mastery. The next, turning to his broom, and not even deigning to look at them, he gruffly observed that, "It weren't no use; agin the rules; couldn't do it."

With a look of indignation mingled with disappointment, and a few expressive words, Bradley and Morgan bounced out of the Black Bull, and into their workshop.

"Fools that we are!" said Bradley to his mate, as they stood at their bench, "to give that man nearly a fourth of our earnings every week, as we do, and then, on a morning like this, to be refused two days' credit for a glass of gin!"

Morgan could hardly trust himself to speak, he was so enraged: and simply said he would never spend another penny at the Black Bull. Bradley's resolution took a wider range. He was an older and more thoughtful man. He was, moreover, not so complete a slave to the drink passion as was his younger companion, and so, while the one only vowed that he would transfer his custom to another tavern, the other determined, with God's help, to give it up at once and forever. Pursuing this train of thought, he continued:

"Bill, do you know I think I shall carry out that notion of my old woman's and emigrate. She is quite right. I haven't the strength to resist the temptation of company, the jaw and the song turns my head, and then I makes a beast of myself, and paupers of her and the young 'uns. And if, as she says, I had a fair start in a new place, and among new faces, I shouldn't have the temptation. I'm really more than inclined to try it!"

Bill Morgan felt the force of his comrade's reasoning, and though he shrank from appropriating it to his own case, he did not attempt to persuade Jack out of his resolution. The matter was soon arranged, and without much difficulty. Bradley's master, a real philanthropist, lent him the necessary passage-money; and on a fine spring morning Jack, his wife, and his little ones, sailed for New Zealand.

"Good-by Bill," said he, shaking his old comrade's hand warmly—for Morgan and his wife and little girl and two neighbors had come to see the emigrants off; "Good-by! I wish you were coming with us."

"So do I," responded Bill, rather mechanically; "but I don't think I could stand it."

The Emigrants' Farewell.

They stepped into a little wherry, which took them with other emigrants out to the ship in the middle of the river. As they were being rowed slowly, Morgan and his wife waved a last adieu from the landing-stage, which was responded to by Bradley and his family. The next minute they were on board, and then Jack went below to look after their berths, and did not come on deck again until the ship had passed Gravesend. He never saw his mate, Bill Morgan, again!

In his new home Jack Bradley prospered far beyond his hopes. In three years from his departure he revisited the old country to repay the money lent him by his old master, and to take Bill Morgan out with him to New Zealand. He found his master hale and well, the old factory looking just the same, and the Black Bull as bright and flashy as ever. But Jonas Wylie, Esq., Guardian of the Poor and Churchwarden of the parish, was no longer there. A fit of apoplexy had terminated his career. And as for Bill Morgan, all that remained of him was lying underground in a pauper's grave. His little girl lies under him, and his widow is in the workhouse. Back o'er the wide ocean, with a heavy heart, goes Jack Bradley to his new home, pondering over the miserable fate of his old boon companion, and thanks God for taking him out of "the horrible pit and out of the miry clay, and for setting his feet upon a rock." For not only has he been redeemed from the bondage of drink, but has found forgiveness for the past, through the precious blood of Christ.

IDOLATRY AND SORCERY IN AFRICA.

ONE of the missionaries on the Congo says: "The fields around us are white to harvest." A few days ago a chief inquired "Why do you not come to my town and teach my people about God?" I replied that as his town was so near Palaballa, where I am, I thought his people might attend service here; but I said, "If you wish it I will have a meeting at your town every Sunday." He appeared very much pleased. His name is Nikiangalla; he is considered a very great medicine man.

"A headman of the town, named Magibba, professed to be able to make the idols talk. I challenged him before the whole town to do so, and promised that if he accomplished the feat I would give him ten bales of cloth. Of course he could not do it, and had to acknowledge so before the whole assembly. The women seemed especially pleased at this public confession of his weakness. The people are losing faith in their idols. Oh, that Christ would take up His abode in their hearts. "There are six towns governed by an old king named Kakumpaka. He is a most superstitious old man. I am told he has killed more than eighty persons since he began to reign for witchcraft alone. During the three years previous to my arrival more than ten suffered death for the same thing, which means for no crime at all; but during the two years I have been here only one has been killed, though there have been many occasions on which others would have shared the same fate had I not been there. When I first arrived the fetish drum was ever going, now months pass without it being heard at all. This time last year there was an idol house in the town, but the house and the idols are alike destroyed now, and Christian services held on the site. The palaver house used to be filled with charms on the floor, on the walls, hanging from the roof—charms on every side; now they have vanished.

"Oh, this poor, bleeding Africa! Could we but lift the curtain and display its undressed and terrible moral sores, people at home would surely deny themselves more, in order to send hither the 'balm of Gilead!'"

ONLY A TRAMP. A Serial Story by Grace Stebbing.

The Mayor Forges a Chain.

WHEN Mr. Barnes first took the wanderer into his employment, he was full of benevolent schemes for making his return to duties proper to his own station in life agreeable to him; but Jim Blake appeared on the scene, the new-comer took the burden of him upon his shoulders, and, business matters were pressing. Wynn proved very useful in the office, and those more stirring affairs on which he was to have been employed were entrusted to the two travellers for the manufactory.

Enid Barnes did once say to her father, as Jim Blake observed later on, "Our tramp must be feeling like a caged lion, papa, in that atom of an office of yours from eight in the morning till nearly seven at night."

But her father laughed rather absently. A post had come in with important letters. "Anyway, little Birdie, the cage seems to agree with the lion. His cheeks are filling out. But he must get a holiday all the same when the summer comes round."

And so he put aside all idea of widening the cage meantime; and thus it came to pass that Jim Blake, on that fifth of April, gave Mrs. Williams his private opinion that before the date for summer holidays came round, the man who had so recently drifted into Silverdale would have drifted away from them all again out into the wide world. Thus it came to pass that Charles Wynn made a sudden effort to secure friends for Jim Blake to take the place of himself, and that he gave a present to little Bobby Balston that should do as a parting keepsake. He trusted that he should see him again in future years ; but he had almost made up his mind not to see him again in the present. It would be so painful to say good-by to the child.

About the same time that Charles Wynn turned down the short lane that led to the Williams's cottage, the Mayor of Southford drove up to Silverdale vicarage. He very often did drive over on Saturdays to treat himself to a holiday hour with the vicar or Sir Edmond Wright, or Captain and Mrs. Richardson ; but on the present occasion his visit was to do a good turn to Mr. Copleston, by extending a helping hand to one of his parishioners.

Bobby Balston's eldest brother, a good-humored ordinary sort of boy, was just thirteen, and Mrs. Balston was so anxious to get him into Mr. Barnes's factory that Mr. Copleston had written a few words for her on the subject to the manufacturer. The note was answered in person.

"I thought," said the mayor, as he drove into the gate, and his friend came across the lawn to him—"I thought if you could spare ten minutes to take me to the Balstons, we might clinch that matter about their boy on the spot, and he might begin work at once, on Monday. My foreman has found a decent woman he can lodge with."

"Decidedly your promptitude is a blessing to your friends, whatever it may have done for yourself," said Mr. Copleston laughing, and without more ado accepting the proffered seat in the gig.

When the two gentlemen arrived at the Balstons' the immediate business on hand was interrupted by finding small Bobby in tears, and both Bob the elder and his mother engaged in vain attempts to soothe him. On seeing the mayor, Mary Balston exclaimed in a tone of great relief :

"There, child, now here's the good mayor himself to tell you as you are quite out in your fears. Mother's silly little bonny."

"But what are the fears that I'm to tell him he's out in?" asked Mr. Barnes, looking a good deal puzzled.

"Why, sir, if you please, that Mr. Wynn is going away on the tramp again. Bobby here has seen him to-day, and declares he means to go away."

Mr. Barnes started, and his face flushed. "Surely not ; he cannot be meaning to go away. He has said not a syllable of the sort to me. Where is he now?"

"He went down the way to Mrs. Williams's, please, sir," said Jessy Balston shyly.

Mr. Barnes put his hand over his eyes for a moment in thought. Then turning to Bob the elder to ask him to hold his horse a for few minutes, he begged his companion to step down with him to the other cottage. As they turned into the short lane a savoury smell of fried bacon, hot apple puffs, and hot cake saluted them, and through the open window of the sitting-room they caught a glimpse of a bountifully-spread table, and a party of four gathered around it. They also caught the sound of a few words from the owner of a certain broad back placed against the window. The words were grave and sad, but very distinct.

"If I do go away, I shall certainly come back and see you all again some day, if I live."

"I should hope so indeed," came a stentorian shout, followed almost immediately by a tremendous thump, intended as a hearty mark of friendship, on the aforesaid broad back, so conveniently placed by the window for those outside to operate upon.

"Meanwhile," continued the stentorian voice, "in order to coming back again it is necessary first to go away, so can you be ready to start for Brussels by six o'clock on Monday? You won't need to take much with you ; my business won't take you more than three days, I expect."

Ten minutes later, as Mr. Barnes bid the vicar good-by at the vicarage, he said, with a laugh :

"Well, come now, I did expect a little bit of praise for that bit of promptitude."

"But it was so wonderful that you took my breath away," came the reply, with an answering laugh ; "but surely you have not really anything requiring to be done in Brussels?"

The manufacturer shrugged his shoulders. "I've always things to be done everywhere. This move will only necessitate my telegraphing to another fellow to go off somewhere else. When Wynn comes back he shall be set to form a cricketing society and a debating club. He shall not get free of my chains yet awhile. We'll find him plenty of stirring work to do between times, if that's what the young fellow wants, you'll see. Our fine piece of restlessness won't tramp it again for good and all from these parts, not just this next summer or two, now he's once fairly woke me up to the danger. Good-by."

The mayor was already half-way back to Southford before three out of four of the party assembled at tea in the Williams's cottage felt that it was quite possible for them to draw a full, free breath again. It was quite as much as Mrs. Williams could do to go on pouring out cups of tea, and cutting generous slices of cake. As for James Williams, her husband, he was quite beyond remembering to attend to his duties as host. As he expressed it afterward—"His wits was that flustered as he couldn't seem rightly to remember the way to his own mouth, let alone reminding of other folks to find the way to fill theirs."

"And what beats me," he ejaculated, twenty minutes or so after Mr. Barnes and the vicar had driven away—"what beats me is, as you look, sittin' there, as cool as a cucumber. One might think, to see you, as mayor had just come around to tell you that he'd like you to step over to Worroton, three miles t'other side o' Southford, Monday mornin' ; you couldn't look no cooler."

"Possibly not," said Wynn, laughing. "But at any rate I should not feel half so pleased. You see I have had so much running about over long distances the past half of my life, that expeditions seem to come as naturally into my day's work as fixing book-covers does into yours."

"And you don't feel, not to say, afeard to trust yourself along o' they foreigners?" said Mrs. Williams, with something of a sigh of pity for her adventurous guest. She had heard of Bonaparte in her early childhood, and his dreaded troops, and all peoples across the water had some imaginary connection in her mind with terrible individuals, who made English bread dear, put Englishmen in prison when they could catch them, and were still ever on the watch for a convenient opportunity to swallow up England itself.

But it was no good. Compassion had no effect in lessening the tramp's contented smiles ; and astonishment at the tranquility with which he contemplated the immediate prospect before him did not succeed in awakening an answering surprise in himself. However, in spite of his absence of sympathy in these respects, he rose very high in favor with his entertainers during the couple of hours that he favored them with his company, and when at length he and Jim said good-by, and set out on their homeward route, many an earnest hope that he would return safely from "foreign lands" was sent after him, and many a heartfelt invitation was bestowed upon both young men to repeat their visit as soon and as often as they pleased.

Williams was as glad as his wife when Charles Wynn presented himself, two or three weeks later, to report himself whole and uninjured from his expedition.

Two days before Christmas, and a large group of people gathered around the Silverdale vicarage dining-table engaged, not in eating and drinking, but in admiring a bright new silver teapot, with an engraved inscription on it, to the effect that the vicar and parishioners of Silverdale presented it to James Williams, in token of their respect for the efficient and upright way in which he had, for twenty-five years, performed the duties of clerk of that parish.

The parishioner who had headed the subscription was Sir Edmond Wright, with a five-pound note ; the tail was dear little Bobby Balston, with a big penny and a new farthing, which he gave to Florry one Sunday as they were coming together out of church, with the whispered request that she would "put it in the bag for the ferription."

"And it is quite decided that we give it the day before Christmas, and not the day after?" asked Mr. Copleston.

"Oh, yes, yes, to-morrow, to-morrow !" shouted such a chorus of voices that the vicar clapped his hands over his ears. "I beg your pardon, Lady Wright," he said, laughing ; "but it is not the sound of your voice, nor of my wife's, that I wish to shut out."

"No, of course not ; it's Edith's," shouted Frank, and Florry, and Harry, and Guy Patterson, and Tod Wright, all at once.

Herbert Richardson put the teapot down. Shall I punch their impudent heads for you, Miss Copleston?"

"Well, not Florry's perhaps," was the laughing answer.

"No ; he'll only pull her curls," said Hal, doing the deed himself at the same time. "But seriously, father," he added after a moment, "you do yourself think it will be jollier for Williams to have the pleasant thing to think of on Christmas-day, don't you?"

"Well, yes, I suppose I do, taking everything into consideration. But now, that preliminary question being settled, comes the second one, who is to give it to him? I say you, Squire."

"And I say you, Vicar," was the smiling retort.

"How nice it would be if our tramp could give it," said Florry thoughtfully.

"The very thing !" shouted Frank. "He's the very jolliest fellow out. You should have seen him playing in the football-match yesterday, father ; it was grand. And how he did rouse up that Jem Blake. He made him almost as plucky as himself before the day was over. Williams ought to be proud to have his testimonial presented to him by such a first-rate fellow."

"More than if papa gave it to him?" murmured Edith, in an accent of hurt surprise.

"No, Eds, of course not," muttered back Frank reproachfully. "You know that I can't mean that ; but father seemed not to want to give it."

At that minute there was a tap at the room door, and Susan appeared with the information—"If you please, sir, Mr. Wynn with a message from the mayor."

"Ask him to come here, Susan," said the vicar, and almost immediately after a fine, soberly-dressed, earnest-faced man stood in the doorway, and received such a hearty, universal welcome, that he was compelled to dispense with diffidence, and make one of the large group already assembled in the room.

Florry danced up to him. "Isn't it a lovely teapot, my —" and there she stopped suddenly, and the color rushed into her fair little face, but Charles Wynn smiled, and laid his hand gently on the child's curls, as he said to her quietly :

"Don't leave off calling me your tramp, little one, I have learned to like the name since I have been made so happy here among you all."

Then raising his other hand he put a parcel into one of hers, saying, "There, Mr. Barnes has sent those to go with the teapot, and I was to deliver them to you. He says he was obliged to send them, I was especially to tell you, because you told him that he must not subscribe to the testimonial."

Florry laughed. "So I did tell him, because he isn't a Silverdale parishioner of course, and he would have had to have a little inscription all to himself on the teapot, you know, which would have looked rather funny, I think. This is much nicer. Williams has got two things this way, instead of one."

And thereupon the parcel was opened, and six silver teaspoons disclosed to view, which it was at once unanimously decided to the great satisfaction of all the boys, that at any rate Charles Wynn must and should present for his otherwise engaged employer, whoever might present the teapot. Sir Edmond Wright had business in Southford the next day, and promised to call for him in his carriage at five o'clock to bring him over.

And then the mayor's clerk said good-by, mounted the mayor's dog-cart again, taking up Hal Copleston with him, to be dropped at the Williams's cottage, where he delivered the demurely-received, but thoroughly understood message, that Williams was required to attend at the school-room at half-past six the next evening. From there Wynn drove to Betty Sharplin's home, and having had a five minutes' chat with her he departed, leaving behind him his own Christmas gift to her, consisting of a basketful of all manner of groceries, which he managed to smuggle in under the table without her knowledge. However, she took care not to let him off without thanks when she saw him in the school-room the next day.

"Thank you—sir," said James Williamis with an obstinate little quiver of a smile, which refused to be suppressed, as he received the silver spoons; "I thought when first I see you as you was born to the title, but you've got it in a better way now; for you've earned it, and I don't mind sayin', as it's my firm belief as ten years hence there won't be a better-liked nor a better-honored gentleman around these parts than Mr. Charles Wynn, the tramp."

"Hold him then! hold him!" shouted little Bobby Balston excitedly, "for he's going to tramp now."

And so he was, and Bobby's warning came too late. Quite unable to bear the general attention called to him by Williams's little speech, Charles Wynn had escaped through the near side-door, and was already once more on the tramp, but only on the tramp to Southford, where one day we may hear of him again.

THE END.

AFTER THE RESURRECTION.

S. S. Lesson for December 17. Mark 16 : 9-20. Golden Text, Verse 15. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Incredulity of the Disciples—A Scarce Type of Christians—Lives that Prove that Jesus Lives—The Two Warring Natures—Deliverance from Diseases not Expected—Lunatics not now Brought to Christ—The Walk to Emmaus—The Benediction of Peace—The Unlimited Commission—The Faith Confessed—The Signs Following—The Signs in the Primitive Church.

THE testimony of Mary that Jesus was alive received no credence among the disciples. What an apt type of the condition of the Christian church in our day! Men are ready enough to receive doctrine, to discuss it, prove it from Scripture, preach it, write about it. Professing Christians are ready enough to do all which is expected of them in the little world to which they belong; whether it be to conduct a prayer-meeting, or to lead in a croquet party; and there are such as contrive to excel in both. But those are few and far between who prove to a skeptical world whether they will receive it or not that JESUS LIVES.

There are few who dare step out in advance of their fellow-Christians, and claim that Pentecost belongs to us now, and that apostolic power has not ceased with apostolic times. There are those, indeed, who like religious life well enough so long as it is confined to certain limits, and so long as it does not shock conventional propriety. Away with such limiting of the Holy One of Israel! God is King, let us learn our true place, and be small that He may have room in our hearts and lives to move and work and manifest Himself.

"We have two natures," say some believers, "and we cannot help ourselves, we mourn over the evil of our hearts, but it will be the same until we die." "God hath not called us unto uncleanness, but unto holiness" (1 Thess. 4 : 7), and most surely He does not call us to that which he makes impossible, He calls us to be pure "even as He is pure," "righteous even as He is righteous" (1 John 3 : 3, 7). Practically, men believe that their evil nature is more mighty than God, they expect it to exercise its power and of course it does so; let them put as much faith in God's deliverance as they do in sin's tyranny, and they will know assuredly that Jesus lives. (Rom. 7 : 23-25.)

There are men who are quite shocked at the idea that Christians should expect in these days deliverance from their diseases; they say we are not to look for such things, the days of miracles are past. God is to them as though He were deaf and dumb, and maimed. To them Jesus is as though He were still in the grave. Many persuade themselves that it is more according to the mind of God that they should remain continually and incurably sick, and are perhaps little aware of the subtlety of unbelief in their hearts, which dare not put God to the test, which dare not have to do with a real, living, present Christ.

There is a latent conviction that these habits of disease are of too long standing, and that the organs are too much impaired for restoration, and every plausible excuse is made for this unbelief of heart. There are few who have the holdness to bring a poor lunatic to Him who was manifested to destroy the works of the devil, and these poor victims of Satan's rage are often so hedged round by well-meant supervision, that any spiritual influence, the only thing which, in many cases, can prevail, is carefully excluded.

EVEN BY THEIR MAKER;

Jesus lived, but none of the chosen twelve as yet believed in His resurrection. He appeared to two, not of the twelve, "as they walked and went into the country." We well know the history of that blessed walk and converse with Jesus about Himself, and how He "was known unto them in breaking of bread." We know how He had charged them with their slowness of heart to believe all that the prophets had spoken, how He opened to them the Scriptures, and their hearts burned within them. Yet when "they went and told it unto the residue, neither believed they them."

"JESUS AND THE RESURRECTION" was to be the theme of the God-filled men who were sent out to win a world to God. No wonder the great enemy of souls made all the stand possible against the declaration of this mighty fact.

"Afterward He appeared unto the eleven as they sat at meat, and upbraided them with their unbelief and hardness of heart, because they believed not them which had seen Him after He was risen." From Luke's Gospel we find that more than the eleven were present, it is added "and them that were with them" (Luke 24 : 33). Probably the company was the same as mentioned in Acts 1 : 13-15, but only the eleven received the reproach of the Lord because they had been instructed about His resurrection.

Both Luke and John tell us that His first words were,

"PEACE BE UNTO YOU;"

and "He shewed unto them His hands and His side," and said, "Behold My hands and My feet, that it is I Myself : handle Me and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones, as ye see Me have." Were they not guilty? Had they deserved such love? Surely not; yet he met them with a message of peace. Oh, how the meaning of the cross must have flooded their minds at this moment! Oh, how their hearts must have been thrilled through and through as the meaning of those wounds for them, dawned upon their hitherto dull and unbelieving hearts!

In token of His complete reconciliation He sat at meat and ate with them, and then unfolded to them their apostleship, "Go ye into all the world, and preach the Gospel to every creature." "As My Father hath sent Me, even so send I you" (John 20 : 21). Here is the commission to "the eleven and they that were with them," the call to those who have peace with God through Jesus Christ our Lord. God has given us peace, not for ourselves alone, but that we may make known the glad news to a lost, perishing, unhappy world; and the only limit to our commission is

"EVERY CREATURE."

He has excepted none; dare we make exceptions? He includes the poor and the rich, the high and the low, our own fellow-countrymen and those in foreign lands; the sane and the insane, the sick and the healthy, the intelligent and the imbecile, "every creature," excludes none. Here is our call : How are we fulfilling it? What are we doing with those who are indisputably within our reach? How about the members of our own houses? How about those who work with us? Are they saved? Have we been sent of Christ to them as He was sent of His Father, and have they been constrained to recognize the divine authority of the message which we brought to them?

The Lord added, "He that believeth, and is baptized shall be saved, but he that believeth not shall be damned." Although we are responsible to carry the message of God, in the power of God, and in His Spirit, to every creature, yet when once the soul has been brought into contact with God, and will not receive the message, then the responsibility of rejecting Christ becomes his own. God asks of a lost soul who is fleeing from self and sin, but one thing, and that is to believe; to receive the message which has been given him, to take, to have, and to thank God for, the Saviour who has undertaken his whole case. And he who rejects his rightful Lord, and counts himself "unworthy of everlasting life" (Acts 13 : 46), can meet with but one possible result, "He that believeth not shall be damned."

And God calls, not simply for an unconfessed faith, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved." We are not going to enter upon the disputed question of infant baptism, enough to recognize here that unless a faith leads to a public confession of Christ, unless a man commits himself, there is no promise that he shall be saved. "If thou shalt confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and shalt believe in thine heart that God raised Him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (Rom. 10 : 9).

With the commission of our Lord to His disciples, we find from John 20 : 22, 23, "He breathed on them, and saith unto them, Receive ye the Holy Ghost : whosoever sins ye remit, they are remitted unto them; and whosoever sins ye retain, they are retained." And here we may remember the words of our Lord to His disciples, "It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father which speaketh in you." This makes the rejection of one who speaks by the Spirit of God to be such a terrible thing, it is really of God, and this a man cannot do unconsciously.

Our Lord continued, "And these signs shall follow them which believe; in My Name shall they cast out devils; they shall speak with new tongues; they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them; they shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover." Who can say in the face of such words that the Lord has withdrawn from His church the power of healing, speaking new tongues, and of casting out devils? "How is it then," you will ask, "that we do not see these signs? We say boldly that they which believe do see them, that the healing of the sick by faith in the name of Jesus is continually going on; and there are hundreds of witnesses to it. The casting out of devils is going on, and there are instances of a blessed power to speak foreign languages in what, to anything but faith, would seem a remarkable manner. Let those who doubt attend faith healing meetings, which are held in various parts of America, Switzerland, Germany, and England, and let them confess that God is among us of a truth.

But where these signs do not follow, what then? The case is proved by the Word of God, the spoken words of Jesus, they do not believe, their faith is deficient. Where they believe the signs follow, where the signs do not follow, men do not believe. Let history speak : For the first six centuries the writings of the fathers testify to healing by faith as being prevalent in their days. Here and there the more spiritual in the Roman Catholic Church, before the Reformation, testify to the same thing. Catherine of Sienna was a witness to it. Luther knew it. The first leaders of the Wesleyan movement, and also the friends of Edward Irving. Wherever primitive faith has been revived, there the gifts of the early church have reappeared.

Lord, stir us up, educate our faith, fill us with Thyself, that we may not hinder Thee from carrying out Thy purposes. "So then after the Lord had spoken unto them, He was received up into heaven, and sat on the right hand of God. And they went forth, and preached everywhere, the Lord working with them, and confirming the Word with signs following." Lord, make these days live again for Jesus' sake. Amen.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Queen Victoria's Speech to the British Parliament on Saturday contained two significant announcements. The speech, which is always the production of the cabinet, but approved by the queen, was delivered by commission on the occasion of the Houses being prorogued at the close of the special fall session. With respect to Egyptian affairs the Queen said: "The recent events in Egypt have enhanced my obligations in regard to its affairs. I shall study to discharge my duties in such a manner as to maintain international engagements, uphold and consolidate the privileges which have been successively acquired, promote the happiness of the people and the prudent development of their institutions, and avoid any measure which might tend toward disturbing the tranquility of the East. I feel confident that my aims and the result of my counsels will commend themselves to the approval of the Powers, my allies, in their several relations to that interesting region." Alluding to the revenue of Great Britain the Queen said: "The growth of the revenue has been sensibly retarded by a cause, which in itself is to be contemplated with satisfaction. I refer to the diminution of the receipts of the Exchequer from duties on intoxicating liquors." England can well afford to dispense with a portion of her revenue, if at the same time her people drink less intoxicating liquor. It is gratifying to notice that the Queen and her ministers recognize that fact.

In the Session of Parliament now Closed, the chief and almost the only work effected is the passage of the new rules regulating the procedure of the House of Commons, which enable the majority in that House to summarily close a debate at will. That power is hedged around with limitations and restrictions for the protection of the rights of minorities, but it has been passed substantially as originally proposed by the cabinet. Mr. Gladstone is praised by the British Press for the tact with which he has managed to keep the House of Commons to that one work and prevent lengthy debates on Egypt and Ireland.

A Fresh Outbreak of Crime is Reported from Dublin. A man named Field was stabbed in Frederick Street on November 27th. He was a member of the jury that recently convicted a gang of desperadoes. His wounds were serious, but being promptly removed to the hospital, where they were dressed, it is expected that he will recover. On November 25th a detective was shot dead in the street. He and two brother officers were watching a group of suspicious looking men who were congregated near a tavern frequented by Fenians. The moon was shining brightly and the detectives crossed the street to see what they were doing. The order to fire was given by some one in the group, and Detective Cox fell shot through the head. The detectives then opened fire and the man who shot the detective was wounded and captured. In consequence of these and other crimes Dublin has been placed under the Curfew clauses of the Coercion Act, which authorizes the police to arrest any one found in the street during the interval between an hour after sunset and an hour before sunrise.

The Two Prominent Irish Leaders, Mr. Michael Davitt and Mr. Healy, M. P., have been summoned to appear in court and bring sureties for their future good behavior. Mr. Davitt was summoned, because on Sunday, November 26th, he made a speech at Navan in Ireland, in the course of which he said, referring to the threatened famine in the west of Ireland, that the tenant farmers should not starve. They would compel the government that prevents them from living on the soil to support them during the winter. In case they were unsuccessful in getting the government to do its duty, he proposed to make the landlords support the people. If Mr. Gladstone did not apply the surplus of the arrears estimate to save the people, then no rent should be paid from November until May. In 1848, Mr. Davitt said, Archbishop Hughes declared in New York that a man threatened with hunger would be justified in seizing bread upon the altar. How much more justified would the Irish be in feeding their destitute from the tribute they are compelled to pay to felonious landlordism? Mr. Davitt states that he will not seek sureties, but will prefer to go to jail. Mr. Trevelyan, the Secretary for Ireland, has stated in Parliament that if inflammatory speeches are continued in the meetings of the National League, that organization will, like the Land League, be declared illegal.

The Report that the Russian Minister of finance has ordered the coinage of coronation medals is taken as evidence in Europe that the long-delayed ceremony of crowning the Czar is about to take place. It is stated that the preparations for the event will occupy several months. In the interval it is expected that the Czar will take up his residence in his capital, and extraordinary precautions are being taken in St. Petersburg to insure his safety. At the recent visit of the Imperial family to the city, police were stationed at intervals of only six yards, and the soldiers were massed outside the barracks. The coronation medals mentioned, will, it appears, be an innovation. The Czar has insisted that the profile of his wife shall appear with his own on the medal. On the reverse side will be the Russian arms and the words in Russian, "God with us."

The Floods in Europe, though Generally receding, still give cause for alarm. It was announced in the Prussian Diet on November 30th, that the worst was over, and that the Rhine had fallen a foot and a half in the last twenty-four hours. Detailed reports received show that there is six feet of water in the streets of Cologne, Coblenz, and Bonn. At the last named place 490 houses are submerged, and nearly all the provisions and fodder in the town have been destroyed. There is much sickness in the flooded districts, especially among the children and the poor. The Prussian Diet will be asked to vote a sum for the relief of the sufferers, when the amount of their losses can be estimated. There are also extensive inundations in Holland. Large tracts of country are already submerged, and the rivers are still rising. The river Seine continues to rise. The cellars of the Palais de Justice, in Paris, and the Tribunal of Commerce building are flooded.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Concluded their mission at Cambridge, England, on November 11th. At the University meeting, in reply to an invitation that all who had found peace in Christ that week, or desired to find it, should go into the adjourning room, four hundred undergraduates of the university immediately responded. The next day, November 12th, the evangelists began a seven days' mission at Oxford, and from the first secured overflowing and most enthusiastic meetings. At one of the earlier of the services the undergraduates made a slight disturbance. Mr. Moody said that all he wanted was fair play, and if they did not want to hear him he would leave. He desired those who wished him to continue his address to stand up, and nearly all present did so. His subsequent meetings were very rich in instances of conversion to Christ. A brief but promising campaign was opened at Torquay. A meeting of those interested in the expected visit of Messrs. Moody and Sankey to Dublin on January 18th, was recently held. It was resolved to welcome the evangelists cordially and co-operate with them in every way. It was also recommended that Christian workers should be admitted to the inquiry rooms by ticket only.

The Return of the Jews to Palestine does not appear to be expected by the dons of the English universities. The will of the late Rev. N. M. P. Lushington Tilson contained a bequest to the effect that the sum of $5000 free of duty be offered to the University of Oxford, and, if declined, then to the University of Cambridge, "for the proper authorities to apply to the payment of a sum yearly to a preacher, to be selected by them—being of strictly Evangelical or Low Church views—who shall preach in the University pulpit two sermons at least annually upon the past history and religion of the Jewish nation, and upon the prophecies in Holy Writ relating to the return of that nation to Judea and the restoration to it of its former glory; and this bequest to be called 'The Lushington Tilson Bequest,' and one of these sermons, at least, is to be published afterward." The University of Oxford declining the bequest, it was referred by the council of the Senate of Cambridge to the Select Preaching Syndicate, by whom a unanimous opinion has been expressed that the offer should be declined. The Council concur in this opinion. This twofold decision sufficiently indicates the judgment of the leading universities of Great Britain concerning the return of the Jews to the Holy Land.

Mr. R. T. Booth, the American Gospel Temperance speaker, whose work in Great Britain has been very successful, has been compelled by illness to discontinue his labors. He has been for some time past in a most delicate condition of health through overwork, and has at last, much against his inclination, been compelled to cancel all his engagements for several months to come. After examination at Bath two weeks ago by four medical gentlemen, the fact was made known that Mr. Booth's lungs are seriously affected, and that his only chance of recovery is complete rest. He has, therefore, been ordered at once to the South of France for the winter months.

The Cost of the War in Egypt is Estimated at fifteen million dollars. Mr. Gladstone, in explaining the charge to the House of Commons, said that the sum mentioned included five millions for the expenses of the Indian contingent. The total cost, including the transportation of the troops home, was estimated at $17,500,000. This cost, he said, was down to the first of October. From that date the charge will be borne either wholly or in part by Egypt.

A Brave Lady's Heroism is Described in an English paper. Mrs. G. A. D. M'Arthur Campbell, formerly a resident of Coonambie, near Sydney, New South Wales, distinguished herself by a deed of admirable bravery. Mrs. Campbell was a passenger in a steamer from Hong Kong to one of the northern ports of Queensland, and one day a little boy about four years of age, to whom the lady was much attached, fell overboard, the accident occurring through a sudden lurch of the vessel. With the exception of Mrs. Campbell and the man at the wheel, all the passengers and crew were at dinner. Without waiting for a lifebuoy or divesting herself of any clothing, and simply saying to the man at the wheel, "Don't tell the child's mother," Mrs. Campbell plunged into the water, swam to the boy, and held him up till both were rescued, the steamer having been promptly stopped and a boat lowered. This incident reminds us of those who engage in acts of loving self-sacrifice, for the salvation of the souls of sinners, who are in danger of being lost in the deep dark sea of iniquity into which they have fallen. Not for self-praise, but for Christ's glory, are they willing to "count all things but loss," that they may save men.

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BINDER.

NUMEROUS applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case, in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed and kept clean for binding, at the end of the year. To meet this demand a stock of such covers has been prepared and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address, on the receipt of one dollar. Applications should be made to THE MANAGER, 63 Bible House, New York.

THOMAS C. GARLAND, THE SEAMEN'S MISSIONARY: SCENES IN HIS WORK.

MR. T. C. GARLAND,

CHRISTIAN work among seamen is one of the most interesting spheres of labor in which the man of God can engage. The life of Father Taylor, of Boston, Mass., which appeared with his portrait in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of November 24th, 1881, abundantly proved that fact. This week we give the portrait and life of a man who is doing, and has done for a long time past, a similar work for the seamen of Great Britain to that which Mr. Taylor did for the seamen of America. In his work, recently published, entitled "Leaves from my Log," many thrilling incidents are related by Mr. Garland, which show that God is perpetually watching over and guarding the lives of those who serve Him and encourages them by marvellous tokens of His loving help. The following narrative gleaned from his book contains a few of those incidents which may serve to encourage Christian workers who may be depressed by the coldness and lack of sympathy they too often encounter. They show that though the world may scoff and the Christian Church be indifferent, He whom they serve is cognizant of their labors and is watching over them.

Thomas Charles Garland, whose portrait appears this week on our front page, is now sixty-one years of age, having been born at Penn, England, on June 14th, 1821. His parents were godly people. From a very early period of his history he was conscious of the fact that he was a sinner in need of salvation. So powerfully at times during his boyhood did the Holy Spirit strive with him, that he would steal away from his brothers and sisters, and in a grassy dell a short distance from the house, would earnestly pray to God to pardon his sins and make him a Christian.

PERILS IN CHILDHOOD.

The man who was destined to labor so successfully for Christ would have perished in childhood, but for the providential interposition of God; for he was often near a violent death. Mr. Garland received his education at the village school, and seems to have gained a reputation among his fellow pupils for bravery and daring; but owing to his characteristic temerity he often occasioned his parents considerable anxiety. When he was about eight years old, he went to a neighboring pond, which was very deep and unsafe, for the purpose of sailing a little boat which had been given him. While in the act of launching his tiny bark, his foot slipped, and he fell into the water, no one being near to hear his cry for help or to rescue him from drowning. But his sister was providentially led to visit the pond, and she arrived there just in time to rescue her brother from a watery grave.

SAVED FROM BEING CRUSHED.

On another occasion he was playing with a spirited young horse, which had been harnessed to a cart for the first time. While running by his side, the creature, somewhat terrified, made an unexpected dash at a gateway, and Thomas being unable at the moment to let go of the rein, which he was holding, or to stop the horse, saw that there was only room for the cart to pass through, and that he would be crushed between the gatepost and the wheel; so, clinging to the shaft with all his strength, just as he neared the gate, he sprang under the animal, and was saved. The contact of the wheel with the heavy post stopped the horse, and the startled animal was secured and calmed.

A "BLUNDERBUSS" EXPLODES.

Once, too, he narrowly escaped losing his life from a "blunderbuss" exploding in his hands. It appears that one winter his father's house had been twice broken into, and property carried away of considerable value. A few gentlemen in the neighborhood, therefore, made him a present of a blunderbuss, as a safeguard in the case of further marauding eventualities, but the children were often cautioned not to touch it on any consideration, as it was loaded. The curiosity of Thomas, however, was so much excited, that one afternoon he ventured to take it down and discharge it, to see how it would spread the shot; but no sooner did he pull the trigger than the weapon burst in his hands into many pieces. Part of the barrel was found some yards off in an adjoining field, the stock was shattered into splinters, and the lad was thrown senseless upon the ground, each hand grasping a fragment of the firearm, but absolutely uninjured!

PERIL IN A WELL.

One other escapade and deliverance should also be mentioned, as illustrative of the preserving might of God in the case of those whom He intends to employ in His service. In the neighborhood of the Garlands' house was a deep well, which had been opened for the purpose of repairing a pump. In spite of the energetic and repeated remonstrances of his companions, Thomas resolved to slide down the pipe. He did so for a long distance, and had just landed on a stay, or timber support, when a large quantity of loose stone-work at the top of the well gave way and came crashing heavily down with a most alarming noise. The lads at the mouth of the well were in despair, believing that their companion was killed, so that it was some time afterward before an attempt was begun to rescue his mangled body. When at length assistance did come, the men, to their astonishment, found Thomas alive, the heavy stones having fallen all around him, but through the Divine mercy, leaving him quite unhurt!

HIS MOTHER'S PARTING PRAYER.

At about the age of fourteen came the great crisis of his being for time and eternity. He was leaving home to be apprenticed to a tradesman at Thame, Oxfordshire, and was standing waiting for the arrival of the expected stage-coach which would convey him thither, when his mother took him affectionately aside, saying she wished to speak to him alone. The lad following her into her room, the door was closed, and the anxious Christian mother, turning to her child with tears trembling upon her eyelids, and a thrill of unutterable tenderness in the tones of her voice, solemnly said, "My dear boy, I want to pray with you once more before you leave us for the busy world, far away from your parents' care." She and the boy then knelt together, and though nearly fifty years have elapsed since that important moment, Mr. Garland says: "The prayer which she then offered I can never forget; and now, as I again think of it, I fancy I can feel her hands resting on my head, and her tears falling on my neck, as she prayed, 'O God, my dear Father, bless and save my boy.'"

HIS CONVERSION TO CHRIST.

Before leaving home, Mrs. Garland obtained a promise from Thomas that he would daily read a portion of God's Word, pray every morning and night, and regularly attend the House of God on Sunday. This promise he endeavored faithfully to carry out. The first Sunday of his absence from home, he found the Wesleyan Chapel, and at once identified himself with the congregation. On the fourth Sunday evening of his attendance, the Lord's Supper was to be administered, after the usual public service, to the members of the society. At this time young Garland was exceedingly anxious about his soul, and he thought, therefore, that he would remain and witness the observance of the ordinance. Just at this instant a lady approached him, and kindly inquired, "Are you not going up to the Lord's Table?" Tears came unbidden as his response, and a moment later he answered: "No; I am not a member; I am not converted to Christ." But through the instrumentality of that solemn service he accepted Christ as his Saviour.

BEGINS WORK IN CHRIST'S SERVICE.

Having enlisted under Christ's banner, the youthful soldier began to fight Christ's battles, and to seek to spread abroad the knowledge of the Gospel. Not long ago Mr. Garland was preaching at a certain place, when an old man arose at the end of the service, and cried out, "Are you little Tommy Garland, that used to live at Thame? Excuse me interrupting, but I saw your name outside, and thought it must surely be the same. Don't you know me?" "No," replied Mr. Garland, "I do not." "Don't you remember a poor starving lad sitting on a doorstep one Sunday morning, and you gave him some bread and butter, and then took him with you to Chapel?" continued the old man. "Oh, yes," replied the preacher, "I can remember now." "Well, sir," said the man, "I kept to Chapel, and afterward got work, and have never wanted since. But, better still, God has converted my soul, and now I find my chief joy in doing what I can for the dear Saviour who has done so much for me."

GOES UP TO THE CITY OF LONDON.

At the expiration of his term of apprenticeship, and when he was about twenty-one years of age, Mr. Garland went to London, and in connection with a few warm-hearted young men like himself, he began to preach the glad tidings of salvation in the open air early on Sunday mornings, and while giving tracts to the members of the audience, cordially invited them to the House of God! At that time two localities known as constituted a veritable cesspool of iniquity, and there young Garland with his friends went to work. God richly blessed the labors of the young men in the locality, and many most miserable and abandoned sinners were led to Christ through their efforts. From that time to the present, now forty years, Mr. Garland has been actively engaged wherever he has been placed in preaching the Gospel.

After a few years' experience of London, Mr. Garland returned to his native village, and commenced business for himself. At the age of twenty-six he married a lady who, like himself, was enthusiastic in the work of her Divine Master. The business prospered, and on Sundays Mr. Garland was engaged in preaching the Gospel; but a longing desire to work entirely for the souls of men took possession of him, and deepened in its intensity. He carried his burden to the Lord, and asked that his way might be made plain.

AN IMPORTANT LETTER.

At length, in the year 1856, he received a letter from the Wesleyan Seamen's Committee, stating that their lay agent had left the mission, and that they were in want of some one to take his place. The letter concluded with the words, "It is a great pity you are not a sailor, for we think you would just do for the work." On reading this communication, Mrs. Garland said to her husband, "Here is a call to London; I feel certain it is a call which you ought to listen to."

Notwithstanding his wife's prayerful conviction as to what the Lord would have her husband do, Mr. Garland thought otherwise; for he was in a good business, and doing well for his family. But he was irresistibly drawn to the work and the remainder of the day was full of anxiety to know and do what was right in the sight of God. He had long and ardently desired to be employed in the Lord's work; so the next day he wrote to the secretary this sentence, and no more, "Is it necessary for your agent to be a sailor?"

THE SEAMEN'S MISSION.

The committee, in reply, invited him to meet them at once. He complied with their summons, and having listened to an explanation of the nature of the work required, was unanimously requested to become the lay missionary of the society. After much thought and prayer, Mr. Garland accepted the proposal, and within fourteen days from the committee's invitation, had sold his business and removed with his family to the scene of his future labors. That was on September 1st, 1856.

In the prosecution of his labors Mr. Garland has been wonderfully preserved by the good hand of God. His life has been threatened many times by bad and desperate men while rescuing some poor sailor from his wicked companions and the snares of designing "landsharks." During the awful visitation of cholera, in 1866, when hundreds of persons were swept away in the East of London, and, in some instances, whole families perished by its ravages. Mr. Garland spent eight weeks in visiting the sick and dying, going out in response to calls at all hours of the day and night, yet neither he nor any member of his family suffered at all in health, but were used of God in a preeminent manner for the material help and spiritual blessing of their less favored neighbors.

A SAILOR'S TESTIMONY.

At a meeting for sailors, conducted by Mr. Garland, one of the number present spoke as follows: "My dear friends and shipmates: It is through the Lord's mercy that I am here once more. It was in this room God converted my soul, and took my burden of sin away, for which I will praise Him as long as I live. But, although religion is the best thing a man can have, yet the Christian has his trials and conflicts." And here, after relating how God had blessed him in going out and in coming home, he recounted some of his trials on board ship; "When I am reading my Bible one of the crew will throw a shoe and put the lamp out. Sometimes, when on my knees at prayer, they will take hold of my legs and lay me flat on the floor, and then laugh at my devotions, singing their filthy songs. Surely if any one has been persecuted for Christ's sake, James Parsons is the man."

AN AFFECTING SCENE.

Here the poor man's tears ran freely down his cheeks, and for some time he could not proceed. "There's that chap in the corner," pointing to one of his shipmates; "he has teased me more than all the others put together. Yes, Jack, you know that's true. For months you have been peck, peck, pecking at me like a wolf. But, my soul is full of love and pity for you, and there's nothing but what I would do for you if you would be a Christian. Don't think I have hard thoughts of you because of your past unkindness. I freely forgive you, and"—walking to the place where Jack was sitting—here's my hand. Here, Jack, let us shake hands and be brothers."

This was too much for poor Jack. He gave his hand to Jem and tried to speak, but could not, and kneeling down he wept like a child. James seized the missionary's hand, saying, "Praise the Lord! kind words go a long way. I thought I should kill him some day. Let me pass. It will do me good to pray side by side with him." And with zeal and earnestness never to be forgotten, he poured forth his prayers and supplications for this broken-hearted penitent. (Our panel to the left of the frontispiece picture depicts James on his knees, in the presence of his persecutors.)

RESCUE OF TWO CHILDREN.

"Some years ago," says Mr. Garland, "I was awoke early one morning by the cry of fire! Thinking the house in which I was staying was on fire, I was soon dressed and made my way into the street, when I found the conflagration was in Fetter Lane. That narrow thoroughfare was soon filled with people. In those days the appliances for saving life were very different from those of the present time. It was thought, however, that all the inmates had made their escape; but presently a female came inquiring with great earnestness where her children were. Two of them were missing, and just afterward two little girls put their heads out of the top window and cried piteously for help. Many now began to shout for the ladders, but no ladders were to be seen. A sailor standing near me became very restless, and hearing the cries for help, he said, 'I'll do my best,' and, throwing off his jacket,

HE CLIMBED UP A WATER-PIPE, which brought him near the window where the little girls were. The eldest threw her arms round his neck, and he went down the pipe hand over hand safely with his precious freight amid the shouts of all the crowd. His hands were torn and bleeding, but after wiping his face, and on looking up, seeing no ladder yet raised to the house, he went up again, while the people held their breath in intensity of excitement. There was a solemn silence as they watched him scale his way to the window once more. Having reached it, the little child threw her arms round his neck so tightly as nearly to strangle him; but down he came, leaving marks of blood all along the pipe, while many voices cried, 'Gently, gently, a little lower, a bit lower,' till at length a strong man caught the child and delivered her to her mother, when there was such an outburst of bravo! tears, and clapping of hands, as I have never heard or seen on any other occasion.

"When the rejoicing mother asked the sailor what she could do for him, and assured him she would do anything he would mention, 'My good woman,' was Jack's reply, 'I have only done my duty; I'll take a glass of water, and wash my hands, and bid you good day, and better luck at our next meeting.' And throwing his jacket over his shoulders, he passed out of sight but not out of mind." (Our picture on the right-hand side of the frontispiece portrait represents Jack sliding down the water-pipe with one of the girls.)

A PENITENT UNDER THE GAS LAMP.

After a very powerful sermon at the Seamen's Chapel a sailor started for his boarding-house, but was in such distress of mind that he stopped in the street, and leaning against lamp-post, burst into a fit of weeping, when a gentleman, passing and seeing him, inquired what was the cause of his distress. "My sins," replied the sailor, "are pressing me so heavily, that I know not what to do, nor where to go." Taking him by the arm, the kind stranger said, "Come with me, my friend; I will take you to a place." He took him back to the Seamen's Chapel. Mr. Garland took the sailor into the prayer-meeting, where the poor fellow sank upon his knees, crying, "Oh, my sins! my sins! Lord, save my soul!"

Prayer was made for him, but for some time it seemed of no avail. About ten o'clock a friend commenced singing, "My God is reconciled," and wished the young man to join in, but he answered, "No! I don't feel that He is reconciled, and I won't say it." After a little more prayer, another friend repeated the hymn, "Just as I am, without one plea," and the sailor followed him word by word, till in uttering the verse, "Just as I am, Thou wilt receive," the Lord revealed Himself to the penitent man, and he shouted, "Glory!" (The panel at the extreme left-hand side of the lower portion of the frontispiece picture shows the distressed man weeping under the gas-lamp.)

THE INFIDEL AND HIS SON.

"Being requested one day to visit a man who was dangerously ill," says Mr. Garland, "I went, and found him to be an infidel, and quite unwilling for me to read the Bible or pray with him. For several weeks I visited and relieved him, sometimes taking him a little jelly, grapes, etc.; but I could not prevail on him to allow me to speak of Jesus. It pleased God to bless the means used for his recovery, and to restore him gradually to health. One afternoon I found him downstairs, and he told me that he hoped soon to be able to resume his work; that he would not trouble me to call again, but if he could oblige me in any way at any future time, it would be a great gratification to him to do so, in return for my attention to him during his long illness.

"I felt much perplexed how to act, for he had forbidden me to speak to him on religion; yet I felt strangely drawn out in prayer for his conversion. Meeting him one evening, I asked him to grant me a small favor, and he at once acceded to my request. The boon I asked was, that he would allow his eldest son to attend our Sunday-school. For a time he was silent, then gave his consent; on the following Sunday morning I called for the boy, and introduced him to the superintendent.

THE SUNDAY DINNER BEER.

"Several weeks after this, the father, one Sunday morning, noticing that the beershops had taken down their shutters, desired the lad to fetch his 'dinner beer.' The boy hesitated, and the father, with angry and blaspheming words, ordered him to take his cap and the pitcher and go at once. The boy began to weep, and the father, becoming furious, at length asked, 'Are you ill? If so, I will send one of the others.' 'Please, father,' replied the lad, 'do not send me to the beer-house on Sunday. Oh, please, father'—falling on his knees—"do not send me for beer on Sundays, because I want to be good and love Jesus."

"The father's heart was touched, and, putting the pitcher on the shelf, he said, 'Ah, that is what you are taught, is it? Then, from this time neither you nor any of my family shall fetch beer again on Sundays.' The same evening the father went with his wife to our chapel. The Word came with power to his heart, and in the following week he began to read the Bible. Soon he destroyed his infidel books, and gave himself to God. Since that period he has continued to live a consistent life, and now rejoices in seeing all his children converted to God, one of them being a successful lay preacher."

THE MAD CAPTAIN.

The following is a most thrilling incident in Mr. Garland's missionary career. "One afternoon a lady came with an earnest request that I would pay an immediate visit to a house which she mentioned; adding, 'I am afraid there will be mischief soon, unless some one calls.' I went with her, and found that the person from whom some act of violence was feared was a captain whom I knew well, and who, with his family, had lately come to board there. For the last few weeks he had been drinking to such excess that his wife was in danger of her life; for in his drunken fits he had often threatened to murder her. I found him in bed, shouting, 'She shall not come here. If she does, I'll blow her brains out.' And, taking a pistol from under his pillow, he began swinging it over his head, crying, 'It's well loaded; I'll take sure aim if she does enter this room.'

"I knew well that violence might lead to less of life, and all attempts to soothe him having proved useless, I had recourse to strategy. I asked him if he had loaded the pistol on the new principle. At this question he was surprised; 'Did not know there were two ways of loading.' I told him there was a new way, and if he would allow me to have it, I would show him how it was done.

"He gave it to me, and I told him that he should see the new principle of loading, at which he rubbed his hands with delight, and laughed like a maniac as he was. After drawing the charges, I told him the new principle was to put the shots—they were common sparrow shots—in first, and the powder on the top. Having carried this innocuous principle into practice, I gave him back the pistol, and he put it under his pillow again.

"In the mean time I had requested that a medical man should be called in. In about two hours the doctor arrived. The captain was lying with his eyes fixed on the ceiling; the moment the new-comer entered he rose up to fight him, but after a struggle he was overpowered and laid upon the floor. It was some time before we could bind him and get him on the bed. Then the doctor pronounced him to be mad. The next day he was conveyed to an asylum, and on the third day he died, raving mad, at the age of forty-five. Thus did this strong man, through his love for drink, shorten his days; dying with curses on his lips, and leaving behind him a wife and five children unprovided for. Surely 'the wages of sin is death.'"

The Original McAuley Mission in Water Street, New York, celebrated its tenth anniversary on November 26th. It is gratifying to learn that since its founder, Jerry McAuley, left it to conduct his important work in West Thirty-second Street, the Water Street Mission is still carried on with continued tokens of the divine blessing. At the anniversary on Sunday, General Clinton B. Fisk conducted the devotional exercises. A number of reformed men related the stories of their lives and what the mission had done for them. Remarks were afterward made by C. W. Sawyer, Dr. Remington, the Rev. C. C. Lasby, James Talcott and W. B. Cutting. The treasurer's report showed that the expenses for the past year were $2590.66, and the receipts $2542.71. General Fisk then announced that he was ready to receive subscriptions for the coming year, and would head the list with $100. James Talcott followed with $250 and W. B. Cutting pledged $150. About $1000 in all was raised.

THE AMERICAN SHEAF.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon on Thanksgiving Day,
Nov. 30th, 1882.*

"We were binding sheaves in the field, and lo, my sheaf arose, and also stood upright: and, behold, your sheaves stood round about, and made obeisance to my sheaf."—GENESIS 37:7.

A JOSEPHIC dream! At seventeen years of age, and when life is most roseate, Joseph in vision saw a great harvest field, himself and his brethren at work in it, and after a while the sheaf that he was binding rose up with an imperial air and the sheaves of the other harvesters fell flat on their faces as the overawed subjects of an empire might fall down on their faces before a king. The dream was fulfilled when there was famine in Egypt and Joseph had the care of all the corn cribs, and his brethren came and implored food from him. Sure enough all their sheaves bowed to his sheaf.

A THANKSGIVING DAY VISION!

I am away out in the centre of a field where the harvests of all nations are being reaped. Here is the great American sheaf. Sheaf of wheat, sheaf of rice, sheaf of corn, sheaf floral, agricultural, homological, mineralogical, literary and moral prosperities—all bound together in one great sheaf. It is kingly, and on its brow is the golden coronal of all the year's sunshine, and in its presence all the sheaves of European and Asiatic harvests bend and fall down, feeling their littleness.

Oh, the sheaf, the golden sheaf, the overtopping sheaf of American prosperity. Other nations far surpass ours in antiquities, in cathedrals, in titled pomp, in art galleries; but in most things their sheaves must bow to our sheaf. I have an idea that the most favored constellation of immensity is the one of which the earth is a star, and of the hemispheres the western is the most favored, and that of the zones the temperate is the more desirable, and that the United States are the best part of the American continent.

THE BEST PLACE ON EARTH

to live is here. Had it not been so, there would have been 800,000 Americans last year moving into Europe instead of 800,000 Europeans moving into America.

Human nature has a strong tendency to fault-finding. Where there is one man who sings and whistles and laughs, there are ten men who sigh and groan and complain. We are more apt to compare our condition with those who are better off than with those who are worse off.

I propose this Thanksgiving morning, for the purpose of stirring your gratitude, to show you how much preferable is the condition of this nation to all other nations, and how the Italian sheaf and the British sheaf and the Spanish sheaf and the French sheaf and all the other sheaves must bow down to our American sheaf.

I. There is not a land where

are so large for the great masses of the people as here. In Ireland, in some parts, eight cents a day for wages. In England, a dollar a day good wages—vast populations not getting as much as that. In other lands fifty cents a day and twenty-five cents a day clear on down to starvation and squalor. An editor in England told me that his salary was $750 a year, and he seemed satisfied! Look at the great populations coming out of the factories of other lands, and accompany them to their homes, and see what privation the hard-working classes on the other side the sea suffer.

The laboring classes here are ten per cent better off than in any other country under the sun—twenty per cent, forty per cent, fifty per cent, seventy-five per cent. The toilers with hand and foot have better homes and better furnished. I do not talk an abstraction. I know what I have seen. The stone masons and carpenters and plumbers and mechanics and artisans of all style in America have finer residences than the majority of the professional men in Great Britain. You enter the laborer's house on this side the sea and you find upholstery and pictures and instruments of music. His children are educated at the best schools. His life is insured so that in case of his sudden demise the family shall not be homeless. Let all American workmen know that while their wages may not be as high as they would like to have them, America is the paradise of industry.

II. Again: there is no land on the earth where is so satisfactory as here. Every three years in the state and every four years in the nation we clean house. After a vehement expression of the people at the ballot box in the autumnal election, they all seem satisfied, and if they are not satisfied, at any rate they smile.

An Englishman asked me in an English railroad train this question: "How do you people stand it in America with a revolution every four years? Wouldn't it be better for you, like us, to have a Queen for a lifetime and everything settled?" England changes government just as certainly as we do. At some adverse vote in Parliament out goes Disraeli and in comes Gladstone, and after a while there will be another admonitory vote in Parliament, and out will go Gladstone, and in will come some one else. Administrations change there, but not as advantageously as here, for there they may change almost any day, while here a party in power continues in power four years.

It is said that in this country we have more political dishonesty than in any other lands. The difference is that in this country almost every official has a chance to steal, while in other lands a few people absorb so much that the others have no chance at appropriation! The reason they do not steal is, they cannot get their hands on it! The governments of Europe are so expensive that after the are paid there is not much left to misappropriate.

The Emperor of Russia has a nice little salary of $8,210,000. The Emperor of Austria has a yearly salary of $4,000,000. Victoria, the Queen, has a salary of $2,200,000. The royal plate at St. James's palace is worth $10,000,000. The Queen's hairdresser gets $10,000 a year for combing the royal locks, while the most of us have to comb our hair at less than half that expense, if we have any to comb!

Over there, there is a host of attendants, all on salaries, some of them $5000 and $6000 a year. Master of Buck Hounds, $8500 a year. Grand Falconer, $6000 a year. (I translate pounds into dollars.) Gentlemen of the Wine and Beer Cellars, Controller of the Household, Groom of the Robes, Mistress of the Robes, Captain of Gold Stick, Lieutenant of Gold Stick, Lieutenant of Silver Stick, Clerk of the Powder Closet, Pages of the Back Stairs, Maids of Honor, Master of Horse, Chief Equerry, Equeries in Ordinary, Crown Equerry, Hereditary Grand Falconer, Vice Chamberlain, Clerk of the Kitchen, Master of Forks, Grooms in Waiting, Lords in Waiting, Grooms of the Great Chamber, Sergeant at Arms, Barge Master and Waterman, Eight Bedchamber Women, Eight Ladies of the Bedchamber, Ten Grooms of the Great Chain, and so on, and so on, ad infinitum, ad nauseam, until it is said that the Queen sometimes actually suffers from thirst because it takes so much machinery to get a glass of water.

All this is only a type of the fabulous expense of foreign governments. All this paid out of the sweat and the blood of the people.

ARE THE PEOPLE SATISFIED?

However much the Germans like William and the Spaniards like their young King and England likes her splendid Queen, these stupendous governmental expenses are built on a groan of dissatisfaction as wide as Europe. If it were left to the people of England, of Germany, of Austria, of Spain, of Russia, whether these expensive establishments should be kept up, do you doubt what the vote would be?

Now, is it not better that we be overtaxed and the surplus be distributed all over the land among the lobby men, and that it go into the hands of hundreds and thousands of people—is there not a better chance of its finally getting down into the hands of honest people, than if it were all built up, piled up inside a garden or palace?

III. Again: the

is less here than anywhere else. The air here is full of protest because great houses, great companies, great individuals are building such overtowering fortunes. Stephen Girard and John Jacob Astor stared at in their time for their august fortunes, would not now be pointed at in the streets of Philadelphia or New York as anything remarkable. These vast fortunes for some imply pinchedness of want for others. A great protuberance on a man's head implies the illness of the whole body. These estates of disproportioned size weaken all the body politic.

But the evil is nothing here compared with the monopolistic oppression abroad. Just look at their ecclesiastical establishments. Look at those vast cathedrals built at fabulous expense and supported by great ecclesiastical machinery at vast expense, and sometimes in an audience room that would hold a thousand people, twenty or thirty people gather for worship. The pope's income is $8,000,000. Cathedrals of statuary and braided arch and walls covered with masterpieces of Rubens and Raphael and Michael Angelo, against all the walls dashing seas of poverty and crime and filth and abomination.

Ireland to-day one vast monopolistic devastation. About thirty-five millions of people in Great Britain and yet all the soil owned by about thirty-two thousand.

STATISTICS ENOUGH TO SHAKE THE EARTH.

Duke of Devonshire owning 96,000 acres in Derby. Duke of Richmond owning 300,000 acres at Gordon Castle. Marquis of Breadalbane going on a journey of 100 miles in a straight line, all on his own property. Duke of Sutherland has an estate as wide as Scotland, which dips into the sea on both sides. Bad as we have it here, it is a thousand times worse there.

Beside that, if here a few fortunes overshadow all others, we must remember there is a vast throng of other people being enriched, and this fact shows the thriftiness of the country. It is estimated that there are over five thousand millionnaires in the United States. In addition to this, you must remember that there are successes on less extended scale. Tens of thousands of people worth $500,000; scores of thousands worth $100,000 each. Yea, the majority of the people of the United States are on their way to fortunes. They will either be rich themselves or their children will be rich.

If I should leave to some men the question: "Will you have a fortune and struggle on through their lives in the struggle you have had to make—will you have the fortune, or would you rather that they should have the fortune?" Scores of men would say: "I am willing to fight this battle all the way through and give my children a chance; I don't care so much about myself; it's only for ten or twenty years, anyhow; give my children a chance." If anything stirs my admiration it is to see a man without any education himself sending his sons to college, and without any opportunity for luxury himself, resolved that though he shall have it hard all the days of his life, his children shall have a good start. And I tell you, although some of you may have great commercial struggle, there is going to be a great opening for your sons and your daughters as they come on to take their places in society.

Beside that the domains of Europe and Asia are already full. Every place occupied unless it be desert or volcano or condemned barrens, while here we have plenty of room and the resources are only just opening. In other lands, if fortunes fatten they must fatten on others; but here they can fatten out of illimitable prairies and out of inexhaustible mines.

* As Dr. Talmage did not preach in the Brooklyn Tabernacle last Sunday we publish this week his sermon delivered last Thanksgiving Day.—Ed.

We have only just begun to set the Thanksgiving table in this country. We have just put on one silver fork and one salt cellar and one loaf of bread and one smoking platter. Wait until the fruits come in from all the orchards and the meats from all the markets and the vegetables from all the gardens and the silver from all the mines and the dinner bell rings saying: "Thanksgiving table spread. Come all the people from between the two oceans. Come from between the Thousand Isles and the Gulf of Mexico. Come and dine!" The prospects are so magnificent that for centuries to come all the other sheaves will have to bow to our sheaf.

IV. Again: the nation is

than any other. At least 15,000,000 men belonging to the standing armies of Europe to-day. Since we had our conflict on the other side the sea they have had Zulu war, Afghan war, Egyptian war, Russo-Turkish war, German-French war. No certainty about the future. All the governments of Europe watching each other lest one of them get too much advantage. Diplomacy all the time nervously at work. Four nations watching the Suez Canal as carefully as four cats could watch one rat.

In order to keep peace, intermarriages of royal families; some bright princess compelled to marry some disagreeable foreign dignitary in order to keep the balance of political power in Europe, the illy-matched pair fighting out on a small scale that which would have been international contest, some times the husband holding the balance of power, sometimes the wife holding the balance of power. One unwise stroke of Gladstone's pen after Garnet Wolseley had captured Tel-el-Kebir and all Europe would have been one battle-field. Crowded cities, crowded governments, crowded learned institutions, close by each other. You get in the cars here and you ride 100 or 150 miles; then you come to a great city, as from here to Philadelphia, as from here to Albany, as from here to Boston.

CROWDED GREAT CITIES

I got on the cars at Manchester and closed my eyes for a long sleep before I got to Liverpool. In forty minutes I was aroused out of sleep by some one saying: "We are here; this is Liverpool. The cities crowded. The populations crowded, packed in between the Pyrenees and the Alps, packed in between the English Channel and the Adriatic so closely they cannot move without treading either on each other's heels or toes. Sceptres clashing, chariot wheels colliding. The nations of Asia and Europe this moment wondering what next.

But on this continent we have

and nobody to fight. Eight million square miles in North America and all but one seventh capable of rich cultivation, implying what fertility and what commerce! Four great basins pouring their waters into the Atlantic, Pacific, Arctic, and Gulf of Mexico. Shore line of 29,969 miles. The one State of Texas with more square miles than all France, than all Germany.

That our continent might have plenty of elbow room and not be jostled by the effete governments of Europe, God sank to the depths of the sea a whole continent that once ran from off the coast of Europe to the coast of America—the continent of Atlantis—which allowed the human race to pass from Europe to America on foot, with little or no shipping; that continent dimly described in history, but the existence of which has been proved by archæological evidences innumerable; that whole continent sunken so that a fleet of German, British, and American vessels had to take deep sea soundings to touch the top of it; that highway from Europe to America entirely removed so that for the most part only the earnest and the persevering and the brave could reach America and that through long sea voyage.

Did I say the whole continent of ours, this North American continent? Governments on the southern tip of this continent are gradually coming to the time when they will beg for annexation. On the other hand,

BEAUTIFUL AND HOSPITABLE CANADA,

the vast majority of the people there are more republican than monarchical in their feelings, and the chief difference between them and us is that they live on one side the St. Lawrence and we on the other. The day will come when Canada will be found waiting for our government to propose marriage, and when we do so, she will look down and blush, and thinking of her allegiance across the sea, will say:

"ASK MOTHER."

Peace all over the continent, and nothing to fight about. What a pity that slavery is gone! While that lasted we had something over which the orators could develop their muscles of vituperation and calumny.

We are so hardly put to it for military demonstration that guns and swords and cannon were called out last month to celebrate the bicennial of William Penn, the peaceful Quaker for whom a gun would never have been of any use except to hang his broad brim hat on. Oh, what shall we do for a fight. Will not somebody strike us? We cannot draw swords on the subject of civil service reform or free trade or "corners" in wheat. Our ships of war are cruising around the ocean hoping for something interesting to turn up. General Hancock on Governor's Island spending the winter with his wife. Sumpter and Moultrie and Pulaski and Fort Lafayette and Fortress Monroe and all the other shaggy lions of war sound asleep on their iron paws.

GUNPOWDER OUT OF FASHION, and not even allowed the juvenile population on 4th of July. Fire-crackers a sin.

The land is struck though and through with peace. The warmest eulogies of Garfield uttered at the South and the heartiest appreciation of the deceased Senator Hill, of Georgia, uttered at the North, and Wendell Phillips and Robert Toombs, if they happened to meet, would shake hands with each other, and the former could lecture to an applauding audience in Savannah, and the latter could call the roll of national mercies at the foot of Bunker Hill. Governor Colquitt's last signature before leaving the executive mansion in Georgia secured $5,000,000 of Northern capital to that State.

There is hardly a Northern city where there are not Confederate generals in its law offices or commercial establishments or insurance companies. There you sit or stand to-day, side by side—you who wore the blue and you who wore the gray—you who kindled fires on the opposite side of the Potomac in the winter of 1862—you who followed Stonewall Jackson toward the North and you who followed General Sherman toward the South. Why are you not breaking each other's heads?

Ah! you have irreparably mixed up your politics. The northern man married a southern wife, and the southern man married a northern wife, and your children are half Mississippian and half New Englander, and to make another division between the North and the South possible you would have to do with your child as Solomon proposed with the child brought before him in judgment: divide it with the sword, giving half to the North and half to the South. No, sir; there is NOTHING SO HARD TO SPLIT AS A CRADLE.

Intermarriage will go on and consanguinity ties will be multiplied, and the question for generations to come will be, how we people in this generation got into such an awful wrangle and went to digging such an awful grave trench.

But there is now—look! no blood on the cotton, no mark of cavalry hoof on the wheat. Twenty years ago, could the wheat sheaf and the palmetto have stood on the same platform? No. Every grain of this wheat would have been a bullet, and every leaf of the palmetto a sword. "Peace on earth, good will to men." Apple and orange—how the colors blend. In the great harvest field of the world's tranquillity all sheaves bowing to our sheaf.

V. Again: we are better off than other nations in matters of NATIONAL DEBT.

Our debt less than one half of that of England, and not more than a third that of France. We have for 16 years, every day, paid $142,000 toward the liquidation of the national debt. It is going all to melt away like a snowbank under an April sun.

VI. Again: we have

than in any other nation. We do not suffer from anything like the Scotch mist or the English fogs or from anything like the Russian ice blast or from the awful typhus of Southern Europe or the Asiatic choleras. Epidemics here are exceptional—very exceptional. Plenty of wood and coal to make a roaring fire in winter time. Easy access to sea beach or mountain top when the ardors of summer come down. Michigan wheat for the bread, Long Island corn for the meal, New Jersey pumpkins for the pies, Carolina rice for the queen of puddings, prairie fowl from Illinois, fish from the Hudson and the James, hickory and hazel and walnuts from all our woods, Louisiana sugar to sweeten our beverages, Georgia cotton to keep us warm, oats for the horses, carrots for the cattle, and oleomargarine for the hogs! In our land all products and all climates that you may desire.

Are your nerves weak and in need of bracing up? Go North. Is your throat delicate and in need of balmy airs? Go South. Do you feel crowded and want more room? Go West. Are you tempted to become office seekers? Go to jail! Almost anything you want you can have. Plenty to eat, plenty to wear, plenty to read.

"It has been well the past year," says the loom. "It has been well," say the type. "It has been well," say pen and chisel and hammer and plough and fishing-net. "It has been well," answer the groves and orchards and studios and factories and workshops and harvest fields of America.

OUR NATIONAL SHEAF

is larger this year and more golden and more regal and riper and more richly grained than at any time since the Pilgrim Fathers settled New England or the Hollanders founded New York or the Huguenots took possession of the Carolinas. Sheaf of sheaves. While all others bow before it, before the good Lord of the unparalleled American harvest. Before Him come down all the corn shocks. Before Him come down the sheaf of governmental sceptres, the sheaf of battle spears, the sheaf of barbaric arrows, the sheaf of commercial yardsticks, the sheaf of joy, the sheaf of family reunion, the sheaf of thanksgiving. All the sheaves of the harvest field bowing down low at the feet of the great Husbandman.

LET IT BOW IN TURN

You have in hackneyed phrase heard over and over again that America is the asylum of the oppressed. This glorious Thanksgiving morning I declare it to be the wardrobe of the earth, the wheat bin of the hemispheres, the corn crib of all nations. Hallelujah, Amen!

Ministers Whose Teaching is not in Accordance with the doctrines of the Bible frequently continue to occupy their pulpits while the spirituality of their hearers is being undermined. A congregation in Maine, however, recently determined to avoid this calamity and elicited a letter of resignation from their pastor by sending him a letter in the course of which the case of the church was thus logically stated: "When called to be our pastor and teacher you had the articles of faith of our church in your possession, and ample time to acquaint yourself with our doctrinal views, and if not in accord with your own, your duty was to inform us of the fact; but neither to the church nor council did you express dissent from any one of them. For these reasons you cannot claim the right to modify or throw doubt upon any one of them while you remain pastor and teacher of this church; and it would be inconsistent for you to retain your present relation with us if you intend preaching contrary to its articles of faith."

REMARKABLE FAITH CURES.

SPINAL DISEASE.

THE following incident, particulars of which have been published in the Pittsburg Banner, is another remarkable evidence of God's willingness in this day to hear and answer the prayer of faith for the healing of disease. Mr. Richard Hoffman, of Bentleysville, Washington County, Pa., has been a great sufferer from spinal affection, and for four years has been altogether unable to walk on his feet or even to stand on them; his case was pronounced to be hopeless by all the physicians.

On Thursday, November 9th, in reply to an inquiry addressed by him to a lady in Erie, Pa., who had testified that she had been healed in answer to the prayer of faith, he was informed that a number of believers would meet at her house that evening to engage in prayer from 7 to 9 o'clock, and that at 8 o'clock they would make special mention of him. He was asked to unite with them in prayer at that hour. On that evening, November 9th, being at the house of his sister, he retired for prayer, and asked the family to pray for him. As he prayed he felt that "God was present, and was led to believe that his request would be granted." After a time he returned to the house as he came out, not trying to use his feet, but using a wagon invented and operated by himself.

During the night he slept as usual, and in the morning he experienced an unusual sensation in his legs and feet. After breakfast he got into his little wagon and passed up the road a considerable distance from the house. Then the thought came upon him that he had not put his faith into practice by trying to walk, after praying and believing. He stopped, made an effort to stand, and succeeded; got out of his wagon, walked several rods up a hill; went back to the house and up nine steps; walked forty feet through the house to his brother-in-law, who was on the back porch; shook hands with him; then walked to another part of the house and shook hands with his sister; and has ever since been walking about as others do.

The editor of the Banner says: "We have given the facts as they have come to us, and we leave the explanation to theologians and scientists. Last Sabbath week a note from him stating that he had been healed was read in the church at Pigeon Creek, and he made a statement of his case in the same church last Saturday evening. His pastor is Rev. John S. Marquis, Dunningville, Washington County, Pa."

A HELPLESS INVALID.

Miss Carrie F. Judd publishes in her Triumphs of Faith a letter signed L. A. Baldwin, and dated from Elizabeth, N. J., this year, in which the writer says: "An elderly lady suffering very many years from several diseases, so that she was almost entirely helpless, became convinced as did her daughter, that she might be restored through prayer. They wrote me to join with them before the Throne for this. Very soon a change was perceptible and it has gone on until she is now able to walk, to go on five miles' visit and do many duties. The daughter writes to-day, 'Ma has been free from the disease for two months past. Praise the Lord, for it was He who did it, and she says she cannot be grateful enough.'"

On November 15th at a meeting

a letter was handed in from Lady Abercrombie, who alluded to the fact, that she had noticed in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the record of the wonderful cures effected, but expressed the belief that she herself had not sufficient faith to obtain the benefit she sought. Earnest prayers were offered up for the strengthening of the applicant's faith, and her ultimate restoration. The following are some of the testimonies which were afterward given:

ULCERATED LIMBS HEALED.

Mrs. Brooks said: "I wish to testify what the Lord has done for me. I have been to Bethshan only twice before, and when I first came, I was suffering from ulcerated limbs, so much so, indeed, that the doctors told me I had no alternative but to go into an hospital. When I came here I was unable to make known my request, but I was spoken to at the end of the meeting by Mr. St. George, and I got such a special blessing, that from that time my limbs began to get better. I left off having medical attendance, but kept on a poultice. However I came again, and then heard Mrs. Baxter say that we were not to trust to any human means, so I at once threw the poultice away, and from that time I have not experienced the smallest measure of pain."

BRONCHITIS CURED.

Mr. Tom Black, of Edinburgh, said: "I was afflicted with asthma and bronchitis, and you know that when it lasts, as it did in my case, during the night, you feel as if you were dying. When I came to Bethshan I was spitting blood, and I experienced a cure when I had been here two or three weeks. I was cured instantly, and at the same time almost completely healed of indigestion. I am also thankful for being delivered from infidel thoughts. The more I struggled to get rid of them, the more they attacked me, but when I ceased from struggling, and trusted only and entirely in the Lord, then I was delivered."

A DYING CONSUMPTIVE MADE WELL.

A woman said: "I have been suffering from consumption, and hæmorrhage of the lungs. I was very ill indeed, and the doctors shook their heads and said, as they generally do, that all they could do was to prop me up a little. They said that everything seemed to indicate that I should be taken out of the world this winter. I put my trust in the Lord, however, and I gradually got well. First, the night sweats left me, then the cough, and now, in answer to prayer, you see me here perfectly well."

A woman also said: "I wish to praise the Lord for the blessing He has bestowed on my son—sixteen years of age." [This speaker, who, together with her daughter, was much affected, also stated that at Bethshan they had both found peace in Christ.]

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Hard-working Horse.—The Rev. Mr. Andrews at a recent meeting said: "When I was in America I saw a curious sight. It was a horse which toiled hard all day, but never moved away from the spot. One day a friend took me to a large institution which required to have the daily water-supply pumped up from a well to the top of the building. In the basement was a peculiarly-constructed wheel, and on it a horse was climbing, climbing, but never got out of the spot. This is just what those do experience who trust to their own merits to reach heaven; they toil with difficulty all day, but never get a step toward the desired goal."

Victory in Death.—The Rev. Mr. McLachlan said: "In this very hall I spoke to a lady who, for twelve years, was in great trouble about her dying hour. 'How shall I die?' was the strain in which her thoughts ran steadily. She was urged to live moment by moment in the Lord, and to leave all care about dying until the time came. However, she was not able to do so until the last day which she spent on earth arrived. As death approached, the joy of the Lord came upon her. Just before she passed away, she put her hand on the head of her son, and prayed fervently that he might come to the Saviour who had been so good to her, and that he might be spared to preach the Gospel to others. A few days afterward she fell asleep, one part of her prayer was answered, for the young man gave his heart to the Saviour; and now her other request is also answered, for her son is preaching the Gospel as a minister of Christ."

A Designing Lover.—The Rev. James Scott said: "I was recently speaking in the East End of Glasgow, and referred to the Wynds meeting. In the inquiry meeting afterward, a woman came to me and said, 'Sir, you spoke about the Wynds services, and it sent a thrill through my heart. That time was the happiest in my life.' Seeing her wretched condition, I asked, 'Why, is it not so with you now? Were you converted there?' 'I still cleave to the Lord,' she replied, 'but the joy of my life is gone for this world.' Her story was, that a young man after her conversion asked her in marriage, but as he was not a Christian, she refused him. He then began to attend the meetings, and after a while professed to be seeking Christ, and again asked her to accept and marry him. She, thinking he was not far from the kingdom of God, judged it to be safe to accept him. In a short time, however, after the marriage, he came out in his true colors, for he not only laughed at her religion, but brutally ill-used her, and she is now suffering for not abiding by the Scriptural injunction, 'Be ye not unequally yoked together with unbelievers.'"

A Servant Girl's Mistake.—Major Colquhoun said: "Many people ask, 'What is the good of these after meetings?' I will give an instance illustrating their utility. A servant girl, who looked upon herself as somewhat more religious than most people, because she lived a quiet, decent life, read her Bible as a duty, and went to church because it was right to do so on Sunday, had two brothers whose lives were not so respectable as her own, and she persuaded them to come to the Gospel meetings, where they were awakened by the Holy Spirit to a sense of their need of a Saviour, and in one of the inquiry-meetings were led to decide for Christ. The girl, of course, was very much pleased, but by-and-by she began to grow uneasy; her brothers, she saw, had something she had not. They delighted in the services of God, and read the Bible as a pleasant book. So, one night she came to our meeting and asked a worker all about it. She happily discovered her error of trusting in her own goodness and righteousness, instead of in Christ, and now she also enjoys the pleasure of knowing Jesus as a dear and personal friend."

Landlord and Tenant.—The Rev. Mr. Forwell said at a recent meeting: "When I lived in Dundee I was sitting in my study one day, when a lady, who was quite a stranger to me, was introduced. She came to obtain my advice in the following circumstances. Her mother and herself had taken a house, which, when they examined it, they found required very considerable repairs to make it habitable. During the time the landlord was effecting these repairs, they took another lodging. When the rent became due they offered to the landlord of the house the amount, less the sum which it cost them to live elsewhere during the alterations. This was refused, and full payment insisted upon; and as they still persisted in declining to pay the full sum, the landlord sent men to sequester their furniture. Seeing that the law was on the side of the landlord, I could only advise that the money should be paid at once. After a short conversation with my visitor, she decided to do so, and there remained now only the sting of injustice, and that, an injustice inflicted by a Christian, and an elder in the church. As she was going away, I asked, 'Have you told Jesus about your trouble?' 'No, I have not,' she answered. 'We will just do it, then,' I said. When we rose from our knees, the joy of our Saviour lighted up the lady's face."

A Bridge-keeper's Heroism.—Surgeon Major White said: "Some time ago I was quartered in the south of England, where there is a long arm of the sea, across which a railway bridge is thrown. In order to let ships pass freely, it remains open except at the time when trains have to go over it. Near the bridge there lived a man whose duty it was to shut the bridge, and to hold a handle to keep it shut while trains were passing. One day after he had shut it and was holding the handle, he heard a sound, and looking in the direction whence it came, he saw his little child approaching the water's edge, with no one to help or guide him. The father's agony was indescribable. It was too late to stop the train and thus he enabled to save the child's life. The temptation to forsake his duty was terrible, yet he stuck to his post. If he left it for one moment hundreds of souls might be ushered into eternity through his act. At a fearful cost this man did his duty. Amid the thunder of the train as it reached the bridge he heard a cry, and saw his child fall into the boiling waters beneath. The little one was drowned, but the man had done his duty; the train and all within it passed safely over; not one of all the hundreds knowing nor thinking that a life had been sacrificed to save theirs. That man against his will gave his child to save these passengers, and we are prepared to weep with him. But God gave up His Son willingly to death for you! How few are touched by that act!"

A Talk with a Kirk Elder.—Mr. Howieson said: "I was an office-bearer in the Free Church for thirteen years before I was a Christian. I did not understand the need for conversion until an evangelist came to Uddingston, and after one of his meetings asked me about an anxious inquirer. I pointed the man out to him. He did not go to the inquirer, but asked, 'How is it with yourself?' 'Oh, I am all right,' I said, 'there is not much the matter with me.' 'Then you are fit for heaven?' he suggested. 'No, no; that is much too strong; few men in the world can say that,' I answered, somewhat alarmed. 'Come with me, brother,' he rejoined, 'and I will show you from the Bible that if you are not on the road to heaven you are on the way to hell.' We got into a corner of the church, and there he clearly showed me that a man must be on the side of God or the devil. For two years afterward I was very anxious about my soul, and sometimes was in despair. One day, when my family were away from home, and I was alone in the house, I fell on my knees and cried out, 'Lord, I can do no more; help me.' That moment I saw the light. The fact was that all these two years I was trying to save myself, and only when I gave it up, and rested only upon Christ, did the darkness disperse, and the joy of salvation come into my heart."

THE CHARACTERISTICS AND CONTRASTS OF THE COMING KINGDOM.

By William Maude.

The Kingdom of Peace.

The Scriptural Emblem of War—The Place and Mission of War—Quotation from John Ruskin—War, as Over-ruled by God—The Horrors of War—A Future Reign of Peace Predicted—Over Mankind, and Even the Lower Animals—When, and by What Means?—Not by Perceiving its Wickedness—Not by the Triumph of Christianity During the Present Dispensation—An unscriptural Assumption—Not by War Curing Itself—The Coming of the Prince of Peace—The Going Forth of the Red Horse—The Morning After Darkness.

WHEN the seer of Patmos beheld the second seal of the mysterious and awful roll opened by the Lamb "in the midst of the throne," he tells us that he saw go forth "a red horse;" and "to him that sat thereon it was given to take peace from the earth, and that they should slay one another; and there was given unto him a great sword" (Rev. 6:3, 4); and, with scarcely an exception, commentators have recognized in this striking figure a symbolical representation of that great scourge of humanity—war. The "horse," not only being the Scriptural emblem of war, but the "blood-red" color of this particular horse confirming this interpretation; the color of each of the four horses described in the vision corresponding to the mission of its rider; which is, in the present instance, to shed blood. Hence we may regard the second, third, and fourth seals of the Apocalypse as the figurative representation of what our Lord Himself has elsewhere declared in unfigurative language; namely, that "wars, famines, and pestilences, are the beginnings of travail" (Matt. 24:7, 8); while, in older prophetic utterance, "the sword" is specified as one of God's "four sore judgments." (Ezekiel 14:21.)

THE PLACE AND MISSION OF WAR.

War, then, we are bound to recognize as one of the most terrible agencies which God employs in the evolution of His great purposes respecting man and his world. "When I tell you that war is the foundation of all the arts," writes one of our greatest thinkers, John Ruskin, "I mean also that it is the foundation of all the high virtues and faculties of men. It was very strange to me to discover this; and very dreadful, but I saw it to be quite an undeniable fact. The common notion that peace and the virtues of civil life flourish together, I found to be wholly untenable. Peace and the vices of civil life only flourish together. We talk of peace and learning, of peace and plenty, and of peace and civilization; but I found that those were not the words which the muse of history coupled together; that, on her lips, the words were: peace and sensuality, peace and selfishness, peace and corruption, peace and death. I found in brief that all great nations learned their truth of word, and strength of thought, in war; that they were nourished in war and wasted in peace; taught by war, and deceived by peace; trained by war, and betrayed by peace; in a word, that they were born in war, and expired in peace."

But, he adds, "it is not all war of which this can be said. . . . The creative and fundamental war is that in which the natural restlessness and love of contest among men are disciplined, by consent, into modes of beautiful—though it may be fatal—play; in which the natural ambition and love of power of men are disciplined into the aggressive conquest of surrounding evil;* in which the natural instincts of self-defence are sanctified by the nobleness in the institutions and purity of the households which they are appointed to defend. To such war as this all men are born; in such war as this any man may happily die; and forth from such war as this have arisen, throughout the extent of the past ages, all the highest sanctities and virtues of humanity."

WAR AS OVERRULED BY GOD.

Thus, too, Dean Vaughan writes: "The suffering and oppressed church of the time of St. John is taught to connect the idea of conquest—of such victories as those which had extended and were to extend over the whole known world the dominion of imperial Rome—first with the overruling sovereignty of God, out of whose presence and by whose edict all human power goes forth, and secondly with the final establishment of a power not human, even with the coming of Him who is the Lord of the church, and to whom all the kingdoms of the earth shall be eventually made to bow." And though the inspired prediction—having as it were an enactive force—that the inhabitants of the earth should from generation to generation continue to "kill one another," is doubtless a very direful one, yet "this too, is both overruled by God Himself, for His own work of power and grace, and also conduces in some definite manner to the coming of Christ, to the overthrow of opposing force, and to the establishment of His reign on earth."†

Nevertheless, when we consider the proverbial

"HORRORS OF WAR,"

when the blood-stained pages of history bring before the mind's eye the dreadful spectacle of fair countries laid waste, of great cities given over to fire and sword, of the reckless expenditure of long and laboriously accumulated treasure, of battlefields not only encumbered with the dead, but—more terrible still—with multitudes of frightfully mutilated men groaning in agony and parched with burning thirst—and when we think of the still greater multitudes of widows and orphans left to mourn, it may be in life-long misery and want, the husbands, brothers, and sons, thus violently hurried into eternity, our heart would grow sick with anguish if it did not burn with indignation; and we are constrained to cry to heaven, as one of old, "Shall the sword devour forever?" and to realize the solemn fact that though God does make use of war as one of His instruments, it is only as one of His "instruments of death."

THE ROOT AND ORIGIN OF WAR.

It is not my purpose, on the present occasion, to enter into any ethical questions as to the lawfulness of war under any circumstances; or whether the Christian can, consistently with the letter of Christ's commands or the spirit of his heavenly calling, adopt a profession, the immediate object of which is to destroy human life. But at all events one thing is very clear, and that is that, though for His own wise ends permitted by God, war has not its root and origin in "the good pleasure of His will," but in the "unruly wills and passions of sinful men."

Thus St. James writes in his Epistle: "From whence come wars, and whence come fightings among you? come they not hence, even of your pleasures that war in your members? Ye lust, and have not; ye kill and covet, and cannot obtain; ye fight and war; ye have not, because ye ask not." (4:1, 2.) God is "the God of peace;" Christ came "not to destroy men's lives, but to save them;" and His solemn and suggestive declaration, "They that take the sword shall perish by the sword," is one of which all history is the thundered echo. If we really believe this, how saddening is the consideration, that inasmuch as all the existing empires of the world have been built up by brute force and lavish bloodshed, so they are doomed by the just laws of God to perish by the same means, sufficient time being given.

How blessed, then, is the assurance of the prophetic word, that a time shall come when men shall cease ruthlessly to shed each others' blood, when the deadly and cruel instruments of war shall be laid aside, and the universal and lasting reign of peace be inaugurated. That such a time awaits the world is explicitly revealed. Thus Isaiah declares, "He shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many peoples; and they shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, neither shall they learn war any more" (Isaiah 2:4); and with exultant joy the Psalmist exclaims, "Come, behold the works of the Lord, what desolations He hath made in the earth. He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth; He breaketh the bow, and cutteth the spear in sunder; He burneth the chariot in the fire." (Psalm 46:8, 9.) And so in Hosea we read: "In that day will I make a covenant for them (i.e., the children of Israel), with the beasts of the field, and with the fowls of heaven, and with the creeping things of the ground; and I will break the bow and the sword and the battle out of the earth, and will make them to lie down safely." (Hosea 2:18.) Yea, this reign of universal peace is to extend, for Isaiah says again: "The wolf also shall dwell with the lamb, and the leopard shall lie down with the kid; and the calf and the young lion and the fatling together; and a little child shall lead them. And the cow and the bear shall feed; their young ones shall lie down together; and the lion shall eat straw like the ox. And the sucking child shall play on the hole of the asp, and the weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice' den. They shall not hurt nor destroy in all My holy mountain; for the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." (Isaiah 11:6-9.)

WHEN? AND BY WHAT MEANS?

But when shall this come to pass, and by what means shall the reign of peace be thus established on the earth? Vain indeed are the dreams which, from time to time, men have dreamed upon this subject. Sometimes, on the low ground of utilitarianism, it has been maintained that as civilization advanced, and the arts of peace were cultivated, and the interests of commerce became more world-wide, men would learn the folly of war, and come to see that even on the victors it generally entailed far more material loss than gain. The story has often been told how confidently such hopes were entertained at the time of the first Great International Exhibition, and how grievously those hopes have been disappointed. Since 1851, the world has been called to witness a series of great and terrible wars, and at the present moment EUROPE IS AS A BED OF SMOULDERING FIRES, which a spark may at any moment kindle into a devastating flame. Indeed, so far from commerce putting an end to war, it too often is its pretext. The latest war, that of England in Egypt, is an illustration of the fact. What has England been at war with Egypt for but to defend the Suez Canal, because it is the great commercial channel between the East and West? No; the trade spirit is essentially a selfish spirit—it "lusts and desires to have" what others possess; and hence it is, and will ever continue to be, conducive, in a very large manner, rather than inimical to war.

* In these words there seem to us to be very clearly indicated the Divine use of war, and the explanation of its permission.

READERS should understand that when an article published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD bears the name of the writer, that writer must be held individually responsible for the views therein advanced. The ministers whose sermons appear in this journal, and other contributors, must not be regarded as always endorsing views about which there is a wide divergence of opinion, even among Christians of eminent piety and learning.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The President's Reminder to Congress that no attention was paid by that body to his previous recommendation on the subject of civil service reform is a mild reproof. In again pressing upon them the urgency of legislation on the subject he says: "In the judgment of not a few who have given study and reflection to this matter, the nation has outgrown the provisions which the Constitution has established for filling the minor offices in the public service. But whatever may be thought of the wisdom or expediency of changing the fundamental law in this regard, it is certain that much relief may be afforded, not only to the President and to the heads of the departments, but to senators and Representatives in Congress, by discreet legislation. They would be protected in a great measure by the bill now pending before the Senate, or by any other which should embody its important features, from the pressure of personal importunity and from the labor of examining conflicting claims and pretensions of candidates. I trust that before the close of the present session some decisive action may be taken for the correction of the evils which inhere in the present methods of appointment, and I assure you of my hearty co-operation in any measures which are likely to conduce to that end." The President after defending his policy of removals and appointments as compared with that of recent administrations, urged the enactment of a law prohibiting assessments on officeholders, except where the contribution is absolutely voluntary and is not the result of fear of the consequences of refusal.

An Unexpended Balance of Nearly Eighteen million dollars remains of the appropriations made for internal improvement. This statement, made by the President in his message, sufficiently indicates the recklessness with which the people's representatives vote away the people's money. There is general approval among all parties of the emphatic words in which President Arthur urges Congress to refrain from any more legislation on the pattern of the River and Harbor Bill. It may be hoped that there will now be some check on the squandering of the surplus in the treasury. The President expressed his opinion last session in his veto of the bill; his action was endorsed by the voters at the polls, and now, once more supported by public opinion, he repeats his warning. The President's recommendations of a policy to prevent the accumulation of so large a surplus in the future deserve attention. There is no doubt that the people are grossly and unnecessarily overtaxed, and that the time has come when they are entitled to relief. It is cruel to force from the people, for the mere purpose of accumulating an enormous surplus, the large sums now being extracted from them. Whether the particular relief suggested by the President is the best form, is a question which will give rise to considerable discussion. It is noticed that even the Secretary of the Treasury is not altogether in accord with the President on this subject, for while the latter recommends the abolition of all internal revenue taxes except on distilled spirits, Mr. Folger advocates the retention of those on fermented liquors and tobacco. They do not agree, either, on the question of taxing the bank circulation.

The Reduction of the Rate of Letter Postage to two cents recommended by President Arthur in his message to Congress will, if effected, be a boon generally appreciated both by business men and the poorer classes, and is amply justified by the postmaster-general's report. As to Federal aid to the cause of education the president is obviously favorable to the project. He said: "The census returns disclose an alarming state of illiteracy in certain portions of the country where the provision for schools is grossly inadequate. It is a momentous question for the decision of Congress whether immediate and substantial aid should not be extended by the General Government for supplementing the efforts of private beneficence and of State and Territorial legislation in behalf of education." The president's hope that Congress will pass a national bankruptcy law is cordially and heartily endorsed on all hands. With respect to Utah, the President did not advise further legislation at present.

The Report of the Tariff Commission about which so much comment has been made, is not, it appears, to be submitted to the House after all. The Ways and Means Committee have announced that they will take the report into consideration and prepare a Tariff Bill on the basis of the Report of the Commission. This is regarded by the advocates of Tariff reform as another expedient for the postponement of Legislation.

The Garfield Fair in the Capitol is reported to have realized considerably less than was anticipated from it. It is a matter for profound regret that a serious injury has resulted from the fair. Washington despatches state that the famous historical paintings, which form panels in the interior walls of the rotunda, paintings which are familiar to the people of the whole country have been damaged. To prepare the walls for the hanging of loaned paintings, a wooden framework was erected in front of the old paintings. It now appears that in some way, perhaps because of the hot air forced up in the space between them and the frame-work, at least three of these paintings have been very badly injured. These are "The Landing of Columbus," "The Baptism of Pocahontas," and "The Signing of the Compact on the Mayflower." One of these paintings alone cost $10,000. Senator Anthony, on December 9th, introduced a bill in the Senate prohibiting in future the use of the Capitol for any similar purpose.

The Transit of Venus Across the Face of the sun was watched under favorable conditions on Wednesday at nearly all the observatories of America. It will be remembered that a request for prayers was made by a prominent astronomer, who represented that as large sums of money had been expended and elaborate preparations had been made for observing the phenomenon, it was a legitimate subject for prayer that clear weather might be granted. On the preceding evening the sky was obscured by clouds, but at the time of the transit, American astronomers were able to watch the long-expected phenomenon. An observer thus describes the scene as observed through a large telescope near New York: "The first contact had taken place, and Venus was fast swinging into line between the earth and the sun. The black notch deepened. Its curve was as perfect and its outline as sharp as the imagination could conceive. As it grew deeper and deeper, there presently burst into sight a marvellously beautiful phenomenon. The atmosphere of the planet had caught the sunbeams on its outer edge and bent them round so that it became visible as a beautiful half circle of light. The sight was almost indescribable, and everybody who saw it uttered exclamations of admiration. Half the planet's body was between the eye of the observer and the sun, making a deep, black scallop in the sun's edge; the other half, being yet outside the sun's disk, was invisible, but around its unseen edge, shining against the sky, and arching rainbow-like across the black gap in the sun's edge, was an arc of silvery light."

The Enforcement of the Sunday Laws in New York last week led to numerous arrests, especially in the localities in which Jewish tradesmen abound. Many inquiries were made at Police Headquarters as to the future regulations. In reply they were informed that the following occupations would not be considered violations of the law: Travelling in public or private conveyances or the transfer of baggage connected therewith; operating telegraph or telephone lines; delivery of telegraph messages; delivery or sale of newspapers in a quiet manner; supplying bread or other food within the hours provided by law for the sale of milk, fish and meats, shaving, boot-blackening, or other works of cleanliness. Mr. David Dudley Field said in the course of an opinion defining for the guidance of the police the course the law permitted them to take: "Drinking saloons, tippling houses, dram shops, concert saloons, and dance houses are not necessary to the comfort or convenience of the people, and they are serious interruptions to the repose and religious liberty of the community. They are prohibited and must be stopped. Trades, manufactures and mechanical employments are prohibited, and must be stopped." Though New York is not so notorious as some other cities for its disregard of the Lord's day, there are sufficient of the resorts Mr. Field mentions in full blast every Sunday to furnish the police with plenty of occupation.

An Association of Christian Ladies has been organized for the purpose of aiding in the work of improving the condition of the Indians. The association is intended to be an auxiliary to the National Indian Association. Mrs. Amelia S. Quinton, of Philadelphia, was present at the inaugural meeting held at the house of Hon. Wm. E. Dodge, and made a short address concerning the work of the National Association, of which she is secretary. After alluding to the hopeless and abject condition of Indian women, she urged the necessity of something being done in their behalf. She thought the only hope for the Indian was in education. By commencing with the children when young, she believed that habits of industry as well as of study and a desire to better their present condition could be instilled into them. The association will at once distribute petitions for signatures, praying Congress to afford to the Indian the same protection and citizenship that white and black men now enjoy; to give them adequate common school and industrial education upon their present reservations, as well as full religious liberty.

The Friends of Blind People should avail themselves of an offer made by the Philadelphia association for furnishing home teaching and the use of a free circulating library in raised type for the adult blind. The association announces through the New York Tribune that the work is now in full operation. The library consists of the Bible in sixty-five parts and more than 250 volumes of history, travel, biography, poetry, etc. Blind persons living in any part of the United States can have the alphabet and a learner's reading card mailed to them by addressing John P. Rhoads, Bible House, No. 701 Walnut Street, Philadelphia, and inclosing ten cents, to pay for their cost and postage. Those who knew how to read before becoming blind can learn this system in a few weeks, and thereafter can have the free use of the library by paying postage on the books.

An Elephant was Treated by his Keeper for a severe cold recently in Indianapolis, Ind. The keeper had not learned the latest discoveries in medical science. He therefore administered the remedy formerly prescribed by medical men. He mixed two gallons of whiskey with three gallons of water and offered it to the elephant. It is stated that the huge beast having drunk it showed signs of improvement, and has since then had no return of his malady. In this peculiarity the elephant does not resemble human sufferers. It generally happens that men, for whom physicians prescribe intoxicating liquors, suffer pretty frequently from a return of the sickness or, at any rate, assign it as an excuse for habitual use of the remedy. They say "I will seek it yet again" (Prov. 23 : 35).

A Terrible Battle with a Criminal Occurred in Chicago on December 2d. The criminal had been in hiding for a long time, and a reward had been offered for his apprehension. At length, one of his associates, tempted by the reward, gave him away and a policeman was sent to arrest him. The fugitive finding he was betrayed, appeared to become desperate, and when his captor attempted to secure him he shot him twice, wounding him in the head and hand, and broke away. He hid among a lot of freight cars in the street, and in a few minutes the policeman and a number of citizens were hunting for him. Finally, he was discovered hiding in a box in a coal shed, and the policeman broke open a window and fired four shots at him, all of which took effect. The prisoner had two revolvers in his possession, but had no time to use them. He died in two minutes after the officer shot him. This criminal's own recklessness in taking life led to his death at the hands of the policeman, who otherwise would have arrested him and left him for trial. It is with men as with nations, they that take the sword perish by the sword; and in this sin as with others, the sinner falls into the fate he prepared for others (Psa. 35 : 8).

A Baby in Pawn, was the Plea Presented by a woman for release from a jail in Washington, D.C., recently. When locked up, she made the station-house resound with her cries of "Let me out; I want to get my baby out of pawn." She had one child in her arms, and when asked about the method of pawning a child, said: "Well, I take them to a woman that lends money on children, and she advances me so much on them, and when I gets the money I go to this woman, pays her what she loans me, and then I pay fifteen cents a day for keeping the baby." She refused to tell where the pawn office was situated, but kept up a constant howl that she wanted to get her baby out of pawn. The sales by pawnbrokers' auctioneers of unredeemed pledges reveal the extensive variety of the articles deposited with them as security for loans, but it was not generally known that money was advanced on children. This is not precisely what is meant by the phrase "pledges of affection," though it is evident that the pawnbroker relied for her security on the affection of the mother and not on the intrinsic value of the pledge. It is not probable that many parents so use their children, but we see many evidences that even Christian parents often dispose of them in business and in marriage in such ways as to advance their own interests, forgetting the Scriptural view of their responsibilities (Psa. 127 : 3).

Deadly Bullets Fired at Random on a Crowd stage was the subject of a terrible narrative related last week by an actor in connection with the recent catastrophe at the Cincinnati theatre. The actor said that in one of the plays in which he performed he had to fire blank cartridges from a revolver. He always loaded it himself as a precaution against accident, but on one occasion being hurried, he intrusted the duty to the stage boy. The boy forgot it until the moment came when he should have handed the pistol to the performer. The latter said in describing the incident: "It was too late for him to begin to load, for the curtain was up and I was waiting for him. The boy, in fear of being censured severely for his neglect, ran excitedly to the back door, where a man was chatting with the old door-keeper, and asked him to let him use his revolver for a moment. It was handed to him by the man, who supposed that he knew better than to give it to anyone to discharge it on the stage. But the boy was too nervous with fright to realize what he was doing, and a few moments later I was firing deadly bullets right and left on the stage. How they missed doing damage I can never tell, but when my attention was afterward called to some holes that had been made in the wood-work of the proscenium box, the terrible fact staggered me so that I was as weak as a child over the danger that had been passed through." No wonder the man was horrified at the narrow escape he had had of doing fatal work. When the influence of the theatre comes to be clearly appreciated in the light of the last day, it will be found that the risks to life and limb incurred by those who frequent it are far less serious than the spiritual danger involved (Isa. 47 : 8, 9).

Rubies, Diamonds, and other Precious Stones formed the subject of a lecture delivered in New York last week, by Professor Thomas Egleston, Ph.D. The lecturer mentioned many curious facts in connection with his subject. He said the history of gems was the history of nearly all the intrigues and wars of mankind since the world began. Many superstitions have been attached to precious stones. The amethyst was considered a cure for drunkenness, and was dedicated to Bacchus; jasper was used as a charm by athletes. The composition of the diamond was discovered in 1694, and its weight was determined by the weight of a bean found in the East called a carat. There are not 1000 known diamonds that weigh over ten carats, and not twenty that weigh more than 100. Black diamonds are mostly used for tools, but in Russia they are worn when the court is in mourning. They are beautiful gems with a brilliant lustre. The lecturer described some of the famous diamonds of the world, and then characterized the ruby as the most precious of all the stones when it has the true pigeon-blood color. A ruby of five carats is worth twice as much as a diamond of the same weight. The ancients held this stone to be a charm against poison, disease, and wicked thoughts. The fact of the superiority in value of the ruby over the diamond is not generally known. It is remarkable that this most precious of all stones should have been selected by Solomon as a comparison with wisdom. They to whom the Holy Spirit has given this true wisdom alone know how far its value surpasses the ruby or any other highly prized gem (Prov. 3 : 13-18).

A Georgian's Disappointment with the Newly elected Governor of the State was very emphatically expressed a few days ago. A countryman, who entered the depot at Atlanta on the day of Governor Stephens's arrival, was very anxious to see the man who had triumphantly carried the State. He observed a stalwart figure on the platform, and concluded that must be the governor. So he walked up, raised his hat, and said: "Governor, can I have the honor of shakin' hands with you, seein' as I've come a good ways to do it and might not never have the chance of approachin' you agin!" "Certainly, sir; but I am not the governor—here he comes now." "Is that him?" "That is Governor Stephens." "Well, I'd hearn he was a prodigy; but if that's the biggest man they could trump up for Governor of Georgy, I think we'd better leave the State, for the country's degeneratin'." "We don't estimate a statesman by his physical development; it's the brain. The governor has the greatest brain in Georgia." "I don't care nothin' about brain. But the idea of a man bein' governor that's got to be carried around like a bundle o' clothes!" The countryman's idea of greatness was something like that of Samuel when he was sent to anoint David (1 Sam. 16 : 7), and he could not understand why the people had been so enthusiastic about a man who weighs only ninety pounds and cannot walk unassisted. But the problem has no difficulty for intelligent citizens. The little band of the apostles, unlettered and uninfluential, and even the Christian world of our day is similarly despised by philosophers and kings, but God sees in them His reflected image and has called them by His grace to be His sons (1 Cor. 1 : 26, 27).

CHARIOTS OF IRON.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"And the Lord was with Judah; and he drave out the inhabitants of the mountain; but could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron. And they gave Hebron unto Caleb, as Moses said: and he expelled thence the three sons of Anak."—Judges 1 : 19, 20.

WE frequently use Canaan as a type of heaven, and the Jordan, through which Israel passed, as a symbol of death. Dr. Watts has taught us to sing:

"Sweet fields beyond the swelling flood
Stand dress'd in living green;
So to the Jews old Canaan stood,
While Jordan roll'd between.

"Could we but climb where Moses stood,
And view the landscape o'er,
Not Jordan's stream, nor death's cold flood,
Should fright us from the shore."

This is thoroughly poetical, and may be made exceedingly instructive; but it is not quite accurate, if we undertake a careful consideration of the whole matter. If the New Testament is to expound the Old, then there is another lesson to be learned from the land which flowed with milk and honey. "We that have believed do enter into rest;" that is to say, all believers in Christ have crossed the Jordan, and have come into the promised rest. The covenant is fulfilled to them already in a great measure; they are living under Messiah's sway within the bounds of His kingdom, and every precious thing which God promised them is theirs. They dwell in the "land which the Lord thinketh upon;" "Thy land, O Immanuel!"

The type, therefore, may best set forth the case of the instructed and advanced believer who has passed through the first or wilderness stage of his life, and has now come into a higher condition, actually enjoying spiritual privileges and sitting together with Christ in the heavenly places. To him, however, this condition of exalted privilege is not a state of undisturbed repose; on the contrary, he wars

A CONSTANT WARFARE, wrestling with spiritual wickednesses. The Canaanite is in possession, and the Canaanite is to be driven out. Our natural tendencies and corruptions, our sinful habits and lustings, and the warping and bending of our spirit toward evil—all this has to be overcome; and we shall not possess the land, so as to enjoy undivided tranquility until sin is utterly exterminated. What Joshua could not do our Lord Jesus shall fully accomplish; the enemy within shall be rooted out, and then shall dawn the day of our joy and peace, when we shall sit every man under his own vine and fig-tree, and none shall make us afraid. That perfect victory shall be ours; but not yet.

Taking this as the truth which we shall illustrate by our text, we notice that the work of Israel was to drive out and utterly to exterminate those condemned races which were in possession of Canaan. One tribe was chosen to lead the van in the fierce campaign. Joshua, their heroic leader, was gone; who should lead the way? The power of the Canaanites in his day had been broken, but now that he was dead the old races began to look up again, even as we oftentimes find our sins which we thought were all dead suddenly finding fresh courage, and attempting to set up their empire once more. Then Israel went to God and inquired, "Who shall go up for us against the Canaanites first, to fight against them?" And the Lord said, Judah shall go up; behold, I have delivered the land into his hand."

The tribe of Judah, then, was commissioned to lead the way, and we see three things in its conduct of the enterprise. First, the Lord's power was trusted and magnified, for "the Lord was with Judah, and Judah drove out the inhabitants of the mountain." Secondly, by this very tribe, this right royal tribe, the Lord's power was distrusted, and therefore restrained; for "Judah could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron." Yet, as if to rebuke them, they had a singular incident set before them for the vindication of God's power, and of that we read in the twentieth verse. Caleb, that grand old man, who still lived on, the sole survivor of all who came out of Egypt, had obtained Hebron as his portion, and he went up in his old age, when his bones were sore and set, and slew the three sons of Anak, even three mighty giants, and took possession of their city. In this way the Lord's power was trusted and vindicated from the slur which Judah had brought upon it.

I. Let us think upon our first head, which is, that by the tribe of Judah was trusted and magnified. "The Lord was with Judah." Oh, that the Holy Ghost may be with us!

The people had wisely consulted their God, and it fell to Judah's lot, by divine appointment, to lead the van. In that work the tribe prospered. Read the chapter when you are at home, and you will observe a series of great victories. The Lord proved to Judah, and to all Israel, what He could do, and it would have been wise on their part to have put unlimited trust in Him; then had they gone forward conquering and to conquer. Has not the Lord done the same with those of us who have believed in Him? What has your experience been, my brother? Has not God revealed His power in you? Do you not possess infallible proofs of it which you would scarcely like to tell, for they are as secret as they are sacred? Though you would never mention them in a mixed audience, lest you should cast your pearls where they would not be appreciated, yet they are laid up in your memories in the form of remarkable deliverances, special comforts, and singular mercies, for which to this day you cannot account upon any other theory than that the Lord God omnipotent put forth His hand and specially helped you in your hour of need. Do not forget these things.

If the Lord's power be proved to your own soul by God Himself, then it is proved indeed. I care very little for those evidences of the existence of a God which are fashioned for us by learned men—the a priori argument, the argument from analogy, and all the rest. I have seen an end to them in my own doubts and fears. The most convincing evidence is found in another kind of reasoning, such as that which conquers all doubt by actual experience. When God has come to our soul, and drawn nigh to us in the hour of our distress, we have needed no further argument.

But the Lord had also proved His power to Judah in NUMEROUS VICTORIES.

The victories which He gave to them were singular and remarkable, even when not miraculous; and there were many of them. They had gone from city to city, and smitten all their foes. It seemed as if God had said to Judah, as He said to Joshua, "No man shall be able to stand against thee all the days of thy life." When your life is crowded with displays of God's power, with you, for you, and in you, then that power cannot be doubted. It is impossible to argue a Christian out of the grounds of his faith when he has had long dealings with God. There! You cavillers may boast that you can disprove a doctrine, if you like. I care nothing for your sophisms. You cannot disprove it to me. You can carp against the Old Testament or the New, if you like. I am sorry for you, for it is all clear enough to me; but I am not going to get into a great heat over it in order to combat you. It is not so very important what you prove, or do not prove, about the Books, because the matter of fact still remains untouched.

Disprove our sanity, and you have done something; only let me tell you that even then we shall remain sane enough to hold to what we do hold, and shall not be so mad as to join the infidel ranks. We are satisfied to be fools if to be fools means to see God. We are satisfied to know nothing about the "culture" and the "thought" of this grand century, if that involves being far off from the Eternal Lord, and ceasing to see His hand in nature, in providence, and in grace. We are content if we may but know Him, whom to know is life eternal.

Beloved brethren, I may say of many here present that God has proven His power and goodness to you by such overwhelming proofs that doubt, in your case, would be a grievous piece of folly and sin. God had especially favored Judah with remarkable assistance in what I may call "brotherly action." "Judah said unto Simeon his brother, Come up with me into my lot, that we may fight against the Canaanites; and I likewise will go with thee into thy lot. So Simeon went with him." (See verse 3.) In communion with each other these tribes had further proof of God's power, for He gave them the necks of their enemies.

We also can narrate wonderful displays of God's power and grace when we have had fellowship one with another in holy service. Our choicest experiences have been enjoyed in Christian society. The Lord is pleased with brotherly love, and there He commands the blessing to rest as the dew on Hermon. When together we have gone forth to battle, to struggle against the sin of the age, to bear testimony for neglected truth, to bring our wandering brethren back, or to reclaim fallen sisters to the faith of Jesus, have we not obtained in that fraternal action grand proofs of the Master's power to bless and save? I know that we have. There let it stand, and let it witness against us if we in future yield to unbelief.

Yet further, brethren, it so happened that to Judah God gave great proofs of His presence and power by raising up, here and there a man in their midst who performed heroic deeds. I will not speak of Caleb, for you will tell me, "Ah, he was an old, old man, and belonged to another generation." He was just going off the scene; we do not wonder that he did great things." Ay, but he had a nephew, one Othniel, a young man as yet unmarried, and when Caleb said, "He that smiteth Kirjath-sepher, and taketh it, to him will I give Achsah my daughter to wife," his nephew Othniel was the man for the city and the bride. The young hero stood forward, and went up to the fortress, and took the city, and passed it over to his uncle's hands, and received the promised reward. Oh yes, and we have seen raised up—and shall see it more and more—who have been self-denying, self-distrustful, inconsiderate of themselves, who have been willing for Christ's sake to be any thing or nothing, and God has been with them, and the power of the Most High has rested upon them.

In our advancing years we become better recruiting-sergeants, and so enlist our own successors. You who are now getting gray once wondered what would become of the cause of God when the guide of your youth fell asleep in Jesus; but the immortal cause has survived the death of the standard-bearer. We never hear of that good man now; indeed, he does not seem to have been so important as you thought. God will find messengers as long as He has errands. When certain of us have gone home, you young people will be leading in our stead, and you will say, "I recollect the old gentleman. We did value his ministry, and we could not think what we should do without him; but we have done a deal better without him than ever we did with him, for God in his infinite mercy has raised up a worthy successor." Wherefore be of good courage, and let what you have seen as to the past be to you a prophecy of God's goodness in the future. Caleb shall be gathered to his fathers, but Othniel shall follow him, who shall be as brave as he.

The reason why the men of Judah were successful was because they had full confidence in God. Up to a certain point Judah relied upon God. Jehovah had bidden them to lead the way, and they led the way. He had conducted them from city to city, and they went, not doubting that God would be with them; and so success attended them, for they leaned upon the Lord. Thus shall it be with us, for it is written—"According to your faith be it unto you." The Lord will not fall short of the measure; let us not make the measure short.

Yet this is where we too frequently fail; for our faith is such a poor piece of business. We scarcely trust God as well as we trust a generous man; and when God does a great thing for His people they say one to another, "Is it not surprising? Is it not wonderful?" Many are amazed that God should keep His word; so that, when He answers prayer, they exclaim, "What a marvellous thing!" Is it, then, a marvel for God to be true? for God to keep His promise? I grant you that there is a side of it which forever must be marvellous; but still I fear that with the allowable marvel there is often mixed such a degree of unbelief that the wonderment is not so much of admiring gratitude as astonished unbelief.

II. Now I come to the painful but important subject of because distrusted. The men of Judah could drive out the inhabitants of the mountain, but they could not drive out the inhabitants of the valley, because they had chariots of iron. As far as their faith went, so far God kept touch with them, and they could do anything and everything; but when they despondingly thought that they could not drive out the inhabitants of the wide valleys, then they failed utterly. They were afraid because of the chariots, which had poles between the horses armed with lances which cut their way through the crowd, and the axles of the wheels were fitted with great scythes; these inventions were novel, and caused a panic, and therefore the men of Judah lost their faith in God, and so became weak and cowardly. If they had believed in God, and gone forth in His name, the horses would soon have fled, as indeed they did when God gave His people faith. When Barak led the way with Deborah, then they smote Jabin, who had nine hundred chariots of iron. God would have been with Judah if Judah had displayed faith; but, having no faith, they could not rout the chariots of iron.

Their faith was imperfect. They retained too much confidence in themselves, mark that; for, if their confidence had been in God alone, these chariots of iron would have been ciphers in the calculation. If God has to give the victory, then chariots of iron or chariots of fire are no item at all against an omnipotent God. They evidently thought that there was somewhat in themselves; for their power went as far as smiting the men of the hills, but not so far as attacking the cavalry in the open plain where there was room for them to rush to and fro. Now, that is your weakness and mine. We tacitly imply that God can help us up to a certain point. Does not that mean that we can help ourselves up to that point?

Being interpreted, the belief conceals a measure of self-trust; and the next akin to self-trust is distrust. If you have passed out of yourself, where have you entered now? Into the infinite. The man who has reached the infinite needs not to reckon any longer.

Herein is the failure of our faith, if it rests not in God's bare arm. See this round world how steadily it turns! how smoothly it moves along in its predestinated course! Why? Because God has hung it upon nothing, and God's own will directs it. Suppose it were hung on a chain; would it be any the more secure? The strength of the chain would come from God, and it is better to have the power without the chain. Though a saint is sustained by nothing but the power of God, all the devils in hell cannot stir him. The bare arm of God is the source of all power.

Next, the imperfection of their faith lay in this, as it may do in yours, my brethren, that they believed one promise of God and did not believe another. There is a kind of faith which is strong in one direction, but utter weakness if tried in other ways. It is curious that persons generally pick out the easiest promises to believe, while those which are greater, and therefore are the more god-like, they cannot believe. Judah believed in smiting the hill-men, because he thought such warfare easy; but as to overcoming the cavalry with their chariots of iron, that was difficult, and so he did not believe up to that mark. Beware of being pickers and choosers of God's promises. Oh, for a faith that takes the and knows nothing of choosing or refusing. Whatsoever God has promised He is able also to perform; and if the promise be but suitable to my case, I am to grasp it and expect to see it fulfilled.

Some believe God at one time and not at another. I have known friends who are wonderful believers on Sunday. They go home singing:

"Let the earth's old pillars shake
And all the wheels of nature break;
Our steady souls shall fear no more Than solid rocks when billows roar."

you make a bad debt on Monday; how do you feel over it? Not quite so much like a pillar, I dare say, but rather more like the thistledown that is blown with the wind. Much faith is temporary. That is the reason why Judah could not drive out the dwellers in the plain; he heard the rushing of those chariots of iron, and his heart failed him.

There was a further reason for failure arising out of this imperfection of their faith; they could not conquer the chariots of iron, because, first, they did not try. The Hebrew does not say that they could not drive them out. What the Hebrew says is that they did not drive them out. Some things we cannot do because we never make the attempt. We set down such and such a thing as manifestly beyond our power, and, silently, we whisper to ourselves, "therefore beyond God's power," and so we let it alone. No chariots of iron will be driven out if we dare not make the attempt.

Next, I suspect that they did not drive them out because they were idle. If cavalry were to be dealt with, Judah must bestir himself. If chariots of iron were to be defeated they must enter upon an arduous campaign; and so, taking counsel of their fears and their idleness, they said, "Let us not venture on the conflict." There are many things that Christ's church is unable to do because it is too lazy. "What," say you, "do you call us lazy?" No, brethren, I will not do anything of the sort. If any of you should happen to call yourselves so it will spare me the trouble. I am afraid that I should have to upbraid certain ministers for being indolent in God's work, and I fear that many others of God's servants are none too diligent. Idleness refuses to sound the trumpet for the battle, and the fight never comes on, and therefore the enemy is not driven out.

Then, again, they were not at all anxious to meet the men who manned those chariots, for they were afraid. These men of Judah were cowards in the presence of chariots of iron, and what can a coward do? He is

GREAT AT RUNNING AWAY.

They say that he "may live to fight another day." Not he; he will live, but he will not live to fight, depend upon it, any more another day than he does to-day. His heart is in his heels, and he will show his foeman his back whenever the fight is hot. We must cry mightily to God to deliver us from cowardice, and then we shall accomplish what now we think impossible.

Come then, brothers and sisters, have you got into a cleft stick in the matter of your personal affairs; and are you saying to-night, "I cannot pray about it; I cannot trust God about it"? Is that right? Look your Bibles up, and see whether there be not a promise exactly suited to your singular condition. Look back upon your own experience and see whether God has not done already for you and others of His people a greater thing than your present trial requires. Why will you say that you cannot drive out the chariots of iron? Be of good courage, and go forward. God is able to deliver you; therefore fear not. He will supply your need; be not dismayed.

Perhaps some holy work for God is your difficulty. You have done something already for which you praise God, and now a new work is laid at your door, of which you say, "No, I cannot undertake it; I do not feel at all equal to it." What! Not if the Almighty Lord has said, "I will be with thee"? Do you answer, "I could do almost anything, but not that"? Are you sure, my brother, that you could do almost anything? Do you not think that, if another task were set before you, it would be equally hard to you? If God commands, is it right to reason why, or even to ask a question? Let us get at the work, my brethren; and the greater the danger, the greater the labor, the greater the difficulty, so much the more fully let us cast ourselves upon our God, and give to Him the glory of the deed when the work is done.

An unconverted person is here who has been thinking of coming to Christ, but he says: "I cannot give up all my sins. One of them I must retain; all the rest I can leave, but that one is invincible, for it has chariots of iron. I cannot drive it out." That sin must die, or you will perish by it. Depend upon it, that sin which you would save from slaughter will slaughter you. "But I am in such a strange connection, and there are so many peculiar circumstances about my case." Yes, I know; peculiar circumstances surround all men that go to hell, but they do not quench the fire for them.

TURN THE SIN OUT.

That is the only thing to do with it; and the more you love it, the more speedily should you turn it out, for it evidently lies near your heart, where it can do you great mischief. "Well, it is not one of the grosser sins." No; it is one of those respectable sins which are so hard to get rid of. You must drive it out. I notice that if anybody picks my pocket it is sure to be a respectable-looking person. If a man is a rogue he is sure to look like an honest man, to lead people to trust him. Sin must be driven out, even though it has a chariot of iron.

Certain Christians make up their minds that certain sins must be tolerated in their cases. I know one who has constitutionally a fiery temper, and so, whenever he gets into a towering passion, he cries, "I cannot help it; I am so constituted." Instead of weeping before God, and vowing, "I will master this passion; God is omnipotent, and He can make my temper a reasonable one"—instead of that, he says that everything else can be conquered in him, but not this sin, for it is constitutional. "You know that we all have our besetments," says one. What do you mean by that? Some sin that you often fall into? Do you call that a besetting sin? If I were to walk to-night across Clapham Common, and half a dozen men stopped me, I should say that I was beset; but if at an appointed place a party met me regularly, I should not say that I was beset. And so the sin which a man often indulges in is not his besetting sin; it is his favorite sin, a sin that will be his ruin. A besetting sin is one which forces itself upon a man, and ere he can be on his guard it seizes him by the throat and throws him down. We must be watchful, so that the next time the temptation comes we may escape from it.

The fact is, brothers and sisters, we must tolerate no sin in ourselves; if we make excuses for it in our brethren, well and good; but let us never make or accept an excuse for ourselves. Sin in us is ten times worse sin than in others. If an unconverted man sins it is bad enough; but when a man has tasted of the good word of grace, and has leaned his head on Christ's bosom, and then falls into sin, what excuse can be offered for him? None. Let us weep tears of blood because we thus offend. We will yet vanquish the chariots of iron.

III. To close. Let us see

THE LORD'S POWER VINDICATED.

Just at that time brave old Caleb, leaning on his staff, went up to Hebron. When he was a younger man Moses sent him as a spy, and when he was upon that business he happened to come near to Hebron, and there he saw three tremendous fellows of the race of the giants; I suppose they were from eight to ten feet high. He saw them, and those that were with him were afraid. They said, "We were as grasshoppers in their sight." But Caleb was not a bit afraid. He said,

"God is not with them, and they will be easily overthrown." When they came into the land forty years after, Caleb did not ask for his city, but as an unselfish man, he fought to win cities for others. When that was done he said, "Hebron was given to me. I must go and conquer it; and the giants that I saw years ago, I dare say, have not grown much shorter; I must cut them down." Away he went, and it proved as he had said; in his hale old age he was able to slay those three sons of Anak, and to take possession of their city.

I could tell you of holy women, sick and infirm, scarcely able to leave their beds, who are doing work which, to some strong Christians, seems too hard to attempt. Have I not seen old men doing for the Lord in their feebleness that which young men have declined? Could I not tell you of some with one talent—certainly no more—who are bringing in a splendid revenue of glory to their Lord and Master, while you fine young fellows with ten talents have wrapped them all in a napkin and hid them in the earth? I wish that I could shame myself, and shame every worker here, into enterprises that would astonish unbelievers. God help us to do that which seems impossible. Let men be provoked to charge us with fanaticism. God bless the fanaticism which, being translated, means nothing but a true faith in the living God.

May we be helped to trust the Lord as He ought to be trusted, and march on till we drive out all His enemies despite their chariots of iron, that unto God may be glory forever and ever. Amen.

A CONVERTED MOSQUE-READER'S FLIGHT FOR LIFE.

(See Illustration, page 797.)

NOT far from the modern Nablous, the ancient Shechem of Scripture (Genesis 33:18), there resided a few years ago, an Arab family of high lineal descent, who were enthusiastic devotees of Mahommed. Their piety, though not ostentatious, was proverbial, and whenever the prayer signal sounded from the minaret of the neighboring mosque, Youhannah El Mosheh and all who dwelt under his roof were sure to be found, at any cost or inconvenience to themselves, foremost and most devout among the worshippers.

REWARDED FOR HIS DEVOTION.

The reputation for orthodoxy which El Mosheh had acquired, reached at length the ears of the chief dignitaries at Constantinople, and as a guerdon for his devotedness, he was nominated Keri, or Reader, at the mosque, thereby securing to him a much higher religious status than he had formerly enjoyed, and increased respect from his fellow believers.

El Mosheh was a man of much intellectual force, combined with an exemplary gentleness altogether unusual among Orientals. Though he was as strong as any of his nomad brethren who scoured the adjacent plains, and as brave as the most heroic veterans of the tribe, yet he was characterized by a tenderness which, at first sight, seemed a little incongruous with the sterner and rougher elements of his character.

A short time after his appointment to the Readership of the Koran, there happened to pass through Nablous, two gentlemen, the one an Englishman, and the other a wealthy Christian merchant from the United States. Very naturally they sought out first of all the residence of the Sheik, and subsequently, that of El Mosheh. A brief introductory interview resulted in the exchange of most cordial courtesies, and the Englishman and his travelling companion spent the hours between sunset and midnight at the house of the Sheik, whither also the Reader was invited.

The Englishman had been for many years a minister of the Gospel of Christ, and was now realizing a long-cherished dream of his early manhood to visit the Holy Land. Having spoken for some time of local and governmental matters, both host and guests found themselves in the midst of an animated conversation on the respective claims and merits of Christianity and Mahomedanism. The Sheik, who was a man of exceedingly limited knowledge, was speedily silenced, and as the most effective answer to Mr. Burton's really formidable arguments solemnly ejaculated, "Allah is Great, and Mahommed is his prophet."

Not so, however, with El Mosheh. Point by point he disputed, though with unruffled equanimity, with his Christian opponent, with all the adroitness and ability of a practised debater, and it was clear that he was contending for truth and not only for victory. When the moment for parting came, the Sheik accompanied them to their lodging, and bade them good-night. Early the next morning a note was sent by El Mosheh, requesting that the two gentlemen would favor him with their company at breakfast—an invitation which they at once gladly accepted.

Eighteen months have passed since Mr. Burton and his friend enjoyed the rights of hospitality at the house of the Reader. But he is Reader at the mosque no longer. The conversation with the foreigners followed by a diligent perusal of the New Testament, a copy of which was given him when his guests said farewell, resulted in his conversion to Christ as the true Prophet of God.

During the development of the recent revolt in Egypt against the authority of the Khédive, and when the tidings of Arabi's movements and reported successes fired the ambition of Mahommedans everywhere, El Mosheh had occasion to visit a town not far from Nablous, and found outside its walls the majority of its inhabitants keeping high holiday. He was well known as a recreant from the faith of his fathers, and his approach in Arab costume from the gate of the town, was the signal for an outburst of fanatical passion, such as he had never witnessed before. His very life was in imminent peril, but putting his spurs to his horse's flanks, he dashed forward, and speedily left the irate Mahommedans far behind.

El Mosheh is now endeavoring in a quiet, prayerful manner to lead his neighbors and friends to Jesus, whose love has won his own heart, and whose ardent disciple and follower he has become.

COLONEL ORTON'S INTERCESSION.

MR. CHILD was seated in his office awaiting the visit of a man for whom he had telegraphed. Mr. Child was the president of a bank, and the man for whom he had sent was Colonel Orton, the father of one of his clerks. Presently the door opened and Colonel Orton was ushered in.

"I have sent for you, Colonel," said the banker, "on a very painful business. I am a business man, and therefore I speak plainly. Your son is a defaulter. I have found this morning that he has appropriated the funds of the bank, and it is my duty to prosecute him unless you can make good the deficiency."

The old soldier staggered under the blow. "Where is he?" he asked breathlessly. "Oh, I cannot believe it."

"He is in the bank strong room," said Mr. Child. "It was my duty to take care he did not abscond, and so rather than send him to prison I have kept him here until you arrived. He has been gambling and I believe his statement that this is his first offence; but he has taken over a thousand dollars which must be replaced."

The colonel buried his face in his hands, and brave soldier as he was he shed bitter tears—the first he had shed in many years. The banker was distressed by the sight, but was inflexible on his alternative. It must be either repayment or prosecution.

"I have not a quarter of a thousand dollars in the world, Mr. Child. What can I do? It will kill me to see the boy in a felon's dock. Will you give me a few hours to see what can be done?"

The banker willingly consented, and the colonel went his way. Three hours later he returned bringing with him a well-known capitalist who was, like Colonel Orton, a veteran of the war.

"Mr. Child," said General Seymour, "Colonel Orton is a dear friend of mine: he saved my life once at the risk of his own, and I am going in gratitude to him to pay this defalcation. But I can only do it conditionally. I do not know the boy, but for his father's sake I want him to have another chance. Will you give it him?"

"I will," said the banker. "I believe, as I told Colonel Orton just now, that this is his first offence, and I hope it may be a lesson to him. But for his father's years and honorable service I would have sent him to prison. Now that you are making good the loss, it will be very gratifying to me to have him reinstated."

The defaulter was called in and forgiven. He was deeply affected and solemnly promised amendment. A promise he faithfully kept, and in after life the bank had no more faithful, trustworthy servant than he. Not long after his reinstatement in the bank he in fulfillment of his promise of a new life attended church. There the Holy Spirit convinced him of sin. A Christian friend to whom he went in his anxiety explained to him the way of salvation, not through the merits of the sinner, but through the life and death of Jesus. Young Orton recalled his own experience of deliverance through his father's merits and had no difficulty in understanding how God for Christ's sake could pardon him.

TOM THURSTON'S CONFESSION.

"How silent you are this morning, Tom. I should say morose if I were sure you would not be offended. Here we have been all morning in this lovely spot with no ledgers or journals to worry us, and yet you are dull and gloomy, and have had hardly energy enough to haul in even when you have had a bite."

"Yes, you're right, Arthur," was the reply, "fishing bores me this morning. I am poor company for you, old fellow, but it's no use; I can't shake off the depression. It's been getting worse ever since we came, and this morning I am melancholy enough to fling myself into the river."

At that moment Tom Thurston looked very much inclined to do as he said. His companion glanced at him and noted the despair plainly written on his face. He was disappointed, for the vacation Arthur Brook and Tom Thurston were then enjoying had been planned six months before, and had been eagerly anticipated by both young men.

"You have something on your mind, Tom," Arthur said at last; "you've been robbing a church or committing some other horrible crime. Your conscience is troubled, I believe. Now, I don't want to pry into your private affairs, but if you really are in trouble and I can help you in any way, you may count on me."

"I don't think confessing will help me, Arthur, though it certainly would be a relief, and if you don't mind hearing the story, I know I shall have your sympathy."

"Go ahead," said Arthur, "I'll listen gladly and you shall have my advice at lower rates than they charge at the office."

"Arthur," said Tom impressively, "I am married."

"Whew!" said the other, with a low whistle, that expressed amazement more emphatically than any words could have done.

"That is a long row to hoe."

"Yes it is. I'll tell you all about it. When we came here last week, one of the first things my father did was to call me into the library and unfold his plans for my future. There is some young lady staying in the village yonder whom the old gentleman knows. She has a big fortune and he is set upon my marrying her. He has made up his mind that I shall propose to her and if I don't consent, he seems obstinate enough to propose for me himself. I could not tell him I was married. He would have had a fit on the spot if I had."

"But it's the marriage that amazes me, Tom," said Arthur, "when did it occur? How have you kept it so secret? I thought I knew all about you, but I never suspected anything of that kind."

"No, I don't think any of our set know anything about it. You remember old Mr. Ward, our chief clerk, who died three years ago? Well he died very poor. I used to visit him while he was ill for I liked him very much. When he died Mrs. Ward did not know how to get along so she set up a boarding house with the little money there was, and I went to board there as you know, and have been there ever since. I went at first more out of sympathy for the widow and her daughter than from any other reason. But I was very comfortable, and by and by my sympathy for Miss Ward grew into a warmer feeling, and nearly a year ago we were quietly married. I suppose it was a very foolish thing to do, but it is done, and she is the best and dearest wife a man ever had, and but for my father's anger I should not regret what I have done for a moment. Now you have heard all, what do you advise?"

Arthur sat on the bank musing for a few minutes. Then he said, "Let us tell Helen, and get her to break it to your father. He must be told, of course, and if she will do it, he will take it better from her than any one."

Tom agreed, being too despondent to object, and packing up their rods they started for Mr. Thurston's house at once. When they arrived, Tom sat down disconsolately on a rustic bench while Arthur went in to find Mr. Thurston's niece, Helen Gould. Presently she came out and there, in the garden, Arthur told the story, while Tom sat silent and dejected playing with a reel. Helen's sympathy was quickly enlisted, though she knew that in undertaking to intercede with Mr. Thurston or his son, she accepted no trifling commission.

The Converted Mosque Reader's Flight for Life.

What passed in Mr. Thurston's library when he heard the story from Helen's lips no one ever knew. That it was a stormy time might be guessed by those who knew his character. It was more than two hours before Helen returned, and the young men were weary with suspense. But at the end of that time she came out and that evening Tom was speeding away with a bright face and a happy heart to New York to conduct his wife to his father from whom she received a hearty welcome. Disappointed as the old gentleman was in his ambitious schemes for his son's welfare, he learned, in after years, when Helen Gould left him to become the wife of Arthur Brook, that a good Christian girl can minister to the happiness of the man she loves, and those about him, more effectually than a woman whose chief charm lies in her money bags.

RICHARD OWEN'S CHOICE.

A Story in Three Chapters.

CHAPTER I.

The Owens and Their Home.

"WILL father soon be home?" inquired little Jim Owen, as the clock hands pointed to the time at which his father generally returned from work on Saturday evenings.

"I hope so, Jim. If you like you may run to the top of the lane and see if he is coming. Give me baby, dear. I am quite ready for her now."

As Mrs. Owen extended her arms to take her little one, Jim bestowed a hearty kiss on its chubby cheek, and then snatched up his cap and went with rapid steps to the top of the lane, quite expecting, however, that his father would meet him before he could reach it.

But Jim was disappointed. When he arrived, there was no father to be seen; though he might have been perceived a long way off had he been on the road. While Jim is watching and waiting, we will take another look at the cottage.

Saturday is always a busy day with working-men's wives. Their own homes must be thoroughly cleansed, and that too, in the afternoon, in order that they may look fresh and bright on the morrow. All that can be done ought to be done to insure the keeping of God's commandment with respect to His own day, "In it thou shalt do no manner of work."

It was in this spirit that Mrs. Owen made her Saturday preparations. It was not to insure time for idle gossip, country excursions, or with the view of displaying finer clothes than those worn on the other six days that she labored beforehand. These things, alas! move many, but they cannot influence those who belong to God's family, those who have been led by the teaching of His

Holy Spirit to comprehend "what is the breadth and length, and depth, and height; and to know the love of Christ which passeth knowledge."

It was this love of Christ which constrained little Jim Owen's mother to obey the commandment, "Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy." She and her husband looked forward to the Day of Rest as one of God's precious gifts to be used for the sustenance of their souls and the refreshment of their bodies, and did all in their power to devote the whole of it to the purpose for which it was bestowed.

Richard Owen's home on Saturday night was always as clean and bright looking as hands could make it. The floor all ruddy with recent brushing, the hearth white, the fire-irons, fender, and the tin utensils on the wall sparkling with the reflected fire-light, and the wife and children as clean as the home itself. Such was the picture on which Richard Owen could always look on his return from work. And these things, together with the neatly spread tea-table, were so enticing that he never wished to leave them to spend his Saturday nights amid brawlers and drunkards in a beer-house.

Richard Owen, the father of little Jim and baby Alice, was a mechanic, and worked for Messrs. Farr and Bradley, the great engine makers and machinists. Their works were at a considerable distance from his home; but Owen had a special reason for living so far away. His wife, in her younger days, had been used to a country life, and when they were going to be married, he said, "Mary, I don't mean to take you away into the heart and din of a large town, where the air is always full of smoke and you would feel half stifled. You shall have a home where you can have a bit of green around you."

Mary hardly knew how this was to be managed, but Richard told her there were nice cottages outside the town and within sight of the fields, and he had fixed on one of these for their dwelling. When she found that his consideration for her tastes and likings would cause him to have a walk of nearly two miles to his work, and the same at night, we may be sure that her affection and gratitude were not lessened by it.

She would have persuaded Richard to study his own convenience by taking a cottage near the works, but he would not, and she, therefore, strove to make their first home all that home should be to a weary man when he comes from his daily toil.

After this introduction to the Owen family, let us go back to little Jim, whom we left watching and waiting at the top of the lane. The little fellow—he was only eight years old—was beginning to feel impatient and sorely disappointed, for he had waited a long while, and there were no signs of father, when he saw a familiar face. It was that of Andrew Parker, a lad much older than himself, who had lately been apprenticed to the same work as his father did.

"Oh, Jim," cried Andrew, "you are looking out for your father, but it is of no use. He and ever so many more are at Scott's Mill. They've had a break down there, and they must have it repaired so as to start at the regular time on Monday morning. I was just coming to tell your mother she must send your father's tea, for he'll not get home this side of midnight."

Away ran Jim, hardly stopping to reply to this piece of information, and carried the unwelcome news to his mother.

Mrs. Owen was sorry to hear that her husband was likely to be detained so late, but she at once began to prepare the meal. This done, she put on baby's hood and shawl and her own bonnet.

"Can't I take father's tea, mother? Scott's Mill is not so very far away. I know where it is."

"You shall go with me and carry it while I carry baby. I could trust you, but I want to speak to your father."

Jim's face looked far brighter after receiving this assurance, and he trudged on, carrying his basket with a steady hand until they reached Scott's Mill.

It was a large flour mill, and they had to ask in what part of the building Richard Owen was working. Soon they found him, and the little party went to a quiet nook in one of the great chambers, that the father might take his meal.

"Poor little Jim!" said he, as he kissed his boy. "Poor little Jim has been disappointed to-night, I am sure. But he sees his father before bed-time, after all. And baby too, bless her merry face, baby has come to help bring tea. I can't take you now, my little woman," he added, as the tiny creature recognized him and stretched out her round arms.

"Will the work be done before twelve, Richard?" asked Mrs. Owen.

"No, Mary; that is quite impossible."

"Then I suppose you have to begin again by one o'clock on Monday morning?"

"That would not be sufficient to complete it. Only a certain number of hands can work, and those could not get it done. I hear that Mr. Scott is resolute about having it ready for Monday morning, and you know what that means."

"Breaking the Sabbath."

"Just that. They say if the mill is not at work on Monday they will lose a great deal of money, and it must be done."

"And what do your masters say, Richard?"

"They say the same, that it must be done!"

The wife looked up in her husband's face, and though she said nothing, he well knew what the glance meant.

"There's a question in your face, Mary," said he. "I can read it without your speaking a word. You want to know what I shall do. Look into the past for the answer, Mary."

Mrs. Owen could not have borne to ask this question, lest by so doing she might seem to doubt her husband, but it was in her mind, and, when he said, "Look into the past, Mary," she rejoiced, and her eyes filled with glad tears. More than once Richard Owen had been tempted by the offer of double wages to work on Sunday, and been threatened with dismissal for refusing to do so. But bribes and threats had failed in making him change his resolution. Ever did the Apostle's words, "We ought to obey God rather than men," come into his mind, and he prayed that their motto might be his, and that like them, he might be strengthened to act upon it.

Hitherto he had not suffered. Men had been found willing to do what he refused to have part or lot in, and after the first feeling of anger was over, his employers hesitated to carry a threat into execution which would deprive them of one of their best and steadiest hands. With each temptation conquered, came increased strength for the future, and increased faith in the good providence of a loving and gracious Heavenly Father.

Richard Owen's wife went home again with a glad heart, assured that she should see him again ere midnight came. She had gone to Scott's Mill, desiring to hear from his own lips that he would not waver from his resolution to keep the Sabbath holy, and prepared, should there be any need for so doing, to strengthen it by her words.

As little Jim trotted home by her side, he asked, "Will father come home before twelve, mother?"

Joyfully and confidently came the answer. "Thank God! Yes. He is sure to be home, Jim. Your father loves the Sabbath too well, and fears God too much, to abuse the gift or disobey the Giver."

"How is the work getting on at Scott's Mill?" asked Mr. Farr, one of Richard Owen's masters, of the foreman.

"Very well, sir, considering, but there is more to do than we at first thought, and it will only be by very hard work we can finish by Monday morning."

"Then I suppose the men will have to keep on all to-morrow?"

"Yes, sir."

"Ah well! There is no help for it. You must tell them that those who leave off at twelve to-night must return at twelve to-morrow. I dare say they will not object?"

"Only one does, sir."

"And that is Owen, is it not?"

"Yes, sir."

"Ah! he has always been a troublesome fellow about Sunday work. If he had not been so steady and such a good hand I should have dismissed him long ago. But so few of them are to be thoroughly depended upon, that, while we were so busy, I could not send away a man like Owen. However, I am determined to keep nobody who will not obey orders and who sets himself up to be better than his master. Our slack time is coming on, and we can spare a hand or two very well. You will therefore say that I am resolved to dismiss whoever refuses to work on the Sunday when it is a case of necessity like the present."

"I gave a hint of the sort, sir, for I found that Owen had been trying to persuade the rest to stand out. It silenced them, and I fancy he will think twice before he throws himself out of employment at this season."

"I wish he may, for he is a worthy fellow, and never gave us any trouble except by his religious scruples."

If Mr. Farr had been a religious man himself, he would have understood that Owen's steady, industrious, conscientious conduct, was the result of his religion. "The fruit of the Spirit is love, joy, peace, long-suffering, gentleness, goodness, faith, meekness, temperance." Now these things Mr. Farr gave Richard Owen credit for; he had seen him temperate in his habits, gentle and kind in his conduct toward others, entirely trustworthy and honest in all his dealings, working steadily, in short, "With good will doing service, as to the Lord, and not to men." And he approved of these things because they tended to his own temporal gain. But when Mr. Farr found that his employee's religion made him desirous to be obedient to all the commandments of his Heavenly Father, and that he preferred offending an earthly master to breaking the fourth commandment, he objected to the religion that caused opposition to his will.

"I will put an end to these nonsensical fancies, once for all," said Mr. Farr to himself, and before he left the works that evening he gave strict orders "that any workman refusing to come on the morrow should be dismissed."

Eleven o'clock struck, and then Richard Owen laid down his tools and prepared to depart. The foreman observed him and at once said, "Owen, you must work till twelve, and come back at noon to-morrow."

"I cannot do that, sir," was the firm but respectful answer.

"Nonsense, man. You must. Mr. Farr has left special orders, and I am to see them obeyed. At any rate go on till twelve."

"Mr. Crossley," returned Richard, "I cannot work longer without encroaching on the Lord's day. As to working on that day, sir, you know I never have done that, and God's grace preventing me, I never will."

Mr. Crossley's face flushed and his looks told how much Richard's words displeased him. "Are you prepared to risk the consequences, Owen?" he asked. "Mr. Farr has resolved that no man disobeying his orders shall set foot on his premises again. He will not be moved this time."

"I shall be sorry to displease Mr. Farr, sir, but I dare not obey him."

"Come, Owen, don't be rash," said the manager in a persuasive tone. "Just think what a position you will be placed in if you are dismissed now. Who will provide for your family if you throw yourself out of work by your stubbornness?"

"I have thought, Mr. Crossley, and I have determined I will obey God at any cost, and trust Him to open another door if Mr. Farr shuts his against me."

"You will rue this folly, Owen, before you are many days older," retorted the manager in an angry tone, as he handed Richard his wages. Then telling him that Mr. Farr had no further occasion for his services, he turned on his heel and left him.

Richard Owen was not a little grieved at being thus dismissed by an employer whom he had served faithfully for several years, and whose only cause of complaint was that his employee's conduct agreed with his religious profession.

"It does not matter though," thought Owen. "I must be firm where principle is concerned. If it were only a matter of convenience, Mr. Farr would find me as ready to yield as any man; but no earthly master shall induce me to disobey my Heavenly One."

Accordingly Owen packed up his tools, put on his jacket, and started on his homeward way. In the stillness of that bright night, he had an opportunity of lifting up his soul to God in prayer that his faith might not waver, but that strength might be given him to persevere, under every trial, in the course which the Bible told him was right.

With these words in his thoughts and engraven upon his memory, Richard Owen felt comforted and strengthened. He thought of the command—"Trust in the Lord and do good;" and of the beautiful promise joined to it, "So shalt thou dwell in the land, and verily thou shalt be fed."

"And I will trust him," exclaimed Owen, forgetting that he was alone. "The promises of my God cannot fail. Hath He said and will He not do it? I shall be fed, and my wife and children too, for the mouth of the Lord God hath spoken it."

Owen had now reached his own door. He entered softly, but found the precaution needless so far as his wife was concerned, for she was awake and downstairs. "I could not bear for you to come in and find nobody up, Richard," she said. "Here is a bit of warm supper. You must want it after such a long day's work."

"I am pretty hungry, Mary, but anything would have done. I'm sorry you sat up so late, you will feel the effects of it to-morrow."

"I have had a rest, Richard, for I know I can't bear very late hours, and I don't like to feel heavy and weary on the Sabbath. I suppose you would leave some of the men at Scott's Mill."

"Yes, and I am sorry to say they will work, in turn, all to-morrow."

"I should think they would hardly ask you to do Sunday work, Richard," said Mrs. Owen.

"Ay, but they did, and more than that, Mr. Farr gave the manager strict orders to say we must all take our share of it, and whoever refused was to be dismissed."

"Richard, is it possible?"

"Yes, Mary, it is true."

"And you stood out against the master's orders."

"I did, and was dismissed, Mary. I, who have served Mr. Farr so faithfully. Our slack time is coming on and he will not care about keeping on all his hands. I've no doubt he thought I should give in if I had the prospect of being out of work. But not even the thought of you and the children frightened me into doing what I knew would be wrong."

"Thank God for that. Don't be cast down, Richard. The Lord will provide."

"I'm sure of that, Mary. I can't see in what way, but I know, 'He is faithful that promised,' and He will enable me to trust Him."

After a little more conversation, in which husband and wife strove to encourage each other, they retired to rest, and when they went out on the morrow to the house of God no one would have guessed from their faces that any worldly trouble was hanging over them.

GLAD TIDINGS.

S. S. Lesson for December 24. Isa. 35. Golden Text, Ps. 89 : 1. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Singing Children of God—How David Sang—His Theme Exhaustless—Undemonstrative Religion—Prophecy of the Millennium—The Millennium in the Heart—What we Need—The Promised Deliverance—Not for Souls Only—The Ministry of the Spirit—The Way of Holiness—Wholly Given up to God—Crooked Ways—The All-Absorbing Principle—No Lion in that way.

OUR golden text for to-day is just the outpouring of a full, glad heart; "I will sing of the mercies of the Lord forever." The children of God might be divided into the singing ones, and the sad ones, those who have their eye on the Lord, and those who are contemplating themselves. These latter know how to mourn, but they have not yet learned

HOW TO SING.

The Psalmist goes on to say, "With my mouth will I make known Thy faithfulness to all generations." He has nothing to say about himself or his faithfulness, his song is all about the Lord, but he finds the theme so rich that he reckons eternity alone long enough, "I will sing of the mercies of the Lord forever." Earthly joy lasts only till the next sorrow comes, self-exaltation endures only until some mortification takes its place. No insurance companies can insure the continuance, either of life, health, honor, or fortune; it is only when we immortal souls get into our native air, and breathe the breath of eternal life, that all vicissitudes cease to be, all is enduring, out of reach of time, change, decay, or dissolution. "I know that whatsoever God doeth, it shall be forever" (Ec. 3 : 14).

Some may think it is a dull, senseless thing to be continually singing and talking about a God we have never seen or heard or touched. But "the pure in heart" do see God; not anything which earthly eyes can see, but the Spirit of God in them holds intercourse with God, they know what it is to have "fellowship with the Father and with His Son Jesus Christ" (1 John 1 : 3). To them God is more present than people or circumstances, because they know and see that He controls them all. The Psalmist was not content with singing of God's mercies to vent the gladness of his own heart; he was determined to make known with his mouth the faithfulness of his God. He did not make the excuse which many do that they do not like "demonstrative religion," they think the life should speak. Indeed it should, and if it does not, all words they speak fall powerless. But do the lives of those speak whose hearts are not full enough to compel them to tell the story of the Lord's goodness to them? Let it be proved.

Our subject for to-day is a glorious

we see in it what will be the result of the binding of Satan for a thousand years (Rev. 20 : 3). But blessed be God, wherever Jesus has fully taken up His abode in a human heart, there Satan's power is destroyed, and thus the experience of such a soul partakes of the character of the millennium. "The wilderness and the solitary place shall be glad for them" (the restored children of Israel and inhabitants of Zion, see chap. 23 : 20-24 ; 34 : 5, 16, 17); "and the desert shall rejoice and blossom as the rose." Why is this? "My tabernacle also shall be with them; yea, I will be their God, and they shall be My people." If God shall dwell in the midst of His people Israel, when they are restored to their own land, does He not dwell in "the Israel of God," "they which are of faith . . . the children of Abraham" (Gal. 3 : 7 ; 6 : 16)? "Know ye not that your body is the temple of the Holy Ghost which is in you, which ye have of God" (1 Cor. 6 : 19)?

God in a people or God in a person is ever the same, His indwelling must have the same results. The wilderness is a wilderness no more when God comes into it, the desert blossoms as the rose. Beloved reader, if God dwells in you in His fullness, you will not be mourning over a dead church, over sinners too hard to win over hindrances which cannot be overcome. The presence of life eternal, the presence of God who is life, is more powerful than the death you meet with. God must conquer.

What we need is more of God. When the wilderness, where there are no elements of fertility shall blossom abundantly, and rejoice with joy and singing, then its whole nature shall be changed, "the glory of Lebanon," the cedar forests shall be given unto it, "the excellency of Carmel and Sharon," famed throughout the world for their floral beauty. But yet more, "they shall see the glory of the Lord, and the excellency of our God." God's glory is the outshining of His holiness. Only that can shine out which is already within, only so much of the glory of our God as is within us, can be reflected out from us upon a lost world or a degenerate church.

WE WANT MORE OF GOD.

But not only is God's holiness reflected by those in whom He dwells, but His power also, yet again only in that measure in which the power of God dwells within us. God calls us to put the wrong things right, and repair the damage which Satan has done. "Strengthen ye the weak hands," don't despise them, don't say, "We can't work with such as these," strengthen them, "Confirm the feeble knees." Don't leave the feeble to their feebleness, "Tell them of Jesus the mighty to save." Say to them that are of a fearful heart, "Be strong, fear not; behold your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompense, He will come and save you."

Praise the Lord for giving us such a message. Blessed be God, that we may go to the most timid, the most despairing, the one who has gone through long years of the enemy's oppression in spirit, soul, and body, and we can say, There is no need for you to continue as you are, you may have been for years the slave of temper, of self-indulgence, of impurity, of unkind and bitter feelings, of levity, of pride, of jealousy, but now there is deliverance, "Behold your God will come . . . He will come and save you." We can say to the weakest, "Be strong," to the most timid, "Fear not," for when Jesus comes, He says, "Behold, I make all things new" (Rev. 21 : 5).

And glory to our God, this is

NOT FOR THE SOUL ALONE,

"Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened, and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped; then shall the lame man leap as an hart, and the tongue of the dumb sing." Yes poor blind and deaf, and lame and dumb, "Behold your God shall come . . . He will come and save you." In the millennium healing shall be universal, and now in this very day, they who yield themselves completely up to God to be His undivided, undisputed property, to be His dwelling place, they who boldly claim and appropriate Him as their Physician, and let go their case completely into His hands, those do indeed experience His faithfulness in healing and in expelling from them the diseases and infirmities which once oppressed them.

God "calleteth those things which be not as though they were" (Rom. 4 : 17), and God has a right to do so because His creative power can change all things, He says, "In the wilderness shall waters break out, and streams in the desert.

And the hardened ground shall become a pool, and the thirsty land springs of water;" "and everything shall live whither the river cometh" (Ezek. 47 : 9). God hath made us able ministers of the New Testament; not of the letter, but of the Spirit, for the letter killeth, but the Spirit giveth life" (2 Cor. 3 : 6); God means that we shall minister the Spirit of God to others, that we shall be channels to convey the Spirit of God to others. "In the habitation of dragons, where each lay shall be grass with reeds and rushes; praise God where the enemy once dwelt there shall be fruitfulness unto God."

"And an highway shall be there, and a way, and it shall be called the unclean shall not pass over it, for He shall be with them (see margin) the wayfaring men though fools shall not err therein." Holiness is to be entirely given up to God, possessed by God, as fully as a drunkard is possessed by drink, indwelt by God and shewing forth God. A holy man has something about him which reflects God, not himself, which makes people feel that God is present. On the way of holiness it is never asked, "Is there harm in this or that?" another idea has taken possession, "Does this or that shew forth my God?"

To be holy, a man has to decide for God against himself, against the world, and often against lukewarm Christians, as well as against sin. A really holy man finds that the presence of God in him consumes sin, and makes self shrink more and more and more into insignificance, so that it strikes him as something quite foreign when an appeal is made to his self-interest. Blessed be God in this way of holiness there is no losing our way, "the wayfaring man though a fool shall not err therein." When we have one aim, to possess and be possessed by God, and so to shew forth His glory, everything becomes simple; there is no more asking how far we may go, we cannot go too far in such a path as this.

The turning "aside into their

CROOKED WAYS"

(Ps. 125 : 5), belongs to such as have not a single eye, such as live to God so far as they think it suits their purpose, and oh how many "err therein," oh how many who try to play the dangerous game of "the world and Christ too" make shipwreck of their faith altogether. The terrible calculation how far a man who is saved can go into the world without losing his soul, has ruined more souls than open and declared sin. The principle is altogether wrong, and it has led worldlings to think that they may live unto themselves and then slip into heaven at the last by a little deathbed religion. Worldlings know very well that what they live for absorbs them, and no wonder they look upon the faith of Christians as a very small, unimportant appendage to ordinary life, to be put on or off at pleasure, if it does not fill the whole horizon of one of its votaries and completely transform his life. Brethren, shall we be guilty of making men err on the way to heaven, because we do not tread on God's only highway of holiness? Are we ready to answer for the consequences, and meet those whom we have misled at the judgment seat?

Bless God,

"NO LION SHALL BE THERE,"

the way of holiness is at too high a level for the tread of the enemy of God, "no ravenous beast shall be found there," but it shall not want for passengers, "the redeemed shall walk there," every foot which treads there has been redeemed by the precious blood of Christ, redeemed not only from the condemnation, but also from the power and the presence of sin, "And the ransomed of the Lord shall return, and come to Zion with songs, and everlasting joy upon their heads; they shall obtain joy, and gladness, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away." "In Thy presence, is fulness of joy, and at Thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore." Reader, are you on the way of holiness? Are you leading a life so thoroughly out and out for God that everybody around you knows it without asking a question? The Lord keep you and me from the awful sin of making others to err in the way.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

Two Large Fires Occurred in London last week. On Wednesday, December 6th, the Royal Alhambra Theatre was burned down. Happily the performance had concluded before the fire broke out or the loss of life might have been very serious. The theatre was one of the largest in London, and was always densely crowded. It was a favorite resort of dissolute women, and the performances were of the type which experience has proved have the most powerful attraction for men of vicious propensities. It was first opened twenty years ago, and though it has not been under the same manager throughout its existence, the character of the place has not varied. On Wednesday the piece performed was The Merry War which, by a curious coincidence, was the play on the boards of the Ring Theatre in Vienna when that theatre was burned down. The fire at the Alhambra was first noticed in the refreshment saloon about an hour after midnight. Shortly afterward the whole front of the theatre was ablaze. The flames spread with fearful rapidity, and the entire structure was soon destroyed. The district around for some distance was illuminated, and the spectacle was one of appalling grandeur. Eight houses at the back of the theatre were also burned. The loss is estimated at $750,000. Another fire occurred the following day in which the premises of Foster, Porter & Co. wholesale hosiers who export extensively to this country were destroyed. The hosiery warehouse stood in Wood Street, a narrow street off Cheapside, and the centre of the London dry goods trade. The fire spread to the warehouses on each side, and before it was brought under control property to the value of $15,000,000 was destroyed.

The Flooded Districts in Europe are still submerged, and at the close of last week the water was stated to be still rising. In France several workshops at Ivry-sur-Seine have been flooded and two hundred persons thrown out of employment. The river Seine continues to rise. The government has asked the Chambers for a grant worth $200,000 for the relief of the sufferers in the inundated districts. A telegram dated Paris, December 8th, says the water has reached the heart of the city. The drains in the low lying quarters are unable to find an outlet, and the water has risen to a level with the roads. In the Rue de l'Université the water is a foot deep in some places. The cellars of the Foreign Office building are flooded. The Notre Dame quarter is swarming with rats, driven out from the sewers, and the people are suffering from their depredations. The government of Hesse-Darmstadt is preparing a bill granting State assistance to the sufferers by the inundations in Germany.

Arabi Pasha has been Sentenced to Exile. He was arraigned on the charge of rebellion only, and to that he was induced by Lord Dufferin the British diplomatist, to plead guilty. He was thereupon sentenced to death. The Khédive promptly commuted the sentence into one of banishment. Arabi asked for permission to reside either in London or Damascus, but it was decided that the island of Ceylon should be his destination for the present. The fallen leader addressed a letter to the London Times in which he expressed contentment with his lot because he knows his misfortunes have been the means of securing for the country he loves the liberty and prosperity it deserves. He says he feels confident that when England has carried out her good work she will permit him to return. She will soon learn that he was no rebel when he set himself at the head of the people, who wanted nothing but justice.

The Sultan of Turkey is Reported to be on the borders of insanity owing to the results of the Egyptian trouble, and to his consciousness that the Empire of Turkey is gradually being dismembered. A special cable despatch to the New York Sun says that the Sultan's mind has also been affected by the discovery of a plot to assassinate him. "He is a prey to the most fearful fits of depression, becomes frantic in his terrors, wails and shrieks at his imaginary enemies, makes and unmakes ministers in twenty-four hours, and altogether presents a pitiable spectacle. His dread of assassination haunts him like a perpetual nightmare. He tells every one about him that he will meet the fate of his brother, and if his hallucinations do not carry him off it is quite possible that he may." The same correspondent adds: "The English Government was perfectly well aware that the Sultan had committed an act of war against England, and that she, in conducting a campaign against Arabi, was really at war with Turkey. But, for a variety of reasons, it was not desirable that formal admission and publication of the fact and of her knowledge of it should be made, as in the trial of Arabi it necessarily would have to be made; therefore Lord Dufferin summarily disposed of the State trials at Cairo, and the relations of England with Turkey are apparently undisturbed. The acknowledgment of the existence of a state of war between England and the Porte would have entailed the most serious consequences, and a responsibility which England could not at present shoulder. It would have precipitated an outbreak between Austria and Russia, which may not be long deferred in any event."

The Opening of the New Law Courts in London on December 4th was the occasion of a pageant of unusual splendor. The buildings have been several years in course of erection, and are intended to centralize the law business of the British metropolis. The courts were opened by Queen Victoria in person, who drove in state from Buckingham Palace to the new edifice. The Prince and Princess of Wales participated in the ceremony. Thousands of persons assembled along the route of the royal procession which consisted of the Queen, Princesses Christian and Beatrice, the court officials and a large escort. All the judges had previously proceeded in state from Westminster to await, with the Prince and Princess of Wales, the arrival of the Queen. The proceedings at the courts were brief, consisting of the delivery of the key to the Queen by the First Commissioner of Works and by her to the Lord Chancellor. Mr. Lowell, the United States Minister, and all the diplomats and Cabinet Ministers and other officials were present at the ceremony. Lord Selborne, the Lord High Chancellor, was created an earl in honor of the event. The last act before the handing of the courts over to the legal authorities was a two hours' search, similar to that which has always been made since the gunpowder plot, before the opening of Parliament.

Dr. Tait, the Archbishop of Canterbury, whose serious illness has already been mentioned in these columns, continued to grow worse throughout last week. The cable reports stated that he bore his suffering as he had borne all the many trials of his life—with true Christian courage and patience, and repeatedly of late expressed his entire readiness to "depart and be at rest." On Saturday, he took an affectionate farewell of his servants and friends, since which time he gradually sank and died on Sunday, December 3d. He was seventy-one years of age. He has held the office of Archbishop of Canterbury since 1868, when he was promoted from the Bishopric of London, which he had held for twelve years. His portrait and life with a picture of Canterbury Cathedral was published in THE CHRISTIAN HERALD of March 3d, 1881.

Messrs. Moody and Sankey, through God's blessing upon their work in Cambridge and Oxford, have left an impression which it is believed will never be effaced. In the opinion of many Christians the scenes among the students were altogether without a parallel, and it was evident that the evangelists were specially guided by God. One correspondent says: "When it is considered that in a few years these young men will be scattered over the British dominions, holding positions of high trust and influence in Church and State, or in the learned professions of science, law, medicine, etc., it is impossible to estimate the results on society that may accrue from this evangelical revival in these two university towns." The evangelists proceeded from Oxford to Torquay, commencing their mission on November 21st, and concluding on the 24th. The large glass pavilion at the Winter Gardens was filled to overflowing twice daily, many visitors having attended from miles around. The after-meetings were well attended, and many sinners were led to decide for Christ. From November 25th to the 28th they were at Exeter, and on November 29th they commenced a week's campaign at Southampton. Their work seems to realize an increasing measure of the Divine blessing, and large numbers are being brought to Christ.

French Antagonism to the Church of Rome, and indeed, more or less, to everything of an ecclesiastical or religious character, is becoming increasingly manifest. A recent debate in the French Chambers on Church Establishments revealed a dominant and deep-seated antipathy to the Church. A resolution for largely reducing the salary of the Archbishop of Paris was lost only by a very slender majority. The sentiments uttered by many of the speakers in the debate must have been exceedingly offensive to the Archbishop and to all associated with him. This is only one of many rapidly multiplying "signs of the times." Not only in France, but in England and other European countries, the way is being prepared for the development of Antichrist by the spread of scepticism and avowed atheistical principles.

The Great Volcanoes of the World are Showing unwonted activity. Mount Etna has, for some time now, been evidencing great and increasing energy, emitting flashes of fire and dense volumes of smoke, while a report has reached San Francisco that the volcano of Kilauea, in the Hawaiian Islands, is again in eruption "on a grander scale than for a quarter of a century." Earthquake shocks are of somewhat frequent occurrence, also, in the northernmost districts of Great Britain, and on the high tablelands of Southern and Eastern Europe, as well as in Asia and America.

Settling Accounts on Sunday is a Practice often observed by unscrupulous business men. An incident related in an English journal shows how terrible is the risk such men incur: "A wealthy manufacturer named Darnoll in the Midland Counties of England, said to his confidential clerk one Saturday night, 'We cannot settle our accounts to-night, but must do so early in the morning.' On the Lord's Day morning, therefore, they resumed their work, which occupied them till three in the afternoon, when dinner was announced. 'Let us eat and drink,' said Mr. Darnoll, 'for tomorrow we die. Not that I,' he added, 'have any thought of dying for some years to come.' The next morning when at breakfast with his family, a friend called and said, 'Mr. Darnoll, have you heard of the death of Brown?' 'No,' said he; 'is he dead? It is very different with me; for my part I am so engaged in business that I could not find time to die.' Uttering these words while rising from the table, he went into the kitchen, and fell on the floor a corpse."

THE CHRISTIAN HERALD BINDER.

NUMEROUS applications have been received from readers of this journal for a case, in which the copies of the paper, as they are received, may be placed, and kept clean for binding, at the end of the year. To meet this demand a stock of such covers has been prepared and they are now on sale at this office. Each cover is made of strong cloth, with the name of the journal stamped in gilt letters on the outside. It is large enough to hold fifty-two copies, and is fitted with the new patent apparatus for holding the papers securely. A cover will be sent, postage paid, to any address, on the receipt of one dollar. Applications should be made to THE MANAGER, 63 Bible House, New York.

Major-General Sir H. MACPHERSON—QUEEN VICTORIA Inspecting the Troops Returned from Egypt.

MAJOR-GENERAL MACPHERSON.

Military Services in Persia in 1856, and in India during the Indian Mutiny in 1857—Wounded at the Capture of Lucknow—Takes part in the Afghan War in 1878-9—Heads the Indian Contingent in the Recent Egyptian Campaign—The Battles of Tel-el-Mahuta, Kassassin, and Tel-el-Kebir—End of the Campaign.

THE events of the English campaign in Egypt were followed with unusual interest by readers on this side the Atlantic, who were enabled by means of the copious cable reports to form very accurate ideas of the difficulties and dangers of the struggle. Among the names of the officers mentioned most frequently in the cable reports was that of the gallant general whose portrait appears this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD.

Major-General Sir Herbert T. Macpherson, commenced his military career in the British regiment 78th Highlanders, and in the year 1851 served in a political capacity at Lahej, in the vicinity of Aden. On the outbreak of the war in Persia in 1856 he accompanied his regiment as adjutant, and took part in the expedition to Barazjoon, the night attack and battle of Koorshbo, and the bombardment of Mohumrah, for which he obtained a medal and clasp. Scarcely had the troops withdrawn from the Shah's dominions than the terrible mutiny broke out in India, and Captain Macpherson was attached to Sir Henry Havelock's column, and with that distinguished general marched to the relief of the handful of women and children whom the thousands of fiendish wretches had surrounded in Lucknow, hoping to glut their vile passions as they had done in other places.

He was wounded in the battle of Onao, and was present at various actions too numerous to mention. During the operations which resulted in the Relief of Lucknow he was wounded, and his horse killed under him. It was on this occasion that he gained

THE COVETED VICTORIA CROSS.

This is the most highly prized distinction of British soldiers. It is given only for a specified act of valor, and may be won by a private soldier as by a general. Many a soldier who wears it would refuse to exchange it for a dozen glittering orders that adorn the breast of the officer who commands him.

Major Macpherson subsequently served throughout the whole of the trying period during which a few British troops had to defend Lucknow against thousands of native rebels, and later he accompanied Sir James Outram's force when defending itself at Alumbagh against repeated attacks of the enemy. He was dangerously wounded while Brigade-Major to Sir John Douglas, who conducted the operations ending in the final capture of Lucknow. For this arduous and meritorious service he received a medal and clasp in addition to an advance on the path to promotion equal to that he would have won by a year's service.

For seven years Major Macpherson saw no active service on the battle-field, but in 1864 he commanded the 2nd (now Prince of Wales's Own) Goorkhas in one of the frontier wars in India, while in 1868 he was present with the same troops during the Hazara and Black Mountain campaign, when another clasp, this time accompanied by the distinction of a C.B. (Commander of the Bath), was added to his already well-decked breast.

THE AFGHAN WAR.

In 1871-2 an expeditionary column was sent under the orders of Sir Charles Brownlow into the Looshai country; to this Major Macpherson was attached, and gained yet another medal. Passing by his services during the minor Jowaki campaign in 1877, the following year afforded the Major the opportunity of winning his spurs during the Afghan War of 1878-9, from which he emerged Sir Herbert Macpherson, K.C.B., one of the most gallant and daring commanders of the day. Returning to India, he was shortly gazetted to a divisional command.

When the recent campaign commenced in Egypt, it was determined to send an Indian Contingent to co-operate with the troops which had been ordered from England. The fine body of men selected for this important service consisted of various corps of Bengal Cavalry, Lancers, Madras Sappers and Miners, and Infantry. The total force amounted in the aggregate to 114 officers and 5423 men, with the usual complement of followers (3500).

"As these troops mustered together," says a newspaper correspondent, "what met the eye! Here a lordly Rajput, with the blood of centuries in his veins, joined the hand of fellowship with a wiry Mahomedan worshipper of the Prophet of Arabia; there a denizen of the mountainous regions of the north-west frontier shared the toils and perils of war with a no less bold and intrepid Mahratta from the plains; the fierce Beloochee by the side of the fiery inhabitant of the Punjaub; veterans from Sind and warriors from among the Poorbeahs who dwell in the country east of the Ganges—what a miscellaneous conglomeration of nationalities and peoples, differing in religion, in habits, in customs, but united in one common bond of loyalty to the person and sway of the Queen-Empress Victoria, under whose banner they were gathered to fight!"

Among the most important of the early engagements during the war, now happily-closed, was the BATTLE OF TEL-EL-MAHUTA.

On August 22d, the head of the Indian column, of which the Seaforth Highlanders were the advance guard, made its appearance on the Freshwater Canal. The troops on landing found that their water supply had been cut off by the erection of dams across the canal, and Sir Garnet Wolseley immediately pushed on an advanced guard to seize and destroy the obstruction to the flow of water. On moving out from camp the Egyptians were found posted in strength in the neighborhood of Tel-el-Mahuta. The British Cavalry Brigade swooped down on the village of Mahsameh, dashed into the railway station through flocks of flying Arab soldiers, and succeeded in seizing several trains, the engines for which had made their escape.

THE BATTLE OF KASSASSIN.

About half past nine on the morning of August 28th, the Egyptians commenced their first attempt to drive back the head of the British column, and opened fire with two heavy guns which had been advanced along the railway upon trucks. Gliding along, the Household Cavalry, 7th Dragoon Guards, and Horse Artillery kept the ridge between them and the Egyptians until they thought it was time to charge. As they crossed the ridge they were perceived, and a heavy fire was opened upon them. Sir Baker Russell, who commanded the Brigade, then gave the order to charge. Cuirassiers and Dragoons rushed on at full speed, swept through the Egyptian guns, and made great slaughter among the infantry. The guns were afterward carried off by the Egyptians under cover of the night; but the charge made literally at the cannon's mouth was a memorable one, which will take rank in history with some of the most brilliant and daring of military achievements.

THE BATTLE OF TEL-EL-KEBIR.

On the morning of September 13th, the troops struck tents preparatory to march to the final attack of Tel-el-Kebir, the stronghold of Arabi Pasha. Shortly after three o'clock, amid the darkness and stillness of the night, guided only by the stars, the march forward commenced, the solemn silence being broken by the tramp of the men and an occasional cry of command. So matters continued till the first glimmer in the east heralded the rise of the sun, when suddenly the boom of a gun betrayed signs of the Egyptian forces, whose presence was further evidenced by the flashes from the redoubts, followed by shells in every direction. General Macpherson, standing on an eminence from which a complete view of the surrounding desert could be obtained, had a narrow escape, owing to the bursting of a shell above his head.

A GRAND AND STEADY CHARGE.

The Egyptian infantry clustered thickly on the parapets of the redoubts, and poured down the slopes into the trenches. Hundreds of them, lying down, plied the head of the advancing brigade with fire. The British soldiers did their work with perfect steadiness, and advanced by sections, alternately lying down to fire and making short rushes toward the Egyptians' position, always under full control of their officers. As they came near the trenches they gathered themselves together, and, without an instant's hesitation, leaped into the midst of Arabi's troops. Bayonet and butt were plied with deadly effect, and the second line, rushing down to join their comrades, found the trenches full of dead and wounded Arabs. The first line of the Egyptian defences was captured. A stronger fort was seen behind, armed with twelve guns. Line after line of shelter trenches stood further on. The men cheered again, climbed the mount and the parapet of the fort, and bayoneted the gunners at their guns. A quarter of an hour or twenty minutes from the first great rush the advance sufficed to place the intrenchments, with their supporting redoubts, in the hands of the English troops.

THE HIGHLANDERS' ADVANCE.

Toward the left of the British line the Highlanders advanced with a steadiness not to be surpassed. Not a shot was fired until they were within 300 yards of the Egyptians' position, and then came a burst of flame which broke out at once along the whole Egyptian line. But at this point Arabi's men fired wildly. The Highlanders cheered, and dashed forward to the shrill music of their pipes. The first line of intrenchments was carried with a rush, and the men found themselves in presence of a second line, which had to be carried. Like their comrades on the right during the first advance, the Highlanders pressed on for a time slowly and firing steadily, then cheered again, and rushed into the inner redoubt.

PURSUIT OF THE FUGITIVES.

The resistance of the Egyptians failed from that moment, and the battle was virtually over—the battle, but not the pursuit. The Egyptian regiments, mingled together in one wild and disastrous retreat, and lest they might when arrived in the open, re-form and make another stand, thus involving fresh slaughter, they were rapidly followed by the cavalry, which, sweeping round from the north, hemmed in the tide of fugitives. Events of the same character were seen in other parts of the field. The 4th Brigade attacked boldly and suffered heavy losses, and the Artillery did its part with its usual devotion; 58 guns were captured, 12 of which fell to the lot of the Indian Contingent. Without delaying a moment the troops were pushed on to Zagazig, where they arrived about 4 P.M. Proceeding direct to the railway station, they captured five trains full of soldiers, who, on seeing the approach of the British troops, leaped from the carriages, and throwing away their arms, made good their escape. A seventh train was just disappearing in the distance as General Macpherson's men entered the station.

LESSON OF THE CAMPAIGN.

The war was now at an end, the Egyptian insurgent army being thoroughly demoralized, and Arabi Pasha a fugitive without influence or following, while the occupation of Cairo brought the military operations to a successful termination. The events of the Egyptian campaign have now shown in a way not open to misconstruction, that the troops of Hindostan may be reckoned as part of the effective army of the British Empire. It was previously doubted, especially in America and in European countries, whether these troops, faithful and brave enough when fighting in their own land, could be trusted to fight for England in other countries and especially, whether they would be trustworthy when confronted with an enemy more nearly allied to them than their commanders in race and religion. That doubt is set at rest by the recent events, and in consequence, the power and influence of England in Europe is perceptibly strengthened. This is a lesson of the Egyptian campaign, which will not be easily forgotten or lightly overlooked.

THE ROYAL REVIEW.

val of the Queen from Windsor at Buckingham Palace—Her Subsequent Departure from the Palace to the Parade at the Horse Guards—Impressive Scene of the Review—Enthusiasm—Welcome accorded to Generals, Officers, and Soldiers.

As was mentioned in a former number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD in the department of "Foreign Topics" a grand review of the expeditionary force took place in London, on Saturday, November 18th. The event had been anticipated with considerable eagerness, but the dense fog which enveloped everything just after sunrise, occasioned a feeling of considerable disappointment. Such moderate sightseers as Londoners were not deterred, however, from getting as near as possible to the performers in the first act of the day's drama, at James's Park, even though no eyes could penetrate the veil. Some gathered early at Waterloo, King Cross, and Victoria Stations, to welcome the troops brought by rail, and anxious and despondent were the speculations as to whether they would be late, or whether they would come at all. The trains certainly were, in some instances, late, the programme was carried out to the letter, not to the minute.

THE LOYAL RECEPTION OF THE QUEEN.

Near Buckingham Palace, the residence of the Queen (a sketch of which appears in the right-hand corner of our frontispiece), which was almost as strong a centre of interest as the saluting gun on the Parade, immense crowds gathered, expecting so rapidly that police reinforcements were required to keep the ground. Just here, behind the fog, all was life and animation—especially at about eleven o'clock, the dense atmosphere was rent by blasts of martial music heralding the approach of the troops from various points. Then began a roar of cheering which hardly ceased all was over and done.

Meanwhile, thousands of eyes looked toward that point in the heavens where the sun was supposed to be. "Oh," said an optimist, "he'll shine right when the Queen comes." It is a favorite fiction with Londoners that the Queen always finds fine weather for any pageant in which she takes part. It is a fact, that even before her retirement from the active discharge of her duties, and when outdoor pageants were more frequent than now, it is very rare indeed that there was either fog or rain or snow on the days fixed. In consequence of the phrase "Queen's Weather" has passed into a proverb.

Her Majesty was at that moment very near, having driven from Paddington Station, attended by an escort of the 1st Life Guards, and alighted at the private entrance of the Palace. The reception of the Sovereign, who was accompanied by Princess Beatrice, was warm and genial.

From the moment of Her Majesty's arrival matters began to mend. It was possible to see the sun through the low-lying mist would be drawn up and dispersed. More and more animated waxed the scene. General and staff officers multiplied, and in time to time members of the royal family drove to the palace, amid cheering and the strains of the National Anthem. Thus arrived in succession the Queen's sons and daughters, Prince and Princess of Wales, the Duke and Duchess of Edinburgh, and the Duke and Duchess of Albany.

THE GRENADIER GUARDS' ENTHUSIASM.

The Brigade of Guards, at about a quarter before twelve, emerged from the Wellington Barracks enclosure, and headed by the Duke of Connaught, entered the open space within the palace gates. Simultaneously emerged the Queen, surrounded by members of the royal family. By the time the troops had got into position, and officers and colors had taken post in review order, it was but a minute or two of noon. Then came a pause until the note of the big clock on the walls of Parliament was heard giving through the frosty, misty air the first stroke of twelve; and the word of the Queen's soldier son, the brigade commander, gave a royal salute.

Colonel Wigram called for three cheers for Her Majesty, and the Guards, taking off their bayonets, and lifting them high on the bayonet point, gave "Hurrah with a will, the immense assemblage all around taking up the cry, and echoing it with twice ten thousand voices. Accustomed as the Queen is to such demonstrations, it is not surprising that she seemed much affected while repeatedly bowing her acknowledgements of so heartfelt a tribute. This impressive episode over, Her Majesty and the royal family retired; the Guards marched off to take up their position in line with the rest of the troops, and Sir Garnet Wolseley having finished a tour of inspection and joined the brilliant group at the palace gates, all was ready for the next act in the splendid pageant. That is

THE REVIEW BY THE QUEEN.

The parade ground of the crack British corps is silent, almost motionless. The sailors are standing at ease; the cavalry sit like statues in their saddles; only along the lines of onlookers are life and movement visible. Suddenly there is heard a muffled roar of voices from the direction of the palace, swelling louder and louder. At last the Queen's carriage comes fairly into view, and then the cheering in the Park almost overpowers the clashing strains of music. Having reached the left flank of the sailors, her Majesty's procession goes on till opposite the right flank of the Life Guards; then turns and approaches the saluting point, where the royal standard, just before run up by a couple of grenadiers, droops against the staff. The privileged spectators in the stands salute the Queen with cordial respect.

As Her Majesty's carriage took up its position an incident occurred almost theatrical in effect. That was the sudden lifting of the fog. A sudden breath blew from the south, and the fog rolled away with the effect of a veil withdrawn from the face of beauty. The change was magical. The park trees and the countless faces beneath them, the buildings on either hand, and the people who clung to every coign of vantage their roofs presented all started into sudden clearness in the light of an unclouded sun. The hitherto motionless troops move from their place near the railings. General Drury-Lowe, Sir Garnet Wolseley, and the Headquarters Staff take up position. The head of the column once in place there is no delay; and, to the music of "See the conquering hero comes," the staff move past her Majesty, who returns in a condescending, gracious manner the salute of her successful generals, more especially of Sir Garnet Wolseley whose glory is the greatest as his responsibility was the heaviest.

THE MARCH PAST.

Regiment after regiment marched past in fine order, and presented a resplendent appearance, until at length all was over, and Sir Garnet Wolseley having received the congratulations of her Majesty, galloped away to place himself again at the head of his troops; the royal procession re-formed, and quitted the Parade amid loud cheers, and, in a little while, all that remained of the display was a row of empty stands and a force of police with nothing to do. The majestic pageant had faded, but the thunder of distant drums and noise of far-away cheering testified that it had gone into the streets where it received from the citizens an enthusiastic welcome. There the victorious troops were received by men whose power is even greater than that of the Queen. Prominent among them was one who from the gallery at the bottom of his garden sat field-glass in hand, surrounded by a select party invited by Mrs. Gladstone and himself, observing the review with the keenest interest as the procession filed past.

THE SCENE IN WHITEHALL.

Down Whitehall (a view of which appears in the left-hand section of the upper portion of the front picture), where stand the large government buildings went the long array. It seemed as though the enthusiasm of the densely packed populace were the greater and their eagerness to welcome the heroes of Egypt the more intense as a result of their feelings being so long pent up. Accustomed as the victorious generals must by this time have been to loud bursts of popular recognition, due in a great degree to the familiarity of the public with recent striking and authentic portraits, they were fairly surprised by the emphasis which the throng bestowed on their demonstration at this part of the street-march. Sir Garnet Wolseley was evidently much gratified as, from numberless windows and balconies, hats and handkerchiefs were waved; and on all sides could be discerned the same outward tokens of enthusiasm. The Duke of Connaught was also warmly cheered.

And so, with undiminished warmth of welcome, the eight thousand warriors, with the recollections of their short, sharp, and victorious campaign in the East vividly in mind, and their sense of the country's gratitude proudly stirring their hearts, reached the home of the Household Brigade, where the triumphal march terminated.

It is impossible to read of the magnificent reception accorded to these warriors who returned home victorious after exposure to death by the sword and by disease without being thrilled with emotion. They had not fought our battles nor were we concerned in the issue of the struggle. But our countrymen resident in Egypt, American missionaries such as Dr. H. H. Jessup and other men whose experience qualified them to speak authoritatively on the subject, have told us that the cause of England in Egypt was the cause of right against wrong and the cause which ought to have our sympathies. And, beside all that, however frequently we good-humoredly criticise England and her policy, there is deep down in all our hearts the consciousness that among all the nations of the earth there is none so near to us as the great nation whose rule our forefathers threw off so gloriously a century ago. We are allied to them by ties of blood, of language, and of religion, and in any struggle in which they may be engaged we are naturally disposed to sympathize with them, though we reserve to ourselves the right of expressing our own opinion of the justice of their policy.

Nor is the pageant described, without its voice to the Christian soldier. As he reads of the welcome given by an earthly sovereign to those who have fought and conquered under her flag, of the plaudits showered on the skilful general and on the gallant soldier, his thoughts are carried forward to a far grander day. He sees, his vision guided by inspired prophets, the scene when the Prince of Peace, the King of kings welcomes those who come from all lands and are of every kindred and tongue under heaven, a host that no man can number, who, having fought in His cause, not against earthly armies nor with earthly weapons, but yet with an enduring God-given courage against principalities and powers, receive from their King a divine welcome. Then they will see Him as He is, and from His hands receive their reward. Then will be fulfilled the promise, which, ringing in their ears during their conflicts on earth gladdened their ears and gave their hearts new valor. "He that overcometh shall inherit all things; and I will be his God and he shall be My son" (Rev. 21 : 7).

An Arrow in His Father's Heart.—The Rev.

Canon Wilberforce recently narrated the following: "There was about to die, in Tunis, an old Arab Sheikh, and he called his three sons, and said to them, 'Only one of you is my son. Two of you are foster-children, and I leave all my property to my son,' but before he could indicate who was the one he died. The head of the tribe ordered that the father's body be propped up against a neighboring wall, and the son who was dearest to his father should show it by shooting an arrow at his heart. The eldest son took up his bow and sent an arrow right into the old man's heart. The second eldest son sent one within a hair's-breadth of his brother's. When the arrow was put into the hand of the third and youngest son, he looked at it, and then dashed it to the ground and said, 'Let the inheritance perish! Do you think I could send an arrow into my father's heart?' The chief and they who were present cried 'Give the young son the inheritance.' There was displayed the marvellous, mysterious instinct of sonship which no philosopher can explain, and which no sceptic can deny. The spirit of the father bore witness that he was his son." And in like manner they who are "born again," and are sons of God, through faith in Jesus Christ, cannot by sin wound the heart of their heavenly Father.

PLAGIARISM.

Dr. Talmage's Sermon, Preached Last Sunday Morning, December 17, 1882.

"Thou shalt not steal."—EXODUS 20 : 15.

A Hoary-headed Sin—The World's Intellectual Common—International Literary Depredation—The Plagiarist's Detection Certain—The Damage they Do—A Lecture Reproduced—A Stolen Sermon—An Australian Plagiarist—An Accusation from Pittsburg—A Challenge—Unconscious Assimilation—A False Plea—Advice to Christian Workers—Other Men's Work, a Whetstone—No Copyright in the Bible—Material for all Purposes—Start Early—Napoleon's Fatal Delay—Losing the Battle of Life—A Misdirection—Failure of a Spiritual Guide—Destroyed by one Mistake.

STEAL what? Overcoats? Furniture? Dry-goods? Horses? United States bonds? Merchandise? Silver? Gold? Do not so limit the command. This Sinaitic thunder rolls out not only against the purloining of the goods of others, but against the theft of intellectual possessions.

It is high time that somewhere a sermon be preached on the subject of plagiarism, a sin which comes down through the centuries, and is now abroad among the people. Dean Swift stopped at a church in Shropshire, England, and heard one of his own sermons preached by the rector of the place. Pope's "Essay on Man" was first anonymously published, and was claimed by another author.

It is a most practical subject, for there are in this house to-day hundreds of persons who, perhaps in greater or less extent, are earning their livelihood by their pen, and there are young lawyers, and there are young clergymen, and young editors who are fashioning their intellectual habits; and then there are those here who giving their entire life to imparting instruction, and more than all, there are hundreds of parents here, who need to give the right bias on this subject to their children—for in our day all the boys and girls come to the art of literary composition.

It is not a subject that you can adjourn to the realm of taste or whimsicality. It is of right and wrong, of practical morals, and is charged with tremendous issues. Much of the world's knowledge is common property and can no more be fenced in or kept under lock and key or chained fast to an author's desk than you can sell or buy the atmosphere. Such are all the facts of history. Such are all the statistics of the world. Such is the realm of anecdote and of logic. Such are all the theories of science and religion. Each age borrows and appropriates the accumulated knowledge of the past ages. Each year is the lawful heir of the preceding year, and every century the legatee of former centuries. But the classification of facts and the peculiar presentation of knowledge may be private property.

Plagiarism begins when you appropriate without credit some one else's way of putting things. All the facts of history are the property of the world, common property; but who would deny the copyright of Bancroft to the "History of the United States," or the copyright of Prescott to the "Conquest of Mexico," or the copyright of Motley to the "Dutch Republic." Telegraphy is a common property, but would it not have been right for Professor Morse to have a patent right in his invention? The one hundred and fourteen thousand words of the English vocabulary are common property, but was not Noah Webster right in keeping a royalty on his unabridged dictionary? The cotton gin added millions of dollars to the value of property in the South, but who is in sympathy with an attempt to swindle Eli Whitney out of his invention?

There are scores of the best men and women in England and the United States who are kept in semi-pauperism and are coughing their life away at writing desks from which they would long ago have been emancipated if they had had rightful control of the financial interests of their literary children. The sanctioned a depredation that amounts to wholesale and infamous brigandage. On both sides the sea the punishment for purloining a bale of cotton, or a tierce of rice, or a can of oil, or a barrel of apples, or a ton of coal, or a load of wood, is imprisonment—Tombs Court, disgrace, ejection from all respectable society; but for the larceny of intellectual toil on both sides the sea—toil that may have racked the brain and shattered the nerves, and destroyed the health through years and years of fatigue—the punishment is a derisive smile. When a great book is published either in Great Britain or the United States, the first question is, which publishing house on the opposite side the water shall steal it? The time will come when the boundary line between meum and tuum of a literary plain will be as distinctly marked as the boundary line between two homesteads.

This countenancing of international larceny has had its effect upon individuals, and editors have to be on their guard lest the poem or the essay that comes into their office shall be the possession of somebody else than its pretended originator. The vice has gone on until it has crept on some of the platforms and into some of the pulpits. It is a most bedwaring vice. It is most ruinous to mind and most damaging to soul. No man can keep such a sin and keep his religion. It is mental suicide. The man's capacity for origination shrivels up.

No one ever yet successfully plagiarized without BEING FOUND OUT.

The newspaper press of the day is a detective on the track of all such desperadoes. The time when such a vice could be carried on year after year, and it was covered up with the cloak of deceit, and ever and anon ecclesiastical courts tried someone for purloining John Wesley's sermons, or Jeremy Taylor's sermons, and they were found out by mere accident. But now, all the literary and scientific and religious knowledge of the world turns over at least once a week, and most of it turns over every day. Each one of the great dailies sends forth in each publication enough material for one volume. They go forth through the mails by the ton. A man might as well hoist a ladder in a village at noonday and try to steal the town clock without being observed as to expect to carry off literary work in our time and not be found out. The newspaper editor, scissors in hand and mucilage on the table, sits up to his chin in exchanges from the four winds of heaven.

Beside that, all the world is travelling now. Fares are so cheap and transit is so rapid that before every preacher and before every lecturer, and before every religious exhorter there may sit persons from the most unexpected quarter, and if they heard three years ago something delivered in New Orleans which you deliver in Brooklyn, the discovery will be reported. Quote from all books that you can lay your hands on, quote from all directions—it is a compliment to have breadth of reading to be able to quote—but be sure to announce the fact that it is a quotation. Ah! how many are making a mistake in this thing. It is a mistake that a man cannot afford to make. Four commas upside down, two at the beginning of the paragraph and two at the close of the paragraph, would have saved many a man's integrity and usefulness. One would think that if the fact that it is a wrong to misappropriate the brain work of others is not a sufficient barrier to the evil, the perils of the undertaking would be savingly appalling.

Plagiarists have no idea of

THE DAMAGE THEY DO.

I have submitted to an amount of imposition to which I shall submit no longer. Contrary to the advice of my friends I have never published one word about it. The time has come for me in a kindly spirit, without any acerbity, to make a protest. In justice to myself, and at the same time as a practical lesson to all Christian workers, I am going to present three or four facts.

Last Friday night a week, I lectured in Detroit, Michigan. On the following night, Saturday night, I received a telegram as I was about to go on a platform at a distant city, a telegram from Detroit, saying in substance: "What does all this mean? The lecture you delivered here in Detroit is identical with one delivered a few nights ago in the City of Chicago by another lecturer. Editorials, many editorials written on the subject, telegrams flying through the country on the subject. A Chicago journalist told me he had received four telegrams from the newspaper press of New York in regard to the matter.

THE HISTORY OF MY LECTURE was that it was the first lecture I ever delivered ever prepared, and it was twenty-one years old was just of age! and I had delivered it in at least hundred cities on this and the other side the sea and it had been largely reported. I do not take the responsibility of saying that the lecturer Chicago plagiarized my lecture, I do not take responsibility because I do not know, but I say that if I had not been able by ten thousand witnesses to prove the priority of my lecture would have been very damaging to me.

Another fact: Just after I came to Brooklyn thirteen years ago, in the old chapel I preached a sermon on "Hagar in the wilderness." The sermon was taken down by a stenographer and printed. Ten years after, a member of my church asked me to reproduce that sermon, saying it had done him some good. I took up the stenographic report of that sermon, read it carefully, and nearly as I could reproduced it.

Before that week was out I received four letters, one from Pittsburg, one from Chicago, one from Boston, and one from Louisville, Kentucky, saying in substance: "How is this? Our Monday morning papers say you preached a sermon on 'Hagar in the Wilderness,' that you preached it the week before in the Brooklyn Tabernacle. Why, then, this very sermon was preached in our city one or two months ago by a minister or an evangelist. If you take it from him, or did he take it from you, I sat down and wrote four indignant letters, and carried them in my pocket, as I am accustomed to do with such letters, and finally burned them. I knew what a plight those plagiarists would be in if I referred my correspondents to the newspaper which had published that sermon ten years before. I was wrong in condoning their faults. I shall never let such thieves again escape.

I say now, as I have said before, that if Christian workers in any part of the world want to employ sermons preached in this house, in places where there is no pastor, and to read them in churches and in halls and in houses, as they read on either side the sea, they have full liberty to do so. I believe what I preach is the truth, the Gospel and the wider it goes the better I am pleased. The officers of this church understand that whoever else are crowded in church, gentlemen of the press shall never be crowded.

Years ago I prayed God for this result which has come in the opening in a marvellous way through the secular as well as the religious press for the full publication of my sermons week by week in all the cities of Christendom. I am grateful to God for this opportunity and I am grateful to all journalists and all reporters who give me this privilege. But is it right that an opportunity like this should be abused by plagiarists to put me in wrong light? I tell you the nuisance has become intolerable.

AN AUSTRALIAN PLAGIARIST.

Another illustration: Years ago, I received a letter from the President of the Wesleyan Conference in Australia, saying in substance: "Yesterday suspended from the ministry a preacher, not preaching your sermons exactly, but for saying that one of your sermons was his. The subject was the 'Mutilation of the Scriptures,' the text was Jeremiah thirty-six and twenty-three: 'And came to pass that when Jehudi had read three or four leaves, Jehoiakim cut it with the penknife.'"

The President of the Wesleyan Conference wrote on to inform me that this preacher had in the city of New Zealand and Australia preached this sermon, and finally he was announced to preach in Melbourne, and a gentleman who had received a book from London containing fifty of my sermons among others the very sermon, carried the book with him to church, thinking perhaps the sermon might be repeated in Melbourne, and when the preacher arose and announced his text the inquirer auditor in the pew opened the book, and with any notes, and from memory the preacher t through the whole discourse, not changing a d. He was arraigned before the ecclesiastical t and, of course, denied the plagiarism, for a who will steal will lie, but the book of sers was produced, and he was immediately sused from the ministry. Am I not right, I ask as common-sense men and women, in uttering otest?

have a more remarkable case, and it is quite nt. On the 25th of last month, November, 2, the Pittsburg Despatch, one of our most ninent papers, printed ch I hold in my hand. It was not printed in unkindness to me because I am personally acinted with the editor; but the reporter says he interviewed "an eminent divine" of Pittsburg, and that "eminent divine" gave him the owing statement: "The sermons of Talmage frequently stolen by rural ministers, yet I once d of a case where he was caught in the act self. On the occasion referred to, he preached unusually eloquent sermon which was afterd published as his own. On the following Sabn a Methodist minister of Brooklyn preached the e sermon. A friend asked him why he had ched Talmage's sermon so soon after he had vered it himself. He denied the insinuation inantly, and being pressed on the point produced English newspaper containing the sermon, thus itting his own guilt, but pulling Talmage from pedestal at the same time.

Talmage once preached a sensational sermon the owl, the vulture, the bat, the chameleon, the snail. A certain minister who was then is still, located within a hundred miles of Pittsburg used the sermon on the following Sabbath. exposure of this action, in connection with er causes, caused a dissolution of his relations n that congregation. Before leaving, however, delivered a farewell sermon, which was especially sarcastic, and which his hearers afterward ned, was also the property of Talmage."

ow, if that "eminent minister" of Pittsburg prove that some minister in Brooklyn preached rmon identical with anything I preached, and annot prove that I previously preached and ted it either in this country or in Europe, I will for distribution among the poor of Pittsburg ousand dollars in the hand of the editor of the sburg Despatch— hat city, the pastors of that city to be the jury he matter. A thousand dollars will buy a great ny shoes for bare feet in this cold weather. w, if that "eminent divine" of Pittsburg is accurately reported, he is a calumniator. Is it not e that in justice to myself and my church I file aveat?

he trouble is when plagiarists are caught they o pleading, generally, unwitting appropriation. They happened to d it and it stuck fast to them! And they did n realize it. False! No man makes a mistake l that without knowing it. A man no more ces that mistake than does by mistake a sneak- d put his hand in your cash box. Unconscious milation, indeed!

UNCONSCIOUS ASSIMILATION,

n my first country settlement I had a great deal nterest in raising a splendid flock of fowls. I d to go out two or three times a day and admire n. One morning I went to the henry and y were all gone. I thought at the time that man who took them was a criminal; but I f out in these days perhaps it was only a case o unconscious assimilation! I suppose he just wked away and they stuck fast to him! I tell that with the vast resources, legitimate resces open before literary men in this day, platism is inexcusable.

e and elsewhere. Be yourself and no one else. the work you do for Christ that is effective you do with your own weapons. God has given you just enough faculty to do all the work He ever expects of you. Use all books and all the intellectual toil of others only as a whetstone to sharpen your own battle-axe. Your own way will be more effective for good than anybody else's way employed by you, though there were fifty per cent more ingenuity in that way. David broke down under Saul's armor, but he had been a shepherd's boy, and he knew how to use a sling, and he took five smooth pebbles from the brook and he had five times more ammunition than was necessary, for it only took one pebble skilfully hurled to crack like an eggshell Goliath's cranium.

Above all, my dear friends, saturate yourselves with Scriptural knowledge and with

SCRIPTURAL STYLE.

No copyright of that Book of books. Daniel Webster said if he had ever come to any perspicuity of style it was by long time perusal of the Scriptures. Rufus Choate having with forensic magnetism aroused judge and jury and court-room to highest pitch of enthusiasm, whelmed them with Scriptural peroration. It is the most magnificent Book ever written, and it is all at your disposal. Do you want history? Quote Moses. Do you want blank verse? Quote Habakkuk. Do you want the spectral? Quote Ezekiel. Do you want the pastoral? Quote Ruth. Do you want a battle march? Quote Joshua. Do you want argument? Quote Paul. Do you want pathos? Quote John. Do you want all tenderness and all omnipotence? Quote Christ.

Equip yourself from all sources. Read all good books. Listen to all oratorios. Examine all pictures. Bring botany and geology and astronomy and history and poetry and archæology. Gather all these up and then mass your troops for one great Gospel campaign, and remember it closes at sun down. Alas! how many lose the battle of life because either they do not start early enough, or they make fatal mistakes after they have started.

HOW WATERLOO WAS LOST.

For those two reasons Napoleon lost Waterloo. History tells us, and Victor Hugo in his most popular work powerfully dramatizes the fact, that the night before the memorable 18th of June, 1815, there was a great deluge of rain, and the ground was so soaked that Napoleon could not move his artillery, and he had to wait until the ground was somewhat settled; so that instead of opening the battle as he had expected at six o'clock in the morning, he opened it at nearly twelve at noon. Of course, that gave time for Blucher to come up with his reinforcements, and to join Wellington and to overthrow the great Frenchman. Had there been no rain that night, and had the battle opened at six o'clock in the morning instead of at twelve o'clock at noon, or near twelve, the battle might have been ended by noon in the overthrow of the English army, for Napoleon had nearly a hundred more guns than Wellington.

The difference between six and twelve o'clock for Napoleon was the difference between defeat and victory. And that is the way I see a great many people

LOSING THE BATTLE OF LIFE.

They start too late. They wait until their foes are reinforced and reinforced and other battalions of temptation fall into line. Instead of opening the battle in the morning of life they open it in the noon of life; at twelve instead of six. Oh, you cannot do in an afternoon what was intended for a whole day. What a lesson for all of the young. Oh, the stupendous difference between six o'clock and twelve o'clock.

But after Napoleon had started his army, he made a fatal mistake. History tells us and Victor Hugo powerfully dramatizes the fact, that Napoleon was and he supposed that the plain ascended gradually to the hill on which the English were entrenched, and that there were no chasms intervening. With the sound of bugle 3500 armed, helmeted, mounted horsemen dashed up the hill with great impetuosity to take it, when suddenly riders and horses by the hundreds vanished. They plunged into the awful gulch near the village of Ohain, a ravine about seventeen feet deep, and with perpendicular sides and a hundred riders and their horses went down into that gulch, and two hundred, and five hundred, and a thousand, and fifteen hundred, filling the chasm with struggling and dying men and beasts; so that the riders and horses in the rear coming up could not stop, and they went to the other side the chasm over this quivering bridge of mangled flesh and broken bones. To the lateness of the hour of starting was owing that fatal mistake. That is the way Napoleon lost Waterloo.

And so I see men losing the battle of life. They started with the blowing of bugles and they expected to gallop to the top, but there was some misdirection, or because some spiritual guide has failed in his duty, that caused the opening of some chasm in their way, and before they know it they are at the bottom, taking others down with them in the awful plunge. Oh, I wish I could report that in the catastrophe only, only 1500 men had fallen into the awful chasm of a ruined life.

DESTROYED BY ONE MISTAKE.

Only one false entry. Only one fraud. Only one plagiarism. Only one experiment in sin. Only one evil companionship. Only one day of dissipation. Only one night of wassail. Only one fall.

Oh, remember the difference between six and twelve o'clock. Remember the awful gulch of Ohain. Only those are safe who are bounded on the north and the south and the east and the west and above and beneath by the grace of God. Your beautiful intentions will avail nothing unless they are divinely upheld. They will be a beautiful suspension bridge with buttresses not strong enough to hold the strain. Make Christ your ally, and you make heaven an annex of time.

An Itinerant Vendor of Jewelry, last January, offered to M. Henri Mayor, the missionary among the Kabyles of Algeria, and who has just been called home to his rest, some jewelry trinkets of Arab and French manufacture. Mayor replied, "I, too, have a jewel, which I will not only show you, but give you," and produced his Gospel in Arabic, reading and explaining to the pedlar the way of salvation. Six months later this man called again to tell with joy that through reading the Gospel which had been given to him he had found salvation in Christ. He belongs to the tribe of Beni Kani, who reside on the Jur Jura mountains. He had never heard of Jesus before. He had heard there was one God, and that Mahommed was His prophet, but that was all. He earnestly pressed M. Mayor to go and tell his tribe the Gospel, and begged for tracts, books, and Gospels that told of Jesus, that he might give them to the Kabyles among whom he sold his wares. He joined in prayer with M. Mayor before leaving, and the latter heard afterward that he bore witness to the truth in the neighboring café, and told the Mahommedans that Christ was the only Saviour and that their prophet was nothing. The people drove him out, saying: "Go away, you devil, you dog. Mahommed will afflict you for speaking thus of Jesus, and reviling him." The man, however, remains unflinching in his testimony, and wherever he goes, speaks of "the Lamb of God which taketh away the sin of the world."

A Happy Basuto.—Mme. Mabile, wife of the well-known French missionary in Basutoland, relates the following incident, which recently occurred. She says: "A native came to me a short time ago, his face radiant with joy, and exclaimed, 'Mother, I am so happy!' 'Why?' 'I have found Jesus.' 'When?' 'This very morning.' 'Tell me about it.' He then told me he was awakened through hearing a sermon by a missionary on 'The Sufferings of Jesus Christ.' He grew miserable; his sins rose up before him like a great mountain; but Jesus rolled them all away, and a perfect peace came into his heart, and he is now trying to lead his companions and neighbors to Christ. Madam Mabile also says: "It was a touching sight at the baptism of three old women, who had spent their lives in the degradation and ignorance of heathenism, to hear them confessing their faith in Jesus as their Saviour."

THE CHARACTERISTICS AND CONTRASTS OF THE COMING KINGDOM.

By William Maude.

The Kingdom of Peace.

AGAIN, on higher and religious grounds, the hope has been and still is entertained that, as Christianity extended its peaceful triumphs over the world, and created a higher ethical standard among nations as well as individuals, men would come to recognize the wickedness of war, and nations no more be allowed to have recourse to the barbarous arbitrament of the sword in the settlement of their conflicting interests, than the individual creditor is now allowed, in any civilized country, literally to take his debtor by the throat, saying, "Pay me that thou owest." But, alas! all such hopes, again, are utterly chimerical. What is the lesson taught us by the history of

THE LAST EIGHTEEN CENTURIES?

It is a sadly humbling one, but it is simply this, that while Christianity, in name at least, has caused many and sanguinary wars, it is hard to point out a single instance in which it has prevented one.

Moreover, apart from all this, such hope is based on a twofold delusion. It assumes, in the first place, that the ethical influence of Christianity is increasing in proportion to its nominal extension. But this assumption is contradicted alike by actual experience and by inspired prediction. We see on every side the sad evidence of the growing lawlessness of the times in which we live, and this lawlessness is being developed in the midst of Christianity.

It is not simply that men, in large numbers, are casting aside all pretence of religion; this is ominous indeed, but what is still more ominous is that over the mass of those who profess and call themselves Christians, the Gospel appears to have little practical life pervading, life-controlling power. In other words, it does not, even as it once did, effectually bridle those natural "lusts," one deadly fruit of which is "war." And is not this precisely what inspired prophecy leads us to expect? The men who in the perilous times of the last days, are to be "lovers of self, lovers of money, boastful, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without self-control, fierce, lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God," are not agnostics or atheists; on the contrary, the crowning mark of their identification is this, "HOLDING A FORM OF GODLINESS, BUT HAVING DENIED THE POWER THEREOF," (2 Tim. 3:2-4. R. V.)

AN UNSCRIPTURAL ASSUMPTION.

But the hope of which I have spoken rests also on another utterly unscriptural assumption—viz., that the Divine mission of Christianity during the present dispensation is to achieve a universal triumph, and thus slowly but surely bring about the much-desired, confidently-expected, "conversion of the world." Alas for the world, if this is its only hope! Nothing is more clearly revealed in the New Testament than the fact that the present dispensation is elective—not universal. The Gospel is divinely commissioned only to "take out of the Gentiles a people for His name" (Acts 15:14); and throughout its whole duration the true children of God will be but a "little flock;" the "few who enter in at the strait gate;" "a kind of first-fruits of His creatures." (Luke 12:32; Matt. 7:13; James 1:18.)

Lastly, as by an argument of despair, it has even been suggested that war—

THE DISEASE OF NATIONS

—will ultimately cure itself. As science, it is said, is year by year utilizing the most destructive forces of nature for warlike purposes, while at the same time the cost of conducting war has so enormously increased, the time will surely come when the engines of war have become so fearfully destructive and its cost so ruinous, that its absurdity will be manifest, and the common sense of mankind demand its abolition. But those who speak thus seem to overlook the fact that, while science thus increases the destructiveness of aggressive arms, it at the same time proportionately increases the resources of defence, and also that, though doubtless the cost of war nowadays is immensely greater than it was in past times, so also is the realized wealth of the nations. In truth, it is just as reasonable to say that the increased destructiveness of war must end in its abolition as it would be to say that the intensified virulence of a disease must terminate in its extinction. Both statements are no doubt true in one sense, they must needs end when there are none left to kill.

Nevertheless, the Word of God, as we have seen, distinctly reveals the coming of a blessed time when war shall be no more; when through the noise of battle God will strike His silence, and from the equator to the poles universal peace shall reign. And inspiration does more than this—it tells us how this consummation is to be reached; basing it, not on empty dreams, but on the assured fact of the COMING OF THE PRINCE OF PEACE.

There will be no lasting peace for the world till the kingdom of Christ is established by His glorious Advent. This is the uniform teaching of Scripture. Are men to "beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks?" Yes; but it is only "in the last days, when the mountain of the Lord's house shall be established in the top of the mountains, and shall be exalted above the hills; and all nations shall flow unto it. And many people shall go and say, Come ye, and let us go up to the mountain of the Lord, to the house of the God of Jacob; and He will teach us His ways, and we will walk in His paths; for out of Zion shall go forth teaching, and the word of the Lord from Jerusalem. And He shall judge among the nations, and shall rebuke many peoples." (Isa. 2:2-4.)

Is "war to cease unto the end of the earth, and the bow be broken, and the spear cut in sunder, and the chariot burned in the fire?" Yes; but it is not until this song shall be sung by restored Israel, "God is in the midst of her, she shall not be moved; God shall help her, and that right early. The heathen raged, the kingdoms were moved: He uttered His voice, the earth melted. Come, behold the works of the Lord, what desolations He hath made in the earth. He maketh wars to cease unto the end of the earth." (Ps. 45.)

Shall neither savage beasts nor savage men "hurt or destroy in all God's holy mountain?" Yes; but not until He is set upon earth's throne, who "shall not judge after the sight of His eyes, neither reprove after the hearing of His ears; but with righteousness shall He judge the poor, and reprove with equity for the meek of the earth; and He shall smite the earth with the rod of His mouth, and with the breath of His lips shall He slay the wicked one." And "the earth shall be full of the knowledge of the Lord, as the waters cover the sea." (Isa. 11:3, 4, 9.)

Yes; peace—peace which no earthly or infernal power may disturb; peace based on Divine and righteous government; peace, not such as man makes, but such as God gives, shall be one characteristic of Christ's Millennial kingdom.

NOW COMES THE CONTRAST.

All the glories of the kingdom cast before them an intervening darkness, that darkness being the antithesis of the dawning light; the proverbial darkest hour before the coming dawn. Thus, when the voice cried out of Seir, "Watchman, what of the night? Watchman, what of the night?" The reply was, "The morning cometh, and also the night." That is to say, "The morning will shortly dawn, but the night—though far spent—is not yet over; its last and darkest hour has yet to be passed through." So it is here. The kingdom of Peace is coming, but it will be preceded by war—war of the most terrific character, and on the most gigantic scale. Hence our Lord's warning, which in no wise contradicts Isaiah's prediction, if only we distinguish the times and so harmonize the Scriptures, "And ye shall hear of wars and rumors of wars: see that ye be not troubled; for these things must come to pass, but the end is not yet. For nation shall rise against nation, and kingdom against kingdom; and there shall be famines, and pestilences, and earthquakes in divers places. All these are the beginning of sorrows (lit. 'birth-pangs')."
(Matt. 24:6-8.)

THE GOING FORTH OF THE RED HORSE.

Hence the going forth of the "red horse," a the Church of the firstborn ones is seen in heaven (Rev. 6:3, 4.) And hence the awful sunning: the prophet Joel: "Proclaim ye this among nations; prepare (lit. 'consecrate') war, wake the mighty men, let all the mighty men draw near, let them come up. Beat your ploughshares into swords, and your pruning-hooks into spears: the weak say, I am strong. Assemble yourselves and come all ye heathen, and gather yourselves together round about; thither cause thy mighty ones to come down, O Lord. Let the heathen be awakened, and come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat: for there will I sit to judge all the heathen round about." (Joel 3:9-12.) Language which plainly anticipates the vision of the Book of Revelation, in which the three frog-like "spiritual demons working miracles, go forth unto the king of the whole world, to gather them to the great day of God Almighty." (Rev. 16:13, 14.)

Truly, then, "the morning cometh, but also and previously—the deeper, darker night." That which immediately awaits the world is not peace, but that tremendous outbreak of war—war intensified by infranatural terrors, which is to terminate this present age. But, as it were in the pause of the dread conflict, the ear of faith listens for joy-bells of the universe, ringing out the long roll of violence and bloodshed; and, through the smoke of the final battle, the eye of faith descries the form of Him whose "name shall be called Wonderful, Counsellor, the Mighty God, the Everlasting Father,

"THE PRINCE OF PEACE."

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

Cured in Answer to Prayer.—At the November meeting on November 10th, the Rev. J. E. said: "Yesterday I was struck with how every poor people can be happy in the Lord. There is a poor woman in this city whose husband is ill, and whose daughter was also ill in one of the institutions of our city. Lately the doctors told her that she could not possibly recover. When the mother heard the news she was very much grieved, and going to another poor Christian woman, asked her to unite in prayer for the girl every-day for an hour. They agreed to spend an hour from five to six in the morning on their knees for this object. For the first week no difference was seen in the girl's condition, but at the end of the second week she walked into the house perfectly well, and has continued so ever since."

A Preaching Carpenter.—Mr. McGilivray of Lovedale, South Africa, related that: "The Rev. Mr. Muir had a prayer meeting in his home one afternoon to seek the Divine blessing upon Christian workers. The same night we were aroused by a sound as though some one were talking. Listening, we heard the words 'Jesu Christ, Amen.' It was our boy, John, praying for his heathen father and mother. This lad is now master carpenter under the Rev. Mr. Maggs, of the Church of England. When he went out into the world to make his own way, he found much wickedness among those of his own trade, and gave it up to try if a coffee-shop would be better, but it did not answer, and now he practices his trade three days a week, and preaches Christ the other three days."

A Brawl in the Forecastle.—Captain H. field, a Christian seaman, said: "I met a schooner with her flag half mast high, the usual signal of distress at sea. I hailed and asked what was wanted. 'Water: ours is finished; can you spare us any?' 'Yes; send your boat for some.' So they sent their boat and got two casks of water and we parted. About an hour afterward I heard a great noise in the fore-castle, and went to see what was the matter. The mate was drunk, stripped nearly naked, and fighting with the men who were also drunk. The schooner we helped was loaded with Hennessy's brandy from the Mediterranean to the West Indies, and the crew had handed up over our bows a three-gall demijohn of brandy as a sign of their gratitude for the water. In less than an hour my crew had drunk every drop of it, and there were only the steward, the second mate, and myself sober on board. As there was a storm coming on we had to lie there two days till the men got sober. In the fight to which I have referred one man so injured another that, he died. I could go on for the rest of my life telling you of the evil results of drinking, but my heart is so full of the love of Christ that I can never stand up to speak, but I must tell about God's love to poor sinners."

Sixty Magdalens Seeking Christ.—Mr. Grady said: "I saw a scene last night at one of the evangelistic meetings at Anderton, which I can safely say is unique in the history and religious enterprise of our city. Over sixty fallen women were gathered there from the streets, and all remained till one o'clock this morning, seeking Christ as their Saviour. Forty of them were still there at six o'clock, when I left. I must not enter into details, but I can solemnly assure you that the cries which went up from these poor girls to the throne of mercy, constitute an awful accusation against those evil men who ruined them."

A Night with a Dying Man.—Mr. Mabon, the energetic city missionary, said: "I remember before I was converted to Christ, sitting up all alone one night with a dying man. The impression made upon me by the pitiful action of his hands and the expression of his face, was such that I am never likely to be able to forget it. So sincerely did I sympathize with him, and so anxious was I to help him, that I would have given anything if I had been able to speak even one word of true comfort to the dying man, who was passing away into eternity without knowing Christ's power to save, or my being able to point him to the Saviour of sinners. Thank God, I can now speak of His power to save under any circumstances."

Inebriate Ladies.—At the same Meeting, the Rev. Mr. McDougall said: "Last Sabbath I was preaching in the Home for Inebriates, in Edinburgh, where I saw so many respectably dressed ladies, that I asked if these ladies were really residents or visitors, and was assured they were all residents. One was the widow of a medical practitioner, who had died of delirium tremens, and she was, therefore, most anxious to be cured. Last week she left the Home, but unfortunately fell again. Why? Feeling lonely and depressed, she took a glass of something alcoholic to cheer herself, and thereby aroused the old demon appetite in the full fury of its force, so that her friends had to send her back. There is no safety but in total abstinence, and the help of God, realized through a humble, clinging faith in Christ."

The Book in the Boy's Bag.—Captain Hatfield said: "I was born in Nova Scotia, and am one of seven brothers who all went to sea like a brood of ducks, and all became shipmasters. When I first went on board ship, I set to rummaging my bag, and found therein this little book. It is a Bible, which my mother put in it unknown to me; and as I have followed the instructions written in this chart of life, so have I been blessed, and as I have deviated therefrom so have things gone against me. I may mention one incident which happened to us, the like of which was never before recorded in the annals of shipping, and I do not think ever will be again. Four shipmasters came into a port at one time from different parts of the world who were all brothers. But the seven of us are steering for the same heavenly port, and with Divine help, we shall all reach the haven at last."

A Fortunate Shark Bite.—Surgeon-Major Gunn said: "On the West coast of Africa a young man was bitten on the leg by a shark; the injury to the limb was so great that the native fetish doctor said that the lad must die. He was, however, carried to the mission station, and examined by an officer who took a great interest in the evangelistic work going on among the natives. He saw that the safest and quickest way to restore the lad was to amputate the limb, and told his parents and brothers that he intended to cut it off; but they refused to permit the operation to be performed. The usual habit among them is to bury the dead in a room in their huts, and feast several days over the grave. The reason they gave for objecting to the amputation of the injured leg was that it would not do to have the young man buried in two places, as then the funeral feast would be spoiled. Owing to the opposition, very stringent measures were taken, the operation was performed, and the lad was cured. The father and the rest of the family were so astonished, that it led to their conversion, and on the next fetish Sabbath, all the natives of the district formally decided to cease worshipping the fetish, and to seek instead the Lord Jehovah, who could cure a man after his leg was cut off."

The Dead Man's Debt.—Mr. Robert Simpson said: "In a town not far off, there lived recently a woman whose husband had died considerably in the debt of a Christian merchant for goods supplied to him. The widow's eldest son got married, and, as his wages were the principal means of support which the rest of the family had to depend upon, she saw that there was no probability of her ever being able to pay this large amount. When the clerk called for payment she told him all the truth, and he, being a Christian as well as his employer, was touched by her story, and repeated it to his employer, adding, 'It is quite evident that the woman is in deep poverty, and can never pay the money; it is best to cancel it.' Taking up a pen, the gentleman scored out every item of the account, and then said, 'Peter, go at once to the poor woman and tell her that it's all wiped out.' When the destitute widow saw the clerk return in such a hurry her heart sank within her, and she thought, 'There's the prison, or worse for me; oh, what shall I do?' When Peter delivered the Christian creditor's message she could not believe it, but offered to do the best she could to pay it up, and entreated for mercy. 'But, my good woman,' said the clerk, 'you are not due one farthing; it's all wiped clean out, and I have come to tell you so.' At last the poor woman trusted in the message, and sat down to cry for joy that the load was lifted off from her. This is just what Christ in His love has done for us. For His sake God blots out all our transgressions, our debts are all cancelled, except one—the debt of love—and that will continue evermore blessedly to increase."

MISS LAURIE McLATCHIE, The Scottish Evangelist.

THE readers of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD have in many letters to its editor expressed their gratification at the opportunity its pages afford them through the portraits and biographies given from time to time of becoming acquainted with the features and lives of those who, on the other side the Atlantic, are engaged successfully in Christian work. They are a part of the same army to which we belong. We have one King, and our hearts beat with theirs in unison, moved by the same Holy Spirit. Though the Atlantic stretches between us, they are our brethren and sisters, and the time is coming when we with them will be gathered in our Father's house.

The lady, whose portrait appears on page, 812 is one of the most indefatigable and successful of these Christian laborers in the Gospel field. Those who can read in the face the index of character, will be prepared from the portrait of Miss McLatchie to learn that she has joined with brilliant mental gifts deep spirituality, and that she possesses the power of moving and swaying large audiences to a degree seldom witnessed under a female speaker. This God-given power she has been led to consecrate to Him who gave it, and that He has accepted and used the offering laid upon His altar there is abundant evidence in the record of her work. She has devoted herself wholly to God's work, and caring nothing for the admiration and homage of worldly society, which her beauty and grace would have commanded, had she chosen to go into circles where those gifts always secure a high place for their possessor, she has counted herself well repaid by the honor of winning souls for her Master.

Laurie McLatchie was born in the pretty mountain village of Penpont, Dunfriesshire, Scotland, amid the hallowing and elevating influences of a pious home, her parents being conspicuous, even among their Christian neighbors, for their cordial attachment to the service of Christ, and their unmistakable exhibition of those winning graces which constitute the chief and potent charm of His most devoted followers.

Her parents' prayers for the salvation of her soul in early years were answered. They were enabled by God's blessing to see that when barely emerged from childhood their daughter had given her heart to Christ.

It was not long before her rare gifts were recognized by Christian people around her, even though the department of usefulness which she had selected as her special field of effort was a very humble and unobtrusive one; and it was in 1874, while she was engaged at Glasgow, in conducting classes for the culture of young people in Biblical truth, visiting the poor, and addressing mothers' meetings, without a thought of any more exalted sphere, that she received a special and pressing invitation to preach in the Congregational Church at Greenock. Regarding the summons as an unmistakable intimation of the Divine will, she cordially accepted it, and during the month of January 1875, delivered a series of eloquent and effective evangelistic addresses to a large congregation, upon which God caused His benediction abundantly to rest, many souls being savingly impressed, and added to the church of God.

LARGE EVANGELISTIC MEETINGS.

With that sagacity in recognizing whatever is intrinsically excellent and practically useful which characterizes the Scotch people, Miss McLatchie was at once singled out to render more distinguished service in a larger arena, and before immense masses of people. She was invited to preach to that large class of the Glasgow population who do not attend church. She accepted and from September 1875, to April 1876, she preached nearly every Sunday evening in the City Hall, Glasgow, to very large and deeply-interested audiences, the Gospel message being delivered in manifest demonstration of the Spirit and in power.

So brilliant was the success now achieved, and so manifold and beneficial the results of her ministry, that without courting an extended publicity, the evangelist's fame spread far and wide, and there was an eager competition among numerous applicants for her services. As a consequence of these invitations, Miss McLatchie visited many towns in England and Scotland. She attracted immense assemblages in various English towns, including Walsall, Frodsham, Middlesbrough, Portsmouth, West Bromwich, Birmingham Town Hall, etc., and it was no infrequent sight to witness capacious edifices crowded to their utmost limit fully an hour before the time announced for commencing the service.

HER INCREASING POPULARITY.

The continuous strain, however, upon Miss McLatchie's strength—not only in the delivery of her addresses with elocutionary skill and exhaustive dramatic fervor, but also, and chiefly, in the conscientious and prolonged mental preparation which invested her efforts with their enduring qualities, and secured for them universal appreciation and success—occasioned a temporary illness and a six months' rest; but in August 1877, she once more resumed her work for Christ and souls, by a series of evangelistic efforts in Hengler's Circus, Liverpool.

CHARACTER OF HER MINISTRY.

In the estimation of persons well qualified to form an intelligent and trustworthy opinion, Miss McLatchie is the peer of the late Mrs. Clara Lucas Balfour in power of felicitous illustration, and is undoubtedly her superior in pathos. While the body of her discourses and lectures is invariably arranged with a logical precision springing from intuition rather than from art, and studded with literary gems of a superlative order, her perorations are most glowing, and sometimes overwhelming in their cumulative grandeur. But, better than all, her prayerful and brilliant ministry has resulted in the conversion of hundreds of immortal souls to Christ.

CURRENT EVENTS.

The Pendleton Civil Service Reform Bill occupied the attention of the Senate during the greater part of last week. The most important of the amendments under discussion were directed to the prevention of assessments on employes. Other amendments referred to the details of the bill; one of them being to reduce the number of Civil Service Commissioners from five to three, and others designed to secure the practical character of the competitive examination. The bill for the reform of the civil service, reported by Mr. Kasson to the House, meets with a less favorable reception both from Congress and from the public than the Pendleton Bill. Mr. Kasson's scheme provides that the terms of all officers appointed by the president, from collectors of revenue down to and including clerks in the public offices, shall be four years; and that they shall not be removable during their term of office "except for cause as prescribed in the bill, and that when an officer has served for four years unexceptionably he shall be reappointed for another term of four years. Also that before the president can remove any subordinate of his from office he must make charges against him; must give the officer or clerk time to make a written reply, and thus initiate a species of trial. It will be seen that in all these provisions it differs materially from the Senate bill. Its opponents urge that it would cripple very prejudicially the executive power and would render the removal of a corrupt or inefficient employe difficult, if not actually impossible. It is expected that when the Pendleton bill is sent to the House an effort will be made to substitute it for the one reported by Mr. Kasson.

An Effort to Stop the Compulsory Coinage of silver dollars is to be made in the House. Mr. Fisher, Chairman of the Coinage Committee, has, it is stated by the correspondent of the Tribune, pledged himself to try to secure a favorable report from his committee on a bill to repeal the compulsory features of the silver coinage act. He urges the necessity of this in order to prevent an injurious contraction of the currency, which he declares will be inevitable unless this action shall be taken. He points to the fact that, while the silver coinage now amounts to $27,000,000 more than it did twelve months ago, the amount of silver certificates outstanding is $500,000 less, and is shrinking constantly, because people will no longer deposit gold in order to obtain silver certificates when they can just as easily get gold certificates. Mr. Fisher's conclusion is that the paying out of gold by the Treasury for silver to be coined into "buzzard" dollars, which are no longer in demand, as a basis for additional silver certificates, is an absurd performance and ought to be stopped, or at least not compelled by law.

The Substitution of the Lowell Bankruptcy Bill by the Senate last week for the bill introduced by the Judiciary Committee is generally approved. The bill framed by Judge Lowell, of Massachusetts, contains a definite scheme, while the committee's bill left the matter chiefly in the hands of the courts. One of the most important features of the Lowell Bill, and one that will commend itself to business men, is that the settlement of the insolvent debtor's estate is placed in the hands of the creditors, through a trustee, or trustees, to be chosen by the majority in value and not less than one third in numbers of the creditors. Compositions are provided for by the law. If they secure the payment of at least fifty cents on the dollar of indebtedness they require the assent of a majority in number and value of the creditors; if for less than fifty cents on the dollar then the assent of at least three fourths in number and value.

The Second Attempt to Convict the Star Route defendants is now in progress. After considerable time had been lost in securing a jury satisfactory to the Government and the defence, the case was opened by Mr. George Bliss on the part of the prosecution. The charge, he said, was one of conspiracy. He expected to prove that the defendants had defrauded the Government of large sums of money, and that they were all guilty under the statute. The original idea of the mode and the first step taken in its execution belonged to the ex-Senator, Stephen W. Dorsey. The conspiracy included an ex-Senator, his representatives, and the second assistant postmaster-general, whose co-operation was necessary in order to make the conspiracy successful and profitable. The indictment was confined to nineteen contracts on nineteen separate mail routes. These contracts, when made, aggregated $41,135 a year. They were increased so as to take out of the treasury in three years between $900,000 and $1,000,000 in excess of the original sum. The Government had been defrauded on the whole of some $5,000,000.

The Results of the Labors of the Utah Commissioners, appointed by the United States Government, are embodied in a report presented to the Secretary of the Interior. They recommend that Congress should enact a law "declaring all future marriages in Utah null and void, unless contracted and evidenced in the manner provided by the act. Certain places should be designated for all marriages, which should be witnessed by certain persons, and registered in specific public offices, so as to make the proof of marriage morally certain. The parties and witnesses should be required to make their affidavits against polygamy." The Commission also recommend the repeal of the Woman Suffrage law in Utah. They say, in conclusion, "If the next session of the Legislative Assembly elected under the act of Congress shall fail to respond to the will of the nation, Congress should have no hesitation in using extraordinary measures to compel the people of this Territory to obey the laws of the land."

The Death of Mr. Robert L. Stuart on Tuesday, December 12th, removed from this world one of the most philanthropic of American citizens. It is estimated that he and his brother, who was also his partner, gave to the cause of religion and philanthropy during their business career not less than two million dollars. It was the invariable custom of the firm to give a certain sum every year in God's service, whether the profits of their business had been large or small, and when the firm was dissolved in December 1879 by the death of Mr. Alexander Stuart, $1,391,000 had been so bestowed. Since that date Mr. Robert L. Stuart, the surviving partner, gave away to various educational institutions, to the cause of missions and to other religious movements, more than $600,000. Mr. Stuart was born in New York in 1806; his parents having the previous year immigrated from Scotland. They left that country owing to financial embarrassment, but they had no sooner commenced business here than they sent regular remittances to Scotland to repay an indebtedness of $7000, which could not have been recovered by law. They completed the payment before they laid aside any money for their own uses. Messrs. R. L. & A. Stuart continued their father's business—that of sugar refinery—after his death and prospered. Mr. Robert L. Stuart was President of the Board of Trustees of the Young Men's Christian Association, and always took a warm interest in the prosperity of the institution.

The Prohibition Cause in Indiana is not to be allowed to fail through the election of a Democratic Legislature. At a meeting in Indianapolis on December 13th of the prominent temperance leaders, among whom were Colonel Eli Ritter, Dr. Gerrish, John R. East, and M. E. Shiel, it was determined to use every effort to secure the submission of the prohibitory amendment at a special election, and to this end an enormous number of petitions will be brought to bear upon the Legislature. Nothing was said at the conference about forming a distinct prohibition party in the State, the whole purpose of the leaders now being to bend the Legislature to a compliance with their wishes.

The Attempt to Secure a Better Observance of the Lord's Day in New York has been continued. The hands of the Sunday Closing League were strengthened last week by the publication of four resolutions passed by a Committee of the Presbytery appointed to consider the subject. The third of these resolutions points very forcibly to a danger which the working men who oppose the execution of the law appear to have overlooked. It reads as follows: "Third, That while workingmen in some countries of Europe are demanding the intervention of the State against enforced labor on seven days of the week, and while in our own land the demands of capital and the greed of gain are pressing more and more hardly upon the laboring classes, it especially behooves the American workingman, whether native or foreign born, to uphold with zealous care the laws and customs which secure to him his Sunday rest."

The Sunday Concerts in New York Which have been attended by large numbers of people have been professedly held for the benefit of some charity since the operation of the Sunday law. The plea that the proceeds would be devoted to a hospital or some other philanthropic institution precluded the police from interfering with the performance. A reporter, who endeavored to test the sincerity of the plea, ascertained from the Superintendent of the German Hospital at Seventy-seventh Street and Fourth Avenue, that he had received from eight so-called "benefit concerts" on the last two Sunday evenings $53. Of this amount $11.30 was received from Koster & Bial, $12.10 from the proprietors of the Atlantic Garden, and $15.15 from the Germania Assembly Rooms.

The Charges of the Physicians and Others who attended President Garfield in his illness have been materially reduced by the board of audit. The board allows Dr. Bliss $6500; Dr. Agnew, $5000; Dr. Hamilton, $5000; Dr. Reyburn, $4000; Dr. Boynton, $4000; Dr. Susan A. Edson, $3000; total professional services, $27,000. Seventy-five claims for supplies and assistance were also allowed, making the total sum awarded $38,860.93. The amount appropriated to meet the claims was $57,000. The physicians are allowed $8000 less than their claims, and the outside bills $11,000 less, leaving a balance of $19,000.

The Welcome Intelligence is Published that Mr. John B. Gough has recovered his health, and is now lecturing nearly every evening. Last week he was at several towns in Ohio, and on Thursday lectured in the Great Music Hall, Cincinnati. Mr. Gough is now in the sixty-fifth year of his life and the forty-first of his career as a lecturer. It is estimated that he has travelled 448,000 miles and delivered 8480 lectures to no less than 8,500,000 persons.

An Ex-Clown Speaking at Jerry McAuley's Mission one night last week, said: "I am a great sinner saved by Jesus. I was formerly a lion-tamer in Wombell's Menagerie, in England, and also acted as the clown. I was led to the Saviour by comparing my life with that of James A. Garfield, and seeing how happy a Christian's death was, and knowing I was not ready to die, I resolved to be a Christian. I am now employed on the steamship Wisconsin of the Guion Line, and the Gospel work has commenced among the crew."

A Testamentary Lottery Came Before the Ordinary's Court of Columbus, Ga., on December 4th, when the will of a deceased citizen was presented for probate. The will contained the eccentric provision that the property should be distributed among the testator's children by lot. The court granted the letters testamentary in accordance with the will, and the next day the sons and daughters of the dead man assembled and drew lots for their respective shares of the estate; the aggregate value of which was a quarter of a million dollars. It is supposed the testator adopted this means to avoid being accused by any of his children of partiality, but it is probable that those who were dissatisfied with the result of the lottery were quite as ready to blame him for his device as if he had selected their shares for them in the usual way. The believer, reading of this eccentric mode of bestowing a heritage on a family, may thankfully remember that there is no chance nor uncertainty about his heavenly possessions. They are prepared for him (John 14: 2).

The Market Value of a Mad-stone Appears to be more than seven thousand dollars, according to a statement made in a Southern journal. It is stated that a man who lives in Mississippi, near the Marshall County line, is the owner of a famous "mad-stone," for which he declares he has refused $7500. Since it came into the possession of his family, it has in 1229 cases proved a perfect antidote to the bites of snakes and poisonous insects and has yet to score a single failure. It was brought from China in 1810 by a Dr. Barker, of Alabama, at whose death it was sold for the benefit of his estate to four neighbors, one of whom, the father of the present owner, bought out the others and, dying, bequeathed it to his son. Many stories which exercise a strain on the credulity of the reader are related of this and similar stones; but it is certain that high prices have been offered for them by persons who believe in their virtue. Yet how often is the offer of the Gospel of an unfailing remedy for the evil sin works on the sinner, made and rejected, though it is offered without money and without price (Zech. 13: 1).

A Child Advocate was Recently Pronounced by the judge of a New York court the best lawyer that had ever appeared there. The case was one of drunkenness and wife beating, and the defendant when arraigned, admitted his guilt. The poor, ill-used wife pleaded earnestly for his release, and while the case was still undecided a child two years of age, made her way to the prisoner, who was her father, and begged him for a kiss. The prisoner cried as he took the child up and kissed her. The three justices looked at one another and appeared to agree without speaking. "Prisoner," said Judge Patterson, "that child is the best lawyer that ever appeared in a criminal court to plead for a prisoner. We are inclined to believe that you are a good man when sober. Promise this court that you will stop drinking and never again raise your hand against your wife, and we will accept her appeal for you." The prisoner promised and was discharged. The silent plea of the child had availed when perhaps nothing else could have done so; for the man was clearly guilty of a mean and cruel crime. So the saved sinner stands at the bar of God, evidently guilty, but saved by the love of his Saviour (Eph. 2: 13-18).

One of the Ten City Aldermen Imprisoned last week in Brooklyn, met in the corridor of Raymond Street Jail, where they were confined, a dissipated-looking man who accosted him with: "Hey, altherman! Don't ye remimber nie? Why, av coorse. Ye sint me here for tin days when you were sittin' fur Jedge Fisher. They tell me ye are wid us here yerself. I'm goin' out to-morrer. Kin I do somethin' fur ye?" The grim pleasantry of his fellow-prisoner between whom and himself, when they had last met, so wide a difference existed, is said to have been resented by the alderman. He wished the man to understand that there was still a difference in their relative conditions, but the man seemed unable to recognize any fact but the patent one that both he and the man who had sat in judgment on him were now prisoners in the same jail, and it obviously gave him satisfaction. The alderman was doubtless smarting under the knowledge that he and his brother officials imprisoned for contempt of court would not have been the only aldermen in jail if justice were done all around, and that while he suffered, others equally guilty in other cities were at liberty. But as his companion was suffering under his sentence, and he was undergoing the sentence of a higher tribunal, there was really a close similarity in their fortunes. The incident suggests the thought that not only judges but private persons of a censorious disposition would do well to remember that a day is coming when before the great Judge every man must give account for himself, and if he have not before then made his peace with God through Jesus, must go to eternal punishment (Matt. 7: 1-5).

Thirty Runaway Cars in the Streets of St. Louis produced a bad scare on December 14th. Early on that morning a freight train was passing up Poplar Street, and when near Fourth Street it broke in two, and thirty cars began descending the decline toward the river. After the train had passed Second Street a transfer company's truck turned out of the company's yard at this point and started to follow it up Poplar Street, but between Second and Third Streets it was caught by the fugitive cars and was not able to get out of the way before it was struck by them. The driver saved his life by jumping, but the mules were run over and so badly injured that they had to be shot. The movement of the flying cars rapidly increased to something terrific, until just below Second Street, when one of them jumped the track and there was a fearful crash. All the cars were wrecked. They needed no force to send them down the hill; their own weight was sufficient for that when the connection with the locomotive was broken. Those teachers who hope to raise human nature by its own good elements, might see in that fugitive train a type of their own inevitable failure. Unregenerated human nature having lost by sin its connection with God, has no hope of rising to the heavenly standard except in the connection as restored by the life and death of Jesus (John 12: 32).

A Narrow Escape from an Infuriated Bear is described in a Michigan journal. A man and his son, a boy about twelve years old, were riding across the hills looking for cattle, when they startled a huge bear. A well-directed shot killed it and man and boy dismounted to examine the carcass. While they were so engaged one of the horses strayed away about a hundred yards, and the father sent his son to catch it. The boy started, but before he got to the horse his dog appeared, pursued by a savage and angry bear, apparently the mate of the one just killed. As soon as the bear saw the boy he rushed at him, paying no more attention to the dog. The boy was too frightened to do anything but stand still and call to his father to save him. The father seized his rifle and fired just as the bear had risen on his haunches to strike the boy. The bullet knocked the bear down, but he rose and rushed again at the fear-paralyzed lad, with bloodshot eyes and foaming, open mouth. With a cry, "He's got me, father!" the frightened boy sank to the ground. The desperate father now sent a second bullet from his faithful repeating-rifle into the bear's body, and with a roar the savage brute fell backward and rolled down the hill. He then rushed to his boy and, to his intense joy, found him uninjured. Such a deliverance is that of many sinners whom Christ sees helpless in the power of Satan fascinated by sin and unable to fight the tempter or fly from him. Then He that is "mighty to save" hears and answers the cry for help (Psa. 35: 19-22).

CHRIST'S WORD WITH YOU.

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

When the regular congregation, at the request of the Pastor, left their seats to be occupied by strangers.

"Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."—MATTHEW 11: 28.

A Personal Text—No Mediator between Jesus and Man—The Promise to Those Who Come—
I. The Value of the Boon—Rest of Heart more Precious than Gold—Practically Helpful—Found in Christ Only—God's Watch-dog—II. The Largeness of Jesus' Heart—Only a Great Soul Seeks the Downcast—III. Blessedness of His Power—IV. Simplicity of the Invitation—V. The Unselfishness of Jesus—The Gospel in four Words.

ONE is struck with the personality of this text. There are two persons in it, "ye" and "me"—that is to say, the laboring one and the tender Saviour who entreates him to come that he may find rest. It is most important, if we wish to see the way of peace clearly, to understand that we must

EACH ONE COME PERSONALLY to Jesus for rest—"Come unto me, all ye that labor"; and that coming on our part must be to a personal Christ. In effect He says, "Come yourselves to me. Come not through sponsors, not through men whom you choose to call your priests, not through the petitions of ministers and teachers, but come yourselves, for yourselves." Dear hearers, the quarrel is between you and God, and this quarrel can only be made up by your approaching the Lord through a Mediator; it would be folly for you to ask another to come to the Mediator for you; you must trust in Him yourself. Personal faith is indispensable to salvation.

But the personality of Christ is equally clearly brought out in our text. Jesus says, "Come unto me"—not to anybody else, but to me. He does not say, "Come to hear a sermon about me," but "come to me." He does not say, "Come to sacraments, which shall teach you something about me," but "come to me"—to my work and person. You will observe that no one is put between you and Christ. The text is, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden"—not to somebody that will stand between you and me, but "Come to me at once, and without a go-between." Come to Jesus directly, even to Jesus himself.

You do want a mediator between yourselves and God, but you do not want a mediator between yourselves and Jesus. Christ Jesus is the Mediator between you and the Father; but you need no one to stand between you and Christ. To Him we may look at once, with unveiled face guilty as we are. I shall fail at this time in setting forth the gospel if I shall lead anybody to think that he can get salvation by going to church or going to the meeting-house or going to a minister or going into an inquiry-room or going to a penitent form. No, we are to go nowhere but to Jesus. You, as you are, are to come to Christ as He is, and the promise is that on your coming to Him He will give you rest.

You see there are two persons. Let everybody else vanish, and let these two be left alone, to transact heavenly business with each other. Jesus says to you, "Come to me." Your answer to Him, if it be, "Yea, Lord, I come," shall be the means of bringing peace to your heart from this time forth and for evermore.

I. I first call your attention to which in this text is set before weary, laboring men, "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." Rest of the heart is worth more than all California. To be at peace—to be no more tossed up and down in the soul—to be secure, peaceful, joyful, happy, is worth mountains of diamonds. A man's life consisteth not in the abundance of the things which he possesses, many a poor man is vastly happier than the possessor of wide estates, for peace comes not with property, but with content. The music of peace is not the jingle of gold or silver. Sweeter bells sound in the pardoned heart than ever wealth can ring. The herb called heart's-ease often grows in tiny gardens, and happy is the man who wears it in his bosom. It is this boon which, for value, outshines the pearls and rubies which deck an Indian queen, which Jesus promises to give to all that come to Him for it. Oh, rare peace which comes from the Prince of peace!

This, if a man gets it, is

to him in all the affairs of life. I say that, other things being equal, there is nobody so fit to run the race of life as the man who is unloaded of his cares and enjoys peace of mind. The man who is happily restful toward God is the man to fight the battle of life. I have known a man losing money on the market step aside, and, getting into a quiet place, breathe a prayer to God, and come back calm and composed; and, whereas before, in his distraction, he was ready to make bad bargains, plunge into speculation, and lose terribly, he has come back rested and peaceful, and has been in a fit frame for dealing with his fellow-men. I know this, brethren, having many cares resting upon myself, that when I can feel calmly restful and quiet before God, I am a match for anybody; but when once the spirits sink, and depression comes in, then the grasshopper becomes a burden, and a trifle frets the soul. Bring solid rest to the heart, and you have given the man a fulcrum upon which he may rest the lever with which he can lift the heaviest weight; but let him always be tossed up and down, and he has nothing to give him force.

I commend to you, men and brethren, in this busy London, the precious boon of my text called "rest," because it is not only a preparation for the world to come, but for the life that now is. The peace of God will serve both as arms and armor; it is both battle-axe and breastplate. It will be your heart's comfort and your hand's strength; it will be good for day and night, for calm and storm; it hath a thousand uses, and all of them are essential to spiritual well-being.

This rest is not found anywhere else but in Christ. Let me tell you what kind of rest it is, confessing that I now enjoy it and revel in it. It is rest to the man's entire spiritual being. Conscience troubles us till Jesus speaks it into rest. Conscience looks back and cries, "Things are not right. You were wrong here, and wrong there, and wrong altogether; there is no rest for you." Conscience keeps a day-book, and writes with heavy pen a gloomy record, which we read with alarm. "Tremble," says conscience, "for you will see this record again at the judgment-day, and find yourself condemned by it to eat the fruits of your doings." Men laugh and say they do not believe it; but they do believe it. Deep in their hearts they must believe it, for God hath a witness within which blurts out the truth. Conscience perpetually rouses some men, as a watch-dog wakes a slumbering householder. "Down, sir," they say, "Lie down, lie down," but in the heart will not lie down always; every now and then it begins to howl horribly, and the man cannot sleep as he wants to sleep. Even if you drug conscience it will have fits of barking in its sleep.

Now, Jesus promises to those who come to Him a peaceful conscience, which He will give through pardoning all the past, through changing the current of the man's ideas in the present, and through helping him to avoid in the future the faults into which he fell in the days that have now gone by.

"Rest, weary soul!

The penalty is borne, the ransom paid,
For all thy sins full satisfaction made;
Strive not to do thyself what Christ has done:
Claim the free gift, and make the joy thine own;
No more by pang of guilt and fear distressed,
Rest, sweetly rest!"

It is a grand thing to have rest of conscience. But then we have minds, and minds are troublesome things. In these days of doubt it is not easy for a mind to get an anchorage, and keep it. Many are searching for something to believe, or, at least, they long to be quite sure that it would be the right thing not to believe. Minds are tossed about like ships at sea, or birds caught in a fierce gale. My mind was once in that state—drifted, carried along I knew not whither; I for awhile believed nothing, till at last it came to this—that I thought my own existence might be, after all, a mere thought. Having a practical vein in my character, I sat me down and laughed at my own dreams of non-existence, for I felt that I did exist. Up from the depths of doubt and unbelief I rose to feel that there must be SOMETHING SURE.

I cast my soul at Jesus's feet, and I rested, and I am now perfectly content in mind.

Thousands of us can say, "We know whom we have believed, and are persuaded that He is able to keep that which we have committed to Him;" therefore we cannot leave the Gospel. No new doctrines, no novelties, no scepticisms, no fresh informations, can disturb us now; at least, they can but breathe a surface-ruffling; all is calm in the soul's depths. Having found rest of intellect in the doctrine of Jesus, there we will stay till death and heaven, or the second advent, solves all riddles.

But then we have hearts. I hope we all have hearts; though some are so harsh and almost heartless. Men that have great, all-embracing hearts need a rest for their love. What a cause of trouble this heart of ours is, for it often clings to that which is unworthy of it; and we are deceived and disappointed, and heart-break crushes us. The tempting fruit, like the apple of Sodom, crumbles into ashes in our hand. Here then is rest and remedy for heart palpitations and the anguish of the breast. Let a man love Jesus, and he will crave no other love, for this will fill his soul to the brim.

Now, I do not know of any religion that offers perfect rest to the mind except the religion of Jesus Christ. Men go the world over to try and find this pearl of great price, but their quest is vain. I often talk with religious people who have no idea of being saved now, and finding rest at once, because they do not understand that Christ came to give immediate salvation to those who trust Him. I spoke with one earnest soul a little while ago, and she said, "I have no rest." I replied, "Have you believed in Jesus Christ?" She answered, "Yes." "But," I asked, "do you not know that as soon as you believe in Jesus Christ, your sins are forgiven you, and you are saved?" "I did not grasp that," said she.

Yet that is the Gospel—that whosoever believeth in Jesus is not condemned. He that believeth in Him hath everlasting life, and is saved the moment he believes—becomes changed from the power of sin and made into a new man, possessing a new life which can never die. This assurance is worth getting hold of, and he that has it, let him hold it fast, and rejoice in it; yet it is not to be obtained anywhere except from the dear hands that were nailed to the wood. This rest can never come from any lips but those that prayed upon the cross, "Father, forgive them, for they know not what they do." This, then, is the boon which is presented by Christ Jesus at this moment to all that labor and are heavy laden; if they will come to Him for it, they shall have rest of soul.

II. Bear with me, in the second place, while I speak upon the LARGENESS OF THE SAVIOUR'S HEART.

Oh, that I could stand aside, and that He would come here Himself and utter the words of my text with His own dear lips! "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden."

See the persons whom He invites to come to Him. None but a man of great soul would keep such company. If we would be merry, we choose merry company. Some folks I should be glad to be in heaven with, but I could dispense with their company here: for ten minutes with them on earth is enough to make one wretched. Only a generous spirit would say, "Come to me, all you that are downcast—all you that are desponding—all you that are broken-hearted." Yet that is exactly what the text says.

Christ courts the company of the sorrowful, and invites those who are ill at ease to approach Him. What a heart of love He must have. Nay, He invites all such to come. You know two or three that are really cast down are quite enough at a time for most of us. It happened some months ago, when I was sitting here to see people, that I had four or five cases so sad—so deplorable—in which I could render such little help, that, after trying to pray with them, and encourage them, I said to a friend who was helping me, "I hope the next that comes to me will be cheerful, for I feel my head ache, and my heart too!" I tried as far as I could to enter into these poor people's troubles till I became troubled myself. Now, the Saviour has such a large heart that He does not forbid the sorrowing ones to come, all of them. "Come one," says He, "come all. All of you that labor and are heavy laden may at this hour come to me."

And, He says, come at once. He does not say, "Stop till you get your spirits raised, stop till you get some measure of relief;" but come just as you are. There is a notion in some people's minds that they cannot believe in Christ till they are better. Christ does not want your betterness. Will you only go to the physician when you feel better? Then you are foolish indeed, for you do not want the physician when you are getting better. The best time to apply to physicians is when you are as bad as you can be; and the time to come to Jesus is when you are so bad that you cannot be worse. Only come you to the Saviour, and He will give you rest.

He promises this rest to all who come to Him.

My Master stakes His credit upon every case that comes to Him. He has already given rest to thousands, to millions; and He promises to each one that comes to Him that He will give rest to him. Let us know when Jesus fails. He says, "Him that cometh to Me I will in no wise cast out;" the first one of you that comes, and He casts you out, let us know of it. We will post it up on the Royal Exchange, "A sinner came to Jesus, and He would not receive him." Woe to the world in that dark day, for the sun of hope will be quenched and the night will miss her stars. Till then we beg you to remember that Jesus has said, "Him that cometh to me I will in no wise cast out." Come and test my blessed Lord, and see if He does not accept you.

III. But now, thirdly, and but for a moment, let me speak to you about the blessedness of His power. Our Lord Jesus Christ is to all that labor and are heavy laden. He has not outrun His power in the promise that He has given. He is conscious that within Himself there resides a power which will be able to give peace to every conscience.

Notice there is no reserve made whatever, no way is left of backing out of the promise. "Come unto me," says He, "all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest." No limiting clause is inserted. Some men will speak what looks to be a very wide promise, but a little condition inserted in it narrows it horribly; but there is no condition here. You have read the story of John Bunyan in "Grace Abounding." Was there ever a poor wretch that was dragged about by the devil more than poor John was? For five years and more he could not call his soul his own. He did not dare to sleep, because he was afraid he should wake up in hell; and all day long he was troubled, and with this, and that, and the other. Poor tinker that he was, he first thought this, and then thought that; and as he says, he was "considerably tumbled up and down in his mind." I am sure such a case as that would have been given up by men; but when Jesus took it in hand John Bunyan found perfect rest; and his blessed "Pilgrim's Progress" remains a proof of the joy of heart which the poor tinker found when he came to rest in Christ.

Now, if within these walls there is a case in which poverty combines with sickness and disease, and if that poverty and disease are the result of vice, and if that vice has been carried on for many years, and if the entire man is now depressed and despondent, like one shut up in an iron cage, yet the Lord Jesus can give rest in such a case. You shall be made pure, though now you are filthy; you shall be restored, though now you are fallen;

you shall be started again in life by a power that shall cause you to be born again, so that you shall be as though you were a little child commencing life again, only under happier skies and holier influences. My Lord and Master has a power to comfort which reaches to the uttermost of human necessity. Some go a long way in sin and doubt, but they cannot rush beyond the uttermost, and therefore they are within the bounds of grace.

I wish I knew how to put this so that it would get into men's hearts; my Master knows that He can save you, for He had reckoned up every possible case before He spoke so positively. His prescient eye discerned all men that have ever lived, or that ever shall live, and He perceived you, dear friend, whom nobody else knows. You up in the corner there, whom nobody understands, not even yourself—He understands you, and He is able to give rest to your eccentric mind. He meant this promise to ring down the ages till it reached you. We have nearly completed the nineteenth century; but if ever we should get to the one hundred and nineteenth century, His power to give rest will be still the same. Still will He cry: "Come unto me, all ye that labor and are heavy laden, and I will give you rest."

IV. Now, fourthly, and this is a very important point, I want you to notice the SIMPLICITY OF THIS INVITATION.

It only says "Come to me, come to me, come to me, and I will give you rest." The call is, as we say, plain as a pikestaff; it has not a fine word in it. What is the way of salvation? If any minister replies, "I should want a week or two to explain it to you," he does not know the way of salvation; because the way of salvation which we need must suit a dying man, an illiterate man, and a guilty man, or else it will be unavailing in many cases. We need a way of grace which will answer all occasions—a mode of salvation suitable to all conditions.

"But what is coming to Him?" says one. "If He were at York, I would walk to York to-night to get at Him." He is not at York any more than He is here. We are not to come to Him with our persons, or with our legs and feet by a visible motion. We are to do with our Lord Jesus just what we do with a physician. We are very ill; it is a bad case. We hear that a certain eminent doctor has great skill in one particular disease; so at once we go to him. Our physical going is not so much required as our mental resort to him, by putting our case into his hands. We say to him, "Sir, here is my afflicted person. I will tell you all about my state as far as I know it. Ask me any questions. I will make a clean breast of all. Whatever you prescribe for me I will take; whatever regimen you lay down as to diet, I will follow. I place myself entirely in your hands because I have faith in your skill. You cured my mother of this disease; you cured my brother; and I believe you can cure me." Such is faith in Christ.

"Oh," says one, "do I understand, then, that if I trust Christ, I may do as I like?" Stop, stop. I never said that. Hearken, and learn! Here is a ship which cannot get into the haven.

comes on board. The captain says, "Pilot, can you get her into harbor?" "Yes, captain, I will guarantee it. I will guarantee that I will get the ship into harbor if you leave her with me." The captain goes to the helm, or gives orders as to steering the vessel, and at once the pilot objects that they are not trusting to him. "Yes, I am," says the captain, "and I expect you to get me into harbor, for you promised to do so." "Of course I did promise," replies the pilot; "but then it was understood that I should take charge of the ship for the time being." He orders the helm to be changed, and the captain declares that it shall not be done. Then cries the pilot, "I cannot get you into the harbor, and I will not pretend to do so. Unless you trust me I can do nothing, and the proof that you trust me is that you obey my orders."

Now, then, trust Jesus, so as to be obedient to Him, and He will pilot you safely. Yield yourself up to follow His example, to imitate His spirit, and obey His commands, and you are a saved man. Your ship shall not be driven out to sea while Jesus steers it; but do not go away under the delusion that you have only to say, "I trust Christ," and that you are saved directly. Nothing of the kind. You must really trust Him—practically trust Him, or there is no hope for you. Give yourself up to Jesus, renounce your old sins, forsake your old habits, live as Christ will enable you to live, and immediately you shall find peace to your soul.

You cannot enjoy rest, and yet riot in sin. Shall the drunkard have rest, and yet drown his soul in his cups? Shall an adulterer have rest, and wallow in his filthiness? Shall a man blaspheme, and have rest? Shall a man be a rogue and a liar, and have rest? Impossible. These things must be given up by coming to Jesus Christ, who will help you to give them up, and make a new man of you, and then you shall receive rest in your soul. Come to Him, then, in spirit and in truth. Oh, that you would come to Him while I am speaking, and find instantaneous rest to your souls!

V. I must not keep you longer, and so I want upon the last point briefly to call your attention to the

UNSELFISHNESS OF THE LORD JESUS.

"Come unto me," says He, "and I will give you." That is the Gospel. "I will give you." You say, "Lord, I cannot give Thee anything." He does not want anything. Come to Jesus, and He says, "I will give you." Not what you give to God, but what He gives to you, will be your salvation. "I will give you:" that is

THE GOSPEL IN FOUR WORDS.

Will you come and have it? It lies open before you. Jesus wants nothing of you. Suppose you were to become Christ's disciple, and serve Him with all your might throughout your life—in what way would that enrich Him? He has died for you; how can you ever pay Him for that? He lives in heaven to plead for you, and He loves you; how can you ever reward Him for that? Our hope is not in what we can give to Him, but in what He gives to us.

Weak-minded men have taken pleasure in flagellating themselves, starving themselves, shutting themselves up in monasteries, lacerating their bodies, and torturing their minds; to what purpose were these pains? Did the loving Jesus require this of them? Could such miseries afford His tender heart the least pleasure? Not at all. He has no pleasure in human misery, but He desires that His joy may be fulfilled in us that our joy may be full.

"I will give you rest." Men, brethren, women, sisters, all of you, this is the final word. The day is coming when we shall

ALL SIGH FOR REST.

We need it badly now, and if we have it not we are leading a pitiful life. Those poor rich people in the West End that have no Christ how can they bear their irksome idleness, the satiety and disgust of unenjoyed abundance? Those poor people in the East End that have no Christ—what they do without Him I cannot tell. Alas for their poverty and suffering, but what are these to their wretchedness in being Christless? Those of us who have all that heart can wish yet feel that we could never be happy if we were not resting in our dear Saviour; how, then, do the starving exist without Him? But we shall soon die, and what then?

A young man said to his father some little while ago, "Father, I am prospering in business wonderfully! if I get on at this rate what will it come to?" "Come to a grave," said his father. And so it will; all things of earth end there. Oh, that we were always ready to die, for then we should be ready to live! He that is ready to live to-morrow is ready to die to-morrow. There is no need that death should be a jerk in our existence; life ought to run on as a river pursues its way, and widens into the sea. Our existence here should glide into our existence there, but that cannot be unless we get on the right track while we are here. If we are on the right track now, which is believing, loving, fearing, serving, honoring God, we shall go on loving, fearing, honoring God forever and ever. "Come," says Christ, "Come to me."

I am glad to see this great company gathered here; but before I came into this house I felt much heaviness of heart, and it has not gone from me even now. To stand here and look into familiar faces from Sunday to Sunday is infinitely more pleasant than to look upon so many, the most of whom I have never seen before; for you cause me new anxieties that I may do good to you also. This was my thought: "I shall see them all again at the judgment-day, and I shall be accountable as to whether I preached the Gospel to them with all my heart." I shall not have to answer for the blood of you all, because there are more Sabbaths than this one, and more opportunities of hearing the Gospel than this; and on other Sundays others preach to you, and these share the burden; or else you waste the holy day, and in that case your blood will be on your own heads. Still, for this one service I must answer to God for you all. If I have not preached Jesus Christ simply and plainly, and from my heart, if I have been cold, and dull, and dreary when speaking upon a theme that might arouse any man to burn and glow with seraphic flame, then I shall be censurable by Him that shall judge the quick and dead. I speak in the name of God, and if you think I do, and believe that God has sent me, then I beseech you to lay hold of the truth which has been held up before you.

If there be a God—and that there is a God is written on the very skies—I devoutly desire to have Him for my friend. I think, as I look up to the stars, "I love the God that made those shining worlds, I worship Him, I desire to serve Him, I wish to be at peace with Him." And what has made me desire to serve Him and obey Him? Can it be a lie which has done this? Does a lie make a man love God, and desire to serve Him? No. It is truth, then, that has made me of obedient heart. The Gospel must be true, or it could not thus put men right with their Creator. O my beloved, trust your Saviour! Lay hold on Jesus. Oh, may Christ lay hold on you at this good hour and cause you to enter into His rest. Amen and amen.

A Chinese Convert was Beaten for Professing Christianity recently. The Rev. R. W. Stewart, of the Fuh-Kien mission, China, reports that at Tong-A, in the Lieng-Kong district, more properly named Tang-Ngie, a young man of good family has just been baptized. One of the senior members of his household holds an important official position over the literate of the district, and, as a matter of course, is literally opposed to Christianity. This young man, while engaged in business at Tang-Ngie, heard of the services, attended them, and finally determined to give up idolatry. His family, hearing of this, called him home on the pretence that his mother was ill. He was forthwith set upon and beaten till he fell to the ground insensible. At this stage his mother interfered, saying she only wished him to be beaten, not killed. They supposed him to be dead; but on his showing consciousness, the elder brother, who had been his chief tormentor, fled from the house, fearing that the young man would bring him before the Mandarins; but on his recovering the Christian sent word for him to return, for that he need fear nothing from him, he was a follower of Christ, who forgave His enemies, and he would follow His example. When asked "How do you know that Jesus loves you?" "Why," he said, "did He not leave His Father and the glory of heaven and come down and die for us wicked men? What is that if it is not love?" In his case the words of Jesus were literally fulfilled (Luke 21:16).

Rev. Dawson Burns, M.A., F.S.S.

THE REV. DAWSON BURNS, M.A., F.S.S.

THE Rev. Dawson Burns, whose portrait appears on this page, is well known in this country as a writer, and his visit here two years ago made him personally known to those who previously knew him by reputation only. There are few men whose names are more deservedly esteemed in connection with the temperance movement than that of the Rev. Dawson Burns. Born in Southwark, London, on the 22d December, 1828, he signed the pledge in 1839, and delivered his first speech at a meeting of the Youth's Temperance Society at the schools connected with his father's church in October, 1840. After writing several literary contributions on behalf of the temperance cause, he was appointed, in 1845, assistant secretary to the National Temperance Society, and early in 1846 joint secretary, after having for some time conducted the monthly Temperance Chronicle. The responsible posts he filled were many. On his removal to Manchester, in 1851, he was elected a member of the committee of the Manchester and Salford Temperance Society, of which he became honorary secretary, and assisted to form the Provisional Committee of

THE UNITED KINGDOM ALLIANCE.

At one of the meetings of this committee the present name of that noble association was adopted at his suggestion. Mr. Burns assisted in the preparation of the "Address to the People of England," afterward issued by the Executive Committee, and was the sixth enrolled member of the Alliance at its formation on the 1st June, 1853. In the March previous he had returned to London, and filled the office of secretary to the National Temperance Society, until the end of June, 1856; but continued to edit the society's monthly organ, the National Temperance Chronicle, till its discontinuance. His activity, however, was ceaseless, and in March, 1856, he wrote his first letter as London correspondent of the Alliance News, and in December following entered on the office of Metropolitan Superintendent of the United Kingdom Alliance.

Mr. Burns's reply, in a lecture delivered in November 1863, to some objections which had been advanced by Mr. C. Buxton, M.P., led to the republication and wide circulation of an article on intemperance contributed by Mr. Buxton to the North British Review, in 1865. Mr. Burns is the honorary secretary of the London Temperance Hospital, the new buildings of which, opened by the Lord Mayor in March 1881, cost $134,000, the full amount of which has been subscribed. In the establishment of this remarkable institution he took a leading part.

Mr. Burns is

A VERSATILE AND VOLUMINOUS WRITER, and independently of the works already referred to, many valuable contributions have appeared from his pen in various religious periodicals. In April 1874, he was formally engaged as co-pastor with his father, and after the latter's death he continued as pastor, with assistance, till October 1881. The annual temperance sermons, commenced by Dr. Burns in 1839, have been continued by him, thirty-five of the addresses having been delivered by the Rev. Dr. Jabez Burns. At the 111th Annual Association of General Baptist New Connexion, Mr. Burns was elected as one of two delegates to represent that body at the Centennial Conference of the Free-Will Baptists of the United States. This mission was fulfilled in the summer of 1880.

At the 112th Association, held at Norwich, England, in June 1881, the Presidential chair was occupied by Mr. Burns, who delivered an able and original address, under the title of "A Century's Progress," which was subsequently published at a penny, and we confess to having read it with intense delight, and a clearer and fuller apprehension of what constitutes the true spirit of Christianity. Beside numerous articles in the principle temperance publications, he has prepared for the press "Statistics on the Manufacture, Taxation, and Cost of Intoxicating Liquors" and other valuable temperance works.

"THE TEMPERANCE BIBLE COMMENTARY," the joint production of Mr. Burns and Dr. Lees, was published in 1868. Four other English editions and one American have since been called for, and the authors have had the great satisfaction of seeing their labors appreciated, and a long-standing want in temperance defence permanently supplied. "A Dialogue between a Clergyman, a Physician, and a Publican" appeared in 1869. About the same time appeared a prize pamphlet, "The Bible and Total Abstinence." The latest important work from the pen of Mr. Burns is entitled "Christendom and the Drink Curse."

A MODEL CONTROVERSIALIST.

Speaking of the amount and variety of work done by Mr. Burns independently of his literary labors, one writer says: "There is rarely a discussion of any note but finds him ready to do wise and prudent service in behalf of the cause, and his watchful eye readily detects a flaw in the reasoning of those who oppose us, when they propound their views in the columns of the press. Prepared for any opportunity, his pen courteously and clearly lays bare any sophistry or clap trap, though access is sometimes denied to the same public attention which was secured for his opponents. Notwithstanding this drawback, the productions of his pen have secured him a world-wide reputation, and he is everywhere regarded as one of the foremost literary champions of the movement." In 1869 he received from Bate's College, Maine, the unsolicited honorary degree of M.A., and was elected a Fellow of the Statistical Society in 1872. As a preacher Mr. Burns is widely known from one end of England to the other, though his duties as the Metropolitan Secretary of the United Kingdom Alliance necessarily limit his engagements of other kinds. It may be said generally, and with undoubted truth, that his sympathies with all movements of a philanthropic character are warm, and his efforts for their promotion have never been wanting when they could be used. In so doing he endeavors, in season and out of season to act upon the apostolic rule that the true Christian should at all times be "ready for every good work." In December 1853, Mr. Burns married Miss Cecil Balfour, the only daughter of Mr. James Balfour and Mrs. Clara Lucas Balfour, whose singular merits as a lecturer and writer were widely recognized.

The Chairman of the Cunard Steamship Company, Mr. John Burns, in a letter to an English temperance journal, announces that on and after December 1st no grog or other alcoholic drink will be served out to the crews of the company, but that coffee will be substituted. This resolution will give still greater confidence to passengers making the journey across the Atlantic in the boats of the company.

Miss Laurie McLatchie.

MRS. FOLKESTONE'S AMBITION.

"AH, Percy, you are going for a row, I see," said a lady who, with her daughter, was strolling along a path bordering one of our most beautiful rivers.

"Yes, Madam," said the young man addressed, a handsome youth of about twenty years who had recently left college and commenced practice as a physician in the neighborhood. "I was coming," he continued, "to your house in the hope of persuading you and Miss Folkestone to accompany me."

"You are very kind, Percy," said Mrs. Folkestone, "but we have accepted the invitation of the Wynters to join them in an excursion, and we are just on our way to their boathouse."

The reply pained the young doctor deeply. He was seriously in love with Connie Folkestone and had earnestly pleaded with her widowed mother for permission to make her his wife. The widow had not refused him, but had not given him a definite answer, and Percy Collins believed that she was anxious to secure for her daughter a more wealthy husband than he. She was ambitious he knew, and he feared that she would not be overscrupulous as to the character of a suitor, provided he possessed the fortune she desired her daughter to enjoy. But he worked hard, was growing in popularity, and believed that in a short time he would be able to show such a balance in his bank as would give him favor in the mother's eyes. Lately the young Wynters had appeared rather frequently at the widow's cottage, and Percy who knew them well as fast young men amply endowed with wealth, feared that if either asked Mrs. Folkestone for permission to win Connie's affections, she would give her consent.

"Pardon me, Mrs. Folkestone," he said, "but though it is not my habit to speak disparagingly of any one, I do think that if you knew the character of those young men you would not consider them suitable companions for Connie."

"Ah! you are jealous, Percy; you do them an injustice. They appear to me excellent young men. A little wild, perhaps, but they will settle down as they grow older. I know what you are thinking of, but you know you are poor, and it is my duty to consider Connie's future."

"That is the very consideration I would press, dear Mrs. Folkestone," said Percy; "her future cannot be made happy by money only. No refined Christian girl, such as Connie is could be happy married to a man leading a life such as both these young Wynters are living."

"I am not sure that Connie would be happy with you. She has her dear father's notions about religion I know, and I think they are much too narrow. A gay, cheerful husband with the means to gratify her natural tastes would perhaps be able to give her a less morbid tone of mind. But here we are at the boat-house so, we must wish you good-morning."

Percy looked down from the little wharf very sadly at the party, as Mrs. Folkestone stepped carefully into the boat assisted by her daughter and Mr. Alfred Wynter. He saw them push off, and then walked moodily away oppressed by the thought that the girl he loved was in danger of being sacrificed for money. He was in no mood for boating after that, and walked away to the top of a hill overlooking the river, where he flung himself disconsolately on the grass and gazed after the boat as it glided out of sight.

How long he lay there he never knew; but it must have been two or three hours, for looking up from his reverie he noticed that the sun was near its setting, and he rose hurriedly to return home. As he did so he looked up the river, and there he saw the Wynters' boat returning. He was turning away when he was struck by its erratic movements. The young men were pulling very clumsily with no regard to time, and Alfred, especially, who was pulling as stroke was endangering the safety of the party by his awkward attempts to feather, so awkward that they would have disgraced a novice.

An instant, and a shrill scream reached his ear. Alfred's oar was deep in the water and he could not withdraw it. The boat lurched heavily to that side, and Mrs. Folkestone, springing to her feet in alarm, lost her balance and fell; her weight sufficed to overturn the light craft, and in a moment the whole party were struggling in the water. Happily, the boat had not filled, but turned completely over and floated keel uppermost, and the two ladies were clinging to it while the young men were swimming for the shore.

Quick as thought Percy Collins bounded to the edge of the stream and ran like a deer to a place where a light outrigger was moored. He soon had her detached, and was pulling swiftly for the spot where the ladies were still clinging to the wrecked boat. He was just in time to reach them as Mrs. Folkestone, fainting from fright and exhaustion, released her grasp and sank. He managed to take her on board, and then rescued the girl he loved. He pulled hard for the shore, where he was able to find shelter and restoratives for the ladies, and then returned to look for the young men. The younger had reached the bank, but Alfred was not to be seen and it was not for many hours that his dead body was recovered.

It was from Mrs. Folkestone's lips that Percy heard the history of the affair. He learned that both ladies noticed soon after entering the boat that the young men were excited with wine, and just before returning they produced champagne which was offered to the ladies and declined, but of which Alfred and his brother partook freely. That accounted for the awkward pulling and for the disaster. Mrs. Folkestone's gratitude to Percy for saving her own life and that of her daughter was boundless, and profiting by the check her ambition had received, he had no difficulty in extracting from her the promise so long withheld.

Mrs. Folkestone's Eventful Boating Excursion.

RICHARD OWEN'S CHOICE

A Story in Three Chapters.

CHAPTER II.

Another Home.

MESSRS. FARR AND BRADLEY were the only engineers in Bradborough, so that a man dismissed from their works was in a manner driven from the place also, and compelled to seek both employment and home elsewhere. Such being the case, we can hardly wonder that few would even think of braving the consequences of an opposition to the master's will, and only one be found to do it.

When Mr. Farr gave the order to dismiss any man refusing to work on the Sunday, he did not believe that Richard Owen would persist in so doing, and when he came to the works on Monday morning he expected to find that he too had yielded.

"Did Owen come yesterday?" he inquired of the manager.

"No, sir. He flatly refused, left at eleven on Saturday night, and, of course, I told him he would not be wanted here again."

Very angry was Mr. Farr when he heard this. He wanted Richard Owen to bend, not to leave, and could not help feeling that he himself would not be altogether the gainer by having turned off one of his best and most trustworthy workmen.

"What a foolish fellow he must be!" exclaimed Mr. Farr. "After all, though, I begin to wish I had not insisted on his coming, for orders have arrived this very morning which will keep us busy for months to come. We shall actually want more hands instead of employing a smaller number. Crossley, if Richard Owen should ask to be taken back, as I fancy he will, you may say you will intercede with me; then I can give him a lecture and put him in his old place again."

Crossley said, "Yes, sir," but in his own mind, did not believe that Owen would ask to be taken back; and indeed he was right, for at the time this brief conversation was going on at the machine works, Owen and his wife were considering what would be best for them to do.

Above all others, Owen was resolved upon one thing, and that was, never to work under a master who would punish a faithful servant simply because he had the fear of God before his eyes.

"I will not be idle a single day if I can help it," he said. "We have a little money saved up, but I'll not encroach upon that if it is possible to avoid it. Still, for a while, we may have to deny ourselves more than we have been used to do."

Mary expressed her willingness to second her husband's efforts in any way, and was the first to suggest their removal to a house of a less rent.

"Suppose, Richard, you go to Mr. Wood, tell him what has happened, and ask his advice. He is a kind gentleman, and will feel for you, I'm sure."

Richard thought this a good idea, and resolved to act upon it. Mr. Wood was the owner of the cottage in which they lived, and agent for a great deal of property belonging to other gentlemen.

"I will go at once, Mary, and I shall catch Mr. Wood at his office. I may as well take the week's rent with me, and perhaps he may know of another little cottage that will suit us. We should like to be his tenants still, if possible."

Richard accordingly took the rent, and, as he expected to do, found Mr. Wood at home. The gentleman smiled pleasantly at the sight of his tenant, and said, "Good morning, Owen. It is a new thing to see you here at this time of day. How are your good wife and the children?"

"Very well, sir, thank you. I have brought the week's rent."

"I wish all my tenants were like you, I should have an easier time than I have. In more than nine years you have never been twelve hours behindhand with your rent."

"Well, sir. It is to pay, and there is no comfort in keeping money in one's pocket that belongs to somebody else."

"True enough, so far as you are concerned, but many people find a pleasure in spending money that belongs of right to the landlord or tradesman, at the ale house. But how is it you are not at the works this morning? Are you stopped for something?"

"No, sir, I was dismissed on Saturday night."

hands instead of employing a smaller number. Crossley, if Richard Owen should ask to be taken back, as I fancy he will, you may say you will intercede with me; then I can give him a lecture and put him in his old place again."

Crossley said, "Yes, sir," but in his own mind, did not believe that Owen would ask to be taken back; and indeed he was right, for at the time this brief conversation was going

Mr. Wood uttered an exclamation of surprise, and seemed as though he could hardly believe his ears. "You dismissed," he said, laying down his pen. "Tell me all about it, Owen."

Very glad of the invitation, Richard told his tale simply enough, and confined himself to the bare facts. Then he mentioned his wish for a cheaper house, and begged Mr. Wood's advice.

"What a shame!" said Mr. Wood, indignantly. "Never mind, Owen, good will come, good must come out of steady obedience to God's laws, and faith in His promises. Cheer up, man. I am delighted you came to me, for I can help you. And first, about the house. You know Fernley Hall, that old place with large grounds, and a neighborhood composed almost entirely of gentlemen's houses and new villas?"

Richard had seen the place often, and said so.

"Well, the Hall is closed just now. Old Mr. Fernley died a few weeks back, and his only son does not care for the place, as he has bought a nice estate in the south. It is now in my hands for sale, and I was just on the look out for some steady person to take care of it until it can be disposed of. I may not sell it for many months, and in the meanwhile I must place a steady person in the lodge, a nice little house just at the end of Ash Lane, to prevent boys from trespassing on the grounds and breaking the windows. If you like to undertake this, you will have a comfortable cottage, rent free, and a trifle beside. Your wife can open the hall windows in the morning, and shut them in the afternoon, which will be the hardest part of the work, and the presence of a family in the lodge will keep off intruders. What say you, Owen?"

"I shall be most thankful to accept it, sir. It will be a very great help to me, and I don't know how to express my gratitude for your kindness."

"You need not say a word about that. Now, how soon can you be in?"

"I suppose it will want a bit of cleaning and putting to rights, but we can soon manage that. I dare say by Saturday, as I shall be at home to help and remove the furniture."

"Very well then, we will say this day week. If I hear of any employment likely to suit you, I will not forget to let you know."

With many expressions of thankfulness Richard Owen left Mr. Wood's office and took his way homeward. His home was at no great distance, but it seemed longer than it had ever done before, so eager was he to tell the good tidings to his wife. Mary saw him coming and met him at the door.

"I can see by your face you have good news for me, Richard," she said; and very soon she knew all that had passed between her husband and Mr. Wood.

The grateful couple knelt down and in the spirit of the psalmist, when he said; "What shall I render unto God for all his benefits?" poured out their tribute of praise and thanksgiving for the mercies vouchsafed them.

Before Saturday night came the Owens and all their worldly goods were comfortably housed in their new abode, and the next thought of its master was, "What can I get to do, in order to provide all that is wanting beside the roof to shelter us?"

Richard had not been idle during the week. As he went to and fro he had made inquiry in every direction, but as yet, he had heard of nothing. News had however reached him that Farr and Bradley were likely to be busier than ever, and were actually on the look out for more hands. But Richard could not, all at once, subdue a feeling of indignation which would come when he thought of the way in which he had been dismissed. This alone would have prevented his applying for employment under Farr and Bradley, had not the thought also come, "The same cause of disagreement is still more likely to occur, now that there is so much to do at the works."

More than once Mr. Farr asked if Owen had eaten humble pie yet, but he always received the same reply. And worse still, he heard through the manager, that the better class of workmen thought Owen ill-used, and applauded the conduct which they had not faith to imitate.

Altogether Mr. Farr derived very little satisfaction from the affair, and in his heart wished he had acted differently toward his old servant.

On the day that the Owens removed to their new home they received a letter from Mary's father, to say that he should be at Bradborough on the following Tuesday, and would spend an hour or two with them.

Old Mr. Blake had very large gardens in a beautiful part of the county, and he sent part of the produce to Bradborough market by railway. The rest went to another and nearer market town. He was in very comfortable circumstances, and had brought up a large family respectably and well. Both Richard Owen and his wife were especially glad to see Mr. Blake. They wished much to ask his advice as to what would be best for them to do, for Owen had not heard of any employment, and now the removal was over, he was both ready and willing to work at anything rather than lose another day in idleness.

At the appointed time Grandfather Blake arrived at the cottage, laden as usual with garden produce. After he had taken some refreshment, he talked over matters with his son-in-law and daughter, told them news of his own dear ones at home, and listened attentively to Richard's account of his dismissal from the works.

"He could not do otherwise, father, could he?" asked Mary.

"He could not do otherwise, and do right, Mary."

"I wish you could think of anything for him to employ even a few weeks," said the wife.

The old man sat silent for a few minutes, and then replied, "I believe I can contrive something, my girl; I thought I saw it as I was coming up to the house, and since I have looked round a bit, I feel sure of it."

A joyful exclamation broke from Mary as, turning to her husband, she said, "I felt certain father would think of something that had never come into our heads."

The old man smiled. "Mary always thought her father wiser than anybody," he replied; "when she was a little lass at home, it was 'Father this,' and 'Father that,' till nother used to say she was of no account beside me. But she loved mother just as well, and was a dutiful daughter to us both. Now, Richard, listen to my scheme. You see where this cottage stands, just at the top of a broad green lane. Now it is, in a manner, the centre of a vast number of new houses, inhabited by well-to-do people. There are no shops within a long distance. But none of these new houses have much ground to them. The land has been made the most of for building on, and if Fernley Hall should be bought, depend on it more new houses would be built on the same plan as the others."

"Father," exclaimed Mary, "I believe I see what your plan is."

"If you do, my girl, it won't be the first time you and I have thought together. Let me hear if you're right."

"The gentlemen that live in all these new houses must buy their garden stuff, because they have no place to grow it in, and"—

"You have it, Mary, you've guessed it, girl. If the gentleman who has let you have this cottage will only grant the other favor, you will soon have reason to say that you never did a better day's work than when you moved here."

"Richard had better see Mr. Wood at once."

"What must I ask him?" inquired Owen.

"Start a little green-grocer's shop here, if Mr. Wood will let you. I'll send you the stock for it, and with your fruit and vegetables, such as I can supply you with, you'll stand a first rate chance. You are steady and industrious, civil and obliging. You go solicit orders; Mary can look after the shop while you do that, and take in the goods to your customers."

Owen and his wife both saw that the plan was an excellent one, and thankfully resolved to act upon it.

They were fortunate in finding Mr. Wood, still more so in receiving that gentleman's hearty consent to the carrying out of their scheme. "There is, however, one thing I must remind you of, Owen," said the agent: "Fernley Hall and its belongings may be sold any day, and it is my duty to endeavor to find a purchaser. I can, therefore, only answer for the time it may remain undisposed of. But, my friend, the same gracious God who seems to have opened a present way for you to employ your time profitably, and maintain your family, is the same yesterday, to-day, and forever. Take the opportunity which offers itself, and trust Him for the future."

"Indeed, sir, I have reason to do so. When I look back upon the last few days, I fairly wonder at the goodness of the Lord, and the way in which He keeps His word."

"Would you not have more cause to wonder if He were to break His word, my friend?" said Mr. Wood.

"You're right, sir," exclaimed old Mr. Blake. "That's the way to put it. Not but what my son-in-law here has learned that lesson, only, I do believe, he was thinking how wonderful God's goodness to us is, when we consider how little we deserve it. Wasn't that what was in your mind, Richard?"

"Something like it, father."

"What a blessing that the fulfilment of the promises does not depend on our righteousness, remarked Mr. Wood.

"Ay, sir, I hope we all realize that," replied Mr. Blake.

Their business thus pleasantly settled, Richard Owen and his father-in-law returned home to the cottage where Mary awaited them.

Richard Owen warmly thanked his father-in-law both for the plan itself and the assistance promised toward carrying it out, and then as it was time for the old man to be going, he and little Jim walked with him to the railway station. On their way they passed a carpenter and wheelwright's yard, in which Owen observed a new hand-cart and pointed it out to Mr. Blake.

They accordingly went into the yard examined the cart, found that it was well made and cheap, and purchased it, Owen agreeing to bring the money when he should come, in an hour's time, to fetch home his bargain.

"That is well done," said Mr. Blake. "Now you will want scales, weights, and measures; but those you need not buy. I have a spare set and will send them down for you to use, until you see how the business answers."

The old man took his departure, having thus arranged to supply the whole stock-in-trade. Richard fetched home his hand-cart, and, in the morning, took it to the railway station in time to meet the earliest train. Sure enough he had plenty to fill it, and returned home laden with garden produce of the most tempting description. Mary helped him to divide large bundles into small ones, to arrange the fruit, and make everything look prettier still from the neat manner in which it was put upon the hand-cart. At length all was ready. All, did I say? It seemed the master was not, for, leaving his little stock-in-trade within the gate, he re-entered the cottage, for what think you? It was to ask God's blessing upon his new undertaking.

Richard Owen believed God's word, and trusted to the promises contained in it. When he read that sweet encouraging text and command, "Be careful for nothing; but in everything by prayer and supplication with thanksgiving, let your requests be made known unto God," he took it as meant for his comfort.

In this spirit of dependence on God's truth, the husband and wife, with their little boy between them, knelt together, and humbly besought His blessing on the work they were about to commence. Then with a feeling of peace and trust, Richard Owen set out with his little stock-in-trade, and his wife went on with her household duties.

Mary Owen was just setting the dinner table when little Jim ran in from school. "Mother, mother!" he exclaimed, "father is coming, and what do you think? He has sold all his things except two bunches of onions, and a little few apples."

The child had scarcely got the words out of his mouth, when Mary heard the sound of the handcart, and she went to the door to meet her husband. She found that little Jim's report was indeed true. Richard brought back his cart nearly empty of everything but his measures and weights. And the profits on this morning's sales exceeded what he could have earned by the hardest day's work in the machine shop.

"The Lord has indeed heard our prayer," said Owen, "and blessed our beginning beyond our hopes."

Mary could not speak. Her eyes were filled with glad tears, which dropped on the face of Baby Alice as she knelt with the tiny creature in her arms, while Richard, in a trembling voice, thanked God for favors, exceeding not only what they had prayed for, but their hopes.

Mary was naturally anxious to know all that her husband had done, where he had been, and who had been his customers, and he was no less desirous of telling her. Then, there was just time to send a few lines to Mr. Blake, that he might not only share in their pleasure, but be guided as to what should be sent on the morrow.

Altogether this was a very happy day, and little Jim ran off to school in the afternoon more zealous to learn than ever, because he was told that when he could write and reckon well he would be a great help to father.

REVIEW OF THE QUARTER'S LESSONS.

S. S. Lesson for December 31. Golden Text, Heb. 5 : 8. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

Jesus Learning—His Real Humanity—Graduating in the School of Obedience—The Call to Partnership—Paul's Conception of the Call—The Paschal Lamb—What Hinders Unity—Self Proof People—The Supernatural Life—Where the Hindrance Lies—Glorified Together.

WE shall take the liberty of extending our golden text to the two following verses, "Though He were a Son, yet learned He obedience by the things which He suffered; and being made perfect, He became the Author of eternal salvation unto all them that obey Him; called of God a High Priest, after the order of Melchisedec." "Though He were a Son, yet learned He;" this is a clue to the life of Jesus. He is our Representative and every step of ground He trod, He trod for us, and although throughout a past eternity He had ever been one with the Father, yet as Man

HE LEARNED OBEDIENCE.

Jesus did not come on earth to play a part. He took on Him, and lived a real human life, with a real human will, that He might lay down as Man both life and will and learn obedience, not on the high ground of an all-powerful divinity, but on our own ground of tempted and tried humanity. And He achieved His object; Jesus learned obedience, and He learned it so fully by the things which He suffered, that as man He was made perfect, and being so, had power to propagate the eternal salvation which He had obtained, and to reproduce it in "all them that obey Him."

In the closing scenes of our blessed Lord's life, which we have been considering during the past quarter, we see, more than in any other part of His life, our blessed Lord in this school of obedience. Anointed for His burial in Bethany, not by God, but by a saved sinner, Jesus suffered it. Once for all He had said to His Father, "Lo, I come, to do Thy will, O God," "I delight to do Thy will, O My God, yea, Thy law is within My heart" (Ps. 40 : 7, 8; Heb. 10 : 9), and Jesus meant all He said, there was no shrinking back, He had given Himself in sacrifice the Man for men, He had counted the cost, and "knowing all things which should come upon Him," our most loving Lord went forward; He had set His face as a flint (Isa. 50 : 7), He saw but one thing before Him, the salvation of men; and to accomplish this, He pressed on through shame, sorrow, agony, condemnation, death, right on to resurrection, ascension, intercession, until He could pour down the Holy Ghost, and make of sinners temples of that Holy Ghost like Himself. And Oh, marvel of marvels, He calls you and me, dear reader, to enter into partnership with Him, to go to school with Him, to learn obedience as He learned it, in the school of suffering. But alas! few understand or enter into this calling.

Few accept from the hand of God the rubs of life through which He seeks to insure their real crucifixion with Christ, there are few who put in no claim for self. Paul understood his vocation, we hear this man of birth, position, reputation, and high standing among Jewish theologians saying, "What things were gain to me, those I counted loss for Christ. Yea, doubtless, and I count all things but loss for the excellency of the knowledge of Christ Jesus my Lord; for whom I have suffered the loss of all things, and do count them dung, but that I may win Christ, and be found in Him, . . . that I may know Him, and the power of His resurrection, and the fellowship of His sufferings, being made conformable to His death; if by any means I might attain unto the resurrection of the dead" (Phil. 3 : 7-11).

GOD TOOK THIS MAN AT HIS WORD and showed him how great things he must suffer for His name's sake (Acts 9 : 16), and when late on in his life the Holy Ghost witnessed in every city that bonds and afflictions abode him, he said, "None of these things move me, neither count I my life dear unto myself, so that I might finish my course with joy, and the ministry which I have received of the Lord Jesus, to testify the Gospel of the grace of God" (Acts 20 : 23, 24). Like his Master, Paul set his face as a flint, like Him he learned obedience by the things which he suffered. Brethren, readers, let us be followers of him as he also was of Christ.

Our second lesson in the past quarter was on the Passover, and we saw Jesus

THE PASCHAL LAMB.

His blood upon the lintel and the doorposts; Himself the food and the strength of His people; and then in the following lesson on the Lord's Supper we saw how under the New Testament, not the flesh only, but also the blood, the very life of Jesus is to be imbibed by His followers, that we who believe are to be life of His life, members of His body, of His flesh, and of His bones, one life, one spirit, one body, one man with Jesus. Oh, when shall we fully enter into this union with our beloved Lord? How much more real is it to some of us to refer temptation, trial, pain, weakness to a Saviour close to us, than to experience constantly that we are one life, one body with Jesus. What irresistible power for God is the power of God. Our beloved Lord prays for us that we may be one, even as He and His Father are one. "I in them, and Thou in Me; that they may be made perfect in one, that the world may know that Thou hast sent Me, and hast loved them as Thou hast loved Me" (John 17 : 22, 23).

WHAT HINDERS UNITY?

Separate interests. So long as I have an interest for myself, and you for yourself, we are not one, and cannot be one. If in a family, the members are each seeking the best for himself, disunion is the result, but where, on the contrary, the family good, and the family interests are pre-eminent, there is unity, there is love, there is power. "All seek their own" (Phil. 2 : 21), was Paul's complaint some eighteen hundred years ago; alas, it is the same now. Believers seek their own, in honor, position, expenditure, comfort, food, health, and there are few indeed who are practically "a living sacrifice" for Jesus. Yet it is such and only such who are one in God and one with God, and the world is waiting for the manifestation of such that they may know and believe that God has sent His Son. Eighteen hundred years have passed, but men and women have not yet been found sufficiently empty of themselves to startle the world with the phenomena of a people vulnerable only in one point, Jesus.

Our most precious Lord could only be touched when His Father was concerned, He stood every test. When in Gethsemane the accumulation of six thousand years of sin with all its consequences lay heavy upon Him, there was no pitying of Himself. We have seen men, believers too, looking most unhappy and offended too, if they happen to sit in a draught, or if their food is not to their liking, or if somebody happens to depreciate them; and Jesus under all this load was so free from Himself that He could excuse His disciples for going to sleep, instead of bitterly reproaching them for their want of sympathy for Him. Betrayed by Judas, again His thoughts were for others, for He said to those who came to take Him, "I have told you that I am He, if therefore ye seek Me, let these go their way" (John 18 : 8), there was the offering Himself in sacrifice and the tender, loving shielding of others which ever marked the heart and life of Jesus.

Dragged before the Council, He spoke no word in His defence; He took the place of a sinner, speechless under condemnation; and although that condemnation came through man, He took it from His Father's hand, "The cup which My Father hath given Me, shall I not drink it?" (John 18 : 11). Priest, and governor, and king sought in vain a just ground of condemnation, but how could they find it? The Lamb of God which taketh away "the sin of the world" was "without blemish" He "did no sin, neither was guile found in His mouth" (1 Pet. 2 : 22), yet without opening His mouth, without any self-defence, without looking for even a look of sympathy, Jesus received the sentence of death, and was so free from Himself that He could remember and restore, by one look of love and power, the fallen Apostle Peter. Oh, depth of love, oh, marvellous obedience which He learned by the things which He suffered! And when things came to the worst, and the Son of God was mocked and crucified by the hands of men, when the penalty of sin had to be paid by Him who did no sin, He went on learning obedience, and still to the very last was free from Himself, praying for His murderers, saving the thief, providing for His mother.

God made Him as Man "perfect through sufferings" (Heb. 2 : 10), and He has become "the Author of that eternal salvation," that "newness of life," that divine, eternal, "supernatural" life, which loves its enemies, and pleases not itself, He became its Source, its Author, and its Finisher, or Perfector, and He has the power and the will in our humanity, if we will obey Him as He obeyed His Father. He longs to make us "partakers of His holiness" (Heb. 12 : 10), and this He cannot do unless we "endure chastisement," unless we learn obedience by the things which we suffer, as He learned obedience by the things which He suffered. It seemed never to strike Him that anything which happened was painful, unjust, wrong or inconvenient to Him. He had covenanted to give Himself up, and He did it in detail without ever flinching for a moment.

Oh, reader, this glorious, divine, honorable path of learning obedience lies before us. In the details of your life and mine, lie abundant opportunities to sacrifice, deny, ignore ourselves. The hindrance lies in the will. Are we willing to be really nothing, really despised, really put out of the question, really injured, to take it from the hand of God as part of the glorious pathway which our Master trod, that He might make a path for us up to joint-heirship with Him? For remember, we are heirs of God, and joint-heirs with Christ, if so be that we suffer with Him that we also may be

GLORIFIED TOGETHER.

But the Man Christ Jesus, who had conquered self could also conquer death, self and death go hand in hand; He rose, and if we die with Him, we shall also live with Him, we shall also arise out of the death, corruption, and littleness of our own life, into the life, the immortality, and the greatness of His life. Oh, for the power of His resurrection, Oh, for the power of an endless life! To bring men to live a resurrection life, a life "hid with Christ in God"; (Col. 3 : 3), a life out of themselves, above themselves, divine and therefore irresistible; for this Christ died, and they who live such a life know all the glorious experience spoken of in last Sunday's lesson, they tread and lead others to tread on that way of holiness where the unclean cannot walk, for it is above their level; where "the ravenous beast," and the roaring lion can find no footing. O God, lead us there, cost what it may, lead us on into Thine own life, for Jesus' sake.

FOREIGN TOPICS.

A Reorganization of the British Administration is announced by cable. Mr. Gladstone, who has held two offices in the Cabinet, those of Premier and Chancellor of the Exchequer, has resigned the latter. He has offered the post to the Rt. Hon. Hugh C. E. Childers, who has accepted it. Mr. Childers was formerly Secretary of the War Department. The Marquis of Hartington, who was Secretary for Indian affairs, is to succeed Mr. Childers at the War Office. Lord Kimberley will succeed Lord Hartington. He had charge of Colonial business, which is now confided to the Earl of Derby. Thus the changes are merely transfers from one office to another except in the case of Lord Derby, who now for the first time holds office in a Liberal Cabinet. He was Secretary for Foreign Affairs in the Conservative Cabinet of his late father, and he subsequently held the same office under Mr. Disraeli. He disagreed with Mr. Disraeli on his Eastern policy, and resigned his office. His entrance into the Cabinet is regarded by the British public as a concession on the part of Mr. Gladstone to the aristocratic element of the party, and it is expected that the radicals will insist on some equivalent being granted to them. In that case it is stated Sir Charles Dilke, an intimate friend of Mr. Chamberlain and an avowed Republican, will receive an invitation to accept a seat in the Cabinet.

The Hopes Entertained by Irishmen of Further Government concessions to their unhappy land have been rudely shaken by the new acquisition to the administration. Lord Derby in a speech delivered on December 13th showed that however he may have changed his opinions on general matters of policy he is not in accord with the majority of his new colleagues on Irish questions. He said his personal opinion was that some millions spent in promoting emigration from Ireland would be a profitable expenditure. He believed that in a few years, despite the land act, small tenants in Ireland would be just as dependent as ever on the forbearance of landlords. Thus the old difficulties would recur. But he thought the government should abstain from encouraging fresh, large proposals for legislation in regard to Irish land. The Government should refuse to listen for an hour to the claim for Irish nationality in whatever disguise it is presented. An Irish Parliament would lead to separation as certainly as two and two make four. If we do not want this to become a practical question, he said, we must be careful to avoid giving vague pledges which will be construed to mean more than they do. Lord Derby's scheme for facilitating the exit of the Irish from Ireland is not new. The money so expended might be profitably spent, but the Irish people believe that the landlords would have the profit. The idea is not likely to be popular either in Ireland or America.

The Possibility of a War Between France and China is among the rumors current in Europe. France puts herself forward as the defender of the Roman Catholic missionaries in China, and seems desirous of coming into collision with the Chinese, whom it is not thought difficult to defeat. The Chinese are busy in preparations to resist the pretensions of France. It has been observed that the French have no particular interests at stake in China, except that of protection of the Catholic Church. Other European powers, however, who are interested commercially in China would undoubtedly regard with suspicion French interference in that country and would probably render the Chinese powerful aid.

The Mental Condition of the Sultan of Turkey continues to excite the alarm of those about his person. A cable despatch to the New York Sun states that he is in constant dread of assassination, and that he goes about armed with revolvers which he is totally unfit to carry. It is reported that very recently he fired at and killed an attendant whom he observed thrust his hand into his bosom. When the person of the dead man was searched it was found that he was giving to present a petition to the Sultan for a few days' vacation, and was about to withdraw it from his breast when the Sultan supposed he was drawing a pistol.

Sedition is rife on every side of the Sultan. The army is full of dismissals and disaffection, the popular discontent is loudly expressed, and affairs at Constantinople present the aspect which usually indicates the approach of a violent transition. The most extraordinary precautions against assassination are taken at the palace. No one is admitted to the palace, and the Sultan goes out only on Fridays, when he is conducted to the mosque in his French bomb-proof carriage.

A Large Portion of the City of Kingston, Jamaica, has been destroyed by a fire which broke out on the morning of December 11th, and raged for three days before it was extinguished. The fire, which was of incendiary origin, began in a quantity of shingles in a lumber yard, and, as a high wind prevailed, immediately gained great proportions. All the warehouses, wharves, and four hundred stores were consumed. Buildings regarded as fireproof did not escape destruction, as nearly every one of that class which the fire attacked succumbed to the flames. Five persons are known to have been burned to death. The burned district included most of the warehouses in the city, which at this time of the year hold large stocks of provisions and other goods, including sugar, coffee, spices, and pimento, awaiting shipment to the New York market. Most of the buildings destroyed were built of stone or brick. The portion of the city devoted to residences was not reached by the flames. The principal losers will undoubtedly be the merchants, who have laid in large stocks of goods for the Christmas season. The loss is estimated at $15,000,000.

The State of Switzerland is Described by a writer in the London Record as rapidly deteriorating. He says: "There is a sad increase of crime, and a sad decrease of social prosperity. Theft is becoming very common, murder not uncommon, while mendicancy is a perfect pest. The soil is largely owned by peasant proprietors, and these proprietors have exceptional advantages in farming, but almost all these peasant proprietors are head over ears in debt, so much so that it is even now a question what public measures can be taken for their relief. This state of impecuniosity may be attributed to many causes, but probably the true cause is the steady declension from the old simplicity of life, and the gradual introduction of luxury and self-indulgence into every class. But there are other causes at work, one of which no doubt is the evils attendant on the influx of an ever-increasing number of tourists, who are perhaps responsible in a certain degree for the introduction of new habits, and new vices; for instance the habit of intemperance has followed only too surely on the track of the stranger, and the lavish gifts which are easily obtainable from wealthy visitors seem to have seriously affected the national character."

Jews in Considerable Numbers are Flocking to Jerusalem from Russia, Germany, and other lands in spite of obstacles placed in their way by the Turkish Government. Many who were not allowed to disembark at Jaffa travel the long overland route from Beyrout, meeting with great hardships and experiencing what must have been more grievous, namely, the inhospitable conduct of their co-religionists at Safed. Arrived at Jerusalem their troubles do not end, their brethren could or would not afford them any help, and but for Christian charity they must sooner or later perish from famine or despair. The assistance they receive is and has always been rendered them freely at their own solicitation, and not as a bribe to induce them to pretend a profession of Christianity. The agents of the English Mission are at present in great perplexity as to where to secure suitable winter lodgings for their protégés. Applications for help have been received from the body of refugees at Jaffa, who finding themselves abandoned by their own brethren, turn in their hour of trial to those whom they had been accustomed to regard as heathens or apostates. This is a significant fact.

A Desponding Forecast of Egyptian Affairs is made by the distinguished traveller, Captain Richard F. Burton, who said recently to the correspondent of an American journal: "I have never seen a population more discontented and dissatisfied than the Egyptians to-day. Should the English troops leave the country every European in Egypt would be tortured and massacred. In villages not ten miles from Tel-el-Kebir I saw Egyptians spit upon the ground the moment any European passed by. They have been so excited by religious teachings that at least another generation must elapse before Europeans can live in the country and not be subjected to sudden outbreaks of fanaticism. They are incapable of reasoning, and their fanaticism would make them believe that any benefits they might enjoy resulted, not from the English rule, but rather in spite of English rule. It is difficult to see any course for England to pursue other than to practically annex the country. Whether or not international etiquette requires annexation to be termed a "protectorate" matters but little. If England do not take the bull by the horns and govern Egypt you may depend upon it some other nation will do it, for history has pretty well proved that the Egyptians cannot govern themselves, and Western industry has taken root in the country and cannot be left to Oriental decay and destruction."

Messrs. Moody and Sankey Concluded their brief mission at Southampton on December 6th. Their visit will be long remembered, and its results give much gratification to those who are praying and laboring for the extension of Christ's kingdom among men. It was arranged that they should the following day begin a five days' campaign at Portsmouth, where great preparations were made to give the evangelists a cordial welcome, and the most sanguine anticipations were cherished as to the blessing which it was hoped would accompany and crown their work in the famous English garrison town where large numbers of soldiers and sailors are stationed. The work of the American evangelists at Oxford and Cambridge was blessed even more signally than was at first supposed, and eminent English evangelists, among whom is the son-in-law, of the ex-Lord High Chancellor, are continuing, the meetings commenced by Messrs. Moody and Sankey. The correspondent of an English journal commenting on the work at Cambridge says: "Mr. Moody made, in some unlikely quarters an extraordinary impression. A well-known senior member of the University, of advanced liberal views in religion, described him to a friend of mine as 'the most eloquent man he had ever heard.' More than 200 members of the university (I have seen the list) sent their cards in to Mr. Moody in token of having received spiritual help."

A Soldier's Premonition.—At a recent meeting at a sailors' mission in England, a Royal Marine, with tears in his eyes, told of a young comrade and bosom friend, an earnest Gospel temperance man, with whom he went into the battle of Tel-el-Kebir. "Give me your hand, comrade," said the young fellow. "I feel in my heart that I shall not come out of this battle alive, but all is right; Jesus is with me." They made the charge, and in a few moments, throwing up his arms, he fell dead, with a bullet through his head. He felt that that day would close his mortal warfare, and that he would go home to God. He was quite ready, however, for he was simply relying upon the finished work of Christ for salvation.

An Illustrated Work on the Unfulfilled prophecies of the Bible, by the Rev. M. Baxter, entitled: "Forty Coming Wonders," may be had from the office of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, 63 Bible House, New York, by remitting one dollar. It is a book of 528 pages, is handsomely bound in cloth and contains fifty full-page pictures and diagrams representing the scenes described in the prophecies of Daniel and in the book of the Revelation. It also contains a resumé of the opinions of other expositors and extracts carefully collated from the works of all the most eminent writers on prophecy, from the earliest ages of the Christian era down to those of recent date. It thus forms the most useful and complete guide the student can have in entering on the study of that portion of the Word of God. The book may also be obtained for one dollar from any bookseller, who can procure it from the American News Company.

The Rt. Hon. EARL CAIRNS—The New Palace of Justice in London, Opened by QUEEN VICTORIA on Dec. 4.

THE RIGHT HON. LORD CAIRNS.

Ancestry—Education—Called to the Bar—Returned to Parliament—Speeches—Honors Attained—His Philanthropy—His Support of Dr. Barnardo's Work.

THE name naturally associated with the opening of the magnificent pile of buildings, a picture of which appears this week on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD, is that of the Lord High Chancellor of England, the highest legal functionary in the kingdom. The present holder of that office is Earl Selborne, whose eminent Christian character is as well known as his legal ability. He is the author of a book of hymns and has all through his life been a Sunday-school teacher. His portrait and a sketch of his life having appeared recently in this journal (on February 2d last), we associate with the picture of the Palace of Justice, the portrait of his predecessor, a man also eminently distinguished for piety.

One of the official appellations of the Lord Chancellor is that of "Keeper of the Queen's Conscience." The epithet had its origin in the functions exercised by the court over which the Lord Chancellor presides. It is established for the benefit of people whose wrongs cannot be rectified by any existing law. In some cases they are wrongs for which no remedy is provided by statute. In other cases they are exceptional conditions in which a law beneficial in the majority of cases would in theirs, operate to produce a manifest injustice. For such cases "equity judges" are permitted to exercise discretion and to decide according to right rather than according to law. Hence the title, "Keeper of the Queen's Conscience." Were it possible for Her Majesty's conscience really to be in the keeping of another, there are few men in whom the British nation could repose fuller confidence than the distinguished peer who, a few years ago, sustained that official prerogative and Lord Selborne, the present holder of the exalted position.

Lord Cairns has obtained high and well-deserved honors both as a skilful lawyer and a sagacious statesman; and as a humble, devoted Christian and untiring philanthropist his praises are echoed on all sides as well as by the opposite political party.

Nor need this be wondered at, for in his case the dignity of the highest legal and parliamentary status is gracefully supplemented by a rare nobility of personal worth and trophies won in fields of lowly and unobtrusive labor, to which the learned and the great do not frequently aspire.

ANCESTRY AND EDUCATION.

His lordship, Hugh MacCalmont Cairns, is an Irishman. He is the second son of the late William Cairns, Esq., of Cultra, County Down, Ireland, and was born in the year 1819. He is now sixty-three years old. He was educated at Trinity College, Dublin, where he took first honors in classics, and also won other brilliant academical distinctions.

In January 1844, he was called to the Bar at the Middle Temple, London, and rapidly attained an extensive and lucrative practice, as well as a high reputation as a barrister in the Courts of Equity.

The sterling character and splendid talents of the rapidly rising young lawyer early rendered him conspicuous as a man likely to do valuable service, and it was not surprising, therefore, that in July, 1852, he was elected to Parliament as one of the members for Belfast in the Conservative interest, and continued to represent that city until his elevation to the judicial bench in October 1866. He had been previously made a Queen's Counsel in 1856, and was knighted as Sir Hugh Cairns in 1858, when he was appointed Solicitor-General.

PARLIAMENTARY HONORS.

His speeches in Parliament were characterized by a ready eloquence, a persuasive manner, and the barrister's special faculty of throwing himself heart and soul into the business of the time, whatever it might be. As a natural consequence he speedily became one of the most useful Conservative members of the House of Commons.

The defeat and resignation of Lord Derby's Government in June 1859, brought his short tenure of office as Solicitor-General to a close; but he had proved himself one of the ablest and most useful men of his party, and had made his mark so firmly and distinctly that the unprecedented rapidity with which he afterward rose to the supremest honors in the State followed almost as a matter of course.

On the return of Lord Derby to power in June 1866, he was appointed Attorney-General; in the February of 1867 was elevated to the peerage as Baron Cairns of Garmoye, in the county of Antrim; and in February 1868, became Lord High Chancellor, an office which he continued to hold until the resignation of Mr. Disraeli's Ministry in December of the same year, and to which he was reappointed in February 1874, on the return of the Conservatives to power.

Other honors also came thick upon him. In 1862 he was made LL.D. of Cambridge; in 1863 Oxford conferred on him the degree of D.C.L.; in 1867 he was elected Chancellor of the University of Dublin; and in September 1878, he was created a Viscount and Earl. His public career affords, indeed, perhaps as striking an instance of rapid advancement as British history of recent years supplies.

PHILANTHROPIC AND RELIGIOUS WORK.

His lordship has thus not only deservedly won the highest place of legal distinction which the nation has to offer, but he has also done noble service as a Christian worker and devoted philanthropist. During the memorable visit of Messrs. Moody and Sankey, in 1875, he took a deep and sympathetic interest in their work, and expressed the most favorable opinion of Mr. Moody's Gospel discourses. When at his seat in Scotland, he conducts a religious service, and either reads a sermon or delivers an address to his servants and neighbors on Sunday evenings. His personal service in Sabbath-school enterprise is proverbial.

An eminent writer says of him: "Lord Cairns is not only a great man; he justly claims and richly merits the higher appellation of a good man. To brilliancy of intellectual powers, remarkable legal acumen, and never-failing industry and perseverance, we must, in estimating his character, add the nobler elevation which springs from the consecration of his powers to the service of God and the best welfare of his fellow-creatures. He is in every respect a ready man—and emphatically 'ready to all good works.' We have heard that on receiving the Great Seal as Lord Chancellor, it was remarked to him by a friend, 'You will no longer be able to take your Sunday class,' when he immediately rejoined (as if no reason could be assigned for withdrawal from the work in which the Master delighted—'feeding the lambs'), 'Why not?'"

HIS SUPPORT OF PHILANTHROPIC WORK.

To this hour he is officially identified with the great work so ably superintended by Dr. Barnardo, in the East of London; and his speech as chairman of the annual meeting, in June 1878, showed how absorbing was his interest in this and kindred work of a Christian philanthropic character.

Since the retirement of Lord Cairns with his party from office, his legal functions are confined to the hearing of appeals to the highest court of the realm, a duty performed in consideration of an annual pension of $25,000 which in England is paid for life to all who have held the high office of Lord Chancellor. As a liberal contributor to charitable institutions and as an active personal worker in the cause of Christ, Lord Cairns occupies an eminent position in the esteem of the Christian public of Great Britain.

THE PALACE OF JUSTICE.

THE new law courts of the city of London, a picture of which appears on the first page of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD are thus described by the London Times: The new law courts are situated in the Strand, near Temple Bar. They are grouped round a central hall, but considerably above its level. The hall is entered from the Strand under an elaborate Gothic arch, supported by columns of polished Aberdeen granite, red and gray. Above is scroll work and a series of busts, which remind the visitor of the great portal of Amiens Cathedral. These faces carved in stone represent the sages of the common law, justiciars and chief justices of England, the great judge who rebuked the King's son among them, while high above, on the gables of the two courts to the left and right, stand statues of Solomon and Alfred.

The central and highest figure, in a line with the summit of the entrance arch but far above it, is that of the Saviour. The great vestibule beyond the arch is flanked by rooms called arbitration rooms, fireproof apartments, as dark and dreary as Faust's study; but the vestibule itself is lofty and magnificent, with a fine groined roof, supported by polished marble pillars.

From the inner vestibule spring staircases on either side, which lead to the southern gallery, a singularly massive piece of workmanship, remarkable for the science with which it is supported on great corbels. Under a fine iron grille the way is made into the great hall, 230 feet in length, 40 feet wide, 80 feet high, with a groined stone ceiling.

The remarkable length of the hall makes it look narrow to eyes accustomed to Westminster and Guildhall; it resembles the nave of Salisbury Cathedral or the long chapels at Windsor and King's College, Cambridge, rather than any building raised for secular purposes with which ordinary Englishmen are acquainted. The lofty windows are ornamented with shields, which bear the arms of the Chancellors from the earliest times to that of Lord Selborne.

Beneath the windows are broad squares of stone on which the judicial history of the country has yet to be emblazoned in fresco, and beneath this is an arcade in gray Purbeck stone, with yellow stone from the Jura between the gray. Seats are to be placed below the arches. The windows terminate above with traceried heads, and a scrolled cornice runs between these and the roof. The floor of the hall is a mosaic pavement. Four elaborate arched portals on each side lead out of the great hall. The scrollwork in the archivolt of each in stone is different, the tympana the same. These gates, each of which will have a janitor, are the witnesses' entrance to the several courts; the rooms for witnesses in waiting are level with the floor of the hall, separate rooms for male and female witnesses. From the waiting rooms witnesses go up by stairs to the courts.

The jury approach the scene of their duties by quite different means of access. Two entrances, one on each side, in the middle of the hall, give the jurors access to four of the courts. The others are reached by stairs at the end of the hall. Ingenious precautions are taken to prevent the jurors from finding it necessary to pass near the witnesses and parties.

The public come in from the Strand on the south and Carey Street on the north by towers containing steps which lead to the public gallery in each court without passing through the hall. Small spiral staircases have been built for service, and special entrances, stairs and corridors in a crescendo scale of magnificence are provided for solicitors, barristers, and the judges. All the entrances from the hall are closed by iron gates.

THE NUMBER OF ROOMS.

There are barristers' dining and coffee-rooms; a refreshment-room for solicitors, witnesses, and jurors; another for officials, and buffets in the corridors, the total length of which in the building is close upon two miles and a half. Some idea of the business to be done in connection with these courts may be gathered from the fact that there are 750 numbered rooms, independent of the courts on either side of the Great Hall. The refreshment-rooms are on the basement, and partake of the semi-monastic gloom of the crypt; but, as there is a great difference in the levels, they are still higher than the Strand roadway.

The edifice which has been more than twelve years in building was opened on December 4th.

THE OPENING CEREMONY was of a very imposing character. It was conducted by Queen Victoria in person, who drove in state from Buckingham Palace to the new edifice. The Prince and Princess of Wales participated in the ceremony. Thousands of persons assembled along the route of the the royal procession which consisted of the Queen, Princesses Christian and Beatrice, the court officials and a large escort. All the judges had previously proceeded in state from Westminster to await, with the Prince and Princess of Wales, the arrival of the Queen. Mr. Lowell, the United States Minister, and all the diplomats and Cabinet Ministers and other officials were present at the ceremony. Lord Selborne, the Lord High Chancellor, was created an earl in honor of the event. The last act before the handing of the courts over to the legal authorities was a two hours' search similar to that which has always been made since the gunpowder plot, before the opening of Parliament.

When the procession had divided right and left on the dais the Chief Commissioner of Works, holding a large steel key on a small velvet cushion, bowed low, and begged her Majesty's acceptance of it. He then knelt and presented it. Her Majesty, assisted by the Home Secretary, took the cushion and the key upon it, and passed it over to the Lord Chancellor, who stood on the right, near the front of the dais, and who received it kneeling. In a clear, firm voice her Majesty expressed a hope that in the future, as in the past, the courts of justice of this realm would prove the chief safety of her crown and the palladium of the liberties of her people.

LORD SELBORNE'S SPEECH.

The Lord Chancellor then addressed her Majesty on behalf of the assembled judges. He accepted the charge, and after assuring her Majesty of the devotion of her judges to her throne and person, proceeded to refer in feeling terms to the death of the architect of the building, and then to the loss of the Archbishop, paying a warm tribute of appreciation to her Majesty's depth of sympathy. This hall, he said, would not, like that at Westminster, have long historic traditions, but it would be associated with the name of her Majesty and her beneficent reign. He, with the judges associated with him, had endeavored to fulfil the great duties entrusted to them with zeal and fairness and impartiality, in the fear of God and without fear of man. Long might her Majesty live to shed fresh lustre upon a throne founded in love, sustained by justice, and established in the hearts of her people. The Archbishop of York then read a dedicatory prayer, after which Sir Wm. Harcourt, first speaking with her Majesty, said in a loud voice, "I have the command of her Majesty to declare this building open." This was followed by a loud flourish from four royal trumpets posted in the gallery over the dais, and the opening of the Royal Courts of Justice was then an accomplished fact.

THE CLEANSING BLOOD.

A Sermon by Dr. Talmage.*

"The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin."—I John 1: 7.

NINETEEN centuries ago there lived one Jesus, whose personal appearance Publius Lentulus, in his letter to the Roman Senate, described as being rather tall of stature. He says that Christ's hair was the color of chestnut full ripe, that it was parted in the middle, that the Saviour wore it plain down to the ears, and from thence it floated down in curls over the shoulders; that the angles of the nostrils and the lip were so perfect that nothing on earth could be compared to them; that His eye was gray and clear and calm; and in personal appearance He was the most attractive man the world had ever seen. So says Publius Lentulus, in substance, in his letter to the Roman Senate.

This man must die: He has been sentenced. It is said that on a plate, was discovered some time ago—a death-warrant signed by Zerubbabel, Raphael Rabboni, Daniel, and Caput. Some other men destined to the scaffold have sometimes been arrested by the mob on the way and carried off in triumph in spite of the police; but there was no attempt to take Christ from the custody of the officers. The mob was against Him, the city authorities were against Him, and all the empire was against Him, except a few humble men and women.

THE DEATH-WARRANT OF CHRIST,

From 9 A.M. until 3 P.M. Jesus hung a-dying. There is nothing so thrilling as the sight of human blood. The cry of a child in the street does not so much touch us as the crimson drop from its lips. When we see signs of blood, we say, "What tragedy's been committed here? Whose life has been taken?"

"THIS IS BLOOD!"

My text gives in one word a glimpse of that last moment. You see the blood dropping from the nails and the cross, blood suffusing the face, blood saturating the garments, blood gathered in pools beneath the cross.

There is just one word in the text that arouses my faith, and stirs the deepest emotion of my heart. It is not the tears of Christ, not the perspiration of Christ, not the fatigues of Christ, but the blood of Jesus Christ His Son, which cleanseth from all sin. I know there are people who say they don't believe in the Christian religion, because it is a system of carnage. They don't believe in such a sacrifice; they don't want a religion with any blood in it. Well, my friend, if so, you will have to go without any Bible religion; you will have to do without pardon. For without the shedding of blood there is no remission of sin.

No blood, no sacrifice; no blood, no atonement; no blood, no pardon; no blood, no heaven. Others may despise this Christian religion because there is in it this crimson sacrifice, but I rejoice in it; and when, at the close of the meeting, I give out the hymn by Cowper, this whole audience, I am certain, will join in with great pathos and enthusiasm:

"There is a fountain filled with blood,
Drawn from Immanuel's veins,
And sinners plunged beneath that flood Lose all their guilty stains."

Blessed be God for this religion of blood. My father believed in it, my mother believed in it, we all believe in it, I hope, to-night. And may that sacrifice, that divine sacrifice, that blood shed on Calvary, atone for all our sins, so that at the close of this service, instead of there being two parties, as there are now, the children of God and the children of the world, there shall be only one great party—the friends, the disciples, the worshippers of the Lord Jesus Christ. Master, help. "The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin."

I. I remark, in the first place, in regard to this blood spoken of in the text, that it was

ROYAL BLOOD.

There are democratic preferences. We may affect to despise claimants to regal pretensions, but if we should find the son of a king traversing one of our streets, our deepest interest would be aroused. When the Prince of Wales went through this country a few years ago, the people turned out en masse, hundreds of thousands of people turned out just to look upon the son of a queen. People have been proud of royal blood in their veins, such as the blood of the house of Stuart or Hapsburg, because it was royal blood.

But the blood of which I speak to-night is the blood of the Son of God; it is royal blood; it is the blood of the King of the Universe. Henry was so honored a name in England, that it was given from one throne to another, and from one reign to another, and it was Henry I., Henry II., Henry III., and so on to Henry VIII. Louis was so popular a name in France, it was handed from throne to throne, and from reign to reign, and it was Louis I., Louis II., Louis III., and so on to Louis XVI.

But in this royal line it is Christ the first and Christ the last. No one shall ever have His name. He took His throne long before the throne of Austria or Russia was established—King eternal, immortal, invisible, the only wise God. Sometimes the physical health in the royal line degenerates, and kings become almost imbecile and idiotic, and their blood becomes thin and watery through sinful indulgence; but the royal blood of which I speak to-night has in it the health and virtue of Divine Immortality.

II. I remark further, in regard to this blood spoken of in my text, that it is not only royal blood, but it is

HUMAN BLOOD.

The King is dying. Some of you may remember twenty-five years ago when Nicholas, the Czar of Russia, died. At that period despatches came every hour out from the palace; and the flag signalled by day, and the telegraph flashed the news all over the land, all through the world, "the Czar is better," "the Czar is worse," "the Czar slept soundly last night," "the Czar was very restless," "the Czar is dying," "the Czar is dead."

I find in the passage before me the Lord Jesus Christ is in the pangs of his last sufferings. Jesus, our King, is dying. Our King is dying. Oh, be careful how you tread around under this cross of the Son of God. It is not only the King's blood, but it is human blood. If some one of those Roman soldiers standing under the cross had just caught one drop of that blood of the Saviour, and had analyzed it, he would have found in it the same chemical elements, the same fibrine, the same albumen, as are to be found in human blood.

It was human blood, and the thought of this stirs our souls into the deepest sympathy. If it had been an angel dying there, "why," you would have said, "that is blood of some other order of being." But it was a human being, bone of our bone, flesh of our flesh, nerves just like our nerves, muscles just like our muscles, sinew just like our sinew, heart of our heart, life of our life—human, human. Oh, when we understand fully that it is not only royal blood that is spoken of in my text, but that it is human blood, all our sympathies are aroused; and we can hardly endure the scene when we hear Him cry out, "My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken Me?"

Stephen, the King of Hungary, put off his royal robes and went down among his subjects that he might benefit them; and he carried a great many jewels and treasures, and distributed them among the people. But one day the beggars and violent people of the town fell on him, and they beat that monarch almost to death. After he had recovered from his sickness and his bruises he continued the same benevolent and kindly work. But, oh, what a far more tragic and sublime scene on Calvary! Witness earth and heaven! Jesus, who came to seek and to save that which was lost, set upon and beaten, and beaten to death.

"Was it for crimes that I have done
He groaned upon the tree?
Amazing pity, grace unknown,
And love beyond degree."

III. But this blood spoken of in my text is not only royal blood and human blood, but it is

A BROTHER'S BLOOD.

If you were going along the street and you saw a perfect man maltreated, you would be indignant; but if you found out there was a great crowd of roughs around a brother of yours, and that they were trying to take his life, how you would, reckless of your own life, rush in amid the throng, and cry out to the ruffians to disperse. Well, I find in my text that this is a brother's blood. They spit on Him; they smote Him on the cheek. How does that make you feel? Your brother!

Oh, that your soul might be melted down at the thought when you see Christ on the cross, your brother dying! Don't you feel as if you could fling yourself down before that cross, and cry to Almighty God for help? feel as if you must die in the agony of your heart, if deliverance did not come to Him? He is your brother, your brother.

* Monday last being a holiday, it was impossible to insert in this number of THE CHRISTIAN HERALD the sermon Dr. Talmage preached last Sunday. Rather than delay the issue of the paper, we print an excellent evening sermon by Dr. Talmage, which has never before been published in this journal. The sermon delivered last Sunday will appear next week.—ED.

Years ago a vessel came from England to the United States, and in the course of the voyage, just off the banks of Newfoundland, the vessel sprung a leak, and it was found she must go down. There were on board that vessel one was married, the other was single. The married brother was coming to this country to meet his family, who had preceded him. As soon as it was found the vessel must go down, they cast lots as to who should get into the boat, for there was room for only one more passenger ; and the lots were drawn, and it was found out that the single brother might come ashore, while the married brother must tarry on deck and die. Then the single brother said to the married brother, "It doesn't make much difference whether I die or not ; no one would mourn very much for me. Your family are waiting for you ; they are expecting your arrival. You get into the boat and save your life."

TWO BROTHERS ;

It was some time before the persuasion was successful ; but the married brother leaped into the boat and started off home, and reached it. The other brother went down with the lost ship. Vicarious sacrifice ! Christ, our brother, died for us, going down that we might rise, dying that we might live. Oh, it is a brother's blood ; not only royal blood, but a brother's blood.

IV. I go further, and say, in regard to this blood mentioned in the text, it is SUBSTITUTIONARY BLOOD.

Our sins cried for vengeance. Either we must die or Christ. Shall it be we, or shall it be Christ? "Let it be Me," said Christ ; "I will take all their burden, I will endure their sufferings, I will die their death, I will take their stripes, I will be their ransom." "Lo, I come to do Thy will, O God."

Christ's blood paid the price, and received the pardon, and opened the gate of heaven. The blood of Paul that soaked the axe, the blood of Hugh Latimer that was scorched up in the fire, the blood of the early martyrs which reddened the mouths of the lions in the Colosseum, was worth just as much to you or to me as the blood of Christ unless His blood be expiatory and substitutionary. The blood of Jesus Christ, God's Son, alone cleanseth from all sin. That is

THE CENTRE OF OUR GOSPEL SYSTEM

—Christ the Substitute, bearing our burdens, enduring our pangs, dying our death.

There is no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus. Therefore you have these ideas—it is royal blood, and it is human blood, and it is a brother's blood, and it is substitutionary blood. Now, will you, seated just where you are, accept this blood-cleansing power? I do not ask you to come to the confessional to tell your sins and your sorrows ; but, seated just where you are, accept this blood-cleansing. "Well," you say, "for which sin?" Well, for that old sin, "Well, what do you mean?" I mean that sin you committed some time ago ; a sin that probably troubles you very much, that has given you a great deal of restlessness ; that sin has tormented you, perhaps, more than all the other sins of your life, and you say to-night if you could get rid of that sin you would be a happy man, you would be a happy woman.

Now, I come to tell you how you may get rid of THAT PARTICULAR SIN.

I do not know what it was—God and your own soul only knows ; but this night the blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin, and therefore from that one. But there are some sins more aggravated than others. If a child unwittingly does wrong you excuse it ; but when you do wrong, it is not unwittingly. Every time we sin there is something in our souls that sounds the death-knell. Now there may be in this house hundreds of backsliders, men and women who once came to God, sat at the holy communion, knelt in the closet of prayer, and seemed as if they were on the road to heaven ; perhaps were illustrious in some Christian church.

There are, perhaps, in this audience hundreds of people who were really frank and honest. The Lord heard their expressions for divine love and mercy while they were kneeling at the altar of prayer or seated at the holy communion. When one such goes away, oh, how far he goes ! It is hard for you to get back, my brother, my sister, I know, I know, I know all about it. But to-night. But you say, "I must go over a long series of repentances ; I must get quit of this habit and that habit ; and I must be weeks and months getting my spiritual nature entirely reconstructed." You must come as a lost, perishing, guilty sinner to Christ, crying as Bartimeus did, "Thou Son of David, have mercy on me." Believe truly in the Lord Jesus Christ, and thou shalt be saved. This understand—as soon as the blood of Jesus pardons your sins, they are pardoned ; they sink into the very depths of the sea. There is no condemnation for them that are in Christ Jesus. The blood of Jesus cleanseth from all sin—all sin.

Now, that is

to-night. Perhaps you have been hardened and worldly and selfish, and going away from God, and become a thorough backslider, and for ten years you have not been in a Christian assemblage. The Lord brought you in here to-night. Perhaps some one casually invited you to come, or, passing along the street, you said, "I will just go in and pass an hour," and you thought it merely incidental or accidental. But the Lord brought you in, and I am here to tell you that now, this night, nay, this moment, you may find the peace of the Gospel—"The blood of Jesus Christ cleanseth from all sin."

"But," says some one,

"I AM A MORAL MAN ;

I am not a sinner. It is very well for you to speak so to sinners, but I cannot take this counsel ; I am a moral man. I never took any one's life ; I am not a murderer." My brother, did you ever hate any one? "Yes," you say. Then you are a murderer. For the Bible says, "If any man hateth his brother, he is a murderer."

"But," you say, "I never took anybody else's property." Well, I do not say that you ever abstracted funds that didn't belong to you from your fellow-man, but have you ever taken from God the days and months and years that didn't belong to you, and given them to your own service when they should have been given to God's service? Have you robbed God? Now you can see this hand as well as that. And just so the sin of the heart and the sin of the life are plain before God. He sees the sin of the heart just as plainly as He sees the sin of the life ; and if you do wrong He knows it ; and He knows the desires of the heart, the reveries of the soul. They prove the fact that you are a sinner against God, and you need pardon ; you need it—oh ! how much you need it. Will you accept it this night—pardon for all your sins?

But there are some here yet unpardoned of their sins. Shall I blow the trumpet of the resurrection? I stamp on the ground and call up the great and they come up vaster than the hosts of Xerxes, in companies of hundreds, in regiments of thousands, in battalions of tens of thousands. They come, they come, marching, marching on. Let the larger sin of the hundred be the captain over the hundred ; let the larger sin of the thousand be the colonel over the regiment ; let the swarthiest sin of all your life long be commander over the host. And here they come, all the sins of your past life, all the unforgiven sins, tramping on, traumping on—a great host. They are all armed—just one poor man against a million.

What are you going to do? Rest? Oh, see the coming of that host. Strike it, oh lightning ! Consume that foe. The lightning goes back into the scabbard of the midnight cloud, saying, "No help in me." But behold, yonder I see a rider on a white horse. He is Conqueror. Clear the way. He is the Captain of Salvation. Swinging His sword through the darkness He says, "Make way, I am the ransom."

HE CUTS DOWN THE LEGIONS

of your unforgiven sins. He casts them into the depths of the ocean more completely than Pharaoh and his hosts were overwhelmed by the devouring waves of the Red Sea. Victory through our Lord Jesus Christ. The gates are open, the shackles broken, sins pardoned, eternal life secured. Victory for every man through Jesus Christ.

In the thirteenth century the English attempted to conquer France, and they came to the city, Calais, and they resolved to destroy it ; but after a while they sent in word that if there were in the city six men who would come out with halters c their necks, ready to be sacrificed, then the city might be saved. A great multitude was gathered in the city ; there was a death-like silence. Some one standing on a platform said, "We must have six men or our city will be destroyed. Who are they? Where are they?"

St. Pierre, the commander of the town, rose up on the platform and said, "I am one." "And another," said his son. "And I another," "and I another," until the six were all ready prepared for the sacrifice. And with their families waiting and praying about them, they were taken out of the gates of the town, and they passed over to the English army, and they were to be put to death and the city to be saved, when the Queen of England burst in upon the scene, and she begged for the life of these six men, and begged so pathetically for their deliverance that the king said, "Well I am overcome by the importunity of the queen let the six men go ; let the city be saved ; let those whose lives were to be sacrificed be saved."

Now we are all condemned to die by reason of our sins. But the Lord Jesus Christ Himself pleads for us, and with a more self-sacrificing spirit than St. Pierre, with a more self-sacrificing spirit than the Queen of England. He pleads our cause and He says, "Let them go free. I will be the ransom, I will be the ransom." Oh, that God by His Holy Spirit would impress upon you, my hearer, to-night, the fact that a great atonement has been made ; that for you that royal blood, and human blood, and brother's blood, and substitutionary blood has been shed ; that all who will may come and be saved. O Lord ! help the people to come.

THE MOST SOLEMN MOMENT

of the Sabbath-day is the closing of one of these services. I meet a great multitude of men and women here to-night whom I shall never see again. We have just hailed each other on the ocean of life, and pass on. But we shall meet in the judgment. What shall be the history of this service? Will it be found that through any cowardice or lack of earnestness or zeal on my part that any man goes away unimpressed with the truth, and any one shall say he is not invited to Christ's waters. "Ho, every one that thirsteth come ye to the waters." "Whosoever will, let him come." "Let the wicked forsake his way, and the unrighteous man his thoughts, and let him return unto the Lord, who will have mercy, and unto our God, who will abundantly pardon."

It is a glorious Gospel to offer. It is so full of earnestness, sweetness, and love, and power. "The Spirit and the Bride say, Come, and whosoever will let him come and take of the water of life freely." You may never have so good an opportunity to surrender your heart to the Lord as this very moment. Now is the day of salvation ; now is the night ; now is the hour ; now is the moment ; now is the second.

"To-day if you will hear His voice,
Now is the time to make your choice ;
Say, 'Will you to Mount Zion go?'
Say 'Will you have this Christ or no?'"

RETROSPECT OF THE YEAR 1882.

THE year now near its close has been for our loved land a period of tranquil prosperity. God is watched over the nation, has given to us undisturbed peace, an abundant harvest, and a prosperous condition of trade. As we have read of wars and rumors of wars in other lands, of national jealousies, of thousands of armed men withdrawn from peaceful pursuits and organized and drilled in readiness to plunge into deadly conflict at the word of their monarchs, we should be ingrates, indeed, did we not bend before the throne of the Almighty Ruler of the Universe in humble gratitude for our national blessings. He has given us glorious land, with no hostile nation on our borders, free institutions, and commercial prosperity. Whatever may have been the trials through which we may have passed as individuals, we have abundant cause as patriots to acknowledge the love and kindness of our God.

Nor can we be unmindful of the spiritual blessings which have been vouchsafed to us as a people during the year. The Holy Spirit has been at work in our midst. Those who have travelled through the States during the year have been impressed by the increased earnestness of God's people in all quarters. It is evident that there is a readiness to engage in active work for Christ on the part of Christians engaged in business or in the professions which but a few years ago, was only seen in ministers of the Gospel, and was left to them. Now, artisans, clerks, merchants, and professional men may be seen organizing movements to reach the classes who do not attend church, and they have been blessed. Such a work as that among the employes of the Baltimore and Ohio Railroad, conducted by Miss Jennie Smith, Mr. George A. Hilton, and their co-laborers, is a new and hopeful feature of Christian life and activity, and that is but one among many in other parts of the country, which are being conducted unostentatiously by private Christians and which God is blessing and blessing. Beside those is the work of the evangelists in tents, public halls, theatres, etc., of which from time to time encouraging reports are received. It becomes us to thank God for these blessings, while entreating Him to grant them to us in still greater abundance.

THE CASUALTIES

Of the year have been few, compared with those of other years, even of recent date. Sad and sorrowful as some of them were, they were less disastrous than those we have had to mourn in other times. The Sputyen Duyvil catastrophe on January 13th; the fire at the Potter Building on January 31st; the burned Steamboat Scioto, on July 5th, and the disaster to the Robert E. Lee on September 30th, were among the most serious in the loss of life involved. How near we were to a calamity, far worse than any of these, on the night when the Park Theatre, in New York, was burned only an hour or two before the time when it would have been crowded with people—only those can realize who remember the burning of the Brooklyn Theatre a few years ago.

The outbreak of yellow fever at Pensacola, Fla., and a few adjacent towns, which excited apprehensions through the country that we might be on the brink of another extended visitation of the dreaded scourge, mercifully passed away, and we could thank God that the pestilence was stayed.

THE POLITICAL EVENTS

Of the year, important as they have been, have had in them nothing in the nature of a crisis. The conflict of parties has been within the limits of the Constitution, and our institutions have not been strained by the political struggle.

The year opened amid the changes in the Cabinet, consequent on the succession of President Arthur to the seat of his lamented predecessor. In the House there was dissatisfaction with the arrangements made by the Speaker for the Committees. The people saw with regret an indisposition on the part of their Representatives to utilize the surplus in the Treasury for the relief of the nation. The River and Harbor bill, passed over the veto of the President, deepened the dissatisfaction of the public, and it grew into indignation at the oppression of the political machine was witnessed in the collection of assessments, levied by the dominant party. Then came the elections of last month, and the people exercised their right of expressing in the most effective way their resolve to have a pure and liberal government.

Other events, which have occupied a prominent place in the attention of the people during the year have been: The conclusion of the trial of the wretched creature who slew the President, and his execution; the trials of the men charged with corruption in the Postal Star Route service; the struggle with the polygamous sensualists of Utah; and the discovery of the bodies of De Long and the brave men who sought to wrest from its icy grasp the secrets of the North Pole.

IN OTHER LANDS

the course of events has not been so smooth, and peaceful. At the commencement of the year, the cloud in Egypt, then only like a man's hand, was looming on the horizon. Arabi was stirring up the revolution which eventually was put down by the strong arm of England. Those who knew the bitterness of the jealousy of the European family of nations, knew well that the course England was taking might easily provoke a war in which half Europe might have been ranged against the other half, and a general war have broken out. God mercifully averted that calamity, and the world has reason to hope that from the discipline of the past, Egypt may come forth stronger, purer, and more prosperous than before.

IRELAND

has been the most gloomy quarter of the world's horizon, and it is still under a heavy cloud. When the year opened, the men in whom the Irish people had put their trust were in prison. Murder, arson, and violence were rampant in the land. Harsh measures appeared only to increase the evil, and at length the prison doors were opened, the patriots were released, the statesmen, responsible for rigorous rule, were replaced by men notable for kindness of heart, and it seemed that a happier time was dawning on the unhappy land. Then, came the news of the barbarous murders in Phoenix Park, and the friends of Ireland trembled in expectation of acts of condign vengeance. But the critical moment passed, and the innocent were not punished for the sins of the guilty. There is yet profound discontent among the people, and crime and lawlessness are rampant. God grant that English statesmen might receive from the Giver of every good and perfect gift, the wisdom they need to guide aright the destinies of the afflicted people.

Unhappily, there are numerous and unmistakable signs in almost every country in Europe of the increase of that which prophecy warned us would characterize the closing years of this dispensation. In France, in Italy, in Germany, and especially in Russia may be heard the premonitory rumblings of the political and social earthquake which yet will shake the world. Uneducated, desperate men, organized by crafty schemers, are preparing to overturn all the institutions of government and in their place to set up a Godless system which they call liberty, but which is in reality the worst form of slavery.

THE PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS

in Russia is one of the most prominent features that will render the past year memorable. The sudden outbreak of hatred against God's ancient people took the world by surprise. The ignorant, Russian peasants turned upon the Jews with a ferocity, no cause yet assigned is sufficient to explain. Men were murdered, women outraged, and property destroyed. Thousands of the refugees claimed American hospitality, others fled to their ancient land, and others again to nearer havens. It is a marvellous, and unexpected movement, doubtless preparatory to the peopling of Palestine with the race to whom God gave the land.

THE DEATH LIST of the year is a sorrowful one. The last enemy has reaped grain that the world counted very precious. God knows that His purposes can be carried out without the aid of human talent, and that the men on whom we have relied for wisdom and guidance and encouragement can be spared. Yet while we bow our heads in humble acquiescence, it is with a sad heart that we remember how many an eloquent voice is hushed, and how many a pen, from which living words flowed to cheer and help us in the past, is laid aside forever.

Prominent among the names of those whom this year we have seen pass away are, Henry Wadsworth Longfellow, and Ralph Waldo Emerson in the world of letters; Thurlow Weed and Senator Hill and Edwin W. Stoughton in politics; Professor Draper and his son in science; Dr. George W. Musgrave, Dr. John Cotton Smith, Bishops Paine and Wightman from the pulpit, and Robert L. Stuart from philanthropic charity.

Across the Atlantic the losses have been equally heavy. Among the names of famous Europeans, whom death has laid low, are General Garibaldi, Dr. Tait, Archbishop of Canterbury, Anthony Trollope, Dr. Pusey, Dean Close, and Professor Darwin.

As we close the hasty record of the year we turn to the future with souls trusting in God whose mercy and lovingkindness are unsearchable, and who loves His people with unchanging love. May He keep us in His way and prepare our hearts for the events which are before us, known to Him, but all unknown to us.

The Statistics of Illiteracy in the Country have been issued by the Census Bureau and will cause general surprise. The census bulletin shows that of the 36,761,407 inhabitants of the United States and Territories over ten years of age, 4,923,451, or over 13 per cent were returned as unable to read. The number returned as unable to write is 6,239,958, or 17 per cent of the whole. The percentage of illiteracy is at its height in New Mexico, where it ranges from 50 to 65 per cent. In Alabama, Georgia, Louisiana, Mississippi, and the Carolinas the percentage is from 50 to 55 per cent. Iowa is afflicted with only 2.4 per cent of illiterates over the age named, and Nebraska occupies an equally enviable position.

An Imperial School Teacher.—The German

Crown Prince often visits with his wife, the village schools of Bornstedt and Eiche, near Potsdam. On November 25th he unexpectedly made his appearance at the Bornstedt school, and had hardly entered it when a messenger arrived with a telegram summoning the master (Mr. Mathias) to come to his mother then dying in a village near Spandau. The Crown Prince insisted that the master should instantly depart in obedience to the last request of his mother. "But how can I leave the children?" objected the master. "Never mind," answered the Prince, "I will take the class. Run away, and may you find your mother still alive!" Thus were the Bornstedt children examined for a whole hour in history by the heir to the throne, who possesses an intimate knowledge of the great Reformation period, and gave his pupils the benefit of it. Before leaving he promised the school a new set of Bibles, instead of the worn out copies at present in its possession.

Temperance Workers Will Find Useful Material

in the following figures which were cited in a lecture recently delivered by Mr. George A. Hilton of Washington, D.C.: During the fiscal year ending June 30th, 1882, there was produced in the United States 16,952,085 barrels of beer. The revenue derived from this enormous production is one dollar per barrel. In a barrel of beer there are five hundred drinks, which at five cents per drink amounts to $25 per barrel, or $425,000,000 that we pay for beer alone in this country in one year. That is $8.25 for every man, woman, and child in the United States. The tax paid on spirits during the year is about $67,000,000. In the State of Kentucky alone there was on the 30th of June last 62,627,210 gallons of spirits locked up in its storehouses. One year ago there were 41,000,000 gallons there, giving an increase this year of over 20,000,000 of gallons in one year. Not long ago in the Produce Exchange in New York there was sudden excitement over the discovery that there was a great shortage between the balance of corn in market and that known to have been raised, and men were asking what had become of it. This enormous production of liquor answers the question,

ANECDOTES RELATED AT MOODY AND SANKEY'S MEETINGS IN SCOTLAND.

A Dying Boy's Message.—At a Meeting of Christian workers, on November 24th, in James Morrison Street Hall, J. Campbell White said: "Every worker should do as a dear boy did whose deathbed I attended a short time ago. Just before he passed away to Jesus I asked him, 'Alec, have you any message for the class?' 'Yes,' he answered; 'tell them that I am leaning all my weight on Jesus.'"

The Day of Atonement in Russia.—At the noonday meeting on November 25th, Mr. Baron said: "When I was a boy in Russia, and the great Day of Atonement came round, we fasted truly. Not a drop of water nor a morsel of food passed our lips on that day. It was a real fast—not a pretended one. I as well as most religious Jews had always doubts in our minds about this day, and we often wished that a real lamb was sacrificed, and not a mere form gone through of doing so. It is one of the clearest proofs as to the Messiahship of Christ that since His death no lamb has been sacrificed on the Day of Atonement."

A Man in the Canal.—At the Same Meeting Mr. Isdale said: "A man fell into the canal one day, and another man leaped in to save him. Instead of at once trying to catch the struggling man, and help him ashore, he swam round and round him until the man was exhausted, and lay still in the water. Then he seized his coat and pulled him ashore. So long as the man tried to save himself, the rescuer could do nothing; but when he gave it up, he saved him. It is just so with Christ and sinners. When they leave all to Him, He saves them; but so long as they struggle to gain their salvation, He can do nothing."

Drawing out the Damper.—Mr. White Said: "When Townsend's large chimney shaft was first built, I went to see it. When looking around the premises, Mr. Townsend asked, 'Would you like to see the effect of a full draught?' 'Yes, most certainly,' I answered. 'John, draw the damper.' In less than a minute I felt the ground trembling beneath my feet, and saw the large boilers actually shaken with the force of the stream of air which passed through the furnace. What we as Christian workers have to do is to draw the damper which prevents the breathing of God's Spirit upon us, and then the ground will shake beneath the power which He will exert."

Sixty Days in Duke Street Prison.—At the Gospel Temperance Meeting in Cowcaddens on November 25th, a respectable elderly man said: "Our chairman has invited any one to testify as to whether a man can be saved from the power of strong drink. Well, I know that there is not a man in this house who has ever been so low down as I was. I will not enter into details, as they are too horrifying; but the records of the station-house on the opposite side of the street tell the melancholy story of my life up till eight years ago, when the Lord rescued me from the grip of the demon. Many say to you, 'Don't give it up at once; it will ruin your health.' My answer to that is, 'Get sixty days in Duke Street Prison, and see if you will lose your health.'"

A Message for Grandfather.—At the Meeting at Easterhouse, on November 4th, Mr. Andrews said: "There was a poor old man who lived a moral, respectable life, but was a stranger to the grace of God. A severe illness came upon him, and he was taken to the Infirmary. His granddaughter got permission to see him every day. The first day she visited him she read the Bible, and in the course of the chapter came across the words—'The blood of Jesus Christ His Son cleanseth us from all sin' (1 John 1:7). 'Read that again, lassie.' She did so. 'Are you sure that's there?' he inquired. 'I never heard it before.' 'Yes, grandpa, it is,' said the girl. 'Put my finger on the place, and read it again.' The child complied, and with tears rolling down his cheeks the old man said, 'Mary, if you find me dead on your next visit, tell all you know that I am saved and cleansed in the blood of Jesus Christ.'"

Jews in a Jeweller's Shop.—Mr. Baron Said: "About a fortnight ago I asked you to pray for the Jews of Edinburgh, to whom I was going to preach. When I went there I found a hearty welcome awaiting me: the Spirit of God was working among them, even though I had not spoken to them. In a jeweller's shop in Nicolson Street I found seven Jews. One of them, an old man, got so excited when I spoke about Jesus of Nazareth that the other Jews had to carry him out. There were then six left to speak to, and they received my message willingly. The first question put to me by the Jews is always, 'Have you seen the Rabbi?' If I have not, then they will not listen, but if I have they listen and speak with me. When I called upon the Rabbi in Edinburgh, I found him to be the most intelligent Rabbi in Scotland. He is not an orthodox Jew; and before I spoke with him, he was a disbeliever in God, but since then he says that he believes the Bible to be inspired by the Holy Spirit."

A Cask of Bitter Beer Afloat.—Captain Hatfield also said: "The last ship I ever commanded was the largest sailing ship ever built. She was called the Great Republic, of 3500 tons register. On one occasion, during a voyage to Callao, one of my sailors going up the rigging, cried out, 'Boat ahead, sir.' I went up with my spy-glass to see if there really was a boat. Sure enough, there really was an object which seemed like a small boat. To save life, I at once sent off a boat to the rescue of the perishing. I watched until it got alongside the object, and then had to attend to some other duty. When we came alongside, we saw that the men were engaged in a very energetic way. It was a cask of bitter beer which they found. The men had taken out the bung, and with the bailing dish had baled the beer out of the cask into their own bodies. I had to hoist every man of them on board with a block and tackle, as though they were so many sheep, so drunk were they. I hope the lecturing I gave them afterward was blessed of God to some of them."

A Dyke Washed Away.—At a Recent Gospel Temperance meeting in Cowcaddens the Rev. Mr. Fullarton said: "When I was a boy I lived in a house near to which there was a running stream. One day my companions and myself determined to dam the stream. We set to work, and with our spades cut turf which we put right into the stream, and for a moment or two the water was stopped; but shortly we saw our dyke break first here and then there, and at last it was washed all away. When I was first anxious about my soul, I tried to make myself good with all my might. I put a turf in here and another there, and prayed earnestly and long; but the stream of worldly thought which came into my mind with greater force when on my knees than at any other time showed that I was simply a hypocrite. Not till I gave up trying to stop the evil stream of my life did I find peace. I asked Christ to cleanse my thoughts and to make me pure. The peace then came as gently and calmly as a dove nestling over her young."

Both Different, But Alike.—At a Gospel Temperance Meeting at Cowcaddens, Major Colquhoun remarked: "A man said to me the other night in this church, 'I have often prayed to the Lord to save me—ay, I have prayed long and earnestly; but He has not yet saved me.' 'I suppose you are waiting for some great and particular revelation to come to you?' I inquired. 'Yes; I expect that God will do something which will let me know that I am saved,' was his answer. 'Well, you are wrong; the only way is God's way, and He has already done all that is needed. Accept a free pardon, and follow Jesus. Will you do it?' 'No, I cannot see it in that light.' Another man sitting beside me said, 'I also have often and often prayed to be saved, and He has not heard me; but when the drink is out of my head to-night I will think better and more of what you say. It is hard to give up the drink though.' Now, both these men were wrong; one wanted some special feeling or sudden revulsion of thought, the other wanted to cling to his sin, but the Gospel was too plain for them both."

Startling a Young Lady.—At the Noonday meeting on November 22d the Rev. Dr. Ferguson said: "When I was a very young man, and in fellowship with the Congregational Church, under the ministry of the Rev. Dr. Wardlaw, a young lady, daughter of one of our deacons, applied for admission to the membership of the church. The committee appointed to visit her, according to the custom of that community, felt rather afraid to act, fearing that a fashionable young lady, fresh from an English boarding-school would not have much, if any, experience of saving grace, and that they would have to do all the talking on that subject. Very agreeably were they surprised, for she was eloquent in the praises of Christ. They were pleased to sit and let her talk. A few Sundays previously her pastor said in his sermon that 'Any one who did not accept Christ and follow Him, even although they lived good, amiable, moral lives, was a very great sinner.' This plain statement so startled her that she made a study of the Bible to see for herself, and was awakened to a deep conviction of her need for a Saviour, whom happily she sought and found."

GROWING RADICALISM: A SIGN OF THE END.

THE years at hand—even now commenced—are shown in prophecy to be pregnant with events more important than any that are passed; for, excepting the first thirty-three years of this era, when Christ lived, died, and rose from the grave, none will have been so momentous.

The revelation given to us through John the Apostle shows how big with evil days are the last years of this age—days wherein atheism, and Antichrist and his followers, will fulminate defiance against the Lord of Hosts; when Satan and his fiends, having but a short space of freedom, will use their strongest endeavors to turn the created in impotent rage against the Creator, and force them to commit the unpardonable sin by uttering every gross and conceivable blasphemy against the Holy Ghost. They will be days of God's wrath upon the nations and rulers of the earth in punishment for their iniquity.

With this very year, 1882, according to the chronology of the Great Pyramid, we commence the Antichristian epoch, and already, like distant thunder, the preparation of coming battle is heard. The social, religious, and political liberties so hardly striven for, so dearly gained, contain within themselves the seeds of direful forces which will issue forth with destructive and overwhelming energy, as vials of wrath at the command of Omnipotence.

How essential, therefore—so that Christians may be ever upon their watch-tower looking for the "signs of the end," that their faith droop not, nor their hopes die—how essential that any new method of interpretation connected with those "signs" should be approached without prejudice for a calm and careful study. And seeing that there is sound reason for believing the Pyramid to have been constructed under Divine direction, for the instruction of man in the last days, its voice should be reverently listened to and its teachings taken to heart.

In writing of our political, social, and religious liberties, as containing seeds of discord and evil, the liberties themselves are not condemned. They are blessings when rightly used, evils when abused. Is not the world's history undying evidence to the truth of this opinion? Has not innate sin always marred and spoiled, so that good has become bad, beauty transformed into ugliness, harmony changed to discord, the child of peace become the man of war, and innocence turned into corruption? In just such a manner are the blessings of social and political liberty being fashioned by designing, crafty, and ambitious men into what will ultimately, under Satan's permitted power, bear fruit in curses. The upas-tree grows rapidly; it is already commencing to taint the atmosphere with its deadly poison of lawlessness.

A straw in the wind to show this tendency of society and politics, is the recent publication of a work entitled "The Coming Democracy," in which it is maintained that the force of circumstances will eventually drive all power into the hands of the lower classes. It does not require much astuteness to perceive that the entrance of democracy or socialism, however fair a face may be put upon the name, and however plausibly its claims may be advocated, will grant many an opportunity for the foul spirit of disorder to wriggle in.

With regard to the blasphemous propensities of the nations of the earth in the last days, we have not far to look. Has not the small cloud of atheism been discerned for some time upon our horizon? Is it not rapidly enlarging, and will it not ere long overspread the entire firmament; so that, when the storm bursts, blackness and despair will shut out the nations of the earth from hope of God's mercy?

And this state of things, we know from the pages of Revelation and the other books of prophecy, will continue until the end, growing in intensity, accumulating in force, concentrating to a head, until the times of Antichrist, when he will become all that is devilish, a centre of all that is antagonistic to God and His government.

THE ASCENDING LORD.

S. S. Lesson for January 7. Acts 1:14. Golden Text, Ps. 68:18. By Mrs. M. Baxter.

The Commission—The Source of Power—First the Deed, then the Teaching—The Baptism Promised—Mistakes about the Baptism—The Disciples' Misunderstanding of Prophecy—The Witnesses to Jesus—Not to Experience—Not a Dying Charge—The Hope of the Church—The Pledge of the Gift—The Ascended Christ a Living Reality.

OUR beloved Lord had called His little band of disciples to a task from which the strongest, wisest, and most influential of men might well have shrunk back. These poor, illiterate men were charged to "go into all the world and to preach the Gospel to every creature." The very men who had forsaken Him and fled in the hour of His apprehension, the very women who had followed Him "afar off," received this commission to do a supernatural work. Was Jesus mocking them? Oh, never; for He said, "All power is given unto Me in heaven and in earth,

GO YE THEREFORE."

(Matt. 28:18, 19.) That which cripples and paralyzes men and women of God, is the miserable temptation to look within for power, and then in the consciousness of their incapacity to say that the call of God is too great and too high for them. Thank God, when we put our will at His disposal, He puts His power at our disposal. Our lesson for to-day treats of the inducement with power from on high which our Lord promised His disciples.

"Luke, the beloved physician" (Col. 4:14), the evangelist who enters more into the detail of the Lord's works of healing than any other, writes thus to his friend Theophilus, (the lover of God): "The former treatise" (the Gospel of Luke) "have I made, O Theophilus, of all that Jesus began both to do and teach." "Jesus began:" Who shall finish what Jesus began? The Holy Ghost, and the Holy Ghost dwelling in redeemed and consecrated man. Jesus began "both to do and teach." He did first that which He afterward taught. His life was beforehand with His words. Does He call us to be "poor in spirit," to "resist not evil"? He who made the world, and bore uncomplainingly the rejection of that world, and then died to save the world, He has taken the lead in this nobility, this true heroism of endurance. He who said, "Love your enemies, bless them that curse you, do good to them that hate you, and pray for them that despitefully use you, and persecute you" (Matt. 5:44). He led the way, dying for, and praying even in His dying hour, for the very men who murdered Him. Fellow-workers in the Lord's vineyard, unless we do first, and continue to do, what we teach, we are "as sounding brass or a tinkling cymbal" (1 Cor. 13:1). We cannot lead any one further than we ourselves have gone, and we have not gone one step beyond that which our lives manifest, we may see beyond, but we are not yet there.

Luke continues, "Until the day in which He was taken up, after that He through the Holy Ghost had given commandments unto the apostles whom He had chosen." The risen Jesus was still man; still when filled with the Holy Ghost, God indeed, but none the less man; He still chose to act as the Instrument of the Holy Ghost, that to the very last He might tread on ground which He thus made possible for men and women filled with the Holy Ghost to tread upon. Oh, the delicacy, Oh, the consideration of the love of Jesus!

Luke goes on to say how, during forty days Jesus was seen of His disciples, "speaking of the things pertaining to the kingdom of God; and being assembled together with them, commanded them that they should not depart from Jerusalem, but wait for the promise of the Father, which, saith He, ye have heard of Me. For John truly baptized with water; but ye shall be baptized with the Holy Ghost not many days hence." Baptized, i.e., immersed, buried in the Holy Ghost, sunk into and under the Holy Ghost; surely, surely this means more than that which is often so flippantly called the baptism of the Holy Ghost. A man who is immersed is covered entirely over, and hidden, lost to sight. Oh, to be thus lost in the Holy Ghost! out of sight of ourselves and others in the element of God's own life! This is possible, this has happened in the lives of the first disciples; and their God is our God, and their responsibilities are ours, and God's provision for them belongs as much to us as to them.

OH, SHALL WE COME SHORT OF IT?

These disciples had learned to know themselves. During the time of our Lord's agony, His trial, His death and resurrection, their love and service had been a miserable failure. Prayer had failed them in Gethsemane, their love for their Master had given way to the instinct of self-preservation, the most zealous among them had denied his Lord, the last remnant of self-dependence must have hidden its head in shame. Instead of the glad exulting cry, "Lord, even the devils are subject unto us, through Thy name," they were now brought down, emptied, humbled to the dust. And only thus was it possible that they should be endued with power from on high. It was thus that they were ready to listen to the blessed teachings of their risen Lord. Knowing now how ignorant they were, they became apt to learn; knowing how their own power and zeal had completely broken down, they were ready to yield themselves entirely up to another.

Oh, how many seek the baptism of the Holy Ghost, thinking to obtain a consciousness of power which shall be at their disposal for the work of God, which shall be under their command, exercised by them. But the very word "endued," or clothed upon, contains the idea of being under and within the power from on high; being subject to the Holy Ghost, not the Holy Ghost subject to man, being at the disposal of the Holy Ghost, at His command. The necessary qualification for being filled with the Holy Ghost is to be nothing, to be willing to be nothing, even in the eyes of those who expect something of us.

But the disciples had not even yet got rid entirely of their preconceptions; they said, "Lord, wilt Thou at this time restore again the kingdom to Israel?" They knew the unfulfilled prophecies;

THE FUTURE OF THE JEWISH NATION

was at their fingers' ends, they were aware that the prophecies of the Messiah included His future reign, and they did not understand, that which is indeed difficult to discover from the prophecies alone, that "the times of the Gentiles" should precede the reign of the Messiah on earth.

In the following prophecies the Christian dispensation is like an interruption Isa. 61:1, 2, in the middle of verse 2; Isa. 63:1-4, in the middle of verse 3; Dan. 9:24-27, middle of verse 24; Mic. 5:1-5, between verses 2 and 3; Zech. 9:9, 10, between verses 9 and 10. Until after the days of Pentecost the disciples seem never to have fully grasped the meaning of this dispensation, the gathering out from the nations a people for His name a Bride for the Lamb, a second self for Christ, in which He could live His life over again. Jesus, in answer, said to them, "It is not for you to know the times or the seasons, which the Father hath put in His own power. But ye shall receive power, after that the Holy Ghost is come upon you: and ye shall be witnesses unto Me both in Jerusalem, and in all Judea, and in Samaria, and unto the uttermost parts of the earth" (some translate ye shall receive the power of the Holy Ghost coming upon you).

"Ye shall be witnesses unto Me." How often have we been witnesses unto Christ's salvation but not unto Himself. How often have we led men to what He has done rather than what He is. John, the beloved disciple, said, "That which was from the beginning, which we have heard, which we have seen with our eyes, which we have looked upon, and our hands have handled, of the Word of life; (for the life was manifested, and we have seen it, and bear witness, and show unto you that Eternal Life, which was with the Father, and was manifested unto us); that which we have seen and heard declare we unto you." John's witness was not to experience, although perhaps he had the deepest experience of any man living in his time; not to doctrine, although his doctrine is powerful and searching; but it was to whom John witnessed in life and in word. Lord, teach us to go and do likewise.

This charge of Jesus was not a dying charge, but a parting one, and "when He had spoken these things, while they beheld, He was taken up, and a cloud received Him out of their sight." He had led them to expect this. As long ago as when He was teaching in the synagogue in Capernaum, a full year past, He had said, "What and if ye shall see the Son of man ascend up where He was before?" (John 6:62) and it was this which Mary Magdalene was commissioned to announce to the disciples. They lost sight of Him, but He had left them a precious assurance, "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world" (Matt. 28:20). They had renounced all portion upon earth, all which they possessed was Jesus, and He had left them.

But He sent them a message. Two men in white apparel stood by them. They knew not how they came there, but they knew who had sent them with their message, "Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye gazing up into heaven? This same Jesus which is taken up from you into heaven shall so come in like manner as ye have seen Him go into heaven." From that moment the coming of the Lord has been the hope of the church. "And they worshipped Him," unseen and yet near, "and returned to Jerusalem with great joy; and were continually in the temple, praising and blessing God" (Luke 24:52, 53), and this while they were waiting for the baptism of the Holy Ghost. Why should we pray for that which God has promised with sighing and groaning and lamentations? If we are honest in the acknowledgment that we come short, and are willing to let men know our deficiency, then our loving God is always found waiting to supply our need. "Thou hast ascended on high, Thou hast led captivity captive: Thou hast received gifts for men; yea, for the rebellious also, that the Lord God may dwell among them." The ascension of Jesus, who "ever liveth to make intercession" for us, is our pledge and guarantee that He can, will, and does give to us those gifts which He died, rose, and ascended to secure; and the chief of these is the gift of the Holy Ghost.

But the apostles were not always in the temple; there was a gathering of one hundred and twenty men and women who had for time and eternity upon Jesus their Lord. "These all continued with one accord in prayer and supplication, with the women, and Mary the mother of Jesus, and with His brethren." For forty days or more their Master had been educating their faith. Thomas was learning now with the rest, to believe when he did not see. Now that the man Christ Jesus was gone into heaven in that human body which saw no corruption, the God Christ Jesus was a present reality to their souls, and must have been most precious to that little company to know that they had His word for it, He was with them, unseen, unheard, yet there, and they were counting with joy upon His promise to send the Comforter. God keep us in a like attitude, praising God and counting on the greater outpouring of the Holy Ghost to come.

CURRENT EVENTS.

Two Nominations sent by the President to the Senate last week occasioned some surprise. The first was that of Mr. J. F. Olmstead, as Commissioner of the District of Columbia, in place of Commissioner Morgan. The association of Mr. Olmstead with Mr. Shepherd has caused an unpleasant odor to attach to his name, and it is expected that there may be some difficulty in getting the nomination confirmed. On Thursday, the President sent the name of Mr. Joel B. Erhardt as the successor of Mr. Henry E. Knox, as Marshal of the Southern District of New York. As Marshal Knox was nominated by President Garfield from motives of personal friendship, it was at first supposed that he had been removed. It was, however, learned on the authority of Mr. Knox himself that he had tendered his resignation. Mr. Erhardt does not belong to the same wing of the party as Mr. Knox, but the Stalwarts contend that the principle of the two appointments was identical, both men being personal friends respectively of the Presidents who nominated them.

The Joint Congressional Committee on Shipping has agreed on its report, which it may be hoped will lead to such a reform in our laws as will enable our citizens to compete on equal terms with those of other nations in the trans-Atlantic carrying trade. After an exhaustive survey of the present and past condition of our merchant marine, and a statement of the measures which were adopted by Great Britain for the benefit of the trade, and which have resulted in its present prosperity the committee says: During this whole period (1865-1882) nothing has been done by the American Congress to meet England in this direction. Our error was in not so modifying our laws as to give the American merchant marine the same advantages in this respect that English shipping was given under English laws, and our further error was that when steamships began to take the place of sailing vessels on the great lines of commerce we did not also imitate England in extending the same encouragement for the establishment of American steamship lines that she did for the establishment of English lines. Although the adoption of such a policy after England has entrenched herself in her position on the ocean for a quarter of a century would not speedily secure for us the benefits which it would have brought if it had been inaugurated before the war, yet your committee believe that it would gradually work most beneficent results. A bill embodying substantially the recommendations of the committee was reported on December 16th.

An Important Decision on the Constitution-ality of the law prohibiting the political assessments has been rendered in the Supreme Court in the Curtis case. Chief-Justice Waite, who read the decision, said most emphatically: "If there were no other reasons for legislation of this character than such as relate to the protection of those in the public service against unjust exactions, its constitutionality would in our opinion be clear; but there are others to our minds equally good. If persons in public employ may be called on by those in authority to contribute from their personal income to the expenses of political campaigns, and a refusal may lead to putting good men out of the service, liberal payments may be made the ground for keeping poor ones in. So, too, if a part of the compensation received for public services must be contributed for political purposes, it is easy to see that an increase of compensation may be required to provide the means to make the contribution, and that in this way the Government itself may be made to furnish indirectly the money to defray the expenses of keeping the political party in power that happens to have for the time being the control of the public patronage. We deem it unnecessary to pursue the subject further. In our opinion the statute under which the petitioner was convicted is constitutional."

The Suspension of the City Bank of Rochester, New York, was announced on Wednesday, November 20th, that action having been compelled by the misappropriation of several hundreds of thousands of dollars of the bank's money by the president, who used it to speculate in oil. The amount of deposits in the bank is stated to be $500,000, and the amount of paper held by the bank to be $800,000. The president's disastrous speculations, it is stated by one of the directors, has left him indebted to the bank $330,000. As other banks were depositors with the City Bank, fears are entertained that the disaster may not end there. The Second National Bank of Jefferson, Ohio, has also suspended because of defalcations.

The Defeat of Governor St. John in Kansas is accounted for on grounds other than that of a temperance retrogression. The liquor party in other states are endeavoring to make capital out of the defeat, so that it is important that the true reasons should be made known. Mr. W. C. Denning in a letter to the Witness on the subject says that a large number of Democratic prohibitionists believing prohibition to be secure, voted this year with their party: "With the loss of the temperance Democrats, the whiskey Republicans, and anti-third-term men, many of whom were temperance men, St. John was beaten. Temperance Democrats are busy denying that it is a whiskey victory. The county of Miami, which gave eight hundred majority for Garfield, went seven hundred in favor of Glick for governor. But in this county, as in many other places, the people were trying to rebuke the 'bosses' who had been running the Republican party for years in the interest of a 'ring.' I think temperance is as strong in Kansas to-day as it has ever been; and find a great many people who, though they voted against Prohibition when it was submitted, would vote for it were it before the people again. I make this statement that the people outside the State may understand the situation."

An Appeal to Ladies to Refrain from Offering wine to callers on New Year's has been issued, signed by many clergymen and influential temperance laymen. It is as follows: "In view of the approach of the holiday season, and having regard to the influence which the manner of its observance is likely to have on many, especially among the young, the undersigned, ministers of religion and others interested in the welfare of the community, would respectfully suggest that the ladies of New York, in providing for their friends on New Year's Day, should put no wine or strong drink upon their tables. We gladly bear testimony to the fact that in past years this course has been very largely followed in the best social circles, and we earnestly desire to see it universally adopted. The opening of the year is a time for serious reflection as well as joyful congratulation. We have no wish to frown upon the mirth which is associated with the season, but we are desirous that there should be nothing in it to drown thoughtfulness or endanger character; and we are sure that it will not mar the happiness of the day to feel at its close that we have done nothing throughout it to put temptation into the way of another. For the sake of their influence and example, therefore, and in order that no act of theirs should seem, even in the remotest degree, to encourage that intemperance which is such an evil in the midst of us, we hope that our ladies will accede to this suggestion."

Messrs. Moody and Sankey have visited Portsmouth, and the town and neighborhood have been stirred to their depth, by the interest and enthusiasm arising out of the evangelists' services. Immense crowds assembled at every meeting, and it is believed that many sinners have been led to Christ. On December 12th, they opened an eight days' campaign at Brighton, where great preparations had been made for their reception, and where for weeks past prayer and preliminary meetings have been held in anticipation of the visit. All sections of the Church of Christ are cordially co-operating, and a rich and lasting blessing is expected.

Eugenie, Ex-Empress of the French, Per-formed a graceful act last week. The Municipality of Marseilles with much obsequiousness presented to Napoleon III., while he was still emperor, a castle and park. When the imperial family were in misfortune and in exile, Marseilles was so mean as to seek to recover its gift in the law courts. The case was tried, and it was decided that the castle and park having been presented to the Emperor personally, were the property of his heirs. The ex-Empress with rare magnanimity has written to her agent directing him to present the town of Marseilles with the property it failed to obtain by law. The Empress says in her letter that in restoring the gift to the original donors, she is carrying out the wishes of the late Emperor.

Emigration from Ireland is not under certain conditions opposed by Mr. Parnell and his colleagues. In the course of a speech at a banquet in his honor, in Cork, Mr. Parnell said he should always oppose any attempt of the government to land emigrants in a helpless and penniless condition on the shores of the Eastern States of America. If, he said, England desired to promote the emigration of Irishmen, let them be placed on land in America provided with houses and means to raise a crop the first year of their residence. He advocated relief for congested districts by purchasing for the people vast tracts of grazing land in Ireland, which were peopled before the famine. There was no reason, he said, why they should not be peopled again. A violent speech made by Mr. Biggar, M.P., on December 18th, proves that the Irish leaders are irreconcilable. Mr. Biggar denounced Earl Spencer, Lord-Lieutenant of Ireland, as a bloodthirsty English peer, who had hanged Hynes and Myles Joyce, although satisfied of their innocence, in order to gratify the English whigs. His remarks were loudly cheered. It is stated that the government will prosecute him for making this speech.

The Archbishopric of Canterbury has been offered, it is stated by an English paper, to Rev. Edward W. Benson, D.D., Bishop of Truro, in Cornwall, who has accepted it. Mr. Gladstone in making this selection has followed the precedent of giving the primacy of the Episcopal Church to an alumnus alternately of the two great universities of Oxford and Cambridge. Dr. Tait, the late Archbishop, was an Oxford man, while Dr. Benson graduated at Cambridge. Dr. Benson is a native of Birmingham where he was born in 1829. Like his predecessor in the primacy, his earlier years, after leaving the university, were devoted to tuition, and it is remarkable that he should have been an assistant-master of Rugby School of which Dr. Tait was head master.

An Indictment was Quashed in a Court in New York last week for a very valid reason. The indictment charged a man with attempting to shoot his wife. Before his trial came on, his counsel rose in the Court of General Sessions, and announced that he had been found dead in his bed, and said he supposed that would put an end to all further proceedings. Judge Cowing said that as soon as a certified copy of the man's death was received, a note of that fact would be placed on the papers and the indictment dismissed. If anxious, awakened souls could only see in this incident a type of their state as dead to the law through the body of Christ they would soon find peace (Rom. 7 : 4).

A Case of Leprosy has been Found in Massachusetts. A physician at Salem, Mass., was consulted by an inmate of the almshouse, who was suffering from a peculiar disease unlike any of the ordinary diseases of this latitude. The physician, after examination, pronounced it leprosy. The patient arrived from San Francisco on December 10th. The disease is pronounced leprosy also by a sea captain and a physician who was familiar with that disorder in Africa. The patient is well educated, and was for several years at Honolulu as chief botanist to Queen Emma. He has been isolated and his clothing burned. These extreme precautions were rendered necessary because the law very wisely requires physicians to use every means in their power to isolate patients having contagious diseases. It is careful where physical danger is threatened, but men who are spreading moral contagion are frequently permitted to continue doing so unchecked (Eccles. 9 : 18).

A Pardoned Murderer's Request to a Newspaper reporter is mentioned in a Georgian journal. It was made by the condemned murderer whose pardon by Governor Stephens has caused much discussion in the State and throughout the country. On his arrival at home after his release, he replied, when asked by a reporter if he wished to make any statement for publication: "Nothing, nothing. I want quiet and peace—peace with man and God. Don't even say that I am home again. Let me stay out of sight of the public. Now, I'll esteem it a favor if you won't even mention my name." This desire was certainly more creditable than the conduct of other pardoned murderers who are now exhibiting themselves in dime museums and lecturing in our public buildings. They have only been saved from the consequences of their sin; the Governor's pardon does not cleanse from the guilt of it. But the sinner whom God saves is cleansed, and has no need to seek obscurity (Mark 5 : 19).

The Testimony of a Prominent Unitarian minister has been given to the fact that evangelical churches have in the Bible a solid ground for their faith in those points in which it differs from the creed of his own church. This admission was made publicly in the course of an address by Rev. George E. Ellis recently delivered before the Unitarian Club, of Boston, Mass. He said that fifty years of study of the Bible had brought him to the conclusion that "the vast majority of its readers, following its letter, its obvious sense, its natural meaning, and yielding to the impression which some of its emphatic texts make upon them find in it orthodoxy. Only that kind of ingenious, special, discriminative, and—in candor I must add—forced treatment which it receives from us liberals, can make the book teach anything but orthodoxy. The evangelical sects, so called, are clearly right in maintaining that their view of Scripture and of its doctrines draws a deep and wide division of creed between them and ourselves." Christian men will rejoice in this frank admission, for they have no higher ambition than to be found in harmony with "the natural meaning" of the Bible.

The Deepest Coal Mine in America, which is a distinction claimed by the Pottsville mine in Pennsylvania, was recently explored by a writer, who gives the following vivid description of the emotions produced by his descent: "Through the shaft 1576 feet in depth, 200 cars, holding four tons each, are lifted every day. The time occupied for lifting a full car through the whole length of the shaft is only a little more than a minute. A person of weak nerves should not brave the ordeal of descending the shaft. The machinery works as smoothly as a hotel elevator, but the speed is so terrific that one seems falling through the air. The knees after a few seconds become weak and tremulous, the ears ring as the drums of these organs are forced inward by the air pressure, and the eyes shut involuntarily as the beams of the shaft seem to dash upward only a foot or two away. Half way down you pass, with a roar and sudden crash, the ascending car; and at last, after what seemed several minutes, but is only a fraction of that time, the platform begins to slow up, halts at a gate, and through it you step into a crowd of creatures, with the shapes of men, but the blackened faces, the glaring eyes, and wild physiognomies of fiends." The sights and scenes are so novel that it seems like another world underground. Visitors on their first sight of it are forced to think of the shadowy descriptions we have of the abode of lost spirits. How sad is the thought that even now thousands of our fellow-creatures are making a descent to that place more rapid, more bewildering than that into the mine, and believers are doing comparatively little to stop them (Isa. 38 : 18).

The Little Demon from England, is the Title by which a man is proud to be known, who on Monday, December 18th, engaged in a wrestling contest in Madison Square Garden, New York. The newspapers have for some time past contained stories illustrating his prowess. Though short of stature and of comparatively slight weight, he had in his own country succeeded in throwing heavier and taller men, and had been invariably successful in all his contests. When he arrived in this country he issued a general challenge, which was accepted after a lapse of time by two burly men, but they were unable to stand before him. Then a third wrestler who came from the Rocky Mountains accepted, and he and the Englishman met on Monday. Then for the first time the "Little Demon," as the latter is called, found an antagonist he could not throw. The American planted himself firmly on his hands and knees, and the Englishman could not lift him or turn him. After a long struggle a consultation was held, at which the American said he was prepared to maintain his chosen attitude all night. The Englishman then admitted that so long as he did so he could not throw him, and the struggle was discontinued. The scene was a degrading one, but from the incident as reported, a valuable lesson may be learned. Like the Rocky Mountain wrestler, the Christian in his struggle with Satan, cannot be overcome while he continues on his knees (Eph. 6 : 11, 12, 18).

An Interesting Reunion of Veterans and their descendants took place last week in Turn Hall, New York. A large number of white-bearded men were assembled. Met there with them were a number of young men and women, young and old, and a large number of children. Four generations were represented, the oldest being the surviving members of the old Mechanics' Association of the Eleventh Ward, and their children, grand-children, and great-grand-children. The old gentlemen renewed their youth by telling stories of the days when they "ran with engine 13," or some of the other old machines that, in the days of the old Volunteer Fire Department, had their houses on or about Fiftieth Street or the docks adjacent. The younger generation looked at the relics displayed about the room, whose history was detailed by the old men who, in their youth, had "run wid the masheen." Among these relics were the battered trumpet and fire hat of Foreman George W. Trenchard, who was killed in the discharge of his duty at a fire in Essex Street, in August 1853. Another relic was the silver fire trumpet used by William M. Tweed, when he was foreman of "Big Six." As the old men recalled their experiences they seemed to grow young again. It was a strange assemblage of young and old, at which the bygone times were talked over. A scene, dimly suggesting that future feast when the Christian, having crossed the flood, sits down with his ancestors and the patriarchs in the kingdom of God (Matt. 8 : 11).

"WITHOUT CAREFULNESS."

A New Sermon by Pastor C. H. Spurgeon.

"I would have you without carefulness."—1 CORINTHIANS 7 : 32.

The Higher Rule of Life—How Christians may be Without Carefulness—I. By Avoidance of States Where it is Involved—The Marriage of Christians—The Time of Which Paul Wrote—The General Principle—Increased Worldly Business—The Steps Downward—Public Engagements—Sunday Work—Desperate Speculation—II. By Exercising Childlike Faith—Never Anticipate Trials—Be Content with the Lord's Will—Be Sure of His Love—Faith in Prayer—A Widow's Strait—"My Grandfather"—A Penurious Maiden Lady—The Best Troubles in the World.

AT the time when Paul wrote these words he was giving judgment as to whether it was expedient for Christians in those days to marry. The question was whether they were likely to be better Christians married or unmarried. This was a question of much delicacy, and Paul answered it with remarkable discretion and fidelity; and in so doing he laid down a great general principle, which is of much more value to the church to-day than Paul's private opinion about the matter of marriage or non-marriage.

The general principle in our text I will endeavor to open up before you. We who have believed are the servants of Christ, and are no longer at our own disposal. We are not our own, for we are bought with a price. If you look back in the chapter, at the twenty-third verse, you find a statement to that effect. Hence our business in life is to serve him who has redeemed us. This one occupation should entirely absorb and engross us. Everything, therefore, which helps us to serve the Lord Jesus better is a good thing; but everything which hampers and hinders us in the main business of our life, though it may be good enough for others, is bad for us.

He who would be eminent in any one direction must forego a great many other things which are perfectly allowable; these he must renounce for the sake of his one object. He will not succeed unless he sacrifices all other things to the one chief thing. So must it be with the Christian. The rule of his life is to be, "This I will not do, this I will not enjoy, this I will not allow to myself, because I could not serve God so well with it; and my business is to keep myself in the best possible form for doing my Master's work." We are to labor as much as ever we can for our Lord, and all other result of life must be to us as chaff to the wheat.

How are we to be without carefulness? This must be the work of the Holy Ghost, for He is the Comforter, and the helper of our infirmities; but as far as we are to work with Him the question needs a careful reply. How are we to be without carefulness?

I. I answer: we may hopefully attempt this in the power of God, first, by avoiding those STATES WHICH INVOLVE CAREFULNESS.

Mark well, it is not given to many to select their place in life. More or less it may be committed to us to turn to the right or to the left on certain occasions, but men and women are thrown into certain conditions in which it may be their duty to abide in their calling, though it may surround them with special difficulties. That calling may be one which ordinarily involves a vast amount of care and anxious thought, and yet they cannot get out of it. They ought not to leap the hedge which the Lord has placed along their way, for if they do they may fall into a ditch on the other side, and mire their garments, and so make matters worse. By crying to God for help, and trusting in His sure word, they will be able to bear the burden which God has put upon them, and it is their wisdom so to do. Yet there are points in which we are allowed a choice about the state in which we would place ourselves, and here our text comes in as a rule of action.

Paul, in the case before us, is talking about the marriage of Christians, and he bids Christians, in the first place, not to marry; for, says he, "I would have you without carefulness. He that is unmarried careth for the things that belong to the Lord, how he may please the Lord: but he that is married careth for the things that are of the world, how he may please his wife."

Now, observe the condition of affairs which led Paul to give this advice. Times of great persecution were present. Christians were continually being dragged into court, or set before the lions in the amphitheatre, or shut up in prison, or put to cruel deaths; in such circumstances few would desire to have families about them. The Christian man who had no wife or child could flee in a moment if it was right to flee; or when he stood before the bar of Nero he had not to think within himself, "If I die, I leave a wife and fatherless children." When the single man put on his hat he housed all his family, and thus he could move this way or that way to preach the Gospel, or to escape from persecution, and his moving was no great affair such as would be involved in transporting a family from land to land. He was thus without carefulness.

In those hard and desperate times it was the best possible thing that a man could do, or a woman either, to remain single; they were thus in the best condition for flight or suffering or service or death. It was not a time in which they could settle down and engage in trade or agriculture; and he therefore gives as a recommendation that they had better not then be married. If we get into such times again we will give the same advice, but we are not certain that we should speak thus to-day, as a general rule. The circumstances are decidedly different, and we are to follow the great principle rather than the particular instance. I have known brethren who I am sure had a great deal more care before they were married than ever they had afterward. Poor things that they were, they wanted somebody to look after them. I have known cases in which women have had great care and burden in their single state, and have found rest in the house of a husband; and it has been upon the whole the best for them in the truest sense; they served God better, and were freer from carefulness in the married estate. That is

THE RULE TO JUDGE BY.

But numbers of you never judge at all in this way. Many men and women rush into marriage when they know that it must involve them in all sorts of care and trouble, and deprive them of the possibility of doing anything in the Master's service. It is not for me to offer advice, for it is useless. I am often asked for advice, but I generally find that people have made up their minds long before they come to their minister, and only want him to sanction what they have already settled; and therefore I very seldom give any counsel.

Still, I shall lay down the general principle, which every Christian man and woman must accept—"I would have you to be free from cares." You are to put this to the front, that you are not your own, you are bought with a price; and about this matter of marriage, as well as everything else, you are to consult the will of your Lord and Master, and you are to put this as the question, "Shall I glorify God better married or unmarried? May I hope that I shall not so greatly increase my carefulness as to distract myself from serving my Lord? If so, I may enter upon it; but if not, I am not to gratify myself at my Saviour's expense. I may not marry, if I should then cease to be as good a servant of Christ as I am now."

We have got over that somewhat difficult part of our road which is concerned with marriage. We come to another which is very plain, but needs to be spoken of; namely, the matter of

INCREASED WORLDLY BUSINESS.

Some forget this advice of the apostle altogether, regarding it as a check upon enterprise; such persons take up a number of businesses, and consequently increase their cares indefinitely. Now, if you can serve God better by having a dozen shops, have a dozen; but I have known persons whom God blessed in one shop, and they lost the blessing when they must needs open two or three.

If this were the time, I could mention persons who were members of this church whose departure from the way of righteousness was owing to a grasping spirit; and that grasping spirit has in certain cases led to a foolish rush after riches, which has ended in poverty and discredit. They had as much as they could have managed, but they wanted more and more and more; and to get more they ventured upon ways and methods which were questionable. By and by the means of grace were neglected because they must attend to business. Very soon, for the same reason, they could not get up on a Sunday morning: they were so tired; they did not get the shop shut till twelve, and then there was clearing up till half-past one, and they could not get out on a Sunday morning. Worse than that, after a while they just looked over the ledger a little on Sunday afternoon. Soon the very vitals of godliness were gone, and not long after that, the name to live went also; for the power of godliness had entirely departed from them. "I would have you without carefulness," and therefore to the most enterprising brother I would say, Brother, do not fill your pocket at the expense of your soul. Do what is best for the best part of yourself; and that best part of yourself is the soul which deals with God and eternity.

Some Christian men need to have a touch on the elbow about

PUBLIC ENGAGEMENTS.

For my part, I believe that everything which concerns a man concerns a Christian, and that God never wished His servants to leave the government of this realm to all the place-hunters and unprincipled self-seekers who look for a seat in Parliament. Christian men ought to see to it that right is promoted and justice done. To abandon law-making to the worst of men would be infamous. So with everything which concerns the public weal; I believe that we are to turn the scale for truth and righteousness, and are not to let the devil have his way, and give jobbery and oppression the run of all the parishes in England. But there is a limit to a man's acceptance of public office, and let that limit be watched carefully by all the Lord's children. Let the rule be; first our God, and then our fellow-men.

SUNDAY WORK.

Here I wish to say another word to some whose occupations prevent their attendance at the house of God. I am not going to censure or judge any, but I will say this: whenever I hear of a young man who has a situation with a moderate salary, who is able to get out to worship, and has the whole Sabbath day to himself, so that he can help in the Sunday-school, and perhaps in some week-evening engagements, if I hear that he is offered twice as much money in a place where he must be shut out from worship and service, I hope he will look long before he makes the bargain. If part of the Sabbath must go, and all week-night privileges must go, I would in most cases say, "My brother, forego the temporal advantage for the sake of the spiritual."

There may be exceptions to rules, and I lay down nothing as a hard-and-fast rule, but still let this be the general guide in such matters, "I would have you without carefulness." No amount of salary can make up to you the disadvantage of being kept from the assemblies of the saints, or can make up to your soul the loss sustained by excessive labor in the house of bondage. "I would have you without carefulness."

This bears very hard upon all those forms of

of which some men are so fond. A man says, "I believe that I can get rich in a hurry by a certain venture." Do not touch it. You will have no end of care, and it may bring absolute poverty upon you. You have heard of the man who hasted to be rich, and was not innocent. I am afraid that few are long innocent who haste to be rich. They clutch at everything on a sudden, and they are apt to include in that clutch a few things which do not belong to them. What devouring care must prey upon those whose trade is as risky as a throw of the dice? When business is mere gambling, it ceases to be legitimate. Brethren, abstain from those things which inevitably create undue excitement, anxiety, and suspense. I speak as unto wise men; judge ye what I say; I would have you without carefulness, and therefore I would have you avoid those states which involve it.

II. Secondly, by keeping away from those OBJECTS OF PURSUIT which would naturally foster it, I would have you without carefulness.

When a man makes the gaining of riches the first thing in life he cannot be without carefulness. Where his treasure is, there will his heart be also. There is the carefulness to get, the carefulness to hold, the carefulness to place out at interest, the carefulness to collect dues, and so forth. Ay, and this may be the case even with poor people, who may be as full of greedy care as the millionaire. Thrift is commendable; but covetousness is detestable. Men not only lay by for a rainy day, which is well; but they make saving the main object of their lean and hungry lives, and God's glory and man's needs are alike forgotten. Now, if you live for anything but God—especially if you live to hoard up, with the determination that somehow or other you will be immensely rich, you must be full of carefulness; it cannot be helped.

Suppose that you are of a nobler spirit, and you live with the view of gaining honor among men; you will with equal certainty be full of cares. I hope you will not say, "I must be honored. I must have my neighbors think well of me; and I will make a slave or a fool or a hypocrite of myself to please them." This resolve is detestable, and if you go into that line you will not be without carefulness, I can tell you; and with all your carefulness you will never succeed.

How blessedly easy I feel in my work for God! But I owe that ease to the fact that I have no one to please but my Lord. When I preach, the last thing that ever occurs to me is to ask myself whether any of you will like it or not. It is no wish of mine to give offence; but it has never occurred to me to think whether you will be offended or not. I do not think you would respect me if I made my preaching an occasion for seeking to please you. If it pleases God it will please you, if you are right; and if you are wrong, and it does not please you, well, it never ought to please you. This enables a preacher to give all his mind to his subject; the opposite feeling would distract him, and make him live the life of a toad under a harrow.

Go into life in just that kind of spirit. Do everything to please your fellow-man if it will do him real good. Never be ungenerous nor unkind nor uncourteous; but never live to please the world. No slave is so slavish as the wretch who draws his breath from other people's nostrils, and can only live if he be approved by his neighbors. Scorn such servitude. I would have you without carefulness, and you cannot be without carefulness if you seek to please men.

Some persons have a favorite object in life—not God, but an earthly thing; and these cannot be without carefulness. Dear mother, love your children by all manner of means, but if that little one has become an idol, I am sure you cannot be without carefulness. I have known because they did not want them to die. That is to say, they never let the wind blow on them, they kept them in a handbox, screened the blessed air of heaven from them, and so brought them up that they became weak and sickly, thanks to their mothers' indulgent care. Lots of children have suffered a martyrdom from too much nursing, and excessive carefulness has created cause for care.

If it is not a child, if it is anything else that becomes the pet and hobby of life, you will soon find that you have plenty of care about it; a horse, a dog, a flower, a painting, may entangle men and women in nets of care. I have seen it, and lamented it. The more objects you set your heart upon, the more thorns there are to tear your peace of mind into shreds. I know people who dread every puff of wind, and every shower of rain, because a yacht might be tossed about, or a garden-party spoiled; such trifles may sensible people be troubled about. "What are we to do, then?" says one. Why, live to God; live to God wholly. Put everything else into its true place.

III. But now, thirdly, and better still, I would have you without carefulness by exercising a in the ever-blessed God.

He sends you troubles and trials, but be without carefulness, first, by never trying to anticipate them. Never meet them half way. "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." Oh, the strength it gives a man when he learns to pray, "Give us this day our daily bread"! It would be a poor prayer if a man should cry, "Lord, give me a guarantee of my bread for six months." No, no; the Lord never taught us to ask for that; that forestalling of the demands of the future finds no petition written for it. Our Lord would have us cultivate the feeling that whatever the necessity of the day, whatever the requirement of the day, whatever the trial of the day, we shall take it to God as it comes, and He will there and then meet the case. Commit your way unto the Lord, and then be without carefulness.

The next thing is, if you would be without carefulness, be quite content with the Lord's will. Suppose you do not prosper in business as you would like, be content not to do so. Do your best, and leave your prospering in the hands of God. Suppose that after consulting a physician you find that your complaint is not removed; duly follow all right and wise prescriptions and directions, and then leave your health with God. With regard to those you love, when you have prayed for their restoration, and they are not restored, then say still, "Not as I will, but as thou wilt."

If you cannot suit your purse to your wishes, bring your wishes to your purse. Higher still, if God does not give you all your desires, do the other thing—submit all your desires to God. When your desires and God's decrees agree all will be well. Whether God gives you your wish or you give up your wish will make no notable difference. You will be equally happy so long as your will is God's will, and God's will is your will. And I believe—and I speak experimentally—that, when you are racked with pain, if God teaches you to submit—and it is often a hard lesson—you can suffer in every limb, and yet sing in your inmost soul.

The next thing is to be quite sure about the love of God. He cannot make a mistake, and He cannot fail His people. If the worst thing, as it seems to us, should happen, it must be the right thing, because God has sent it. Be sure also that when our needs come, God's supplies will come too. The Lord is bound by His own promise to provide for all the real necessities of those who trust in Him. Oh, that we did thoroughly know God, and did fully believe in Him! Then would our peace be as a river, and our joy like that of birds when the sun is rising. Then should we sing:

"I have no cares, O Blessed Lord,
For all my cares are thine;
I live in triumph, too, for thou
Hast made thy triumphs mine."

Another sweet thing would help us to be without care, and that is, fully to believe in the power of prayer, and in the fact that God does actually answer it. God will grant His children's desires, and answer their prayers. We constantly meet with instances in which God does most manifestly come to the help of those that walk before Him aright. I personally met this week with

A NOTABLE CASE.

A dear sister is left a widow, with three children. She wonders what she shall do for the morning's bread. There is none in the house. She bethinks herself that she formerly kept shop, and that she has a few goods left, a little stained and soiled, but still saleable at a price. She goes into her room, and prays God in her agony of soul to direct her to a customer. To her delight a person asks her whether she kept shop once, in such and such a road. Yes, she is the individual. Such goods as she used to buy at the shop this person cannot get anywhere else, and she much needs them. Could she tell her where she could get the like? Yes, these are the very goods that she had hoped to sell, and though a little soiled and stained the inquirer is glad to have them. The very person who wants them has come to buy them before she has crossed the threshold to seek a customer, and she is amazed at the goodness of the Lord.

This honest woman is told that it was a mere coincidence: she says that she knows nothing about coincidences, but she blesses the Lord that her wants were supplied for the time, and she means to trust Him for the future. I did not attempt to alter her resolution to rely in future upon God in time of trouble; on the contrary, I cheered her in it, for I would have her without carefulness.

When

was a young man, before my days, he had a great family and a small income. He had a cow that he kept for his children, and he went to fetch it up from the meadow, and when it was near the house it was taken with "the staggers," and died. My grandmother said, "There, James, what shall we do now through the winter without the cow?" He replied, "My dear, God has provided for us, and He always will, though I do not know how;" and with a heavy heart he went to pray and lay his trouble before the Lord.

I have heard the dear old man tell how that morning brought a post-letter, with ninepence to pay; and grandmother said, "Troubles never come alone. Here is ninepence to pay for this letter. Shall we take it in?" But when she did take it in, it brought twenty pounds from a society in London, to which the good man had never applied. He could not make out how they knew of him at all; but the Lord knew, and led them to send the money on the day of his greatest need. These stories are a few out of many that are in my wallet, instances which I have gathered in my pilgrimage; I have seen enough in my own lifetime to fill a volume concerning the goodness of the Lord in answer to His children's prayers. When you are as sure that God answers prayer as I am sure of it then you will realize the meaning of the text, "I would have you without carefulness."

Some people of my acquaintance are full of carefulness. I know a maiden lady now who possesses what many poor people would think to be wealth. She has a fixed, regular, and ample income, but she will not spend it because she must first save a certain sum. At first her ambition was to have enough in hand to bury her. Why, she has enough already to bury twenty of her; but she keeps on nipping and screwing still, and whenever you meet her she talks of how little she eats, and how dear everything is. She might live in plenty, and have something for the cause of God; but instead of that she has always an awful story about her expenses. She is of such a spirit that she is a burden to herself, and a plague to all who are about her.

When you once give way to grumbling and grasping, then you are careful and careful and careful till you become good-for-nothing in the service of God. Do, I pray you, brothers and sisters, try to get rid of this disease, for your fretful carefulness will make you a misery to yourself and to your friends; it will destroy your power to do good; and it will cut off your communion with God; for, if you do not trust God, God will not walk with you. I do not care to have a man of my acquaintance who does not believe in me. I cannot bear him if he is always mistrusting me. And so it is with God; He will not commune with you or smile upon you, if you will not trust Him; but if you will leave everything with Him, and believe that your heavenly Father knows best, you shall have many a kind word from His lips, and you shall find what a good, gracious, loving Father He is.

Even our troubles are

THE BEST TROUBLES IN THE WORLD.

Our cross is a heavy one; but it is the best cross for us. Each man has the cross which best befits him. You could not carry mine, and I could not carry yours half so well as my own. Despite your peculiar trials, you are a happy and a favored man, and God has dealt infinitely better with you than you ever deserved or could have expected. Praise Him, then, and bless His name. Get out of the fidgets, brother, if you can. Get out of the worries, my dear sister. You are a good, dear housewife; and your husband says if he could get a little of the Mary into you, and a little of the Martha out of you, you would be a perfect wife. Is not this a practical suggestion? Let us see whether we cannot, each one, be improved by trying to be without carefulness.

The best thing you, my dear brothers and sisters, can do in a great trouble may be to remember that text, "So he giveth his beloved sleep." Pray over your difficulty, and then go to sleep, and wake up and find it all over, for the Lord has wrought a great deliverance for you. I knew one well who was always in trouble about how he should die. Dear good man, he refused to be comforted, but was often troubled about the horrors of the departing hour; until one night he went to bed, and shut his eyes on earth, and opened them in glory. He never knew that he was away from earth, till he knew that he was in heaven, for he died in his sleep; and so it turned out that he had been worrying himself about nothing.

Leave everything with God. If I can trust my soul with Him, I am sure I can trust my body with Him; if I can trust my eternal condition with Him, cannot I trust Him with a matter of a five-pound note? What, rest on Christ for glory, and not rest on Christ for bread! Come, come; the Lord get you out of that low, unbelieving state. I am nearly at a close, and so I press upon you my text. Like Paul, "I would have you without carefulness." May you be so through the power of the gracious God who taught the apostle Peter to say in the Spirit, "Casting all your care upon Him, for He careth for you." Amen.

MR. SAMUEL BOWLY.

SAMUEL BOWLY, whose name is a household word among the friends of temperance, was born at Cirencester, England, March 22d, 1802, and his great age may certainly be allowed to speak in favor of the temperance principles he has so long professed being conducive to length of days.

His father was a well-to-do miller, living a little way out of Cirencester, and upon the close of his school days Samuel entered the same line of business. Education in the villages of England, in those years, was not in a very flourishing condition, and it deserves to be mentioned that the youth, fresh from school, thought it his duty to do what he could to instruct those who had never enjoyed his advantages. This was the more to his credit when we remember, not only the ignorance of villagers generally, but the strong prejudice against educating the industrial classes. More than fifty years ago, when as a young man Mr. Bowly was engaged at this work in the West of England, there were doubtless numbers who looked upon it as a dangerous precedent, and gravely shook their heads as they thought of "whereunto this would grow."

NO HARM CAME OF IT,

however, but, on the contrary, a great deal of good, both to the teacher and the taught. As he grew in years and prospered in business, Mr. Bowly removed from Cirencester to the neighborhood of Gloucester, where he has spent the greater part of his life. At the "Horsepools," as his residence is named, he has been a kind of Gaius, for beneath his hospitable roof, at intervals, have some of the best from all parts of the world received kindly hospitality, and have taken away with them to distant lands impressions of simple English life which formed some of their most pleasant remembrances in after years. All readers of the autobiography of John B. Gough will remember his kindly references to Mr. Bowly and his home.

In speaking, however, of the work with which his name has been so honorably connected for more than forty-four years, it may be that he will be better known to many of more recent times at least. Some of the best temperance men have sprung from among whom, denominationally speaking, Samuel Bowly takes his place. They have for long years felt, and seriously considered, the evils resulting from the prevailing drinking customs of society, and the responsibility which rests upon them to counteract the desolating mischief. Mr.

Mrs. Jane Sewell.

John Bright, it is well known, has been an abstainer for about forty years. Speaking in the yearly meeting of the society, in 1875, the Right Honorable Minister said: "One friend has said that he has not taken intoxicating drinks for thirty-five years; I will not say that I have abstained for so long, but for thirty-four years, from the time I became a householder, I have not bought any wine or spirituous liquor whatever. I have in my house no decanters, and I think I have no wine-glasses, and have not had them since 1839, when I took to housekeeping. It has caused me some inconvenience and trouble, but, altogether, I have had no occasion to regret the steps I then took; while I may say that if I had again to live those thirty-four years, I have sometimes doubted whether I should, considering the difficulties occasioned thereby, take such a step again. I do not, therefore, profess to be better than other people. I believe it would be an advantage which no words in our language are at all adequate to describe, if those who try to do anything for their fellows, would bring about a current of national opinion in favor of abstinence from a source of so much evil."

It will be seen, therefore, that Mr. Samuel Bowly, in point of time, had a slight advantage over Mr. Bright in his adoption of total abstinence principles; for while the latter became an abstainer in 1839, the former dates from 1835. At a temperance meeting, which was being held at Gloucester, he

SIGNED THE PLEDGE.

It was certain that this was done on public grounds alone, and because he wished to influence the working classes to come and do likewise. He felt, no doubt, as many public-spirited, philanthropic men have since confessed, that their example would be the best eloquence that could be brought to bear upon the working classes. When he could use the old strong argument, which with Englishmen has never failed to carry great weight, when he could say "Do as I do," and not simply "Do as I say," he could make an appeal which could not fail to command respect.

One who has written in terms of true sympathy of the public career of Mr. Bowly has reminded us that although he is an earnest man of business, he does not give his time to it to the exclusion of everything else, and as an excuse for the rejection of the claims of Christ or society. "Many will be astonished to learn that he has been as successful a man of business as if he had never devoted his time to anything else. He was formerly chairman of the Gloucester and Birmingham Railway, and took an active part in the management of the Gloucestershire Banking Company. He was for some time a Director and Trustee of the Temperance

General Life Office, and took his full share of work in local societies for the benefit of his fellow townsmen.

He was the intimate friend of the late Joseph Sturge, and co-operated with him in his many political and social reforms, especially in his advocacy of permanent and universal peace. He is also an esteemed preacher of the Gospel in the Society of Friends, and takes an active part in all their proceedings. With all these claims upon time and attention, he is spending the remaining years of his life as he spent his earliest, in the service of his blessed Lord and Master.

AN ARAB ENCAMPMENT BY THE NILE.

THE picture on page 829 represents a modern Arab encampment among the ruins of departed greatness on the banks of the river Nile, in Egypt. The religion of the ancient Egyptians has been the subject of comment by many learned writers, among whom the "father of history" himself, Herodotus, stands conspicuous. According to the Bible, the crowning glory of the wisdom of King Solomon was that it "excelled the wisdom of Egypt."

Egypt may boast of an extreme antiquity. A pyramid at Sakkdrah, near Thebes, was 2000 years old in the time of Abraham. During the period of Israel's bondage in Egypt the country was already in its decadence, and its religion had lost much of its original purity.

The moral code of the Egyptians was exceedingly elaborate. It consisted of forty-two commandments or heads under which all sins might be classed. This code was the ideal placed before men on earth; it was the standard of perfection according to which they would be judged in heaven. Men were taught from childhood that they must appear in the presence of the Divine Judge, and say: "I have not privily done evil to my neighbors. I have not afflicted any, nor caused any to weep. I have not told lies. I have not done any wicked thing. I have not done what is hateful to the gods. I have not been idle. I have not stolen. I have not committed adultery. I have not committed murder." And so on.

But their commandments were positive as well as negative. On the tombs we find the common formula: "I have given bread to the hungry, water to the thirsty, clothes to the naked, shelter to the stranger." In the lamentation at funerals, the mourners see the deceased entering the presence of the Divine Judge, and they chant the words: "There is no fault in him. No accuser riseth up against him. In the truth he liveth, with the truth he nourisheth himself. The gods are satisfied with all that he hath done. He succored the afflicted, he gave bread to the hungry, drink to the thirsty, clothes to the naked, he sheltered the outcast, his doors were open to the stranger, he was a father to the fatherless." This was the principle of the final judgment announced by the Son of Man to whom "all judgment is committed" some 4000 years afterward among the hills of Palestine.

It was the opinion of Herodotus that the "Egyptians were the first people who affirmed the immortality of the soul." Birth into this world they called death into the land of darkness; death they spoke of as birth into the manifestation of light. There are a large number of papyri found in the tombs laid beside and upon the mummies, which are known as "The Book" or "Ritual of the Dead." The "Book of the Dead" describes the passage of the deceased into the presence of the Eternal Judge, Osiris.

The story of Osiris is one of great interest. He is said to have been a divine being, who in ancient times descended to earth and took upon him the form and nature of man. A being perfectly good, he ameliorated mankind by persuasion and by good deeds. But at length he was killed by Typhon the Evil One. His wife Isis went through the world in search of him, asking the little children if they had seen her lord. He was raised to life again, and he made his son Horus his avenger on the Evil One. It is this sacrifice which Osiris had once accomplished in behalf of man on earth which makes him the protector of man in the other world, the invisible place. The god-man becomes not only the guide of the deceased through the outer world; he also clothes him with his own divine nature, so that throughout the books the deceased is described as Osiris M. or N., for he has put on, and become identified with, Osiris; and he sits on the throne of justice, the Judge Eternal.

In the claim which Egypt has upon our attention and affections, let us never forget that it welcomed as guest the patriarch to whom Judaism, Christianity, and Islam trace back their spiritual origin, "our forefather Abraham;" and that it was the home in which the infant Saviour of the world, lying in His mother's arms, found a refuge, and the highest significance was given to the words, "Out of Egypt have I called My Son."

MRS. SEWELL.

MRS. JANE SEWELL has been doing an unostentatious, but most important work on behalf of Gospel Temperance in London. She was born in the little village of Long Stratton, Norfolk, and early fell under the blight of the liquor curse. The youngest of four children, her father died when she was an infant, and her mother was left in a somewhat straitened position through the intemperate habits of her husband, sometime before his decease. This circumstance led to the subject of our sketch being sent out into the world at an early age. However, her mother was a pious woman, and early taught her child the way heavenward.

When she was twenty years of age, Mrs. Sewell was launched upon the great sea of London life. Here, amid the manifold temptations and distractions of a busy and thoughtless city, early religious impressions were in great part effaced. She married, and determined to enjoy such pleasures as the world affords; but she soon found that these were very few, and that in the majority of cases they left behind a bitter taste. The year 1870 was a momentous one in her career. She was induced to attend a mission in Whitecross Street, and through the instrumentality of George Vigeon, she was as a heart-sick penitent brought back to the fold of Christ. It was then that she began to cast about for a useful sphere of labor for her Redeemer.

Shortly after the opening of Hoxton Hall, by Mr. William Noble, hearing so much of the good work being done there by the Blue Ribbon Army, she determined to go and judge for herself. She was very favorably impressed, and, finding that the Gospel was blended with Temperance, she saw at once that she could conscientiously join in so excellent a movement. First essaying to address a women's meeting she felt her own weakness and unworthiness; but God blessed her testimony, and has since continued to do so most richly.

Since then Mrs. Sewell has occupied most of her time in the great harvest field. Her path has not lain among roses; it has often been beset with briars and thorns, but drawing her strength from One who never fails us in time of need, she has gone boldly forward, conquering and to conquer. She has done splendid and enduring work under the Society for Propagating the Gospel in Beer-houses. Such an occupation as visiting low drinking-saloons, has required rare nerve, tact, and character; but that Mrs. Sewell has well fulfilled her mission is evident from the records of the association. She has distributed hundreds of tracts to the wretched hangers-on at the bars; and she has had the unspeakable satisfaction, from time to time, of seeing the very outcasts of society brought into the glorious liberty of the Gospel. On one occasion a rum-seller accosted her with the words, "A pretty fine thing you have done, coming here with your tracts—my barmen will not serve on Sundays." She remarked that she hoped it was true, and rather singularly the publican in replying that it was, expressed a hope that they would continue in their good resolution!

Mrs. Sewell was led to take up this branch of the work through seeing, one Sunday evening when leaving public worship, so many young people blindly and callously rushing on to certain ruin. She prayed God to enable her to do something to stem the tide of evil flowing with seemingly irresistible force around her; and on the next Sabbath evening, accompanied by one lady friend, she visited twelve beer houses, at only one of which they were uncourteously received. Since then she has been appointed by the society above named, local secretary for a busy district, and is now a regular visitor at twenty-two beer houses.

Many are the stories that Mrs. Sewell has to tell of her rescue work. She has been the means of arresting country girls, once Sabbath-school scholars, from a life of degrading misery; she has brought together husbands and wives, separated by the giant curse of intemperance; and she has carried love and happiness into many a household, where for long blank years they had been utterly unknown.

One out of many instances of self-sacrificing duty and its delightful reward must suffice. Mrs. Sewell had occasion to visit the "home" of a man who once occupied a good position, but who through dreadfully dissolute habits brought his wife and four children to the depths of degradation and misery. "Never," says Mrs. Sewell, "shall I forget the first visit to that home. The door was opened by his heart-broken wife, who ushered me along a dark passage. Then following her down a flight of stairs to a back kitchen, she informed the man that a lady from Hoxton Hall had come to see him. He shouted, 'I will not see her.' But I called out, 'I am coming.' He still refused to see me, daring his wife to open the door. After much perseverance, however, I succeeded in gaining an entrance. I found the room was destitute of all furniture except the bed he was lying on. A chair without a bottom was found for me to sit upon, and after staying with him for some time, pleading with him, I knelt down and asked God to save him. Before coming away he promised he would have no more drink.

"On the following day I asked Mrs. Noble to come with me to visit this case, and she kindly consented. When we reached the house we found him at home sober, but looking very dejected. We asked him to come up in the evening to the hall, but he said he would rather wait until he was better. Mrs. Noble turning to him, said, 'You know what the hymn says:

"If you wait until you're better,
You will never come at all."

He at last made a promise to come and sign the pledge, and true to that word he was there and signed the pledge. I followed that man up and never let two days pass without visiting that home. What a change had taken place in a few weeks' time! Now nearly three years have passed away, and that household is entirely transformed. Instead of uproar and squalor, peace and comfort are found, and the little circle is thoroughly united and happy. Such are some of the results being daily effected by Gospel Temperance."

RICHARD OWEN'S CHOICE.

A Story in Three Chapters.

CHAPTER III.

Fernley Hall Sold.

In the Bradborough counting-house were Mr. Farr and his manager, Crossley. They had been hard at work turning over huge ledgers, making up accounts, and balancing the same. After several busy days their labors seemed to have come to an end; and if we might judge from the expression on the master's face, the result must have been very satisfactory.

Mr. Farr might well be satisfied, for he had never known so prosperous a year, and his own wealth, and that of his partner, had increased to a degree never dreamed of by either.

"Well, Crossley," said he, "this has been a wonderful year, equal to the four that went before it. Another or two of the same sort, and we have only had three bad debts; Scott's was the largest, I believe."

"Yes, sir; we did some repairs first, and then we made some new machinery for his mill. He failed a few weeks afterward."

"I remember. We turned away Owen for refusing to help at those repairs on a Sunday."

"Yes, sir. And, Mr. Farr, it is a very singular circumstance; but there was Sunday work done at every one of those three places where we made bad debts."

Mr. Farr laughed; then turned suddenly grave as he saw a peculiar look on the face of his manager. "Do you think, Crossley," he asked, "that these bad debts were the consequence of our working on Sunday?"

"It isn't for me to say that positively, sir, but—"

"But what? Out with it, man. I promise you, Crossley, I will not be offended with so old and faithful a servant as yourself."

"Then, sir, I do think that, whether those bad debts really came through Sunday work or not, we deserved them for ever doing it. And, Mr. Farr, where are the men we worked for on the Sunday?"

Mr. Farr colored, but did not at once reply, for Crossley's remark struck home. The three gentlemen to whom the manager alluded, might all be classed among those who, hastening to be rich, had not been innocent. They had worked with only one end in view, that of winning great wealth. To a certain extent they had succeeded; but not being contented with fair gains, they had speculated deeply—gambled would perhaps be the better word, and had found that "riches certainly make themselves wings." These men were worse than poor, for they had not the means of paying what they owed.

"It is rather singular, Crossley," said Mr. Farr, after a brief silence; "you are right with regard to these bad debts. Besides, I consider I lost something in another way when I dismissed Richard Owen."

"I thought little enough about it then, but I have seen things in a different light since. Owen has lost nothing by the change, for God has prospered him in his new calling."

might turn our backs on trade altogether. Not that I should retire so early, though," interposed the speaker, somewhat hastily, "for a man in the prime of life ought to have employment, whatever his circumstances may be. However, Crossley, both Mr. Bradley and I feel greatly indebted to your exertions, and wish to give you a proof of our esteem."

As Mr. Farr spoke, he slipped a bank note of great value into his manager's hand, and interrupted Crossley's acknowledgments by saying, "This is not all. We intend to increase your salary, and next year, if things go on well, you shall have a share in the concern."

Crossley warmly expressed his gratitude, and Mr. Farr soon after once more glanced over the books. "Let me see," said he, "we

"And hasn't He prospered us, then? Had we ever such a year as this has been?"

"No, sir, but"—

"You are giving me another of your 'buts,' Crossley, and putting on that foreboding face that might foretell all sorts of evils. Now if you say that Richard Owen has prospered because he did a certain thing, you might as well say that I ought to be ruined because I did the opposite; yet you see we have thriven in our large way, just as much as Owen has done in his little one."

"I don't know whether I can make plain what I feel about the matter, Mr. Farr," said Crossley, "but lately I have been led to see things in a different light from what I once did. And it comes to just this, that I would rather prosper in a very little humble way, if that were God's way, than be the richest man in the world and feel that, in getting my wealth I had broken and encouraged others to break one of God's commandments."

"And you are afraid of our present prosperity, because you think we have not gone the way to draw down a blessing upon us?"

Mr. Farr spoke very calmly, far more so than Crossley expected. Having said so much, the manager determined not to shrink from what he felt to be true, and therefore replied, "Yes, sir, I am afraid. And oh, Mr. Farr," he added, "I hope you will forgive my plain speaking. Nobody wishes your prosperity more than I do, or"—

"Has done more to advance it. Crossley, I am not offended at you; because I know no master ever had a more faithful servant than yourself. But you would not have spoken in this manner a year ago."

"No, sir. But I can say like one of old, that 'Whereas I was blind, now I see.' The same blessed Saviour who restored that man's eyesight, opened the eyes of my understanding also. He enabled me to see myself as a lost and guilty sinner, unable by anything I could do to gain pardon or acceptance."

"And then, Crossley?"

"And then, sir, He revealed Himself to me, as the Saviour of guilty sinners such as I, as the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world. And oh, sir, when we once understand something of Christ's wondrous love to us, we are stirred to manifest our faith in Him by our obedience to His commandments. We begin to fear to offend while we love to obey Him."

"Why, Crossley, I never thought I should hear you holding forth in this fashion, still less that I should have patience to listen."

"Indeed, sir, I thought it as little as you; but when the 'glad tidings of great joy' have come home to our own hearts we long for others to share them with us. You're not offended, I trust."

"Not a bit, not a bit. I am quite sure you mean well. We shall, perhaps, have a little more talk on the subject; and one thing I will promise, that no man employed here shall ever be asked to do a stroke of work on Sunday."

"Thank God for that," said Crossley, as his master left the counting-house. "That is a step in the right direction, though I doubt it is caused less by a wish to obey the commandment—'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy,' than by the thought that no benefit comes of Sunday work after all."

As Mr. Farr went home, his mind was a good deal occupied with the conversation between Crossley and himself. He could not help thinking of the many earthly blessings which surrounded him, and asking himself, "Have I felt thankful for them? Have I considered from whom all blessings flow, or have I considered that it is just by my own labor I have gotten these things?"

The answer was by no means a satisfactory one; and when Mr. Farr entered his well-furnished, cheerful home, and saw his smiling wife ready to welcome him, while little hands laid hold of his, and little voices gave a shout of gladness, his heart smote him for his want of gratitude to the Giver of all good.

"I have a visitor here," said Mrs. Farr; "one you will be very glad to see."

"Who is it, dear?" he replied in a pleasant tone, for he was kind and gentle in his home, if somewhat stern at times in business matters.

"My brother Henry."

Mr. Farr's face showed that he was gratified at finding his brother-in-law by his fireside, and gave him a hearty welcome. "And what has brought you to Bradborough?" he inquired, "I can hardly hope that such a busy man as you could spare a day for a pleasure trip."

"The business part of my excursion is this. I think of coming to live here altogether, and I should like to find a suitable residence."

* * * * *
Toward evening the two gentlemen might have been seen at the top of Ash Lane, and at the lodge-door, speaking to Mrs. Owen. Immediately afterward they passed through into the grounds, where Mr. Farr met his old workman for the first time since his sudden dismissal.

"So you are tenant of the lodge, Owen?" said Mr. Farr.

"Yes, sir. But only so long as the Hall is unsold, at least unless the purchaser choose to let me stay; I am liable to be sent away at a week's notice."

"I suppose you carry on a business here."

"Yes, sir. My wife's father has large nursery grounds and gardens. He advised me to begin, and furnished the stuff. The situation is a very good one for the purpose; but I have always tried to feel prepared for a change, as I am liable to one at any time."

"I presume you would be sorry to leave the lodge."

"Well, sir, I certainly should. I can't deny that, but—"

"But what?" asked Mr. Farr.

"The past has taught me to trust for the future, sir, that is all."

Mr. Farr looked keenly in Owen's face as if to see whether any shadow of reproach against himself were mingled with those words. But Richard meant simply what he said, and so Mr. Farr felt.

By this time the two gentlemen were ready to go, and they accordingly bade Owen good evening as they passed through the gateway.

"Are you willing to buy?" inquired Mr. Fletcher, Mr. Farr's companion.

"Quite."

"Then we will see the agent to-night, if possible, for I must leave by the first train in the morning."

They accordingly went to the agent's house, found Mr. Wood at home, and, after some conversation, the bargain was concluded, and they became the purchasers of Fernley Hall. The news that they had concluded the bargain sounded very pleasantly in the ears of Mrs. Farr, seconded as it was by the promise of a handsome new house, as soon as it could be erected, and she was full of joyful anticipations.

There was a visitor at the lodge about the same time. Mr. Wood went to tell the Owens that the old Hall was sold at last. "And who do you think has bought it?" he asked, in a sorrowful tone.

"Mr. Farr, hasn't he, sir?"

"He and his brother, Mr. Henry Fletcher, are the joint purchasers. It is a most singular thing, is it not? Of course, Owen, you know this might come any day, and I have let you have instant information, to prepare you for the worst. By the way, though, I have brought you no notice to quit immediately. I asked Mr. Farr if I must do so, and he said, 'No, the lodge would probably be the last thing touched, and, in the mean while, you could take care of the place as before.'"

This was better news than they expected, and the Owens did not forget to thank God for it, as they really thought Mr. Farr would at once dismiss them from the lodge and render it necessary for them to seek another home at a distance.

On the following morning Mr. Farr accompanied his brother-in-law to the train, and almost the last words which he said as he shook him by the hand were, "Be sure you remember that little matter I mentioned to you, and include it in the plan."

"I will not neglect it. It shall be an ornament to the place."

The train started, and Mr. Fletcher was whirled out of sight, while Mr. Farr returned home with an expression of great satisfaction on his face.

Weeks passed on. Workmen were busily engaged in pulling down Fernley Hall, and digging out earth for the foundations of the new villas to be built on its site, but the lodge still stood, and the Owens remained its unmolested tenants. As, however, the work went on, Richard and his wife became anxious to know how long they would be permitted to remain there. He accordingly went to Mr. Wood; but that gentleman could give him no information. "I should advise you to go to Mr. Farr and ask him yourself," he said. "I dare say you feel rather unwilling to do so; but, for the sake of your wife and children, you ought not to risk having to turn out all in a hurry at last."

Owen thanked Mr. Wood, and went to call upon his former employer. Mr. Farr was in the office, and to him Richard told his errand. "I don't like troubling you, sir," he said, "only if you would be so good as to say when I shall have to leave the lodge, I could look out for a little place to go to. I'm very grateful to you, Mr. Farr, for letting us stop in it, for I hardly thought—"

Owen stopped and looked a little confused. But Mr. Farr completed the sentence. "You hardly thought that the employer who turned you away because you would not break God's command, would be willing to do you a kinder turn should it be in his power. You judge hardly, Owen."

Richard was a little troubled at this. "Oh, sir!" he exclaimed, "I should not have said those words. Indeed, except in wanting me to do that one thing, no one could be a better employer. Mr. Farr, it was not that I wished to displease you, but that I durst not disobey my Heavenly Master."

Mr. Farr smiled. "I believe you, Owen. And now I will answer your question. You will have to leave the old lodge when the new one is ready for you to go into."

So saying, Mr. Farr took down a roll of plans, and showed Richard the drawing of a new lodge which was to be built before the other was pulled down.

"When I planned these large houses for myself and others, I contrived a home for you, Owen. We should need both a lodge and a keeper for it, I was aware, and I would not desire fitter tenants for the little spot than you and your family."

Richard, utterly overcome, tried to pour out his thanks; but Mr. Farr would not let him. On the contrary he said he had something to tell Richard, and he accordingly mentioned his resolution never again, under any circumstances, to allow Sunday work to be done by those in his employment.

"God has graciously opened my eyes to see that His blessing is better than thousands of gold and silver. He has also shown me that whatever may be a man's worldly wealth, he is poor indeed who has no treasure laid up in heaven."

More still, did Mr. Farr say, and then he dismissed Richard, who went home with a light heart to tell his wife of what was in store for them.

"Oh, Richard!" said Mary, while glad tears ran down her cheeks, "surely we have again found by experience how our God fulfils His promises. Isn't this fulfilled to us? 'And it shall come to pass that before they call I will answer; and while they are yet speaking, I will hear.'"

In due time the new lodge was finished, and the Owens became its tenants, humbly and thankfully ascribing praise to God as the Giver of all these mercies. They are prospering in business, yet not so anxious about temporal things as to forget those which belong to their eternal peace.

And Mr. Farr, as he goes in and out of his own new house, often stops at the lodge to say a few words to the Owens and their children. He is a far happier man now that he holds his wealth as a talent intrusted to him by God, and for which he must one day give an account, than he was in those old times when gaining money was the great end and aim of his life.
